law, the Dolphin caused him at his coming, abhominably and cruelly to be murdered. After whose death the Dolphins seruants disposed him of his arap, and cast his naked body into a vile pit. The Duke being thus murdered, Philip his sonne, who had married the Lady Micquell the Dolphins sister, entered into all his fathers possessions: and shortly after, he toynd in amitie with the King of England, promising him in marriage his sister in law the Lady Katherine, & to be heire to King Charles: King Henry promised to deliuer to him so many of them as were guilty of his fathers murdering, as came into his hands, and the Dolphin should be for ever excluded from all title to the crowne of France. The Earle of St. Paul was gouernor of Paris although he were but xiiii. yeres of age, he gouerned the Citie wisely, to the Duke of Burgoyne befoze, who had put him into that charge. The Dolphin would haue excused himselfe of the murder lately committed, but could not, for he was led and gouerned by them that had committed it. Indee diuers of them had their friends killed, in the murder of Paris, when the Earle of Erminake and the other prisoners were killed there, and therefore to be reuenged on the Duke they cared not in what danger they put the Realme, nor in what blame the Dolphin came, who notwithstanding he put them from him, and they went out of the Realme, all this would not appease the matter, nor reconcile the Dolphin to the Duke Philip.

King Henry with his whole armie returned to Pauits, where of his host he made three battails, whercof the one he deliuered to the Duke of Gloucester, whom he sent to subdue the strong towne called Saint Germayns, which after many battails and skirmishes, in thort time was yielded to him for the King. The second battail he sent to the Castle of Mount Ope, which in like manner fearing the Englishmens puissance, yielded them to the King. And with the third of the said battails the King in his owne person went to assiege Petoilance, which about all other was most strong. The situation of this towne was in a plentifulous Ile, betwixt two armes of the sea, no man might approach nigh to assault it by land, but only by the bydye: and by water no vessel might come nigh vnto it, for the infinite multitude of piles that were fired and hid in the riuers. This towne was also defended with high and strong walles, within it also there were people in great number, as well of the inhabitants as of garrisons of men of war, that were purposely deputed for the defence thereof. Wherefore the King considering the strength, and defence of this place, assembled diuers ships and other small vessels, wherein by right great labour, hee first anoyed and clenched the riuer of the foresaid piles, which being done, he made all those vessels to be fastned together with chaines, and then he commaunded to be made certaine small Castles and towers of timber, which when they were finished, hee entended by strength of men, in those ships to assault the walles of the towne, but the garrisons and inhabitants being feared at the sight of these towers, before they were all finished, they sent their captaines to the King to treat with him for peace, which was granted them vpon condition, that if they were not aided by the last of Nouember, by the Frenchmen, they should deliuer the towne to the King, and when the day came they according to covenant delivered the towne to the King, and then the King returned to Spaint, and sent the Duke of Excester to besidge the Caste of Gallard, which to him was yielded the 20. of December.

King Henry solemnized the feast of the Nativite of our Lord in the Citie of Roane: he sent the Earle of Salisburie to take the towne of Freseay, which in short time was delivered to him. The Earle Marshall and the Earle of Huntingdon, weresent to subdue the prouince of Shenen, where the Dolphin had deputed a capitaine with a strong power, which capitaine met the two Carles and gaue them battaile, but the Englishmen remained conquerours, and thus the two Carles subdued the prouince of Shenen, without any great resistance.

Whildest these and many other victories were atchieued, the King continuing in the Citie of Roane, lauding God, the Ambassadors of Charles King of Fraunce, and of Philip Duke of Burgoigne, came to treat of peace, where of the King they were honorably receiued, and hee sent backe with them to the French King, and the Duke of Burgoigne, his Ambassadors with full authoritie to conclude this long sought peace, of which Ambassadors, the principall was the Earle of Warwicke in companie of certaine Bishops and other discrete men, accompanied with a strong power of armed men. These Ambassadors were first brought to the Duke of Burgoigne, because hee was next vnto them, and after they toke their Iourney untill they came to the Citie of Troyes, where they found King Charles of Fraunce, with the Quene his wife, and that beautifull Lady Katherine their daughter. And entering into communication of peace with the Kings Counsell of Fraunce, the way of peace was found betwixt those two Kings by alliance, that is to say, by a marriage to be made betwixt the most victorious King of England, and the Lady Katherine daughter to the King and Quene of Fraunce: but because they perceived that many things might not be done without the presence of the Kings, as well for the appoyntment of their seales for the ratifying of the articles of this peace, as for the solemnization of the matrimonie, and also that King Charles was a man of many yeres, they considered that the King of England at a certaine day amongst them limited should come to the foresaid Citie of Troyes, with as great an armed power as he would: at which day appointed, if he failed to be there, all his communication of peace should bee as void. These things thus concluded and set downe in writing, the Earle of Warwicke with his company returned to the King of England, to whom they declared by order what they had done, who was content in all things to performe their appoyntments, and prepared for his Iourney. He called together knights, men of armes and archers to the number of sixtene thousand, of them the most part were archers: and when the time came that hee would depart towards Troyes (as hee was accustomed) hee divided his people in three parts and battels, and two Ioungs, and in that manner the eight day of May, he entered his Iourney toward Troyes in Campaigne, where hee was met by the Duke of Burgoigne accompanied with many noble men, two leagues without the towne, whom hee receiued with great honour and due obseruance. Then this most victorious King accompanied both of English and Frenchmen of euery estate and degree, entered the foresaid Citie of Troyes, the streets whereof without any abiding hee passed untill he came to the Kings Palace, where King Charles and the Quene his wife abode his coming, of whom hee was receiued godly and after a princely manner. When the King of England was thus royally receiued, after the due resolutions on his part made to King Charles and the Quene, hee departed from them, and by the Duke of Burgoigne and other great estates as well of England as of Fraunce, hee was conveyed to his lodges. The Citie was diuided into two parts, whereof the one halfe was assigned to the Frenchmen and Burgonians, and the other halfe to the Englishmen: and because that part assigned to the Englishmen, sufficed not to receive them all within the walles, but that a great part of them must be lodged in the suburbs, the King of England, because his people on that part should haue free concourse together, he caused the wall on that part of the Citie where he was lodged, to be cast downe to the ground. King Charles gaue authoritie and power to Isabel his wife and Quene, to Philip Duke of Burgoigne, and to certaine other of his Counsell plenarily to conclude the peace with King Henry, for him and for his Realme of Fraunce, vnder such conditions as should be decreed, and also to proue, ratifie, and confirme the same, by oth solemnized in the person of King Charles, without fraud, in all things to be observed vnto the said King Henry, his heires and successors, by the said King Charles his heires and successors, &c. On the 21. of May, in the xl. yere of the reigne of King Charles, in the Cathedrall Church of Troyes, the King of England with the Duke of Clarence his brother, and other Dukes, Carles, Bishops, Barons, Lords of estate, and other prelates of England, and Isabel the Quene of Fraunce, with the Duke of Burgoigne, and other of the Kings Counsell of Fraunce, and in that part his especial commissioners, for and in the name of the King of Fraunce, and also for themselves, and in their proper names, in a great assembly of the three estates of France, vulgarly called their Parliament, concluded a peace betwixt the two Realmes of England and Fraunce, and the same ratified and approued with the conditions and articles that in part shall follow, whereupon writings were made, sealed with the boade seale of the said King Charles. When immediately Isabel the Quene and the Duke of Burgoigne, in the name of King Charles, made a solemne oth vpon the holy Euangelists, that the same Charles, his heires and successors should obserue and keepe, without fraud, the peace made betwixt the two Realmes. And the same oth the Quene and the Duke of Burgoigne in their owne names and for themselves, their heires and successors, made vnto the King for him, his heires and successors, and after them as many as were there present both of the Kings Counsell, and also of the Parliament, as Bishops, Lords, knights, and commons, made the same oth to the King. And the 23. and 24. day of May the Chancellor of France, and many other Lords, bishops, prelates, lates, and noble men gave the like faith and oth to King Henry of England.

The third of June, being present the Councell of King Charles, Isabel Quene of France, the Duke of Burgoigne, and the Parliament of France, and also the Duke of Clarence, with many Bishops, Lords, and Knights of England, with King Henry, the matrimonie was solemnized betwixt the most victorious King Henry of England, and the excellent and glorious Lady Katherine daughter to Charles of Fraunce and Isabel his Quene. The peace that was confirmed betwixt the said two Kings and their Realmes was read as followeth.

King Henry from now forth during the life of King Charles, shall not name or write himselfe King of Fraunce, nor shall not suffer himselfe of his people so to be named or written. After the death of King Charles, King Henry shall be King of Fraunce peaceably with his heires and successors. And because King Charles by reason of his infirmities is unable to governe the common weale, King Henry during the life of Charles, shall rule and governe the Realme of Fraunce, to the profite and honor of the same King Charles. King Charles in all his writings shall name the same King Henry our sonne and heire of Fraunce, during the life of the said King Charles. King Henry shall be written, Henry King of England, and heire and regent of Fraunce, and in the like manner he shall write himselfe in all things that shall be authorized under his owne seale. King Henry shall call King Charles his father, and Quene Isabel his mother, and shall honor them. For King Henry shall not prohibit, with-hold, nor defend King Charles his father of the crowne of Fraunce, nor the issues or revenues thereof. And the Quene his mother at all times during her life, he shall keepe in due estate as belongeth to his mother. &c. with divers other articles which for brevities I set not downe in this place.

After the final end and accomplishing of this marriage, covenants and conditions, ratified in all parts, King Henry accompanied of King Charles and of his counsell, of the two Quenes, Isabel and Katherine, and of the Duke of Burgoigne, departed from Troyes, and toke his journey to Paris, and from Paris not many dayes after they all went to lay siege to the Citie of Sens, which was to them contrary, but before the whole host were settled in their places, the capitaine Citizens and garrisons submitted their bodies and Citie with all that they had to the King. When they halted to Sponstreu, which to wane they toke by force.

On the xv. of July they went to the Citie of Melane, and encircled the same with a strong siege, for there were the Kings of England, of France, and Scotland, the Dukes of Burgoigne, Bavier, Clarence Bedford, and Gloucester, the Carles of Sparch, Marwicke, Huntington, and Somerset, &c. This siege continued 14. weekes and 00. dayes, from the feast of Mary Magdalen, to the feast of All Saints, not without in a manner euery day, a conflict and force skirmish, but at length for want of victuals the besieged, yielded themselves to the Kings of England and France, from whence the foresaid Kings with a great part of their armies went to Paris.

King Henry
besieged Sens
June.
Tho. Walling.

King Henry kept his Christmasse in the Citie of Paris, in the Castle of St. Anthony. And after he had holden a Parliament there he went to Roane. and there with his Normans, and Englishmen held a Parliament. And then when he had established sure guard for his Realme of France, and Dutchie of Normandie, he passed through Picardy to Calais, and so to Douer, where with his Quene he landed on Candlemasse day.

The fourteenth of Februarie Quene Katherine was crowned at Westminster, unto whom the King assigned to hir dowrie 10000. markes: also he consented to the deliuerie of the King of Scots, who had been long prisoner in England, with condition, that before his departure out of England, he shall take to wife the Duke of Somersetts sister, neece to the cardinal of Winchester.

The xxii. of March being Easter day, Thomas duke of Clarence, the Kings brother, the Lord Roke Sparthall, and his brother Gilbert Vinframuile Earle of Bime, and John Gray made Earle of Tankerull in Normandy, with many other Lordes, were slaine beyond the water of Leire in France, & many Lordes were taken prisoners, of the which were the Earle of Huntington and the Earle of Somerset and his brother, the Lord Fitz Walter, and other, the bastard of Clarence, with strength, got his fathers body, brought it into England and buried it at Canterbury, besides B. H. the fourth his father.

In a Parliament at Westminster it was ordained that no man should proffer gold in payment, but if it held weight, wherefore were obtained balances and weights. The King suppressed the French houses of religious monks and friers, and such like in England, because they thought til of the conquest over France, their lands were given by him and Henry the first, to monasteries and colleges of learned men.

In this Parliament was demanded a subside. The Bishop of Winchester lent the King 20000. pound to restrain the matter. The King hauing disposed all things in order concerning the Realme of England and the wars in Scotland, leauing in England his Quene with a great power, to the number (after Enguerant) of 30. thousand, returned into France, where, after he had visited the King and Quene of France at Paris, he toke the Castle of Beclor by assault. And when hee heard, that his enemies prepared themselves to battaile, he approached the Rood of Loyze, about which flood it was said his enemies were: but against him came no man. Wherefore the King led his host to lay siege to the Citie of Sens, commonly called the Kings new towne, which towne for lacke of victuals yielded themselves and the towne to the King.

John Lord Mortimer brake forth of the tower of London, and being afterwards taken, he was drawn and hanged: as shall be shewed in the second parte of the reigne of King Henry the first.

In the month of October, when King Henry had deliuered the Citie of Paris from all annoyances, hee with his host went to besiege the Citie of Spaul in Wyte, to which Citie nigh adioyning, is a place called the Sparcet of Spaul, betwixt which two places floweth the riuer of Sparne, which which also environeth both the same places.

This Citie was besieged all the winter, wherein were so many, and so great stormes and floods of raine, that the Kings host was often annoyed with hunger and cold.

The 6. of December, at foure of the clocke in the afternone, Lady Katherine Quene of England, brought forth his first begotten son in the Castle of Windore, and his name was given him Henry: for there received him at the font, John Duke of Bedford his uncle Lord Warden of England, and Henry the Kings uncle Bishop of Winchester, and Jaquelyn Dutches of Holland that remained then in England. Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canturburie, doing the office of Baptisme.

1422. King Henry held his feast of Christs Nativitee at the siege before Meture, for he would not give over his siege.

An. reg. 10. In the moneth of February the Knights that were in garrison, and the principall of the Citie of Meaux perceiving that the summer coming should cause the siege to be more light, and lesse painfull to the Englishmen, and difficult unto themselves, departed the Citie, and went into that place, that is called the Markete of Meaux, as to the more defensible holde, after whose departing the common people having none abilitie to resist the Kings power, yielded themselves and the Citie to the King. After this in the moneth of May, when the King had sore beaten the foresaid Markete of Meaux, he constrained the Frenchmen that were besieged, to condescend unto certaine covenants, and to deliver the place unto him: and shortly after were delivered to the King the towne of Dreux in Walois, the Castle of Pier Pontmerailaw, Offemount and many others. After the rendring of these townes and Castles, the King sent over into England prisoners 160. which landed at Hampton on the first of July, from whence they were brought in carts to the tower of London, and the King returned to Paris.

Quene Katherine rine fallen into France.

In the moneth of Aprill Katherine Quene of England shipped at Hampton, and sailed over into France with a strong power, under the conduct of John Duke of Bedford the Kings brother, Humfrey duke of Gloucester being appointed Warden of England, in the Duke of Bedfords place: when the coming of Quene Katherine was knowne to King Henry his husband, and to Charles King of France, both these Kings, and with them the Quene of France, accompanied with many great Lords and estates, as well of England as of France, went to meete him at Boys de Viscenne, where he was sorely received of them, as if he had been an Angell sent from God. The xxv. day of May the two Kings of England and France, with their Quenes departed from Boys de Viscenne, and went to Paris: the King of England and his Quene were lodged in the Castle of Louvre, and the King of France and his Quene were lodged in the pallace of St. Paul.

King Henry hearing that the Dolphin with a great power besieged the towne of Guisney, hee determined to goe himselfe to the raising of the siege, and so came to the towne of Corbell, and to Senlis, where he was ward so sicke, of an hot burning ague, with a vehement fire, that hee was constrained strained to farke and send his brother John Duke of Bedford, Thomas Beauford duke of Excester, the Earles of March, and Warwick, to rescue them of Corne: but the Dolphin raised his siege and departed thence. King Henry his disease increasing, made his testament, appoynted his treasure and jewels to be sold, his debts to be payed, as well to the pleasure of his souldiers as to other unto whom he ought good, either in England or in France: he ordaind his brother John Duke of Bedford to be regent and governour of France and Normandie, and committed the keeping of Henry his sonne to Henry Beaufort Bishop of Winchester, and to Thomas Bewfort, Duke of Excester, he departed this life in the Castle called Boys de Viscenne, not farre from Paris, on the last of August, in the yere 1422. when he had reigned nine yeres five moneths and odde dayes. There was present at his death King Charles of France, and the two Quenes: but before his death this most prudent King disposed the guard of the young Prince his sonne, and the defence of the Realme of England, to his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, but the custodie of the body of this young Prince, the King committed to his uncle the Duke of Excester, to in doctrine him in all good manners: and the revenues of the Duchie of Normandie, he bequeathed to his brother John Duke of Bedford, for the governance of the same Duchie and of the Realme of France: he appointed his debts to be paid out of his treasure, and of his jewels. In his life time he redified the castle of Beaulieuworth, he builded there a most pleasant place, and caused it to be termed le pleasant marish, King Henry the eight, caused the said banquetting house to be taken downe, and part of it to be set up in the base courte at Beaulieuworth: he redified his royall manour that then was called Shene, now Richmond: he founded two monasteries upon the Thames not farre from Richmond, the one of Carthusians, which he named Bethlem, the other religious men and women of Saint Bridget, and that he named Shion. He founded Garcar, principall King at armes of all Englishmen, and also the brotherhood of St. Giles without Crecles gate of London. He gave 1000. markes to the workes of Westminster Church, more he gave to the same Church a faire Walter, with another booke called Flores historiarum, both verie faire written, and enlumined, and a royall scepter of gold, for the Quene. The ring that King Richard the second gave unto St. Edwards Wyne, being taken away, this King Henry restorred againe, in the which ring there was a Rubie, esteemed worth a thousand markes in value: he gave to the colledge of Windore, or chappell of Knights, of Saint George and of the garter, an Image of massy siluer to the hono: of our blessed virgin Mary, the mother of Christ. Executors of his testament were Henry Fitz Hugh, Walter Hungerford, Walter Beuchampe, Lewes Roblart, William Porter, and Robert Babthorpe Knights, and John Woodhouse, and John Lauchthorpe Esquiers: his gods, cattels, jewels, and money came to 40000. markes, as appeareth by the record of Henry the sixt, the first yere. Shortly after his departing, his jewels were entered in the Church of St. Boye de Fosses, and his corps well enbaulmed and seared, was closed in lead: and accompanied with all the Lords, estates, and commons of England that that were there present, with all many Lords and great estates, as well of France, Fozmandie, Burgondy, and Picardie, was brought with great honour to Paris, and set in the Church of our Lady, where were done so; him right solemne erequies, with distribution of money and great almes to the poore. From thence he was brought to Roame, where he abode long. When all things necessarie were prepared for the conuenance of the dead King into England, his body was laid in a chariot, which was drawen by foure great horses: and about the dead corpes they laid a figure made of boyled hides of leather, representing his person, as nigh to the semblance of him as could be deuised, painted curiously to the similitude of a liuing creature: vpon whose head was set an Imperiall diadem of golde and precious stones, on his body a purple robe furred with ermin, and in his right hand he held a scepter ropall, and in his left hand a ball of golde, with a crosse fixed thereon. And in this manner adorned was this figure laid in a bed in the said chariot, with his visage vncouered toward the heauens: and the couerture of his bed was of red silke beateen with golde: and besides that, when the bodie should passe through any good towne, a canopic of marvellous great value, was borne ouer the chariot, by men of great worship. In this manner accompanied of the King of Scots, and of all Princes, Lords, and Knights of his house, he was brought from Roan to Abeulle, where the corpes was set in the Church of Saint Wiffranc. From Abeulle, he was brought to Iardin, and from thence to Spentrecull, so to Bulloigne, and to Calice. In all this journey were many men about the chariot clothed all in white, which bare in their hands torches burning, after whom followed all the householde seruants in blacke, and after them came the Princes, Lords, and estates of the Kings blood, adorned in vestures of mourning: and after all this, from the said corpes the distance of two English miles followed the Quene of England right honourably accompanied. In this manner they entred Calice, from whence after a few dayes they departed, and continued their iourneys by water and land vntill they came to London, where they arriued about the tenth of November, and so were conueyed by London bridge, through Cheape to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul: vpon the covering of the foremost of the foure horses that conueyed the chariot, were imbrodered the ancient armes of England: vpon the couerture of the second horse were the armes of England and Fraunce, in one shield quarterly: vpon the couerture of the third horse was imbrodered the armes of Fraunce, without any manner of difference: and on the fourth horse were the armes of King Arthur, which was three crownes golde in a field azure. When his erequies were solemnised at Saint Pauls Church in London, he was brought from thence to be enttered in the Abbey of Saint Peter at Westminster amongst his Noble ancestors, at the feste of King Edward the Confessor, a ropall image of silver and gilt was laid vpon his tombe, which Quene Katherine his wife caused to be made for him; but about the latter end of King Henry the eight, the head of the Kings image being of massy silver, was broken off, and conueyed cleane away, with the plates of silver and gilt that covered his body. Thus this most glorious and renowned renowned King entred the way decreed for every creature, in the flower and most lustie time of his age, to wit, but five and thirtie yeeres olde, when he had reigned nine yeeres, ten moneths, and od dayes. The first of Henry the first, Quene Katherine had assured for his posterity, Castles, lands, tenements, names and deliuered vnto the summe of 40000. lents, every two lents worth a noble.

King Henry the sixth.

Henry the first, borne at Windsoze, being an infant of eight moneths old, began his raigne the last of August, in the yeere 1422. Continuing the time of his youth, the gouernance of the Realme was committed to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, and the gaird of his person to Thomas Duke of Excester: and to Iohn Duke of Bedford was giuen the regiment of France, who right wisely and nobly ruled the same so long as he liued. This Henry was of nature gentle and meke: he loued better peace than war, quietnes of minde than busines of the world: honestie than profit: rest and ease, than trouble and care: all injuries that euer happened to him, which were many, he suffered patiently, and reputed them to be worthily sent of God for his offences.

The 21. of October, Charles King of France passed out of this world, and was buried at Saint Denis in France, after he had been crowned King 46. yeeres. He was greatly beloued of his people all his life time, and therefore was called Le Roy Charles le biew ame: but yet he had a sickness the more part of his raigne, that being out of his witt, he would strike all that came nere him: it took him first in the Citie of Mans shortly after he had been in Flanders to reduce the Flemings to obedience. There was by reason hereof great trouble in France, because those that were nere to him in linage, sought every one to haue the chiefe gouernment in their hands. When he thus died, the Realme was left in vulerable state, for people of each strange nation were gouernours in the Realme. first, the Englishmen had conquered a great part, and sought to haue the rest: and the Duke of Burgoyne, with many other great Lords alied with him, sought to conquer all, for the young King Henry of England, who claimed then to be King of France, and likewise in all the money that was coined, the armes of both Realmes were quartered. The Crownes that were stamped in the time of Charles, and al other money more, were forbidden to be currant, and called to the mint. King Henry caused a peece to be stamped called a Salus, worth two and twenty shillings, and Blans of eight pence a peece, and so in no place of France where King Henry was obeyed, any other money was receiued, but such as had the armes of France and England stamped on it.

edicts and customs of the said Realme, as was alledged, proclaimed himselfe King after the decess of his father, notwithstanding, by the agreement made at the marriage of his sister to the King of England, it was otherwise concluded (as before is recited); and so there were two Kings in France, Henry and Charles, both which striving for the crowne, the Realme was in way of partition.

A Parliament at London began the ninth of November, wherein was granted to the King a subsidy for thre yeres, five nobles of euery shackle of wool that should passe out of the land.

King Charles of France began now to aduance himselfe into the Duke of Burgoigne lands, and the Constable of Scotland, accompanied with many Lords, and men of war of King Charles side, laid siege to the towne of Carrengis, but the Marshall of Burgoigne assembled men of war to raise the siege, with whom went Thomas Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, a valiant man, and now being come together, fought with their enemies, wan the field, took the Constable, whose sonne was slaine in the field. Many of King Charles men were slaine and taken to the number of ten or twelue hundred good men of warre. After which victorie, the Earle of Salisbury laid siege to Montaguillon in Campaigne, and continued there an eight monethes before he could haue it rendred, and then caused the same to be rased and throwne downe. Then the Earle of Salisbury besieged the Castle of Monnes, which at length was yielded to him: this Castle he also rased and beat downe, which was the strongest place in all Champaigne, it was after repaired by King Charles.

About the same time the Duke of Burgoigne gaue his sister the Lady Anne in marriage to the Duke of Bedford, and so the alliance was made more strong betwene the English and the Burgonians.

Philip de Comines writeth, that Iohn Duke of Bedford, regent in France for the Englishmen, his monthly allowance in that office amounting to 20000. crownes at the least.

Thomas Langley Bishop of Durham was made Chancelloz of England.

The Dukes of Burgoigne, Bedford, and Bypayne, met in the towne of Amiens, there was also the Earle of Richmond, brother to the Duke of Bypayne, and many other great Lords, which Earle of Richmond had married Margaret, the Duke of Bypaynes eldest sister, sometime wife to the Duke of Guyen, and Dolphin of France. These thre Dukes were five or six dayes together in Amiens, in great friendship and reuerence ech to other, promising perpetuall amitie to continue. After this, the Duke of Bypayne returned into his country, the duke of Bedford (regent of France) to Paris, and the duke of Burgoigne to Arras; but withina while after, the Earle of Richmond revolted to King Charles, upon some mistaking he had conceived against the Duke of Bedford: King Charles received him ioyfully, and made him Constable of France.

About the same time the Duke of Bedford caused Crotot to be besieged both both by water and by land, which after foure or five moneths siege, was both towne and Castle deliuered to the Duke, where he obtained Ralph Butler to be captaine. At that time the Duke of Bedford was obeyed as regent in all places through Alimen, Pontieu, and Picardy, from Paris to Reims, Châlons, and Troyes up to the water of Loyze.

About the feast of S. Andrew the captaines of King Charles assembled their forces about le fere, and Jelle, and took by night the towne of Campaigne, and spoiled the inhabitants of all their goods. Shortly after came the Duke of Bedford to Mondisier with twelue hundred fighting men, and requested the Lord of Sannesles to lay siege to Campaigne, and he would finde him men and money to wage them, wherunto he granted, and after fiftene dayes siege had the same deliuered.

In this meane time, to wit, about the xviij. of November, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein the pong King was set in his maiestie among his Lords. And the xviij. day of November the King with the Quene removed from Westminster vnto Waltham holy Crosse, and from thence to Hertford, where he held his Christmasse, and the King of Scots with him: and the foresaid Parliament was adiourned vnto the twentieth day after Christmasse. In the which Parliament, among other actes, was ordained that what prisoner that for grand or petit treason was committed to warde, and after wilfully brake or made an escape from the same, it should be deemed petty treason, and the goods of him so escaping should be forfeited to the Lord of the sole that they were found in.

In the moneth of february, James Stewart the pong King of Scots, who was taken by the Englishmen in the eight yere of King Henry the fourth, and had remained in England prisoner till this time, was now according to covenant, deliuered out of Pomfret Castle, upon pledges, to wit, David eldest sonne to the Earle of Athole, Alexander Earle of Crawford, Alexander Lord of Gourdon, Iohn de Lyndesey, Patrick sonne and betre to Sir Iohn Lyon, Andrew Grey of Houlles, David de Ogleby, Sir William de Rochin, Dauid Mognesse, and William Olifant: the same King of Scots was then married in the priory Church of Saint Mary Queries in Southwarke, to the Lady lane the Dutches daughter of Clarence, by his first husband Iohn Earle of Somerset, cosen to King Henry, and they kept their marriage feast in the Bishop of Winchester's place, by the said Church of saint Mary Queries.

The fourteenth day of february, the foresaid Parliament being againe holden at Westminster, for breaking of the foresaid acte of escaping out of prison, Sir Iohn Mortimer was accused, by a peoman named William King of Wilmolton in Alsale, in Poykethire, seruant vnto Sir Robert Scot Knight, lieutenant of the tower of London, of diners points of treason as follo weth: first, that he conselled with the said William King, to the end to breake out of prison, and promised to him for the same ten pound in his purse, an habergeon, and a dublet, the yereley value of fortye pound land, & in procees an Earldome. Also, that the said Mortimer should say, that he would goe into Wales, vnto the Earle of the Marches, and there he would raise fortye thousand men, and with that power he would enter the land, and strike off the heads of the Lord pottedoz, and of the Bishop of Winchester, to the intent that he might tell o2 play with some of his money. And furthermore he accused him, that the said Mortimer should say, that the Earle of March was but a daw, saue that he was the greatest, noblest, and worthiest of blood, and should be king by right inheritance, and that he himselfe was next rightfull heire to the said crowne after the said Earle of March, wherefore if the said Earle would not take vp on him the crowne and rule of the land, he said that he else would. And ouer this, the said William allured to the said Sir John Mortimer, that he should say, that if he failed of his purpose, and might not ioyne vnto the Earle of Marches, that then he would saile vnto the Dolphin, and aide and take his part, where he wist well he should be accepted, and haue good aide of him to bring about his purpose. All which matter this William would proue vpon the same Mortimer with his body: o2 as the Lordz & commons should alward. Which John Mortimer, after the statute aforesaid escaped out of the tower, and was taken againe vpon the towre wharfe soze beaten and wounded, and on the morrow brought to Westminster, & by the authoritie of the said Parliament, he was after d2awen to tiburne, hanged, and headed, of whose death (saith Hall) no small stander arose: his body was buried in y gray friers church.

King Henries people besieging the Castle of Dinry in the marches of Poymandy, they within compounded to yeld at a day assigned, if the Englishmen were not fought withall before the same day by the Frenchmen: whereupon as well King Charles as the Duke of Bedford made great leuies of men to kepe the day appointed, and here with they drew both towarde Perle. But when King Charles heard how the Duke of Bedford was coming towards him with such puissance, he was counselled to draw backe, and so he did towards Cleruele in Perch, whom the Duke of Bedford followed, so that he found his armie nere to Cleruele. And when either armie was in sight of the other, they put themselves in order of battell, and the Englishmen made an hedge of their ho2e behind their battell, because the French should not strike in among them on the backes: and the Frenchmen ordered themselves in battell array, making a great battell of footemen, in the which they put the flower and chiefe men. They appointed their ho2emen to set on the Englishmen a trauesse, the battelles on foote came vpon and iopned, where was a soze fight betwixt them, continuing two houres together, that no man might iudge which way the bidozie would incline: but at length, the men of King Charles began to breake, and then the Englishmen began to thrust in among them, and did so much, that they discomfited their enemies. There were slaine the Earle Douglas Duke of Laran, James Douglas Earle of Wiltton, John Earle of Bougham, with the Viscount Nerbon, & many other, to the number of ten thousand (saith Fabian:) foure thousand saith mine Authoz (a Frenchman) who saith, that the Duke of Bedford bare himselfe most ballantly, fight-ting with an are so fiercely, as he had the passe of all other. The Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke gouerned themselves also right ballantly.

The Lord of Torsy and other Lordz of Poymandy, which before had taken part with the Englishmen, this day turned to the French, hoping that the Englishmen should haue lost the battell. Erre it is, that the Frenchmen would neuer suffer their King Charles to be present in person at any battell, but when they thought to pitch a field, they sent him into some strong towne. By the losse of this battell fought on the seuenteenth of August before Wernole in Perch, King Charles was put to great hindrance, so that he was not able in puissance to giue the Englishmen any battell, hauing enough to do to defend and kepe his townes and fortresses against them.

The Duke of Bedford returned into Poymandy, where he punished many that fled from him in the day of battell. Then went he to Paris, where he found the Duke of Burgoyne, who received him, and the Dutches of Bedford his wife, the said Duke of Burgoynes sister, right ioyfully, and made to them a great feast, at which feast also were the Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke, the olde Quene of France, mother to King Charles, and many other great estates, of diuers nations, amongst the which; the Dutchesse of Bedford was holden for the most gallanteft Lady of all other, and with her, the countesse of Salisburie a very faire Lady. The Duke of Bedford that had neuer iusted before, iusted there.

The Duke of Burgoyne was a very goodly and amiable man of personage, doing excellently wel whatsoeuer he tooke in hand, and especially in daunting and iusting he excelled all other of his countrey. At this feast, he became desirous of the countesse of Salisburie, and some messages passed betwixt them, which came to the Earle of Salisburies eare, whereof he was nothing contented with the Duke, and therefore sought to doe him displeasure after ward. This feast being ended, the Duke of Burgoyne went into his countrey of Burgoyne, and there tooke to wife the Dutchesse of Flanders which had been wife to his vnckle the Duke of Flanders, and had by her two children. She was his sister to the Duke of Bourbon, but she liued not long with him. The Duke of Burgoyne also gaue his sister the yongest, named Agnes, in marriage vnto Charles de Bourbon Earle of Cleremont, for the which, the Duke of Bedford and other Englishmen were wroth, for that he made such alliance with the enemies without their accord.

This yere the Frenchmen repaired the Castle of Houns in Champagne, which had been a little before destroyed by the Englishmen, and now it was well stufed with victuals and men, which began to make soze warre to the country, but shortly after the Earle of Salisburie besieged them, and with him Messire John de Luxemburg, who did so much, that the Castle was yielded to him. The Duke of Bedford with his wife the Dutchesse, lay for the most part in Paris leading there a pleasant life with the Lady whom he greatly lored, and was lodged in the house of the Tournelles nere to the Castle S. Anchoy, where he made faire buildings, and his men still made soze wars against the French towards the riuer of Loze, and other places, vpon bafe Poymandy, mandy, and toward the Dutchie of Alanson.

This yere in England Edmond Mortimer Earle of March with many other Lords, and a great retinue, were sent into Ireland, where the said Earle of March ended his life without issue, whose inheritance descended to Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to Richard Earle of Cambridge beheaded at Southampton, as is aforesaid.

This yere the warre began in Henault, by reason of Jaqueline Dutchesse of Henault, daughter to Duke William of Henault, uncle to Philip Duke of Burgoyne, and also daughter to Duke John of Burgoyne's sister, wife to the sozenamed William, and so double cousin german to Philip, Duke Philip now living. This Jaqueline was married to John Duke of Brabant his cousin german, and cousin german also to Duke Philip of Burgoyne, and before that, he was married to the Earle of Montfou, sonne to King Charles le bien aine, eldest brother to King Charles now living, but notwithstanding that she was thus married to the Duke of Brabant, yet was she conveyed by Sir Robert-farr Knight, and brought into England to the Duke of Gloucester, and there married to the said Duke of Gloucester: and so she had two husbands aliue at once, Brabant and Gloucester, a thing thought unreasonable, both against God, the world, and the Church, for she had been foure or five yeres in company with the Duke of Brabant, but there had fallen some variance betwixt them, and so she was come from him into Henault.

About the last of Aprill began a Parliament at Westminster, wherein was granted a subsidy of twelve pence in the pound of all manner merchandise coming in, or passing out of this Realme, three shillings of a tunne of wine for the terme of three yeres to be holden. And furthermore it was enacted, that all merchant strangers should be set to an English host, within fiftene dayes of their coming to their port sale, and to make no sale of any merchandise ere they were so lodged: and then within 40. dayes following to make sale of all they brought, and if any remained unsold at the said foure dayes end, that then all such merchandise unsold to be forfeited. Also that all strangers that carried any wools out of this land, should pay three and forty shillings foure pence for a sacke custome, where the English merchants and dealers payed but five nobles, &c.

After the marriage had been solemnised betwixt the Duke of Gloucester, and Jaqueline Dutchesse of Holland, as is aforesaid, within a moneth after the Duke of Gloucester assembled an army of twelve hundred fighting men at the least, all Englishmen, and taking the Dutchesse with him in company, passed over to Calice, and straight from thence to Lens in Artois, and so into Henault, making no outrage as he passed through Duke Philips countries. At their coming into Henault, many towne obeyed them, and other refused to doe: likewise were the Nobles divided.

The Duke of Burgoyne hearing of this, was sore offended for the injury done to his cousin of Brabant, the dishonour of his cousin the Dutchesse Jaqueline, and the cruel dealing of the Duke of Gloucester, and therefore, to avenge the Duke of Brabant he appointed many of his captaines with twelve hundred used fighting men Picards, to go against the Duke of Gloucester. The Duke of Brabant was a man but of weake complexion, and therefore by the counsell of Brabant it was ordained, that his younger brother Philip Earle of Saint Pol, should be chiefe Captaine of the warre against the Duke of Gloucester. He had a great army, as the more part of the Nobles of Brabant, of Henault, and of Burgoyne, in all fiftie thousand. Pierre de Luxemburg, Earle of Conuallan, his neere kinsman, had the leading of the army, for himselfe was but young. The Duke of Gloucester had put off his men in garrison within the towne of Braine, in the county of Henault, who made sore warre to the countrey about, but the Earle of S. Pol, and Conuallan did come and besiege Braine, continuing afoze it 12. dayes before they within yielded, compounding to depart with bodie and goods saved. These having won Braine, destroyed it utterly, and that done, took the field with all puissance, which was great: and the Duke of Gloucester likewise came into the field, so that they approached neere together, and the vancourers skirmished, but the battell layed not. The Duke of Gloucester had sent his herault, and written to the Duke of Burgoyne, calling him traitor, and disloyall to the King of England and Fraunce, for that he had sent men in ayde against him in ayde of the Duke of Brabant, and therefore offered him the combat: whereunto the Duke of Burgoyne answered, that he would accept the combat willingly, denying that ever he had sapled of his promise: but contrariwise, that the Duke of Gloucester had done great wrong to the Duke of Brabant, to have bereft him of his wife, contrary to the ordinance of God, and of holy Church, and for other wrongs which the Duke had uttered against the Duke of Burgoyne's honour, he gave him the lie, and so farre the matter went in words betwixt them, that the day was appointed for the combat, and the Duke of Burgoyne chose for Judge of the combat, the Emperour of Almane, and the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Duke of Gloucester a safe conduct, to depart safely into England, to prepare himself of things necessary for the combat, whereupon both the rampes brake by: the Duke of Gloucester went to Mons in Henault, to the Dutchesse his wife (so termed) and gave her to understand that he was desirous to trie the combat with the Duke of Burgoyne, and many other things he tolde her, which he performed not: for within foure dayes after he took all his power with him, and returned into England, doing no hurt by the way to the Duke of Burgoyne's countries, and left the Dutchesse in Mons, finally accompanied with the people of that countrey. Shortly after his departure, the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Lord Lilladam to the towne of Mons to receiue Jaqueline the Dutchesse, who being deliuered vnto him, he conveyed her to Cant, where the Duke and she made great semblance of ioy together, she promising to be governed alwaies by his aduise, but to go to her olde husband the Duke of Brabant she would not: but what semblance soeuer she made, she had an other thought in her head, as it appeared afterward, for when he espied her time, she stole away into her countrey of Holland, where she was well receiued of many Lords, and began forthwith to maintaine warre against Duke Philip of Burgoyne, and sent to the Duke of Gloucester for ayde, who sent to her a thousand fighting men, under the conduct of the Lord Fitzwaters, who landed them in a place called Breweys haven. During these troubles in Henault, divers Lordes of the countrey held with the Duke of Gloucester, and therefore had their lands sore wasted. Also Messire Englebert Denguieu held on the party of Philip Duke of Burgondy: and he, when he took any of the Englishmen, would cause one of their throbs to be cut off, and so sent into England.

The Duke of Burgoyne fearing least Laqueline would deliver the countrey of Holland into the possession of the Duke of Gloucester, he assembled his power, and went into Holland, to put the countrey into obedience. At his coming thither, Laqueline accompanied with many Nobles of the countrey, and the Lord Fitzwaters, would have defended his landing, but notwithstanding all the defence they could make, he entered upon them, and there nere to the Towne of Brussells, they fought in battell, the Duke of Burgoyne and his people against the Englishmen and Hollanders, taking the Dutchesse Laquelines part: there was a fierce battell on all sides, but in the ende, the Hollanders and Englishmen were all discomfited, and there died in that place about seven or eight hundred, besides those that were taken prisoners: the Lord Fitzwaters hardly escaped.

After this battell got by the Duke of Burgoyne, divers townes of the countrey revolted to him against Laqueline the Dutchesse, as Dordrecht, Hericx, and many other. Shortly after, the Duke of Burgoyne leaving garrisons in those townes that obeyed him, to make resistance against the Dutchesse that lay in the Towne of Cant, he returned into his countrey of Flanders and Artois, there to prepare such abillments as were necessary for him to use at the combat appointed betwixt him and the Duke of Gloucester. The Duke of Gloucester like wise in England made his provision of his abillments and furniture, but the Duke of Bedford brother to the Duke of Gloucester, took great paines to make them friends: and also the counsell of the young king of England, were nothing content with this variance, doubting least it might be occasion that the Duke of Burgoyne might withdraw himself from their aid, whereby their busines in France should be hindered. The Duke of Bedford therefore took his journey from Paris to Calice, and so into England, to the end to agree the said Dukes: he took with him the Dutchesse his wife, and not past a foure or five hundred men.

On the next morrow about nine of the clocke, certaine servants of the Bishop of Winchester, uncle to the said Protector, would have entred the Citie by the bridge, but the warders or keepers thereof, kept them out by force, as before they were commaunded, wherewith they being grievously discontented, gathered to them a greater number of archers, and men of armes, and assaulted the gate with shot and other means of warre, insomuch, that the commons of the Citie that in their shops, and sped them thither in great number, so that great bloodshed would have followed, had not the wisdom of the Princes and Aldermen stayed the matter in time.

The Archbishoppe of Canterbury with the Duke of Quimbye called the Prince of Portugall and other, took great labour upon them to pacifie this variance betwixt the uncle and the nephew, the Protector and the Bishop, insomuch, that they rode betwixt the uncle and the nephew, ere they might bring them to any reasonable consociation, and lastly they agreed to stand to the rule of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, or of such as he would assigne, whereupon the Citie was set in more quiet, and the Bishop of Winchester wrote a letter to the Duke of Bedford, Lord Regent as followeth,

Right high and mightie Prince, and right Noble, and after one lewes earthly Lord, I recommend me unto your grace with all my heart: and as ye desire the welfare of the King our soveraigne Lord, and of his realmes of England and of France, and your owne weale, with all yours, haue you hither, for by my troth, and ye farry long, we shall put this land in jeopardy with a field, such a brother ye haue here, God make him a good man. On the tenth day of January next ensuing, the said Duke of Bedford with his wife, came unto London, and with them also came the said Bishop of Winchester, and the Princes and Citizens received him at Sperton, and conveyed him through the Citie unto Westminster, where he was lodged in the Kings hall, and the Bishoppe of Winchester was lodged within the Abbots lodging. On the morrow following, the Princes presented the Regent with a pair of basins of silver, and over-gilt, and in them a 1000. markes of gold. The 21. of February, began a great councill at St. Albons, which was afterward reioined to Southampton, but for that no due conclusion might be made, on the 15. of March was called a Parliament at Leicester, the which endured till the 25. day of June. This was called the Parliament of Bannes, because men being forbidden to bring swords or other weapons, brought great battes and staves on their neckes, and when those

During this parliament, the variance betwixt the two Lords was debated, insomuch, that the Duke of Gloucester put a bill of complaint against the Bishop, containing five articles, all which articles were by the Bishop sufficiently answered, and finally, by the counsel of the Lord Regent, all the matters of variance betwixt the said two Lords, were put to the examination and judgement, with the assistance of the Lordes of the Parliament, Henry Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Duke of Excester, John Duke of Bedford, Thomas Bishop of Durham, Philip Bishop of Worcester, John Bishop of Bath, Humphrey Earle of Stafford, Raulph Lord Cornwell, and master William Alnewike, then keeper of the pisme scale, which Lords made a decree and awarde, so that either party took other by the hand with friendship and loving words, none having amends of other. Upon Whitsunday following, was a solemn feast holden at Leicester aforesaid, where the Regent dubbed king Henry knight, & then forthwith the king dubbed Richard Duke of York, that after was father to king Edward the fourth, and other to the number of foure.

On Saturday the even of Saint Michael the Archangel, in the morning before day, betwixt the houres of one and two of the clocke began a terrible earthquake, with lightning and thunder, which continued the space of two houres, and was vniuersall through the world, so that men had thought the world as then should haue ended, and the generall dome to haue followed. The burcable beasts roied and dyed to the townes, with hideous noise. Also the fowles of the ayre likewise cried out: such was the worke of God at that time to call his people to repentance.

adjoining to the Citie, and forced them to burne a great part of their suburbs: but one day as the said Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Mountague, rested him at a bay window, a gunne was leuelled out of the Citie, the shot whereof shyned to the bars of the prison grate, that one of the same bars stroke the Earle on the head, bearing away one of his eyes, and the one side of his cheek. Sir Thomas Gargaue was likewise stricken, and died within two daies. The Earle was conveyed to Penn on Looze, where, after eight daies he likewise departed the world, whose body was conveyed into England with all funeral pompe, and buried at Wism in Warshyre by his progenitors, leaving behinde him one onely daughter named Alice, married to Richard Neuill sonne to Ralph Earle of Westmerland. The damage that the Realme of England receiued by the death of this notable man manifestly appeared, in that immediately after his death the prosperous good successe which the Englishmen had had, began to decline. In his place was appointed the Earle of Suffolk to be Lieutenant and Capitaine of the siege, joining with him the Lord Scales, the Lord Talbot, Sir Ion Fastolfe, and diuers other valiant Captaines.

In a Parliament at Westminster was granted to the king a subsidy of euerie tunne of wine three shillings, and of other merchantise, except wool, fell, and cloth, twelue pence of the pound. ance of the same, he appointed sir Simon Morbrier prouost of Paris, with the guard of the Citie & other, to accompany sir Iohn Falloph to the army lying at the siege of Dyleance: they were in all to the number of 1500. men: these with great difficulty came to the English camp before Dyleance, where they were joyfully receiued, & commended for their valiant withstanding of enemies by the way, as they marched. The Earle of Suffolke being thus victualled, continued the siege, & euery day almost skirmished with the French men, who at length offered to treat to saue themselves and their City from captiuitie, they submit the City, themselves and all theirs vnder the obedience of the Duke of Burgoin, because he was extract out of the blonde roppall of Fraunce. The Duke with thanks certified them againe, that he would gladly receiue them, if the Duke of Bedfords Lord Regent would therewith be contented. Whereupon messengers were dispatched to the Regent, who thought it neither convenient nor honourable, that a Citie so long besieged by the king of Englands power, should be deliuered to any other forein Prince. Whereupon the Regent answered the Burgonian ambassadores, that sith the King of England had bene at all the charges about the siege and winning of the City, it was not consonant to reason, that the Duke should enioy the fruites of another mans charge: hereof followed a double mischefe to the English proceedings in the Realme of Fraunce, for both the Burgoyne conceiued an inward grudge against the Englishmen, for that he suspected them to enuie his glory: and againe, the Englishmen left the siege of Dyleance, which by this treaty they might haue recouered out of their enemies hands, and put their friends in possession of it.

While this treaty was in hand, Charles of Fraunce studied daily howe to prouide a remedie by the deliuey of his in Dyleance out of present daunger. And euen at the same time, a monstrous woman, named Ioan la pucell de dieu, was presented vnto him at Chinon, where as then he sojourned, of which woman, her birth, qualities, and estate, the French Histories make mention at large, but to be short, so much credit was giuen to her, that she was honoured as a Saint, and so she handled the matter, that she was thought to be sent from God to the ayde of the French King Charles, the seventh of that name. This woman being armed at all pointes like a valiant Captaine, rode from Poitiers to Bloys, and there found men of warre, victual and munitions ready to be conueyed to Dyleance. Here was it knowne that the Englishmen kept not so diligent watch as they had bene accustomed to do, and therefore this Maid with their French Captaines, comming forthward in the dead time of the night, and in a great rayne and thunder, they entered into the Citie with all their victuall, artillery, and other necessaries. The next day the Englishmen boldly assaulted the towne, but the Frenchmen defended the walles so, as no great feate chaunced that day betwene them. The Bastard of Dyleance gaue knowledge to the Duke of Alanfon in what daunger the towne stood without his present helpe, who comming within two leagues of the City, gaue knowledge to them within, that they should be ready the next day to receiue him, which accordingly was accomplished:

for the Englishmen suffered him and his armie to enter. On the next day in the morning, the Frenchmen all together issued out of the towne, and wanne the bastell of Saint Loup by assault, and set it on fire. And after they likewise assaulted the Towler at the bridge foote, and took it ere the Lord Talbot could come to the inclosures, in the which William Gladdale also Captaine was slayne, with the Lord Molins and the Lord Poyninges also.

The Frenchmen with this good lucke, fetched a compasse about toward the bastell, which was in the keeping of the Lord Talbot, the which like a good Captaine, without all feare issued forth against them, and gaue them a sharpe encounter, that they fledde againe into the Citie with great losse of men and small artillery: of Englishmen were kilt in the two battels to the number of six hundred men, or there about. The Earle of Suffolke, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Scales, and other Captaines assembled together in counsell, where it was amongst them determined to leaue their fortresses and battels, and to assemble in the plaine field, there to abide all the day to see if the Frenchmen would issue forth to fight with them. But when the Frenchmen durst not come forth, the Englishmen set fire on their lodgings, and departed in good order of battell from Dyleance. And the next day which was the eight of May, the Earle of Suffolke rode to Jergeaur with 400. men, and the Lord Talbot with another company turned to Melun: and after he had fortified that towne, he went to the towne of Auail, and wanne it together with the Castell.

Thus when the Englishmen secured themselves into garrisons, the Duke of Alanfon, the Bastard of Dyleance, Ioan le pucell, the Lord Sancerre, and diuers other Captaines of the Frenchmen came on the 12. of June before the towne of Jergeaur: where the Earle of Suffolke and his two brethren sojourned, and gaue to the towne so fierce an assault on three parts, that Poitou de Centrailes perceiuing another part boide of defence, scaled the walles on that side, and without difficulty, tooke the towne, and slue sir Alexander Poole, brother to the Earle, and many other to the number of 200. but the French lost 300. good men. Of the Englishmen were taken 40. with the Earle of Suffolke and his brother Iohn. The Frenchmen as they went to Dyleance, slew their prisoners all sauing the Earle and his brother. Shortly after the same French army came to Mahun, where they took the Towler at the bridge foote, and put therein a garrison: from thence they remoued to Wangeney, and contrayned them in the towne to yield. At this place there came to the Duke of Alanfon, the new Constable Arthur of Britaine, and the Lord Dalbert with other, also the Earle of Wandosme came to them, so that they were now togined to the number of 23000. men, the which shortly after fought with the Lord Talbot, nere to a village in Beaulie, called Batay, at which battell, the L. Talbot was fore wounded at the backe, and taken, & the rest put to flight: in which fight were slaine about 1200. and 40. taken, of whom the L. Talbot, the L. Scales, the L. Hungerford, and sir Thomas Rapon were chiefe. This overthrow did so much abate the Englishmen, that immediately thereupon the townes of Januile, Wabun, Foxt, and diuers other returned from the English part, and became French. Charles the French king perceiving fortune to smile vpon him, determined to conquer the City of Reimes that he might be there crowned, in his iourney thitherward he besieged the City of Auerre, and had it. From thence he went before Troyes which was deliuered to him, and then Chalons, &c. In semblable order they of Reimes yielded themselves: in the which towne the said Charles (in the presence of the Dukes of Lozain, and Barre, and of all the noble men of his nation) was sacred king of France, by the name of Charles the seventh.

The Duke of Bedford aduertised of all these doings, assembled his power about him, and hauing together 10000. men, besides Normans, departed out of Paris in warlike fashion, and passing through Bray to Pontfremault Pont, sent by his herald Bedford, letters to the French king, signifying to him, that where he had contrarie to his final conclusion, accorded betwene his brother king Henry the fifth, and king Charles the sixth, by allurements of a diuinely witch, taken vpon him: the name, title, and dignitie of the king of France, and further, had by murder, wealth, craft, and deceitfull means violently gotten, and wrongfully kept diuers Cities and Townes belonging to the king of England his nephew: for proofe whereof he was come downe from Paris with his army, into the countrey of Brie, by dint of sword to proue his writing and cause true, willing his enemies to chuse the place, and in the same he would giue him battell. The new French king being come from Reimes to Champmartine, studying how he might compasse them in Paris, was halfe abashed at this message, but yet to let a good countenance on the matter, he answered the Herauld, that he would sooner seeke his master, than his master should neede to pursue him. The Duke of Bedford hearing this answer, marched toward the king, and pitched his fieelde in a strong place. The French king though at the first he meant to haue abidden battell, yet when he understood that the Duke was equall to him in number of people, he changed his purpose, and turned with his armie a little out of the way. The Duke of Bedford perceiving his faint courage, followed him by Hilles and Dales, till he came to a towne not farre from Senlis, where he found the French king and his armie lodged: wherefore he ordered his battells, setting the Archers before, and himselfe with the Noble men in the maine battell, and put the Normans on both sides for wings. The French king also ordered his battells to the most aduantage. Thus these two armies lay two daies and two nights, eyther in sight of other without any great doing, except a few skirmishes. At length in the dead of the night, as quietly as might be, the French king brake by his campe, and fled to Bray. The Duke of Bedford had much adoe to stay his people in the morning from pursuit of the French kings armie: but for that he mistrusted the Parisians, he would not depart farre from that Citie: and so returned thither againe.

In this season Pope Martine the fifth, meaning to subdue the Bohemians that dissented from the Church of Rome in matters of faith, and religion, appointed appointed Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, Cardinall of S. Eusebius, to be his legate in an army to invade the kingdome of Boheme, and to bring a power of men with him out of England, and because the warre touched religion, he licensed the Cardinall to take a tenth of the spiritualitie, the Bishop gathered the money, and assembled 4000. men and more. As this Bishop was come to Douer, ready to haue passed the seas into Flanders, the Duke of Gloucester (hauing receiued letters from the Duke of Bedford, containing an earnest request to releue him with men of war) wrot to the Bishop of Winchester, willing him to passe with all his army toward the Duke of Bedford. The Cardinall least he should runne into the note of infamy, if he refused to obey the Regent of France, passed ouer with his power, & brought the same vnto his cosen to the Citie of Paris, where he remained not long, but passed on his iourney towards Boheme, from whence in thoyt time he returned into England.

The first of Nouember, king Henry being about the age of nine yeres was solemnly crowned in Saint Peters Church of Westminster, at whose coronation were made 36. Knights of the Bath, & after solemnization in the Church finished, an honourable feast in the great Hall of Westminster was kept, whereof ye may read a large discourse in Robert Fabian. After which feast great preparations was made for the kings iourney into France.

Richard Duke of York was constituted Constable of England in absence of John Duke of Bedford Regent of France, he was made Constable, for, and because of a battell to be fought betwene John Vpton, and John Downe he was confirmed Constable of England for terme of life, so that he did no waies derogate John Duke of Bedford, that was beyond the sea, dated the 11. of January.

The thirteenth of January a battell was done in Smithfield with in the listes before the king, betwene two men of fiererham in Kent, John Vpton notable appellant, and John Downe gentleman defendant, John Vpton put vpon John Downe, that he and his competers should imagine the kings death, the day of his coronation: when they had long fought, the king toke by the matter and forgaue both parties.

The xxviii. day of Aprill the king toke shipping at Douer, & landed the same day at Calais, hauing in his company the Dukes of York and Gloucester, the Bishops of Bath, Ely, and Rochester, the Carles of Huntingdon, Stafford, Warwick, Oxford, Devonshire, Poitaine of Cleve, and of Devon, and Barons, the Lord Boucher, Beaumont, Typtoft, Fitz water, Roos, Arundale, Audley, Fauconbridge, Gray Corderne, Scroope, and Wels.

Whilest the king remained at Calais many skirmishes were fought betwene the Englishmen and the French in diuers parts of France, and the Frenchmen prevailed greatly by helpe of a woman which they named The mayden of God. So that lastly she with her company came to the towne of Champaigne, to the ende to remoue the siege laid thereunto by the Duke of Burgoyne and other of the English Captaines, and the 23. of May she gaue battell to the Englishmen, and fought with them a long time, but in the end by the manhood of a Burgonian knight named Sir John Luxembourg, she was taken alive, and her company distressed, she was conveyed to the Citie of Roane, and there kept a season, where she fained her selfe to be with child, but when the contrary was knowne, she was condemned and byent.

Robert Gagwine After this, king Henry by small Iourneyes into France, came to Paris, where he was honourably received of the Cittizens and taken for their soveraign Lord and King, whiles he there remained, (saith Gagwine) the Frenchmen wanne many holdes of the Englishmen, and the Burgonians in the countrie of Bry.

The third of August died Joan countesse of Armonde, and was buried at Saint Thomas of Acres in London.

Ann. reg. 9. John Duke of Norfolkke take againe the towncs of Dampmartine, and the Chace Spengay with divers other towncs. The Earle of Stafford toke the towne of Wygn, Countie Robert, and from thence foraged all the countrey to Sens, and after toke Quency in Bry, Grand Dups, and Hampillon.

1431. Conspiracy at Abington. Some after Easter the Lord Botetort was warned of an assembly of certaine lewde persons, under pretence of religiously minded men, to be assembled at Abington, whereto he sent thither certaine persons, and also rode thither himselfe, and there arrested the baily of the towne named William Mandeuill a weaver, the which was appointed for a Captaine, who had named himselfe Jacke Sharpe of Wigmers land in Wales, who being examined, confessed that he meant to haue done many mischiefes, especially against Wyckes, so that he would haue made their heads as cheape as shypes heads (that is to say) three or a penie, for as some write, ten for a peny: many of his complices were taken and sent to diuers pylsons. Their Captaine was dyawne, hanged, and beheaded at Abington, and his head was sent to London, and set on the bylde: his other fautors were executed in diuers places and countries to the terror of other. Also the 13. of July Richard Russell wolman, was dyawne, hanged, and quartered, so that he would haue made Dukes and Cardes at his pleasure.

An. reg. 10. Richard Robsart Lord Bourcher deceased, and was buried at Westminster.

King Henry remaining still in France, the Earle of Arundale accompanied with 2000. Englishmen, sent a certaine of his company unto a towne, called Bealmount, to prouoke the Frenchmen to issue out of the towne, which small company when Boyssican and Senrales then Capitaines behelde, they with their souldiers gaue them forth to take the said Englishmen, the which by little and little sped backe, till they had tolled the Frenchmen a good space from the towne, and then set upon them with a stout courage, and helde them on hande till the Earle with his companie rescued them: then betwixt them was a cruell fight, but in the ende the Frenchmen were chased, and the said Senrayle with many souldiers of the said towne were slaine.

remained from Roan to Montpel, and so to Saint Dionese, & then to Paris, where he was receiued with great honour by the Cittizens, and taken for their soveraigne Lord and King. There were in his company of his owne nation, his uncle the Cardinall of Winchester, John Kempe Cardinall and Archbishop of Poise, the Dukes of Bedford, of Poise, and Norfolkke, the Earles of Warwick, Salisbury, Oxford, Huntingdon, Arundel, Spotaune, and Suffolk. Of Gascoigne there were the Earles of Longueille, and March, besides many noble men of England, Gwine, and Normandie: and the chiefe of the French nation, were the Dukes of Burgoggne, and Lewes of Luremburg Cardinall and Chancellor of France for king Henry: the Bishoppes of Beauvais and Poynes both pères of France, besides the Bishop of Paris, and diuers other Bishops, the Earle of Montemount and other noble men. And he had a guard of 3000. archers, some on horsebacke, some on fote. To speake of the honour, where with he was receiued into the Citie of Paris, what pageants were prepared, and how richly, the gates, streets, and byldes on euery side were hangd with costly clothes of arras and tapestrie, it would be to long a proceste.

On the seventh day of December king Henry was crowned in Paris, by the Cardinall of Winchester, at the which coronation was present, the Duke of Burgoggne, the Duke of Bedford Regent, and diuers other Nobles of France. After the solemnitie of this feast was ended, the king departed from Paris, and so came to Roane, where he held his Christmasse, and that done, he returned to Calais, where when he had sojourned a season, he took shipping and returned into England, and landed at Douer the eleuenth of February, and then riding toward London, he was met on Warham Downe, betwixt Douer and Canterbury, by a great compaignie of Gentles and commons of Kent, all clad in a liuerie with red hodes, the which accompanied him till he came to Blackheath, which was on the one and twentieth day of February, where he was met by the Mayor of London, who rode in a gowne of crimson velvet, his Aldermen in scarlet, and the Cittizens all in white gownes and red hoods, with diuers wozhes or cognissances before, red upon their haues after the facultie of their miseries or craftes: and after due obeysance and saluting of the king, they rode on before him towarde the Citie. And when the king was come to the bylde, there was denised a mighty Giant, standing with a sword dyawne in his hand, hauing written certaine speeches in matter of great reioyng and wel-comming of the king to the Citie, on the middle of the bylde, and in diuers other places of the Citie, were diuers faire and sumptuous pageants replenished with goodly and beautifull personages, the order and speeches whereof, are set downe by Robert Fabian in his chronicle. Thus being conveyed to his pallace at Westminster, the Mayor with the Cittizens returned to London, and on the 24. day of February the Mayor and Aldermen rode to the king, and presented him with a hampire of golde, and therein a thousand pound of nobles.

there of the Welles, for they were not content of their wages; wherefore the Duke of Bedford Regent of France, came down thither in Easter week, at which time many souldiers were arrested: and rode againe to Sirtoine. And hauing not long since buried the Lady Anne his late wife, sister to the Duke of Burgoigne, he married there the Lady Jaquet the daughter to Peter Earle of Saint Paule, and shortly after returned to Calais, where he caused foure of those souldiers to be beheaded, on the xi. of June, and 110. souldiers to be banished the towne, besides 120. that were banished before that time. And upon Midsummer euen the Lord Regent with his new wedded spouse came to London, and remained there till the latter end of August, and then returned againe to Paris.

The Duke of Burgoigne was nothing pleased with this new alliance contracted by the Duke of Bedford, with the house of Lutzenbourg, but the marriage was consummate ere he could finde any meane to prevent it.

The Frenchmen raised a crew, and sodainly toke the towne of Saint Alaire in Bazmandy, nere to the river of Some, and an other army under the leading of Sir Ambrose de Lore, wasted all the countrey about Cane. The Duke of Bedford not minding to be tole, sent the Earle of Arundell, Henry the Earle of Warwickes sonne, the Lord Lisle Adam Parhall of France for King Henry, and 1200. men of warre, with ordnance and munitions to besiege the towne of Salgny upon the river of Garne, the Earle with host of a Canon brake the arch of the bridge, and got from the Frenchmen their bulwarke, and set it on fire, divers assaults were made, but the towne was well defended, by 800. men of armes, besides other souldiers. The Duke of Bedford hereof aduertised, gathered an army of 6000. men wherof were Captains Robert Lord Willoughby, Sir Andrew Ogard, Chamberlaine to the Duke, Sir John Saluaine, balliue of Ronne, Sir John Montgomery, balliue of Caur, Sir Philip Hal balliue of Ternate, Sir Richard Ratcliffe deputy of Calais, Sir Ralph Newill, Sir Ralph Standith, Sir John Handford, Sir Richard Enthin, Sir Richard Haringdon, balliue of Ceneur, Sir William Fulthorpe, Sir Thomas Griffich of Ireland, David Hall, Thomas Strangwith, Leonard Ormstone, Esquires, and Thomas Gerard. The Duke of Bedford with this army came to the siege before Salgny, where he made a bridge of boates, and brought his ordinance so nere the towne, that to al people it seemed not long able to resist: but the ballard of Alliance Earle of Dunoy, with other hardy Captaines valiantly defended it. At the length the french king perceiving this towne to be the key betwene the territories of Burgoigne, English and French, that the losse thereof should turne him to irrecoverable damage, sent the Lord of Rieus, Wapton, the Hirc, the Lord Gaucourt and 6000. men, with plenty of viuals, to the intent, epyther to raise the siege, or at the least victual the towne. The frenchmen framed themselves in order of battell, as though they would doe much, but did nothing in effect: but that whilest part of them maintained a skirmish, an other sort conueyed into the towne thirtie oren, and other viuals. In that skirmish were slaine diuers valiant Frenchmen, and the rest considering how the Englishmen were planted, being now the beginning of August August, they remoued and went vnto Joze under Verre, where by a bridge made of empty pipes, they passed into the yle of France. The Duke of Bedford not minding to lose the more for the lesse, raised his siege, and returned to Paris, nothing more minding then to trie his quarrell by dint of sword against his enemies, if they would thereto agree. And thereupon he sent Bedford his herault to the Lord Gaucourt & other Captaines of the french armie, offering them battaille within a conuenient time, and where they would appoint. To the which officer at armes the Captaines answered, that battaille they feared not, nor the English force they much regarded, but they saide there was time to gaine, and time to lose, of the which they doubted not, to esple the one of the other, to their gaine or losse.

The 25. of Nouember the Lord Fitzwalter was drowned on the sea, and many other harins were done by tempest.

The Regent, sent Peter of Lurenbozough Earle of Saint Paule, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with a competent number of men to besiege the towne of Saint Alaire, which the Frenchmen a little before had taken, these valiant Captaines enuironed the towne with a strong siege. Within the towne, were Sir Lewes de Vicount, Sir Philip de la Towre, and Sir Reignold de Verseilles Captaines with 200. good fighting men, which by the space of thre weekes, manfully defended the same. But then perceiving the fiercenesse of the Englishmen, and the weakenesse of themselves, and hauing no hope of reliefe, rendered the towne, their horse and barnes onely saved.

After this towne was thus gotten, the Earle of Saint Paule, and the Lord Willoughby returned to the Regent, where they were well welcommed, and after the said Earle departed from Paris, to lay siege to the Castell of Sponcher, but being encamped nere to the towne of Blangy, he by a sodaine maladie finished his daies and departed this life, leauing his seignories to Lewes his sonne and heire.

On the eight day of July, King Henry beganne his Parliament at Westminister, continued it till Lammasse, and then adiourned it untill Saint Edwards tide.

This yere in the south west appeared a blasing starre.

During the raigne of this King Henry the first were Lieutenants ouer the Realme of Ireland, Edmond Earle of March, and James Earle of Desmond his deputie: John Sutton Knight Lord of Dudley, and Sir Thomas Strange his deputie: Sir Thomas Stanley, and Sir Christopher Planket his deputie: Lyon Lord Welles, and the Earle of Desmond his deputie: James Earle of Desmond the kings Lieutenant by himselfe: John Earle of Shrewsbury, and the Archbishop of Duclin Lord Justice in his absence: Richard Plantagenet Duke of Poike, father to Edward the fourth and Earle of Ulster, had the office of Lieutenant by Letters Patents, during the space of tenne yeeres, who deputed vnder him at severall times, the Baron of Duclin, Richard Fitz Eustace Knight, James Earle of Desmond, and Thomas Fitz Morris, Earle of Millbare: to this Richard then resident in Duellin, was bozne within the Castell there, the second sonne George Duke of Clarence, afterward bowned in a butte of malmesey.

John Lord Talbot gathered a crew of chosen men of warre in England, to the number of 800. and about the beginning of the moneth of March, sailed into Normandy, and passed by Roan towards Paris, and in his way he toke the strong Castell of Teing betwene Beauuots and Gisors, and caused all the Frenchmen within to be hanged on the walles, and after raised the Castell, and came to the Regent Duke of Bedford at Paris. The presence of which renowned Capitaine, so encouraged the hearts of the English nation, that they thought nothing able to resist their puissance, and so discouraged the hearts of the Frenchmen, that they were in doubt whether it were better to fight or to flie, for he was a chosen Capitaine, and in martiall feates fully instructed. When this hardy Baron had communed with the Regent, he departed from Paris with his army, and besieged the Castell of Beaumont upon Aise, whereof was Capitaine sir Amadour de Viguolles, brother to the Pyre: which Castell was sone rendred upon condition. After that he recovered without long siege, the townes of Creille, the bidge of Saint Maxens, the new towne of Emoy, Crispy in Valoys, and Cleramont in Beauuots: and so with great riches and rich prisoners, he returned againe to Paris.

The towne of Saint Denis, which is within two English miles of Paris, was gotten by the practise of one John Notice a knight of Melaunce, from Matthew Gougly, and Thomas Kiriell Captaines, they slew there many Englishmen, and toke many prisoners, but sone after the saide Captaines with strength taken from Paris, laid such strong a siege about Saint Denis, that finally they agreed to deliuer the towne to the Englishmen.

In the very same season the Earle of Arundell toke the Castell of Bome, line, and raised it to the ground, and after toke the Castell of Dole, and from thence came to saint Selerine, where the Lord Ambrose de Lore was Capitaine, which issued out and fought with the Englishmen so eagerly at the first, that he broue them backe an arrow shot: but the Earle so encouraged his men, that they toke new courages to them, and set so fiercely on the Frenchmen, that they slue a great number, and broue the remnant into the towne. After this victory, he besieged Louiers, whereof was Capitaine the Pyre, and his brother, which rendred the towne without stroke. Then the Earle entranced the towne of saint Selerine with a strong siege, when he had lien there almost three moneths, every day attempting somewhat, for the performance of his enterpryse: in conclusion at the three monethes ende, he gave so fierce assault, that by force he entred the towne, and slue John Almaine, and Guillam saint Aubine, the chiefe Captaines, and 800. of their men of warre, and the children of Loire were taken prisoners: he replenished the towne, and made Capitaine sir John Cornewall. When he besieged the strong towne of Sully, and the inhabitants deliuered pledges upon condition, that if the towne were not rescued within thirtie daies, they should render the towne into his possession: which offer was taken, and when the time was expired, the towne was deliuered, where leauing a garrison, the Earle departed to Paris, and in the meane way toke the Castels of Melley and Saint Laurence.

The Lord Willoughby, and sir Thomas Kiriell returning with great victories out of the parties of Burgoigne, toke in their way the towne of Louiers, and furnished it both with men and munitions.

The Earle of Arundell minding to haue besieged the towne of Key, was there slaine with Ralph Standish, the Earle of Arundell was buried at Beauuots, in the gray friers there.

Though a great frost, that lasted from the 25. of Nouember, vnto the tenth of February, the Thames was so frozen, that the merchandise which came to the Thames mouth, was there landed, and carried through Kent to London.

When the Pope Eugenius the fourth, and his Cardinals after long labour could make no peace betwixt king Henry of England and France, and Charles also named king of France, they at length made a peace betwixt the said Charles and Philip Duke of Burgoigne, wherby the said Duke of Burgoigne became bitter enemy to the king of England, and sone after the said Duke began his order of the Lily, and the Golden flier, and ordained certaine knights of that order, and made thereunto many statutes, whereof some of them were like vnto the statutes of the Garter.

This yeere on the 14. of September died John Duke of Bedford Regent of France, a man as polite in peace, as hardie in warre, and yet no more hardy than mercifull when he had the victory, whose bodie was with all funerall pompe, and solemne exequies buried in the Cathedrall Church of our Ladie in Roan, on the north side of the high altar, vnder a sumptuous and costly monument: which tombe when king Lewes the 11. by certaine vndiscreete persons was counselled to deface, affirming that it was a great dishonour, both to the king, and to the realme, to see the enemy of his father, and theirs to haue so solempne and rich memorie: he answered saying, What honour shall it be to vs, or to you to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground the dead bones of him, whom in his life time, neither my father, nor your progenitors, with all their puissance, were once able to make flie one fote backward: but by his strength, wit, and policie kept them all out of the principal dominions of the realme of France, and out of this Noble Duchie of Normandy: wherefore I say, first, God saue his soule, and let his bodie now lie in rest, which when he was aliuie, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all: and for the tombe, I assure you is not so decent, nor conuenient as his honour and actes deserved.

After the death of the Noble Prince the Duke of Bedford, the Frenchmen began not onely to withdraue their obedience, which they had by oath promised to the King of England, but also toke sword in hand, and openly defied the Englishmen: but the Englishmen appointed for regent in France Richard Duke of York, sone to Richard Earle of Cambridge (beheaded at Hampton)

Hampton.) This Richard now Regent was so disdained of Edmond Duke of Somerset, being cosen to the King, that by all meanes possible he sought his hinderance, by reason whereof, ere the Duke of Yorke could get his dispatch, he was constrained to linger till the Citie of Paris, and diuers other the chiefest townes in France were gotten by the French king.

The Duke of Yorke perceiuing his enill will, openly dissembled that which he inwardly minded, and thus either of them wrought things to the others displeasure, till at length, by mostall warre they were both consumed, with almost all their whole lines and offsprings.

A cow for til

The Normans of the countrey of Caure, being hartened by the death of the Duke of Bedford, beganne a new rebellion, slue diuers Englishmen, robbed many townes that were under the English obedience, and toke the towne of Wardew by assault, and diuers other townes. But the new Lord Regent being aduertised, sent forth the Lord Scales, sir Thomas Kiriell, and the Lord Hoo, which so afflicted those rebels of Caure, that they slue aboute fise thousand persons, and bzent all the townes and Villages in the countrey, not being walled, so that in that part was neither habitation, nor tillage, for all the people fled into Brytaine, and all the beastes of the countrey were brought to Canbebecke, where a good shepe was sold for an English pence, and a cow for twelue pence. Daily was skirmishing in euery part, in so much, that the Lord Scales discomfited at the Wyke beside Roan, the Wyre and 1500. balliant Frenchmen, of the which, aboute thre hundred were taken prisoners, beside seuen goodly saye coursers. Amongst other of the prisoners, were sir Richard Reiginauld de Fountaines, sir Alaine Gerond, Alaine de Moncey, and Gefrey Gram Captaine of the Scots. But yet this victorie and others the like, staied not the Frenchmen from working treason daily, in so much, that diuers townes turned to the part of king Charles, and some were taken by practise, as Wyappe, Boys de Vincent and other.

Here is one chiefe point to be noted, that eyther the disdaine among the chiefe pæres of the Realme of England (as ye haue heard) or the negligence of the kings Counsell, was the losse of the whole dominion of France, betwene the rulers of Sene and Spaine, and in especiall of the Noble Citie of Paris: for here befoze were sent ouer thousands for defence of the holdes and fortresses, now were sent hundredes, yea and scores, some rascals, and some not able to draba bowe, or heare a bill: for the Lord Willoughby, and the Bishop of Terronanne, which had the Gouernment of the Citie of Paris, had in their company not past 2000. Englishmen. Which weaknesse king Charles wel perceiuing, he appointed the Constable Arthure of Brytaine, the Earle of Dunoy, the Lord De la Roch, and Lisle Adam, with other balliant Captaines, and men of warre, as well Burgonians as French, to go befoze Paris, trusting by fauour of certain Citizens, with whom he had intelligence, shortly to be Lord of the Citie, without great losse of battell: so these Captaines came befoze the Citie of Paris, but perceiuing that all things succeeded not according to their expectation, they returned to Spount Martry, and the next day set on the towne of Saint Dionis, where they slue two hundred hundred Englishmen, and upon composition permitted the other to depart to Paris.

Thomas Lord Beaumont, which of late was come to Paris with 800. men, issued forth of the Citie with 600. souldiers, intending to biewe the doings and number of the French armie, but being espied, he was suddenly compassed about, so that he was discomfited and taken, and with him 80. prisoners, besides 200. which were slaine in the field, and the remnant chased to the gates of the Citie. The Parisians, especially the maister of the hals, and some of the Antueritie, and Michael Lellier, and many other Burgeses of the Citie, perceiuing the weaknesse of the Englishmen, and the force of the Frenchmen, signified to the French Captaines their mindes, willing them with all diligence to come, that they might receiue so rich a pray to them to be deliuered. The Constable delaying no time, came with his power, and lodged by the Charterhouse, and the Lord Lisle Adam appoynting to the walles, shewed to the Citizens a charter, sealed with the great seale of king Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offences, and granted them their olde liberties, so that they would be to him true and obedient: which being to them declared, they ranne about the towne, crying Saint Denis, slue king Charles. The Englishmen perceiuing this, determined to keepe the gate of Saint Dionis, but the chaines were drawne, and women and children cast downe stones and scalding water on their heades, and the Citizens slue them, the Bishop of Erwine, the Lord Willoughby, and sir Simon Morriher, withdrew to the bastille Saint Anthonic, whilist this rumour was in the towne, the Earle of Dunois, and other scaled the wals, and some passed the river by boates, and opened the gate of Saint James, by the which the Constable with his banner displayed entered. The Bishoppe and the Lord Willoughby defended their fortress some daies, and yielded. Thus was the Citie of Paris brought into the possession of Charles the French king, &c. now when Paris, Saint Denis, Saint Germaine and diuers other townes in France were taken for lacke of succour, the Duke of Yorke Regent of France, came ouer into Normandy with 8000. men, and in his company the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke, the Lord Falconbridge and other, but this Regent neuer did good in France, as appeareth by the histories.

to the French.

The 19. day of Iuly, the Duke of Burgoyne, with a great multitude of Burgonians and Flemmings appeared befoze Calcis, and there fight his Pauillions and Bents, at which season was Lieutenant of Calcis sir Iohn Rastcliffe Knight, and of the Castell was Lieutenant the Baron of Dudley: this siege endured about thre weekes, in which season many knightly actes were done and exercised on both parts.

Calcis besieged by the
goyne.

On the second day of August the Duke of Gloucester, protectour of England, with 500. sailles, (as some write,) landed at Calcis, and intended by on the third day following to haue issued out of the towne, and to haue giuen battaille to the Flemmings, (but as our English writers testifie,) so lone as the Duke of Burgoyne was aware of the great power of the Lord

Ro Fabian,

Protectour,

Protector, he took with him of his ordinance that he might lightly carrie, and the other that were cumbersome he left behind. When the duke with his host was thus fled, the Lord protector which his people followed him into the countrey by the space of cleven dayes, in which season he bent to two townes of Wopering and Well, and returned to Calcis, and so into England.

This yere was the Castle of towne of Roxburgh in Scotland besieged by the King of Scots, but when he heard that Sir Ralph Gray knight was coming thither with a competent number to remove the siege, anon he departed, leaving some part of his ordinance behind him, to his great shame and dishonour.

Quene Katherine buried in Westminster.

The 3. of January Quene Katherine late wife to Henry the sixt, and mother to King Henry the first, departed out of this transitory life at Bermondsey, and on the eight of February his body was brought to St. Katherines by the tower, from thence to St. Pauls, and so was buried at Westminster in our Ladies chappell, and his corpes being taken up againe in the reigne of King Henry the 7. when he laid the foundation of his new chappell there, she was neuer since buried, but remaineth still above ground in a coffin of boards, behind the east end of the quire. This Quene Katherine (saith Hall) after the death of King Henry the first his husband, being young and lusty, following more his own appetite, than friendly counsell, & regarding more his private affection, than her owne honour, took to husband (saith he) a goodly gentleman, named Owen Tewther, by whom she conceived and brought forth three sonnes, Edmond, Ispar, and another which was a monke of Westminster, and a daughter which lived not long. After whose death, King Henry because they were his brethren, of one wombe descended, created Edmond Earle of Richmonde, and Ispar Earle of Penbroke: which Edmond had by Margaret daughter and sole heire to John Duke of Somerset, Henry, which after was King of this Realme, called King Henry the seventh.

The Dutches of Bedford, sister to Lewes Earle of St. Paul, without counsell of her friends, married a lusty knight, called Sir Richard Woodville, to the great displeasure of his uncle the Bishop of Eburine, and the Earle his brother. This Sir Richard was made baron of Rivers, and after Earle, and had by his Lady many noble sonnes, and faire daughters, whereof one was Lady Elizabeth, after Quene of England, married to King Edward the fourth.

This yere the 14. of January at none, the great stone gate at London by the tower upon it next to Southwarke fell downe in the Thames and two of the farthest arches of the same byrge, and yet no man perished in body, which was a great worke of God,

Ralph Lord Cromwell, and Matild his wife erected the colledge of the Trinitie at Sathall in Lincolnshire, which Colledge at the suppression in the 38. of Henry the eight was valued to dispend yearly 348. pounds, five shillings.

Also this yere on the ninth of July, Jane late Quene of England, and before Dutches of Bypaine, daughter to the King of Navarre, and wife to King Henry the fourth, died in the maner of yawering a Bowe in Essex, from whence she was removed to Bermondsey, and from thence conveyed to Canterbury, where she was solemnly entered by King Henry the fourth her husband.

This yere the King gave licence to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, and Eleanor his wife, to build and embattell his maner house at Cranewich, to inclose two hundred acres of ground pasture, wood, and beath, and to unbatell his tower in the same park, &c.

In the meane time, John Duke of Somerset accompanied with the Lords of Fauconbridge, Talbot, Sir Francis Surien Arragonois, Mathew Gough, Thomas Pawlet, Thomas Harington, Walter Lymbroke, John Geding, William Watton Esquires, and Thomas Hilton bailife of Roane, with a puissance of the English party, besieged the towne of Harlew both by water and by land. The capitaine within the towne was called Sir John de Scuteville, and Sir Robert his brother, with other, to the number of 600. fighting men. The assailants made trenches, both to assault the towne, and to let the French from succours, that they should neither approach nor aide the townes men besieged: divers assaults were given, and great ordinance was laid before the gate of the towne, which overthrow buildings: the siege endured long, to the great discomfort of them within, whereof they advertised the King, who sent thither the Earle of Devon, the Earle of Dunops, the bastard of Bourbon, the Lord Gaincourt and other, with 4000. men, these passed the river of Some betweene Amias and Corby, came before the towne, and daily skirmished with the Englishmen, but nothing prevailed, and therefore returned. The capitaines of the towne rendred the towne to John Duke of Somerset, who made capitaines there Thomas Pawlet, William Lymbrike, Christopher Barker, and George S. George, which many yeres manfully defended the towne and haven, but after ward when the said Duke was regent, he not onely lost the towne, but also the Citie of Roane, with many other Cities.

This yere was a parliament holden at Westminster in which were divers notable conclusions obtained, aswell for the preservation of peace at home, as for the maintenance of war in outward regions: and as it was made for buying and selling by strangers, very profitable to the publicke weal if it were observed.

An. reg. 16.

On the 6. of November the Earle of Warwick as regent of France, passed the sea, after he had been seven times shipped and unshipped, and landed at Harlew with 1000. fresh souldiers, and came to Roan, and then the Duke of Poike returned into England.

The Earle of Warwick hearing that the Duke of Burgoyne besieged the Castle of Croptie, sent the Lord Talbot, the Lord Fauconbridge, Sir Thomas Kiriel, Sir John Montgomerie, Thomas Lymbroke, Thomas Chandos, Dauby Hall, and other knights and Esquires, and in all 5000. men. When the Duke of Burgoyne was informed of the approach of the Lord Talbot, and other, hee with all his power saving 400. left in a battle by him there newly builded, fledde to Abbeville, which battle was soone gained, and the men either slaine or taken. After this the Lord Talbot sent to the Duke of Burgoin, signifying to him, that except he would come forth, and give him battell, he would utterly waste his countrey of Picardy, and according to his promise he went to townes, spoiled, and slew many people in Picardy, but for all this doings, the Duke of Burgoyne appeared not, but got him from Abbeville to Ambois, so that the Lord Talbot abode 20. daies in Picardy and Artois, besetting all afoze him, and returned without impeachment.

Owen Tewtler foully hurtyng his keeper, brake out of Newgate, but was taken afterward by the Lord Beaumont, and brought again to Newgate, and againe escaped. This Owen was thus imprisoned by the Duke of Gloucester, so that he had foure children by Quene Katherine, late wife to Henry the sixt, as is aforesaid. This Owen was many yeeres afterward taken at a skirmish about Wigmore, and brought by Sir Richard Vehan grandfather to great Vehan the sergeant at armes, to Hereford, and there beheaded, and buried: but afterward Jasper sonne to Owen sodainly tooke Sir Richard Vehan in his house, as some say, at Chepstow Castle, and caused his head to be smitten off. In the moneth of June the Earle of Huntington (as steward of Gwine) with 2000. archers, and 400. spears was sent into Gascoigne, as a supply to the countrey and commons of the same. Also Sir Richard Woodville, Sir William Chamberlaine, Sir William Peits, and Sir William Story with 1000. men were sent to suffice the townes in Normandy, which at that time had thereof great neede, for the English Capitaines had small confidence in the Normans, and not to much in some of their owne nation, for bybertie, with civetousnes ranne fast abroad with French crowns, that nineth any creature could hold their hands close, or purses shut.

This yere, by reason of great tempests, immeasurable winde and raines there rose such a scarcity, that wheate was sold in some places for two shillings six pence the bushell, wine for twelve pence the gallon, bay salt for fourtene pence the bushell, &c.

In this moneth followed such a frost, and after that so deepe a snow, that all the ground was covered therewith, and all the ditches frozen, which wea-ther put the Englishmen in hope to recover againe the towne of Pontboile, by the French being gotten before, by corrupting with money divers burgeses of the towne, wherefore the Englishmen being clothed all in white, with John Lord Clifford their capitaine, came in the night to the ditch, and passed them without danger, by reason of the frost, scaled the walles, slew the watch, and toke the towne with many profitable prisoners.

After the regaining of the towne of Pontboile Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwick the Lieutenant generall of France, and of the dutchy of Normandy, died in the Castle of Roan in Normandy on the last of Aprill, the yere of his age 8. And on the fourth of October next following his corpse being honorably conueyed, as well by water as by land, from Roan in Normandy, to Warwicke in England, and was laid with full solemnities in a faire chest made of stone done in the westdoore of the colledge of our Ladies Church, by his noble ancestors, till a chappell by him deuised in his life were made, which chappell founded on the rocke, and all the members thereof, his executors did fully make and apparely, by the authoritie of his said last will and testament: And there after by the said authoritie they did translate the said body into the vault aboue said, where he is intombed right princely and postured with an image armed of copper and gilt, hopped ouer with clauces of copper and gilt, like a chariot.

About the beginning of Lent, John Duke of Somerset, and the Lord Talbot, with other captaines and men of war, to the number of 2000. marching towards Picardy, passed ouer the riner of Some, and through the towne of Montereul, came before the fortrese of Fulleuill, which the Duke besieged, whilest the Lord Talbot entred farther into the countrey. After that the Duke had mounted his great artillery, and began to batter the hold, the capitaine within being laine with a shot thereof, and the batterie being still continued, the place was yielded, in the which the Duke left a competent garrison of souldiours, which afterward were indamaged the countrey.

This done, the Duke followed the Lord Talbot, who was already entred a good way within the countrey of Sauthois, and now joining their powers together, they came to a fortrese called Liphons in Sauthois, which was also rendred into them, after they had burnt the Church which the countrey people kept against them, and would not yield it, till they were fired out, and burnt, and laine, to the number of 300. The fortrese being by composition deliuered into their hands, the duke with his power lay there about ten dayes, sending diuers troupes of his men abroad into the countrey, which spoiled the same, toke the fortrese of Carbonniers, and the Lord thereof within it, who for his ransome, and to haue his subjects and house saued from spoile and fier, compounded with his takers for 1000. saluz of gold, which he paid to them: finally, after the Duke of Somerset, and the Lord Talbot, with their power had laine in Liphons about ten dayes, they returned into Normandy without any impeachment.

This yere wheate was sold at London for thre shillings the bushell, malt for thirtene shillings the quarter, otes for eight pence the bushell, which for red men to eate beanes, pease, and barley, more then in an hundred yeres before: wherefore Stephen Browne maior of London sent into Fraunce, and caused to be brought to London many ships laden with rie, which did much good to the people, for bread coine was so scarce in England that poore people made them bread of ferne roots.

In a Parliament at Reading it was ordained, that all merchant strangers should goe to hoell with Englishmen, and to make sale of their merchandises, and buy againe what they would within the space of six monethes, giving their host for euery twenty shillings worth two pence, except the sterlinges, And that euery householder that was alien, should pay to the King 13. pence the yere, and euery seruant alien six pence.

Harfield Earle of Pembroke, these were the Kings brethren by the Mothers side, John Sutton Knight was created Baron of Dudley, the last day of the Parliament at Reading. Sir Richard Wich vicar of Hermetworth in Essex, or middlesex, sometime vicar of Dertford in Kent, who had before abjured, was bent on the tower hill the 17. of June. After whose death was great murmur among the people, for some said he was a god man and an holy, and put to death by malice: and some said the contrary, so that many men and women went by night to the place where he was bent, and offered their money, images of wax, and other things, making their prayers, kneeling, and kissing the ground, bare away with them the ashes of his body for holy reliques, &c. This endured eight dayes, till the mayor and aldermen ordained men of armes, to restrain the people, who apprehended many, and sent them to prison, among whom was taken the vicar of Berking Church beside the tower, in whose parish all this was done, who had received the offering of the simple people. And to excite them to offer the more fervently to the fulfilling of his false countenances, he had mingled ashes with the powder of spices, and strewd them in the place where the pyre was bent, and so the simple people were deceived, weening the sweete savour had come of the ashes of the dead priest: all which the said vicar of Berking church confessed in prison. This have I noted the more at large, because some have writt the vicar of Berking to be bent, which is false, for he was not bent, though he better deserved than the other.

The Duke of
of France.

After the death of the Earle of Marwike, the Duke of Poike was againe made regent of France, which being accompanied with the Earle of Arfoz, the Lord Bourcher called Earle of Ewe, Sir James of Dymond, the Lord Clinton, Sir Richard Woodville, and diuers other noble men on the fifteenth of May shipped at Portsmouth, and sailed thence into Normandy, before whose arrivall, the French King soze graced with the towne of Ponthois, assembled a great army, and besieged the said towne himselfe in person, environing it with battiles, trenches, and ditches, beating the walls and bulwarks with the shot of great ordinance, giving thereunto diuers great assaults, but John Lord Clifford like a valliant capitaine defended the towne so manfully, that the Frenchmen rather lost than won.

The Duke of Poike at his landing, sent for the Lord Talbot, and a great number of souldiours, and so came nere to the towne of Ponthois, and there incamped himselfe, and sent word to the French King, that thither he was come to give him battell, if he would come out of his strength and battles, but the French King determined not to venture his person with men of so base estate, but meant to keepe his ground, bidding the Lord regent to enter at his perill: and in the meane season did what he could to stop the passage of the river Sise, so that no viadual should be brought to the English army by that way.

The Duke of Poike perceiving that the French King minded not to fight, purposed to passe over the river of Sise, and so to fight with him. Whereupon he removed his campe, and appointed the Lord Talbot and other to make countenance, as they would passe the river by force at the port of Beaumont, ammont, and appointed another company in boates of timber and lether, and bylges made of cozds and ropes to passe over beneath the abbey. Whilist the Lord Talbot made a crye as though he would assault the gate, certaine Englishmen passed the water in boates, and drew a bridge of cozds over, so that a great number of them were got to the other side, ere the Frenchmen were advised what had hapned. When they saw the chance, they ran like mad men to have stopped the passage, but it was too late, for the most part of the Englishmen were got over, inso much, that they chased their enemies backe, and due Sir Guiliam de Chastell, and diuers other. The Frenchmen seeing their euill hap, returned to their King, and tolde him what had happened, whereupon he doubting to be assailed to his disadvantage, thought not good longer to tarry, but with all speed, removing his ordinance into the battell of Saint Martin, which he had newly made, dislodged in the night from Ponthois, and went to Poyse, leaving the Lord de Cotigni Admirall of France with 3000. men, to keepe the battell. The Englishmen the next day came before the towne of Ponthois, thinking there to haue found the French King, but he was gone, and in his lodging they found great riches, and much stuffe, which he could not carrie away for feare of the sodaine invasion. The Duke with his power entred the towne, repaired the walls, and diuers times assaulted the battell of the Frenchmen. After this the Duke intending once againe to offer the French King battell, left behinde him at Ponthois, Sir Geruais Clifton, Sir Nicholas Burdet, Henry Chandos, and a thousand soldiers, and therewith removing with his whole army came before Poyse, where he left himselfe and his men in order of battell ready to fight. Where issued out some Frenchmen, but to their losse: for diuers of them were slaine, and fower valliant horsemen taken. The Duke perceiving the Frenchmen durst not encounter in field with the English power, dislodged from Poyse, & came to Pount, and from thence to Roan.

When the Regent and the Lord Talbot were returned againe into Normandy, the French King considering how much it should rebound to his dishonour to let rest the towne of Ponthois, in his enemies hands, he effones returning sodainly againe unto Ponthois, he first by assault gat the Church, and after the whole towne, toke the capitaine and diuers other Englishmen, and due to the number of three hundred, amongst the which Sir Nicholas Burdet these butler of Normandy was one.

After this King Henry, and King Charles, agreed to send Ambassadors to commune of peace: King Henry sent Henry Beaufort Cardinall of Winchester, with diuers other noble men to Calcis, with whom was also sent Charles Duke of Millance yet prisoner in England, to the end he might be both author of the peace, and procurer of his owne deliuerance. The French King sent the Archbisshop of Reims, and the Earle of Dunois, and the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Lord de Creue-Cure, and diuers other: all these met at Calcis, where the Duke of Millance courteously received the Earle of Dunois (his ballard brother) thanking him greatly for his paines taking in governing his lands and countrie. abſence, diuers communications were had, as well for the deliuerance of the Duke, as for a ſmall peace, but nothing was concluded, ſaving that another meeting was appointed. The Duke of Orlance was ſet at libertie, paying for his ranſome 300000. crownes.

The 26. of nouember was a challenge in armes done beſore King Henry within liſts, in Smithfield, betwene Sir Richard Wooduile, a Knight of England, and a Knight of Spaine, but the King tooke vp the matter into his hands, after the third ſtroke.

This yere King Henry being of himſelfe alwayes naturally inclined to doe good, and fearing leaſt he might ſeeme vntthankfull to Almighty God for his great benefits beſtowed vpon him, ſince the time he firſt tooke vpon him the regiment of his Realme, determined for his priuar notable worke, to erect and found two famous Colleges in the honour and worſhip of his holy name, and for the increaſe of vertue, the dilation of cunning, and eſtabliſhment of Chriſtian ſaith, whereof the one in Cambridge, to be called his Colledge Royall of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas: and the other at Eaton, beſide Windſore, to be called his Colledge of our Bleſſed Ladie. And for the perſormance of this his deuout purpoſe, he enſcoſſed certaine Biſhops with other noble and worſhipfull perſonages, by his letters patentes, with lands and poſſeſſions, parcell of his inheritance of the Dutchie of Lancaſter, to the clere value of well nere ſower and thirtie hundred pound by yere, which letters patentes he after confirmed by his acte of Parliament, declaring alſo by his will vnto his ſaid ſceſſors, his intent and meaning, how the ſame ſhould be employed vpon the edifications of his ſaid two Colledges, whereof in my iudgement the deuice is ſo excellent, and the buildings ſo princely and apt for that purpoſe, as I cannot omit to ſet forth vnto you the very plat of the whole Colledge in Cambridge, euen as I ſinde mentioned, almoſt Verbatim, in his ſaid will, ſuppoſing, that if the reſt of the houſe had proceeded according to the Chappell already finiſhed (as his full intent and meaning was) the like Colledge could ſcant haue ben found againe in any Chriſtian land. This Colledge was begun in his time, and finiſhed ſo ſarre, that in Anno 1443. (which was the 23. of his raigne) the cemetery of Church yerde, the altar, &c. (as the manner was) were conſecrated by the Biſhops of Salisburie and Lincolne. The words of the Will are thus: As touching the dimensions of the Church of my ſaid Colledge, of our Ladie and Saint Nicholas of Cambridge, I haue deuised and appointed, that the ſame Church ſhall containe in length 288. ſote of aſſie, without any Aleas, and all of the wideneſſe of ſortie ſote. euery side thereof a bay window. And in the neather end of the same hall toward the middle of the same pane a pantrie and butterie, euery of them in length twentie fote, and in breadth seventene fote, and ouer that two chambers for officers. And at the neather end of the hall toward the West, a goodly kitchen. And the same pane shall haue inward two towers, ozbalnes for the wayes into the hall and library. And in euery corner of the said quadrant shall be two corner towers, one inward, and one outward moze then the towers aboue rehearsed. And at the upper end of the hall the prouds lodging, that is to wit, moze than the chambers for him about specified, a palour on the ground, containing foure and thirtie fote in length, and two and twentie fote in breadth, and two chambers aboue of the same quantitie. And westward closing thereto a kitchen for him, a larder house, tables and other necessary housings and grounds. And westward beyond these houses, and the said kitchen ozbalnes for the hall, a bakehouse, a brewhouse, and other houses of office, betwene which there is left a ground square of fourescore fote in euery pane, for wode and such stufte. And in the middle of the said large quadrant shall be a conduit, goodly deuised for ease of the same colledge. And I will, that the edification procede in large forme of my said colledge cleane and substantiall, setting apart superfluitie of two great curious woorkes, of entail and busse moulding. And I haue deuised and appointed that the predict of my said colledge, as well on both sides of the garden from the colledge to the water, as in all other places of the same precinct, be inclosed with a substantiall wall, of the height of fourtene fote, with a large tower at the principall entrie against the middle of the east pane out of the high strate. And in the same tower a large gate, and another tower in the middle of the West end at the new bridge. And the same wall to be crested, embattelled, and fortified with towers, as many as shall be thought convenient thereunto. And I will, that my said colledge be edified of the most substantiall and best adding stufte, of stone, lead, glasse, and iron, that may best be had and prouided thereto.

Thus much I haue enlarged by occasion of reading this good Kings will:
the cunning deuise whereof I leaue to the considerate iudgement of such as be expert in architecture, heartily desiring almighty God to put into the heart of some noble Prince of his land, one day to make perfect this royall woorkes charitably begun.

Roger

Roger Bolinbrooke a great astronomer, with Thomas Southwell a chanon of St. Stephens chappell at Westminster, were taken as conspirators of the Kings death, so it was said, that the same Roger should labour to consume the Kings person by woe of peregromancie, and the said Thomas should lay passes in the lodge of Harnesley Parke beside London, vpon certain instruments, with the which the said Roger should vse his craft of peregro-mancie, against the faith, and was assenting to the said Roger, in all his woorkes. And the five and twentieth day of Julie being Sonday, Roger Bo-linbrooke, with all his instruments of peregromancie, that is to say, a chappe painted wherein he was wont to sit, vpon the foure corners of which chappe stode foure woorkes, and vpon euery woork an image of copper hanging, with many other instrumentes: he stode on a high scaffolde in Pauls Churchyard, before the crosse, holding a sworde in his right hand, and a scepter in his left, arrayed in a marvellous attire, and after the sermon was ended by master Low Bishop of Rochester, he abused all articles longing to the craft of peregromancie or mistwising to the faith, in presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Cardinal of Winchester, the Bishop of London, Salisbury and many other.

On the Tuesday next following, dame Elianor Cobham, daughter to Reginald Cobham Lord of Strichough: Dutchesse of Gloucester fled by night into the Sanctuary at Westminster, which caused hir to be suspected of treason.

In the meane time Roger Bolingbroke, was examined before the Kings Counsaile, where he confessed that he brought the said peregromancie at the siring and procurement of the said Dame Elianor, to knowe what should befall of hir, and to what estate she should come, whereupon the was cited to appeere before Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Cantuarie, Henry Beau-force Bishop of Winchester Cardinal, Iohn Kempe Archbishop of Yorke Cardinal: William Aschothe Bishop of Salisbury, and other in Saint Stephens chappell at Westminster, there to answer to certain articles in number 28. of peregromancie, witchcraft, sorcerie heresie, and treason, where when the appeared, the foresaid Roger was brought forth to witness against hir, and said, that she was canle and first stirred him to laboz in the said arte.
Then on the eleventh of August, she was committed to the warde of Sir Iohn Steward, Sir William Wolfe Knights, Iohn Stanley Esquire, and other, to be conveyed to the Castle of Lodes, there to remaine til three weekes after Michaelmasse.

Shortly after a commission was directed to the Carles of Huntingdon, Stafforde, Suffolke, and Northumberland, the treasurer Sir Ralph Cromwell, Iohn Cornwall, Lord Fanhope, Sir Walter Hungerforde, and to certaine Iudges of both Benches, to enquire of all manner of treasons, sorceries and other things that might be hurtfull to the Kings person, before whom the said Roger, and Thomas Southwell, as principals, and dame Elianor as ac-cessarie, were indicted of treason in the Guilde Hall of London.

There was taken also Margerie Gurdemaine a witch of Eye besides
at Westminster

Westminster, whose sorcerie and witchcrafts the said Elianor had long time used, and by his medicines and bynikes enforced the Duke of Gloucester to love her, and after to wed her, wherefore, and for cause of relapse, the same witch was hient in Smithfield, on the 27. of October.

The one and twentieth of October, in the chappell beforesaid, befoze the Bishops, of London Robert Gilbert, of Lincoln William Alnwyke, of Norwich Thomas Brouns, the sayde Elianor appered, and Adam Molins clarke of the Kings counsell read certaine articles objected against hir of Sorcerie and Pseudomancie, whereof some shee denied, and some shee granted.

The thirde and twentieth of October dame Elianor appered againe, and witnessnes were brought forth and examined: and she was convicted of the said articles: then was it asked if she would say any thing against the witnessnes, whereunto she answered nay, but submitted hir selfe. The 27. day of October shee abjured the articles, and was adioyned to appere againe the ninth of November. In the meane time to wit on the 16. of October Thomas Southwell died in the Towre of London, as himselfe had prophesied that he should never die by Justice of the Lawe.

The 9. of November dame Elianor appered befoze the Archbishop and other, in the sayde Chappell, and received hir penance, which shee performed.

On Monday the 13. of November, she came from Westminster, by water, and landed at the Temple bridge, from whence with a taper of waxe of two pound in hir hande, she went through flatestræte, hoddle (saue a herchese) to Pauls, where she offered hir taper at the high altar. On the Wednesday next shee landed at the Swan in Thamis stræte, and then went through Bridgestræte, Grace church stræte, straight to Leaden Hall, and so to Christ Church by Aldgate. On Friday shee landed at Quene Hise, and so went through Cheape to St. Michaels in Cornhill, in forme aforesaid: at all which times the Hales, Sheriffs, and crafts of London, received hir and accompanied her. This being done shee was committed to the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley, wherein shee remained during hir life in the Castle of Chester, having pærely 100. markes assigned for hir finding, in the 22. of Henry the first shee was removed to Bakenham, there to be safely kept, whose pride, false, couetise, and lecherie, were cause of hir confusion.

The 12. of November Roger Bolingbroke, with Sir John Hum pzeff, and William Woodham Esguier, was attained in the Guild Hall of London, where the said John and William had their charters, but Roger Bolingbroke was condemned, and had iudgement of Sir John Hody, chiefe Justice of the Kings Bench, and the same day he was drawn from the towre to Thobone and there hanged and quartered: and when the said Roger should suffer, he said that he was neuer guiltie of any treason against the Kings person, but he had presumed too far in his cunning, whereof he cried God mercy: and the Justice that came on him iudgement lived not long after.

kept two yeres in the Kings hands, was restored to all his livings with great glory, for he was crowned King of England, by the Kings owne hands, and nominated chiefe Earle of England.

The Duke of Boffance being delivred (as is afoze shewed) and speaking now better English than French, after his arrival in France, repaired to the Duke of Burgoyne, and according to his promise, married the Lady Mary Cleue in the towne of Saint Omer, on whom he begat a sonne, which after was french King by the name of Lewis the twelfth.

Richard duke of Yorke regent of France and gouernor of Normandy, sent the Lord Willoughby with a great number of souldiers, to destroy the countie of Amiens, and John Lord Talbot was appointed to besiege the towne of Diepe: and the regent himselfe, accompanied with Edmond Duke of Somerset, set forward into the dutchie of Anjou. The Lord Willoughby entered the countie of his enemies upon such a sobaine, that a great number of people were taken ere they could withdraw into any place of safegard. The Frenchmen in the garrisons adioyning, altonied with the clamor and crye of the people, issued out, and manfully fought with the Englishmen, but in the end the Frenchmen slaine in the forefront, they turned their backs and fled, the Englishmen followed and slew many, and such as escaped the sword were robbed by the earle of Saint Pole, which was coming to aide the Englishmen: in this conflict were slaine aboue 600. men of armes, and a great number taken.

The Dukes of Yorke and Somerset entered into Anjou and Maine, and there destroyed the towne, and spoiled the people, and with great prayes and prisoners repaired againe into Normandy, whither also the Lord Willoughby withdrew after his enterpryse achieved. The Duke of Somerset entered into the marches of Bypaine, and toke by assault a towne named la Cerche, appertaining to the Duke of Alanson, spoiling and burning the same, from thence he went to Pontay, where he solozned two moneths, sending forth daily his men of war, to destroy the countries of Anjou, Craonnois, and Chatragonnois. The French King sent the Marshall Loyach with foure thousand men to resist the inuasions of the Duke of Somerset, but the Duke discomfited him, slew 100. of his men, and toke 62. prisoners of the best of them. The Duke after this encounter toke the towne of Beaumont le Comte, and manned all the fortresses on the frontiers of his enemies, and with rich booties and prisoners returned to the Duke of Yorke.

In the meane time the Lord Talbot besieged the towne of Diepe, enuironing it with deepe trenches and rampiers, building also vpon the mount Powlet a strong baste, but at length perceiving the towne to be strongly defended, he delivred the custodie of the baste to his bastard sonne a valiant young man and departed to Roan for aide, money, and munition.

The French King sent his sonne the Dolphin of Vienne, with the Earle of Dunois and 15000. men to raise the siege from Diepe: thre dayes they assailed the baste, in the which 600. Englishmen were inclosed: at length the Frenchmen won it, and toke the bastard Talbot prisoner, with Sir William Poitow, and Sir John Repley, which shortly after were redeemed. The other Englishmen, seeing the battle won by the Frenchmen, stood all a day in order of battaile, and in the night following returned to Rouen.

Whilste these things were in doing, Philip Duke of Burgoigne made harpe war against the Earle of H. Pole, in taking from him his townes and Castles, so that he was constrained to renounce his allegiance, promised and sworne to the King of England, and returned to the French parte.

The 30. of January a challenge was done in Smithfield within liffes, before the King, the one, Sir Philip le Beawfe of Aragon a Knight, and the other an Esquire of the Kings house called John Atley or Atley, these coming to the field toke their tents, and then was the Knights sonne made Knight by the King, and so brought againe to his fathers tent. When the Heraulds of armes called them by name to doe their battaile, and so they came both all armed with their weapons: The Knight came with his sword drawn, and the Esquire with his speare, which speare the Esquire cast against the Knight, but the Knight auoyded it with his sword, and cast it to the ground, then the Esquire toke his are, and went against the Knight sodainly, on whom he stroke many strokes hard and sore upon his balenct and on his hand, and made him lofe and let fall his are to the ground, and blast vp his vnder thre times, and caught his dagger and would haue smitten him in the face, for to haue slaine him in the field: and then the King cried ho, and so they were departed, and went to their tents, and the King dubbed John Atley Knight for his valiant toney, and the Knight of Aragon offered his harness at Windsor.

John Beauford Earle of Somerset, was made Duke of Somerset: and Lord John Talbot for his approued prowes shewed in France, was created Earle of Shrovetbury, & his sonne Lord Talbot, and then with a company of 3000. men sent againe into Normandy, for defence of that Countrie the 25. of May.

The Citizens of Norwich, rose against the Prior of Christs Church, within the same Citie, and would haue fired the priory, they kept the towne by strength against the Duke of Norfolk, and all his power, wherefore the King sent thither the chiefe Judge John Fortescue, with the Earles of Stafford and of Huntington, who indicted many Citizens, and the Prior also. The Liberties of the Citie were seised into the Kings hand, and Sir John Clifton made captaine there, and many of the Citizens fled ouer the seas and into vni knowne places.

John Holland Earle of Huntington, at Windsor was created Duke of Greffier. John Beawford Duke of Somerset deceased, and was buried at Windsor.

Also this yere deceased Henry Chicheley, when he had sate 29. yeres Archbishop of Canterburie. This Archbishop in his life time, to wit in Anno 1425. began the foundation of a goodly Colledge, and hospitall at Higham Ferris in Northamptonshire, of 8. secular priories fellowes, foure clarkes, and 6. Choristes: And an almshouse, or hospitall for poore people, and obtained many goodly benefites and preferments which he gaue to the said towne, which hospitall for the poore by him founded, his nephew Robert Chicheley, and

This archbishop also founded two Colledges in Oxford, the one All soules Colledge (vnto the which King Henry the first gaue lands lately belonging to the priors allians, to wit, 4. priories, Albermar in Dorset, Kummer in Kent, Langenith in South Wales, & Medon Winkham in Northamptonshire, and therefore the said is. in the Charter is called founder: ) The other Barnard Colledge since suppressed by King Henry the 8. now by Sir Thomas White againe redified, and named S. Johns Colledge. He also redified the new Library at Canterburie, and furnished the same with bookes, bought a great part of their steeple, repaired their church, and gaue to the convent and Church many ornaments, and rich iewels, he caused his owne tombe in the same Church to be builded during his life, he was the new builder, or especiall repayer of the faire large parish Church of Cradocow, as appeareth by his armes grauen on the wals, steeple, and porch of the same Church.

John Stafford borne at Hoke in the parish of Abbotsbery in Dorsetshire, doctor of lawes, deane of Saint Martins le Grand in London, after Bishop of Bath and Wells, about the 12. of Henry the 6. made Chancellor of England, was by Eugenius the fourth, made Archbishop of Canterburie.

Also Lewes Luishebrughie Bishop of Ely deceased at his maner of Hatfield Anno. Eli. and was buried at Ely. To whom Thomas Bourchar succeeded, being translated from Worcester.

Whilste England was disquieted, and France by spoile defaced, all Christendome lamented the continuall destruction of so noble a Realme, and the effusion of so much Christian blood: wherefore to agree the two puissant kings, all the Princes of Christendome trauailed so effectually by the Orators and Ambassadors, that a diet was appointed to be kept at the Citie of Towrs in Normaine, where, for the 15. of England appeared William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, doctor Adam Molins Bishop of Chichester, keeper of the Kings priuy seale, Sir Robert Ros, and other: and for the French King were appointed Charles Duke of Orleans, Lewes de Borbon Earle of Arundel, great master of the French Kings household, Pierce de Brele Steward of Boudoune, and Bartram Beannan Lord of Bersegni.

There were also sent Ambassadors from the Emperre, from Spaine, from Denmarke, and from Hungarie, to be mediators betwixt the two Princes, many meetings were about this busines, but no finall concord could be agreed vpon, more then certaine truce for eightene months, which after was prolonged to the yere 1449. but in the meane time, poore, as ye shall heare after ward.

In this treatie William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, imagining with himselfe, that the best way to come to a perfect peace, was to moue some marriage, betwene the French Kings kinnesman, the Lady Margaret daughter to Reyner Duke of Aniole, and King Henry of England: this Duke Reyner named himselfe King of Sicill, Naples, and Ierusalem, having onely the title of those Realme, without any profit. This marriage was at the first made strange to the Earle, and one thing seemed to be agre at let to it, to wit, because the King of England possessed a great part of the Dutchie of Anjou, and the whole countrie of spaine, which pertained (as they said) to Duke Keyner. The Earle of Suffolke condescended, that the Dutchie of Anjou, and the countie of spaine should be delivered to the Duke, demanding with his daughter for his marriage nothing. And to the intent that of this truce might insue a small concord, a day of enteruiew was appointed betwene the King and the Duke, in a place convenient, betwene Chartres and Roan.

quess and

When these things were concluded, the Earle of Suffolke with his company returned into England where he declared what an honorable truce he had taken, through which there was great hope of a small peace, by meanes of the honorable marriage which he had concluded. But though this marriage pleased well the King, and diuers of his counsell, yet other some were against it. For the performance of the conclusions, the French King sent the Earle of Wandosme great master of his house, and the Archbishop of Reims first pere of France, and diuers other into England, where they were honorably entertained, and after that the instruments were sealed, and delivered on both parts, the said Ambassadors returned with great rewards.

When these things were done, the King created Humfrey Earle of Staffor'd Duke of Buckingham: and Henry Beauchamp Earle of Warwick, King Henry hartily tendering him for his parents sake, bestowed vpon him the Dukedome of Warwick: vnto whom also the King gaue the Castle of Bissolw, with all the appurtenances, which King Iohn had kept in his hands and his successors after him: he gaue vnto him also the Isles of Gernsey and Jarnsey, Serke, Erme, and Arney with all the pylorics aliens in the same. The Earle of Dorset was created and made Marquess of Dorset, and William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke was created Marquess of Suffolke: also Iohn Talbot Knight, the son of Iohn Earle of Shrewsbury, was created Baron Little for him and his heires males on the 26. of July.

In the moneth of November William de la Pole marques of Suffolke with his wife and many honorable persons both men and women richly apparelled, sailed into France, for the conuenance of the Lady Margaret, nominated Queen into the Realme of England. This noble company came to the Citie of Rouen in Touraine, where they were honorably received & entertained, both of the French King and of the Duke Reiner, where the marques of Suffolke as procurator to King Henry, espoused the said Lady in the Church of S. Martin. At which marriage were present the father & mother of the bride, the French King which was uncle to the Duke Reiner, and the French Quene aunt to the Dutches his wife: there were also the Dukes of Orleans, of Calabrie, of Anfon, and of Brytaine. 7. Earles, 21. bishops, besides knights and gentlemen. When the feast, triumphs, bankets, and kisse were ended, the Lady was delivered to the marques of Suffolke, which in great estate carried her through Normandy vnto Diepe, where a while they remained.

On Candlemas euen in diuers places of England, was great weathering of wind, hayle, snow, rapne, thunders with lightning, whereby the Church of Balbocke in Hertfordshire, the Church of Walden in Essex, and diuers other were forseaken. And the skæpe of Saint Pauls in London, about two of the clocke in the afternone, was set on fire in the midst of the shaft, first on the west side, and then on the south, and the people espying the fire, came to quench it in the skæpe, which they did with vinegar, so farre as they could finde, so that when the spaior, with much people came to Pauls, to haue holpen if need had bene, they returned againe euery man to his home, trusting to God all had bene well, but anone after, betwene eight and nine of the clocke, the fire brast againe out of the skæpe, more feruent then before, and did much harme to the lead and timber thereof: but the spaior and much people came thither, and with vinegar quenched the fire that was feruent, so that no man was perished. The skæpe of Waltham in Essex, and of Kingstone in Surrey, was also fired by the same lightnings. The fire at Pauls being quenched, standart of tre being set vp at Leaden-Hall in Cornhill of London, made fast in the midst of the pavement, and decked with holme and Iule, for disport of Christians to the people of the Citie, it was togne and cast downe with such violence that the stones of the pavement, were cast about in the streete, and into diuers mens houses, to the great terror of the people, that neuer had scene so strange a tempest.

The Lady Margaret being transported from Diepe, landed at Dorchester, from whence she was conveyed by water to Hampton, and rested there in a place called Gods house, from thence she went to Southwike, and was married to the King in the Abbey of Richfield on the 22. of Aprill, and from thence she was honorably conveyed by the Lords & estates of this land, which met with her in sundry places with great retinues of men, in diuers lieries with their haies boyled, and some beaten with Goldsmiths worke in most costly manner, and specially of the Duke of Gloucester, who met her with 500. men in a lierie, and so was conveyed to the Blaque Heath, where she was met by the spaior, Aldermen & Sherifes of the Citie in scarlet, and the crafts of the same, all riding on horseback, in blew gownes with boyled haies, and red hoods, on the 28. of May, who conueied her with her train through Southwike, and so through the Citie of London, then beautified with pageants of diuers histories, and other shewes of welcome, maruellous costly and sumptuous, which I ouerpasse, saue onely to name a few. At the bylode foote toward Southwark, a pageant of peace and plenty, Ingrédimini, & replere terram, and certaine verses in English. Noes ship vpon the bridge, Iam non ultra irasci super terram, verses in English. At Leaden Hall, madam Grace Chancelor de Dieu, verses in English. At the tunne in Cornhill, of Saint Margaret verses in English. At the great conduit in Cheape of the fine wife and fine foolish virgins, verses in English. At the crosse in Cheape of the beauenly Ierusalem, verses. At Pauls gate, of the generall resurrection and iudgement, with verses accordingly, all made by Iohn Lydgare.

On the 30. of May she was solemnly crowned at Westminster. This woman Woman excelled all other, as well in beauty and favour, as in wit and politie, and was of stomacke and courage not inferior to any: her badge was the daisie flower. This marriage seemed to many both vnsortunate, and vnsprofitable to the Realme of England, and that for diuers causes: first the king had with her no dowry, and for the fetching of her, and other charges about her, the Marques of Suffolke demyanded a whole sixteenth in open Parliament: and also there was deliuered for her the Dutchie of Anion, the Cite of Aunis, and the county of Maine. Furthermore, the Earle of Arundel took such displeasure with the king of England for the marriage, that he became bitter enemy to the Realme of England, and was the chiefe cause that the Englishmen were expelled out of the Dutchie of Aquitaine.

An. reg. 24.

A Parliament was summoned, in the which it was concluded, that by god forceight Normandy might be furnished for defence before the ende of the trefce, that the French king should take no aduantage through want of time: provision: hereupon money was granted, and an army leuied, the Duke of Somerset appointed to be Regent of Normandy, and the Duke of Poike discharged of that office.

The Marquesse of Suffolke the second of June, in the first session of this Parliament, before the Lordes spirituall and tempozall in the high house assembled, eloquently declared his paine and diligence sustained in his legacy, as well for the concluding an abstinence of warre, as in making of the marriage, opening also to them, that the said trefce expired the first of Aprill next coming, except a final peace, or a further trefce were concluded in the mean season: and therefore he aduised them to forsee and provide things necessary for the warres, least happily the French perceiving them vnprepared, would take the aduantage, and agree neither to peace nor amitie. Like wise on the next morrow, he descended into the common house, accompanied with certaine Lordes, and there declared the same matter to the knights, and burgesses, praying the commons for his discharge, that as well all his doings and proceedings in the kings affaires, beyond the sea, as also his aduertisements and counsaile opened to the Lordes and commons now together assembled, might be by the king and them enacted, and enrolled in the recordes of the Parliament. Whereupon on the next morrow William Burley then speaker, and then company of the lower house, repaired to the kings presence then sitting amongst the Lordes, and there humbly required that the request of the Marquesse might be granted, and so likewise the Lordes made the like petition, kneeling on their knees, and the king condescended to their desires, and so the whole matter was enacted and recorded for his acquittall.

In the Tower
was beheaded.

Henry Beauchampe Duke of Warwicke, chiefe Earle of England, Lord Spencer and Butgauenie, king of the yle of Wight, and Gernsey and Iarnsey, and Lord of the Castell of Bristow, married Cicely daughter to Richard Nevill Earle of Salisbury, and had issue a daughter named Anne, who died at the age of five yeres, he at the age of 22. yeres died in the Castell of Banley, and was buried at Theowbury.

John

John David appeached his master William Catur, an armorer dwelling in S. Dunstons parish in Fleetstreet, of treason, and a day being assigned them to fight in Smithfield, the master being welbeloued, was so cherished by his friends, and pled so with iurors, that being therewith overcome, was also vnbekely slaine by his seruant: but that false seruant (for he falsely accused his master) liued not long unpunished, for he was after hanged at Tyborne for felony: let such false accusers note this example, and loke for no better ende, without speedie repentance: my selfe haue had the like seruant, that likewise accused me of many articles, he liued yet, but hath hardly escaped hanging since, God make him penitent.

Thomas first Thomas Broke of Kallmaine appeached sir James Butler Earle of Desmond of treasons, which had a day assigned to fight in Smithfield, the lists were made, and the field prepared, but when it came to the point, the king commanded they should not fight, and toke the quarrell into his hands, which was done at the instance of certaine preachers and doctors of London, as master Gilbert Worthington, parson of S. Andrewes in Holborne and other.

Pope Eugenius sent a golden Rose to the king of England, expressing the property and application of the same, with the ceremony that is pærely bled on Palme Sunday, touching the same Rose, exhorting the king against the Turkes. Which Rose Lodouicus Cordona doctor of diuinitie did present to the king in S. Stephens chappell at Westminster vpon Saint Andrewes day, in presence of the Dukes of Poike and Gloucester, Cardinal Kempe Archbishop of York, & John Stafford Archbishop of Canterbury Chancellor of England.

King Henry kept his Christmasse at Saint Edmondsburie, and remained there till Easter. In which meane space, to wit on the 10. of february began a Parliament at S. Edmondsburie in Suffolke, at which time for feare of the Duke of Gloucester, all the waies about the same town were kept with armed men both day and night, so that many died with colde and waking. Humfrey Duke of Gloucester being at the Castell of the Wics in Wilshire, came from thence to the Parliament, and was lodged in the hospitall, where shortly after he was arrested by John Lord Beaumont high Constable, the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Somerset & other, who appointed certaine of the kings household to wait vpon him: but on the 24. day he died for sorrow, as some said, that he might not come to his answer: his body was shewed to the lordes & commons, and seemed to die of a palsy, or of an impostume: he was honorably buried at S. Albons: 32. of this principall seruants were arrested & sent to diuers prisons, & five of them were arraigned at London, and condemned, whose names were sir Roger Chamberlain knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Turley Esquires, & Richard Nedam gentleman, which were all fine drawn from the Tower of London to Tyborne, & there hanged, letten down quicke, stript naked, marked with a knife for to be quattered, and then a charter shewed for their liues by the Duke of Suffolke: but the peaman of the crostone had their linelode, & the hangman had their cloths, or wearing apparell. The pardon for liues was obtained through the earnest sute & labour of master Gilbert Worthington, then parson of S. Andrewes

In Wolborn, a doctor of Divinity, a famous man, and a great preacher in those daies. Thomas Wild of Greenwich Esquire serving the said Duke, being amongst other pardoned, the course of his pardon in the patent runneth to this effect, for being amongst many other traitors against the king with Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, they went about and practised to deliver Elianor, late wife to the Duke from out of prison, and gathered a great power, and number of men, to come to the Parliament at Burgh, and there to have practised the destruction of the king, &c. James Fines knight was created Baron of Say and Sele, John Beauchampe Baron of Powicke, and Richard Woodville Baron, and Lord Rivers at Burgh. Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, Cardinall of the title of S. Eusebij, after he had late Bishop 43. yeres, deceased on the 11. of April, he founded an house of almes (adjoining to the hospitall of S. Croffe by Winchester) with a master, 2. chapleins, 35. poor men, and 3. women, & gave lands thereto, at that time valued 158. pound, 13. shillings, 4. pence, as appeareth by the patten, more he gave the, the hospitall of S. John de Fordingebidge: William Wamfler prouost of Eaton, succeeded in that Bishopricke.

The 5. of August deceased John Holland Duke of Excester, and was buried in the hospitall of Saint Katherine nigh to the Tower of London. About the same time deceased the fozenamed Doctor Gilbert Worthington, parson of Saint Andrewes in Wolborne, a most famous preacher, and greatly noted for his good life. Also about the same time, to wit the 24. of October deceased William Lichfield doctor of Divinity, parson of Allhalowes the Spoke in Thamys street, the which was counted a good and holy man, he made in his daies 3083 sermons, as appeared and was found in his booke of his owne hand writing, besides many booke that he compiled of Divinitie yet extant, especially one in a fine verse intituled, The complaint of God to man, and Answer of the penitent to God, &c.

In this 26. yere of the raigne of this King, I finde no great matter worth the recitall, but that the Marquesse of Suffolke, by great favour of the King and Quene, was created Duke of Suffolke, which dignitie he long enjoyed not: for Richard Duke of Yorke being greatly alied by his wife, to the chiefest yeres and potentates of the Realme, once and besides his owne progenie, perceiuing the King to be a ruler, and not to rule, but the whole burthen of the Realme to rest in the ordinaunce of the Quene, & the Duke of Suffolke, began secretly to allure his friends of the Nobilitie, and privately declared unto them his title to the Crowne, and likewise did he to certaine governours of Cities and Townes, which privately attempt was so politihely handled and secretly kept, that his prouision was ready before his purpose was opened.

John Sturton was made Baron of Starcton.

After the death of Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, the affaires in Fraunce, were neither well looked to, nor the governours of the countrey well aduised, for an English Capitaine, called Sir Frances, surnamed de Aragonys, took a towne named Fogars, upon the borders of Normandie belonging to the Duke of Bypitaine. For the which he complained him to the French

French King, and he at the said Dukes request sent unto the King of England, to alke restitution of the harme. The which messengers were answered of the Kings Counsell, that the dede was right displeasing unto the King, and that Sir Frances Aragon had enterprised the seate of his owne presumption. Whereupon it followed shortly after, that the French by like policie took the Towne and Castell of Montallarche, and after that many other, so that the taking of the foresaid Towne of Foglars by the Englishmen, was the occasion by the which the French after gat all Normandie.

This yere the Frenchmen got many Townes in Normandie out of the possession of the Englishmen. Also the Citie of Roane was yielded to the French, with condition that the Capitaines and garrisons might depart with armour and goods, and not long after was rendered (with the like condition as of Roane) the townes of Harflewre, and Honnlewre. A knight of Fraunce called Sir Lewes de Breyll, challenged an Esquire of England named Ralph Chalons of certaine seats of warres, the which to proue, a day to them was giuen to mete at a Towne in Fraunce named Gaunce, where the French knight at that day was present: but Chalons ranne the French knight through the bodie with his speare, whereof the said Lewes died.

About the same time also, began a new rebellion in Ireland, but Richard Duke of Yorke being sent thither to appease the same, so aduaged the furie of the wilde and savage people there, that he won such fauour amongst them, as could neuer be separated from him and his linage.

John Aiconant Beaumont, was made Chamberlaine of England, Henry de Bromefield Lord Velsy, William Bourcher knight, Lord Bonuile, William Beauchampe Lord S. Amonde, Thomas Percy Lord Egremonde, these were created the 6. of Nouember.

The French king assembled an army royall, and coming before Came, besieged it on all sides, and assaulted the walles, but the Duke of Somerset, and the other Capitaines within the towne, manfully withstood their enemies, beating backe the assailants. The French king with his great ordinaunce shot daily at the wals, and did some hurt, but to the Castell which stood on a rock, and in it a dungeon, vnable to be beaten down, he did no harm at all. Though the Duke of Somerset were the kings lieutenant, yet Sir Dauid Hall, as Capitane of this towne for his master the Duke of Yorke, owner thereof, took by him the chiefe charge, Sir Robert Vere was Capitaine of the Castell, and Sir Henry Radford, Capitaine of the dungeon: daily the shot was great, but more terrible then hurtfull, saving that one day, a stone shot into the towne, fell between the Dutches of Somerset and her children, which being amazed with this chance, besought her husband kneeling on her knees, to haue mercy and compassion of his small infants, that they might be deliuered out of the towne in safetie. The Duke moved with the sorrow of his wife, and loue of his children, rendered the towne, with condition to depart with all their goods. Sir Dauid Hall, with others other departed to Cherbrough, and from thence thence sailed into Ireland, to the Duke of Pojke, making relation to him of all these doings, which thing kindled so great a rancoꝝ in the Dukes heart, that he neuer left persecuting the Duke of Somerset, till he had brought him to his fatall confusion. After the obtaining of this strong towne of Cane, the Earle of Cleremont, besieged, the Citie of Bilsbur, whereof was Captaine Mathew Gowgh, with 300. Englishmen, who in the ende deliuered the towne vpon condition to depart. Then was Salafie besieged, whereof were Captaines, for the Earle of Shrewsbury that was owner, Andrew Trolope, and Thomas Cotton Esquires, which agreed to deliuer it on conditions. The towne of Donfront was likewise rendered, so that there rested now, onely English, the towne of Chirburgh, whereof was Captaine one Thomas Gouille, which as long as victuals serued, defended the towne right manfully, but in the ende, vpon composition yelded the towne, & went to Carleis, where the Duke of Somerset, and many other Englishmen then sojourned. Thus was Poymandy lost cleerly out of the Englishmens hands, after it had continued in their possession the space of 30. yeres, by the conquest of Henry the fift. In which Duchie were an 100. strong townes and fortresses, to be kept, and holden, besides them that were destroyed by the warres, and in the same is one Archbishopssee, and six Bishopssees. Whilst the French made these conquests in the Duchy of Poymandy the common people make exclamations against the Duke of Suffolke, affirming him to be the onely cause of the deliuey of Anlow, and Mayne, the chiefe procurer of the Duke of Gloucesters death, the loss of Poymandy, &c. Whereupon the Duene doubting not onely the Dukes destruction, but also her own confusion, caused the Parliament begunne at Westminster, after Christmas adourned to the blacke Friars in London, then to be adourned to Leicester, thinking there to haue suppressed the malice conceiued against the Duke and her, at which place fewe of the Nobilitie would appeare. Where it was againe adourned to Westminster, where was a full appearance. In the which session the commons of the neather-house put vp to the King and the Lords many articles of treason, nuspition, and euill demeanour against the Duke of Suffolke, as pe may read in Hall. The Duene therfore, doubting some commotion to arise, caused the said Duke to be committed to the Tower, where he remained not past a moneth, but was restored to the kings fauour. This doing so much displeased the people, that in sundrie places of the Realme, they assembled together in great companies, and chose to them a Captain, but were overcome as shall be shewed.

The ninth of January, Adam Molins Bishop of Chichester, keeper of the kings priue seale, through the procurement of Richard Duke of Pojke, was by William Raine at Portsmouth.

The ninth of February Thomas Thany, otherwise called Blew beard a fuller, was taken besides Canterbury, for rayling of a rebellion, who was hanged and quartered.

After this little rage allwaged, about the Duenes of Calcer, the Parliament was adioined to Leicester, whither came the King & Duene in great estate, estate, and with them the Duke of Suffolke, as chiefe counsellor, where the commons of the lower house brought the King, that such persons as assisted to the release of Anlow, and deliuerance of Mayne, might be duely punished. And to be priue to that fact they accused as principall, the Duke of Suffolke, with John Bishop of Salisbury, sir James Fines Lord Say, Daniel Truillian, and other whom they indicted of treason, and many other matters touching the king and his commons, as it appeareth by the verbid of thre inquestes, to the number of a thirtie persons, wherupon the king to appease the commons, first sequestred the Lord Say, being Treasurer of England, and other from their offices, and romes, and after banished William de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, for sine yeres, who taking ship, at Ipswich in Suffolke, on the third day of May, sailed towards France, but was encountered with a ship of warre, appertaining to the Duke of Ercester, Constable of the Tower of London, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The Captaine of which barke, with small fight entered into the Dukes ship, and perceling his person present, brought him to Douer Roade, and there on the side of a cocke boate, caused his head to be stricken off, and left his bodie with the head lying there on the sandes, which corpes being there found, by a chaplaine of his, was conueyed to Tellingfield colledge in Suffolke, and there buried faith Hall: but I otherwise finde him to be buried in the Charterhouse of Kingstene vpon Hul.

Wille de la Pole Duke of Suffolke banished and murdered.

This William de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Alice his wife, daughter to Thomas Chawcer, sonne to Geoffrey Chawcer the famous Poet, translated and increased the Manors place of Eweline in Dorsetshire: they builded a new the parish Church of Eweline, a comely peece of woꝝke standing on an hill: and also hard adioyning to the west ende of Eweline parish Church, they founded a pyetic hospitall or almes house for two priests chaffe of bodis and deuout in soule, and thirtene poze men to dwell and be sustayned in sozuer, one of the priests to be master of the almes house and almes people, them to instruct as well by his sound doctrine, as god life, the other priest a skole-master, freely to teach the chyliden of the tenants of the said Lordshippe of Eweline and other Lordships pertaining to the said almes house their Grammar, and either of those two priests to haue tenne pound the yere. One of the thirtene poze men to be called ministr, to present the faultes of the other to the master, and to ring their common bel to seruice, and to haue fiftene pence the weeke, the other twelue poze men to haue euery of them fourtene pence the weeke. This house hath to name Gods house, or the house of almes, vnto the which he gaue thre Manors, Kanruge in Hampshire, Conoche in Wiltshire, and Spethe in Buckinghamshire, with their appertenances, all which at the suppression was valued but 20. pound the yere, such large penworth was then made by such as ment to purchase: they also founded the hospitall of Donnington.

The death of the Duke of Suffolke brought not the Realme in quiet, soz those that fauoured the Duke of Pojke, and wished the crowne vpon his head procured a commotion in Bent in this manner.

In the moneth of May, the commons of Kent in great numbers assembled, hauing to their Captaine Jacke Cade, who named himselfe Mortimer, cosen to the Duke of York, or as hee was named of some Johnmondall: this Captaine brought a great number of people to the Blackheath, and there kept the field more then a moneth, pilling the countrey about, to whom the Citie of London at that time was full fauourable. And the said Captaine (as I find recorde) sent for such Citizens of London as it pleased him to commaund to repaie unto him, vnder letters of safe conduct, as followeth.

of the great assemble in Kent.*

By this our writing ensealed, we grant and will permit truly, that Thomas Cocke of London draper, shall come in god suretie and in safegard to our presence, without any hurt of his person, and so auaile from vs againe at his pleasure, with all other persons assigned at his denomination with him comming in like wise.

For your instruction, first ye shall charge all Lumbarbs and strangers, being merchants, Rhenewes, Venetians, Florentines, and other, this day to draw them together, and to ordaine for vs the Captaine 12. harnesses, complete of the best fashion, 24. bygandines, 12. battaileares, 12. glaues, six bowes with saddle and byde completely harnessed, and 1000. markes of readie money: and if this our demand be not obserued and done, we shall haue the heabs of as many as we can get of them.

What answer to this demand was returned I finde not, but like it is the same was granted and performed, for I finde not the said Captaine and Kentishmen, at their being in the Citie, to haue hurt any stranger.

In the meane time the king sent notable men to the said Captaine and his fellowship, to know their purpose and the cause of their insurrection: vnto whom the Captaine answered, that he and his company were assembled there to redresse and reforme the wrongs that were done in the Realme, and to withstand the malice of them that were destroyers of the common-weale, and to amend the defaultes of them that were chiefe counsellors to the king, and shewed vnto them the Articles of complaints touching the misgouernment of the Realme, wherein was nothing containyd but seemed reasonable, whereof a copie was sent to the Parliament holden that time at Westminster, with also one other bill of requestes by them made, of things to be reformed, and to haue answer therof againe, but he had none. The bill of Articles they intituled assembly on the Blackheath.*

1 Inprimis, it is openly noyed, that Kent should be distressed with a royall power, and made a wilde foreyst, for the death of the Duke of Suffolke, of which the commons of Kent thereof were neuer guiltie.

2 Item, the king is tirred to liue onely on his commons, and other men to haue the reuenues of the crowne, the which hath caused pouerty in his exchequere, and great payments of the people, now late to the king granted in his Parliament.

3 Item, that the Lords of his royall bloud haue put from his daily presence, and other meane persons of lower nature exalted and made chiefe of his pryuy counsell, the which stoppeth matters of wrongs done in the realme from his excellent audience, and may not be redressed as law wil, but if by lyes and gifts be messengers to the hands of the said counsell.

4 Item, the people of his Realme be not paid of debts owing for stufte and purueiance taken to the vse of the kings household, in vndoing of the said people, and the poore commons of this Realme.

5 Item, the kings meniall seruants of household, and other persons, asked daily goods and landes, of impeached or indited of treason, the which the king graunteth anon, ere they so endaugered be conuict. The which causeth the receders thereof to enforce labours and meanes applied to the death of such people, so appeached or indited, by subtile meanes, for couetise of the said grants: and the people so impeached or indited, though it be vnture, may not be committed to the lawe for their delineraunce, but helde still in prison, to their uttermost vndoing and destruction, for couetise of goods.

7 Item, it is noyed by common voices, that the kings landes in France haue ben aliened and put away from the crowne, and his Lords and people there distressed with vnture meanes of treason, of which it is desired, enquiries through all the Realme to be made how and by whom, and if such traitors may be found guiltie, them to haue execution of law, without any pardon, in example of other.

8 Item, collectors of the 15. peny in Kent be greatly bered and hurt in paying great summes of money, in the Exchequer to sue out a writt called Quorum nomina for allowance of the Barons of the poys, which now is desired, that hereafter in the lien of the collectors, the Barons aforesaid may sue it out for their ease at their owne cosses.

9 Item, the Sherifes, and undersherifes, let to ferme their offices and bayliwikes

bayliffes, taking great suretie therfore, the which causeth extortions done by them and by their bailiffes to the people.

10 Item, simple and poore people that be not hunting be greatly oppressed by indiments fained and done by the said sherifes, undersherifes, bayliffes, and other of their assent, to cause their increase for paying of their said forme.

11 Item, they retorne in names of Enquestes in writing into diuers Courtes of the kings not summoned nor warned, where through the people daily lose great summes of money, well nie to the uttermost of their undoing: and make leule of amerements called the Grene ware, more in summes of money than can be found due of record in the kings booke.

12 Item, the ministers of the court of Dover in Kent bere and arrest diuers people through all the shire out of Castell ward passing their bands and liberty used of olde time, by diuers subtile and untrue meanes and actions falsely fained, taking great fee at their last in great hurt of the people on all the shire of Kent.

13 Item, the people of the said shire of Kent, may not have their free election in the chosing knights of the shire, but letters ben sent from diuers estates to the great rulers of all the countrie, the which unbyceth their tenants and other people by force to chole other persons than the common will is.

14 Item, whereas knights of the shire shold chole the kings collectors indifferently without any bybe taking, they haue sent now late to diuers persons, notifying them to be collectors, whereupon gifts and bybes be taken, and so the collectors office is bought and solde extortionously at the knights lust.

15 Item, the people be sore bered in coffes and labour, called to the Sessions of peace in the said shire, appearing from the farthest and uttermost parts of the West unto the East, the which causeth to some men five daies journey, whereupon they desire the said appearance to be diuided into two parts, the which one part to appeare in one place, another part in another place, in relieving of the grievance and intolerable labours and berations of the said people.

INprimis, desireth the Captaine of the commons, the welfare of our soueraigne Lord the King, and all his true Lords spirituall and temporall, by sitting of our said soueraigne Lord, and of all the true Lords of his counsell, to take in all his demaines, that he may raigne like a King royall, according as he is bozne our true Christen king anointed, and who so will say the contrary, we all will lue and die in the quarrell as his true liege men.

2 Item, desireth the said Captaine, that he will auoid all the falsse progeny

and assinite of the Duke of Suffolke, the which bene openly knowne, and they to be punished after the custome and lawe of this land, and to take about his noble person the true Lords of his royall blood of this his Realme, that is to say, the high and mightie Prince the Duke of Yorke, late exiled from our said soueraigne Lords presence (by the motion and stirring of the traitorous and falsse disposed the Duke of Suffolke and his assinite) and the mightie Princes and Dukes of Excester, Buckingham, and Suffolke, and all the Barons and Barons of this land: and then shall be the richest King Christen.

3 Item, desireth the said Captaine and commons punishment vpon the falsse traitors, the which contrived and imagined the death of the high and mightie excellent Prince the Duke of Glocester, the which is too much to rehearse, the which duke was proclaimed as traitor. Vpon the which quarrell, we purpose all to lue and die vpon that it is falsse.

4 Item, the Duke of Excester, our holy father the Cardinal, the noble Prince Duke of Warwicke, and also the Realme of France, the Dutchy of Flandrandy, Gascoigne, and Calen, Antoy and Spaine, were deliuered and lost, by the meanes of the said traitors, and our true Lords, knights, and Esquires, and many a good yeoman lost and solde ere they went, the which is great pite to heare, of the great and grievous losse to our soueraigne Lord and his Realme.

5 Item, desireth the said Captaine and commons, that all the extortions used daily among the common people, might be laid downe, that is to say, the grene Ware the which is falsely used, to the perpetuall destruction of the kings true commons of Kent. Also the kings Bench, the which is too greuous to the shire of Kent without prouision of our soueraigne Lord and his true Counsell. And also in taking of wheat and other graines, beefe, mutton, and all other victuall, the which is impossible to the said commons, without the bybe prouision of our said soueraigne Lord, and his true Counsell, they may no longer beare it. And also vnto the statute of labourers, and the great extortions, the which is to say, the falsse traitors, Sleg, Crowmer, lile, and Robert Est.

These Bills when the Counsell had well perused, they did not onely disallow and condemne them and the authors, as proud and presumptuous, but also perswaded the King rather to suppress those rebels by force, than by false promises. Whereupon the king remoued from Westminster vnto Chenevich, from whence he would haue sent certain Lords with a power to haue distressed the Kentishmen, but the men said to their Lords they would not fight against them that labour to amende the Commonweale: whereupon the Lords were dynted to leaue their purpose. And because the Kentishmen cried out against the Lord Say the Kings Chamberlaine, he was by the King committed to the Tower of London. When went the King againe to London, and within two daies after went against the Kentishmen with fiftene thousand men well prepared for the warre, but the falsse Kentishmen fledde the night before his coming into the good countie

When Iacke Cade had thus ouerrunne the Staffords, he forthwith apparelled himselfe with the knights apparel, and after he had refreshed his people, he returned to the Blacke heath, and there pight againe his field, and lay there from the 29. of Iune, till the first day of Iuly, in which season came vnto him the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Buckingham, with whom they had a long communication, and found him right discreet in his answers. In the meane while, the King and Quene hearing of the increasing of his rebels, and also the Lords fearing their owne seruants, lest they would take the Captaines part, removed from London to Killingworth, leaving the Citie without ayde, except onely the Lord Scales, which was left to keepe the Tower, and with him a manly and warly man named Matthew Gough. When the Captaine of Kent thus hovering at Blacke heath, to bring himselfe the more in fame, that he kept good iustice, beheaded there a peise Captaine of his named Paris, forasmuch as he had offended against such ordinances as he had established in his host: and hearing that the King and his Lords were thus departed, drew him neere vnto the Citie, so that vpon the first of Iuly, he entred the Borough of Southwarke, then being Whensday, and lodged him there at the Hart, so he might not be suffered to enter the Citie.

And vpon the same day, the commons of Essex in great number pight them a field vpon the plaine of Spiles end.

And vpon the second day of the said moneth, the Palatour called a common counsell at the Guildhall, to puruey for the withstanding of these rebellies, in which assembly were diuers men of sundry opinions, so that some thought good that the said rebelles should be receiued into the Citie, and some other wise. Among the which Robert Horne Stockfishmonger then being an Alderman, spake for against them that would haue them enter. For the which, the commons were so moued against him, that they ceased not till they had him committed to ward. And the same afternoon about fixe of the clocke, the Captaine with his people entred by the bridge, and cut the ropes of the drawne bridge asunder with his sword. When he was passed into the Citie, he made in sundry places thereof Proclamations in the Kings name, that no man in paine of death should robbe or take any thing without paying therfor. By reason whereof, he wanne the hearts of the commons, but all was done to beguile him. After as he came by London Stone, he strake it with his sword, and saide: Now is Mortimer Lord of this Citie, and then shewing his minde to the Palatour for the ordering of his people, he returned into Southwarke, and there abode as he before had done, his people comming and going at lawfull houses when they would.

On the morrow the third of Iuly, the said Captaine againe entred the Citie, & caused the Lord Say to be set from the Tower to the Guildhall, where he was arraigned before the Palatour and other the Kings Iustices, and Robert Horne Alderman before named should haue bene likewise arraigned, but that his wife and other friends for five hundred markes gat him redreied to his liberty. The Lord Say desiring he might be tried by his peers, was by the rebels forceably taken from the officers, and brought to the standard in Cheape, where they strake off his head, pight it on a pole, and bare it before them, and his body they caused to be drawne naked at a horse taile vpon the pavement from Cheape into Southwarke to the saide Captaines inn.

Also a squire called Crowmer that was then Sherriffe of Kent, that had wedded the said Lord Saies daughter, by commandement of the Captaine was brought out of the flete, that was committed thither for certaine extortion that he had done in his office, and led to Spile end without London, and there without any iudgement his head was smit off, and the Lord Saies head and his were born vpon two long poles vnto London bridge, and there set by, and the Lord Saies body was quartered.

The same day the Captaine went vnto the house of Philip Malpas draper, and Alderman, and robbed and spoiled his house, taking from thence great substance, and returned into Southwarke. On the next morrow he againe entred the Citie, and dined that day in the parish of Saint Margaret Patens at one Gherdis house, and when he had dined, like an vncourteous guest he robbed him, as the day before he had Malpas. For which two robberies, although the poore people drew to him and were partners in the spoyle, yet the honest and wealthy commoners call in their mindes the sequelle of this matter, and feared least they should be dealt with in like manner. When the Palatour and Aldermen with assistance of the worshipfull commoners in safeguard of themselves and of the citie, toke their counsel how they might draw the Captaine and his adherents from the citie, for the performance whereof, the Palatour sent vnto the Lord Scales, and Matthew Gough, then hauing the Tower in their government, requiring their ayde and assistance, which they promised.

On the fifth of Iuly, the Captaine being in Southwarke, caused a man to be beheaded there, and that day entred not the Citie. When night was come, the Palatour and the Citizens, with Matthew Gough kept the passage of the bridge, and defended the Kentishmen which made great force to reenter the Citie. When the Captaine seeing this bickering, went to barnes, & assembled his people, and set so fiercely vpon the Citizens, he drew them backe from the houses in Southwarke, or bridge side, vnto the drawbridge, in defending whereof, many a man was drowned and slaine. Among the which was Iohn Sutton Alderman, Matthew Gough a Squire of Wales, and Roger Holland Citizen. This skirmish continued all night till nine of the clocke on the moztow, so that sometime the Citizens had the better, and sometimes the other, but ever they kept them upon the brydge, so that the Citizens neuer passed much the bulwarke at the brydge foote, nor the Kentishmen no farther than the draw brydge. Thus continuing the cruell fight to the destruction of much people on both sides, lastly, after the Kentishmen were put to the wast, a truce was agreed for certaine houres, during which truce, the Archbishop of Canterbury, then Chancelloz of England, sent a general pardon to the Captaine for himselfe, & an another for his people, by reason whereof, he and his company went downe them by little and little, and their Captaine put all his pillage and goods that he had robbed, into a barge, and sent it to Rochester by water, and himselfe went by land, and would haue entred into the Castell of Quinborough with a few men that were left about him: but he was there let of his purpose: wherefoze he fled into the wood country beside Ewes in Suffe. The Captaine and his people being thus departed, not long after proclamations were made in diuers places of Kent, Suffe, and Seutchery, that who might take the foresaid Captaine al ue or dead, should haue a thousand markes for his traueil.

HENRICUS Dei gratia Rex Anglie & Francie, & Dominus Hibernie, vniuersis & singulis custodiibus, &c.

For as much as one Iohn Cade bozne in Ireland, which calleth himselfe Iohn Mortimer, and in some wytting calleth himselfe Captaine of Kent, the which Iohn Cade the last yere tofoze his dwelling in Suffe with a Knight, called Sir Thomas Dagre, sue there a woman with child, and for that cause toke the greth of the Church, and after for that cause forswore the Kings land: the which Iohn Cade also after this, was twome to the French part, and dwelled with them, which hath now of late time, (to the intent to enrich himselfe by robbing and dispoysing of the kings lerge men, as it is now openly knowne, to bying himselfe to great and high estate) falsely and vntruly decciued many of the Kings people, and vnder colour of holy and good intents, made them to assemble with him against the kings regaltie and his lawes, and nought setting by the kings Grace and pardons granted, not onely to him, but all the kings subiects, the which by his deceit haue assembled with him, the which he with great reuerence receiued on Sunday last passed, and so did all that were assembled with him: notwithstanding all this, he labourerth now of new to assemble the kings people againe, and to that intent beareth them on hand, that the kings letters of pardon graunted to him and them, be not available nor of none effect without authoritie of Parliament: whereas the contrary is true, as it is openly knowne by that, that the king grants from time to time his Charters of pardon to such as him list, of all manner of crimes and offences both generall and speciall.

give faith nor credence to the said false informations of the said false traitors, nor accompany with him in any wise, nor comfort, nor sustaine him nor his with viual, nor with any other things. But will whosoever of the kings subiects may take him, shall take him, and that whosoever taketh him, and byingeth him quicke or dead, to the king or his counsell, shall haue a thousand markes for his labour truly paid him without faile or delay by the provision of the kings counsell. And whosoever taketh any of those that from this day forth accompany with him, shall haue five marke for his reward, truly to be paid in manner and forme abouesaid.

And ouer this, commaunding all Constables, Minsters, and Officers of the said Shire, that none of them on paine of death take vpon them to execute any commaundement by word or wytting sent or made vnto them by the said Cade, calling himselfe Mortimer and Captaine, be it to reare any people, or to any other intent: but to arrest and make to be arrested such as take vpon them to bying any such commaundement by wytting or by word. Et hoc nullatenus omittatis, Teste me ipso apud Westminister, x. die Iulij, anno regni. 28.

After which proclamation thus published, a gentleman of Kent named Alexander Eden awaited so his time, that he toke the said Cade in a garden in Suffe. And there he was slaine at Hothfield, and brought to London in a cart, and there quartered, his head set on London brydge, and his quarters sent to diuers places in Kent.

This yere the commons also in diuers parts of England, as in Suffe, Wiltshire, and other places, did much harme to many persons, among the which, on the 29. of June, William Alcock Bishop of Salisbury (after he had said masse at Edington) was by his owne tenants drowne from the altar, in his Albe with his stole about his necke, to the top of an hill, and there by them shamefully murthered: for they cleaued his head as he kneeled on his knees in his prayers, and after spoiled to the naked skin, and then they renting his bloody shirt, toke euery man a peece, and made boast of their wickednesse: and the day before his chariot was robbed of his treasury to the value of ten thousand markes.

Alexander Eden Esquire, Sherife of Kent, for his good seruice against the late rebels, is made Custos or keeper of the castle at Rochester.

In the moneth of September, Treham that was speaker in the last Parliament, was beheaded in Southamptonshire.

After Michaelmas, Richard Duke of Yorke comming out of Ireland, toke Iohn Sutton Baron of Dudley, and Reginald Abbot of Saint Peters at Gloucester, and shortly after he toke Iohn Gargrave keeper of the Kings Bench at London, and sent them to the castle of Abolton.

The first of Nouember began a Parliament at Westminster, and the first of December the Duke of Somerset which was newly come out of France, was put vnder arrest, and his goods by the commons was slowly despoiled and bozne away from the Blackfriars. After which riot, on the next moztow, proclamation was made through the citie by the Duke of Yorke, and the Duke of Norfolk, that no man should spoyle or rob, upon paine of death: and the same day at the Standard in Cheape was a man beheaded for doing contrary to the proclamation.

King Henry rode into Kent with an army.

The fourth of December, the King and his Lords rode through the Citie of London, with a great armie of men well appointed, and divided into thre battels. Also the Citizens armed stood in the streets of the Citie, where through they passed, which altogether made the greatest shew of armed men that had bene scene in London within the memory of any man then liuing.

Rebels in Kent and Sussex executed.

The 18. of January, the King with certaine Lords, and his Iustices rode towards Kent, and there indighted and arraigned many, whereof to the number of 26. were put to death, eight at Canterbury, and the residue in other towncs of Kent and Sussex. And the King returning out of Kent on the 23. of February, the men of that countrey, naked saue their shirts, in great numbers, met him on the Blackheath, and there on their knees asked mercy, and had their pardon. Then the King rode royally through the Citie of London, and was of the Citizens topfully received, and the same day against the Kings coming to the Citie, nine heads of the Kentishmen that had bene put to death, were set on London bridge, and the Captaines head that had there before, was set in the midst of them.

Robert Gargwine

The malice begonne, increased betwene the Lords of the land, and especially against the Duke of Somerset, and other of the Quenes Counsell, for the lesing of Normandy, whereof the chiefe Citie of Rouen was lost: or giuen by appointment, the yere proceeding (as witnesseth Gargwine) upon condition that the Duke of Somerset with his wife and English souldiers, should with such goods as they might carry, depart freely from the Citie: for which free passage he should pay unto the French King 56. thousand Scuttes, which amount to fourtēne thousand markes sterling. And also he was bound to deliuer into the French Kings possession, all Townes and Castles that at that day were in the possession of Englishmen, within the Duchie of Normandy: for the performance of which covenants, the Lord Talbot was sent for one of the pledges, and so by one Floquet all the Towns and Castles were to the French Kings be received, Harflete onely excepted, whereof the Capitaine named Curion, with the assistance of sir Thomas Auringham, in despite of all the French Kings power laid both by sea and land, held the same a full moneth or more, and then for lacke of rescue, gaue it up by appointment.

Richard Duke of Poike, pretending a title to the Crowne, and heire to Lionell Duke of Clarence, came this yere out of Ireland unto London, in the Parliament time, there to consult with his especiall friends, Iohn Duke of Norfolk, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his sonne, which after was Earle of Warwick, Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, and Edmund Brooke Lord Cobham, &c. After long deliberation and abuse taken, it was concluded, to keepe their chiefe purpose secret, and that the Duke should raise an armie of men, under a pretext to remove diuers counsellors about the

the King, and to renenge the manifest iniuries done to the commonwealth by the same rulers, of the which as principall, the Duke of Somerset was namely accused, both for that he was greatly hated of the commons for the losse of Normandy, and for that it was well knowne, that he would be altogether against the Duke of Poike, in his challenge to be made to the crowne, when time should serue: Wherefore when the Duke of Poike had thus framed his foundation of his long intended enterpryse, he assembled a great host, to the number of 10000. in the marches of Wales, publishing openly that the cause of this his gathering of people, was for the publike wealth of the Realme, for affirming the same to be true, he wrote his letters in forme as followeth:

An. reg. 30.

Sozasmuch as I Richard Duke of Poike am informed, that the King my soueraigne Lord, is my heauy Lord, greatly displeased with me, and hath me in mistrust by sinister information of mine enemies, aduersaries, and euill willers, where God knoweth, from whom nothing is hid, I am, haue ben, and euer will be his true liege man, and so haue I said before this diuers times, as well by mouth as by writing, notified and declared to my said soueraigne Lord. And soz that this notice so comen vnto me of the displeasure of my said soueraigne Lord is to me so græuous, I haue prayed the reuerend father in God the Bishop of Hereford, and my cosen the Earle of Hereford to come hither, and heare my declaration in this matter. Wherein I haue said to them, that I am true liege man to the King my soueraigne Lord, euer haue ben, and shall be to my dying day. And to the very pson that it is so, I offer my selfe to sweare that, on the blessed Sacrament, and receiue it, the which I hope shall be my saluation, at the day of doome: And so for my speciall comfort and consolation, I haue prayed the said Lords to report and declare vnto the Kings highnes my said offer. And to the ende and intent, that I will be ready to doe the same oth in presence of two or thre Lords, such as shall please the Kings highnes to send hither to accept it. In witnes whereof I haue signed this scedule with my signe manuell, and set therunto my signet of armes. Written in my Castle of Abolton, the 9. of January, the 30. yere of the raigee of my soueraigne Lord King Henry the sixt.

The 16. of february, King Henry accompanied with the Duke of Somerset, and many other Lords, toke towards the marches of Wales, soz as much as he was credibly informed, that the Duke of Poike, assisted with diuers other Lords and men of name, had in those parts gathered a strong power of people, and with them was entring the land, and so held on his iourney towards him: but when the Duke had witting of the Kings great power, he returned from the way which was taken by the Kings host, and hasted towards London. And when he had receiued knowledge from the Citie, that he might not there be receiued, he went ouer Kingston bridge, and so into Kent, and there upon Brent heath nere unto Dartford, he pight his field, whereof the King hauing knowledge, sped him after, and lastly came vnto Blacke heath, and there pight his field. When both the hosts were thus imbatellid, embattelled, mediastian of peace was made betwene them, for furtherance whereof, to the Duke were sent the Bishops of Winchester and of Ely, with the Carles of Salisbury and Warwicke. To whom it was answered by the Duke, that he nor none of his company intended any hurt to the Kings person, nor to any of his Counsell, being lovers of the commonwealth, and of him and his land; but his intent and purpose was to remove from the Kings few cullid disposed persons, by whose meanes the common people was grievously oppressed, and the commonalte greatly impouertised, of whom he named the Duke of Somerset to be the principall, &c. And further to understand of the Dukes meaning by this his forcible entering of the Realme, (as himselfe pretended) may appere by certaine letters by him written to the King, and also the Kings answers to the same, both which I thinke good here to set downe as I finde them recorded.

Please it your highnesse to conceiue that sith my departing out of this your Realme, by your commaundement, and being in your seruice in your land of Ireland, I haue bene informed that diuers language hath ben said of me to your most excellent estate, which should sound to my dishonour and reproch, and charge of my person: howbeit that, I age haue bene, and euer will be, your true liege man and seruant: and if there be any man that will or dare say the contrarie, or charge me otherwise, I beseech your right-wisenes to call him befoze your high presence, and I will declare me for my discharge as a true knight ought to do, and if I do not, as I doubt not but I shall, I beseech you to punish me as the worst man of your land: and if he be found untrue in his suggestion and information, I beseech you of your highnes that he be punished after his desert, in example of all other. Please it your excellence to know, that as well befoze my departing out of this your Realme, for to go into your land of Ireland, in your full noble seruice, as sith, certaine persons haue lien in await for to hearken vpon me, as sir Iohn Talbot knight at the Castell of Holt: sir Thomas Stanley knight in Cheshire: Pulford at Chester: Elton at Worcester: Brooke at Gloucester: and Richard grame of your Chamber at Beaumarres: which had in charge (as I am informed) for to take me and put me into your Castell of Conuay, and to strike off the head of sir William Oldhall knight, and to haue put in prison sir William Devereux knight, and sir Edmond Mallo knight, withouten enlarging, vntill the time that your highnes had appointed their deliuerance.

Item, at such time as I was purposed for to haue arrived at your haven of Beaumarres, for to haue come to your noble presence to declare me your true man and subiect, as my dutie is, my landing was stopp'd and forbarded by Henry Norres, Thomas Norres, William Bulkley, William Gruit, and Bartholomew Bould, your officers in Northwales, that I should not land there, nor haue bituall nor refreshyng for me and my fellowshipp, as I haue written to your excellence here befoze, so farre forth that Henry Norres deputie to the Chamberlaine of Northwales said vnto me, that he had in commaundement that I should in no wise haue landing, refreshyng, nor lodging, for men nor for horse, nor other thing that might turne to my worship or ease, putting the blame vpon William Say Maister of your chamber, saying and affirming that I am against your intent, and as a Traitor, as I am informed: and moreover, certaine letters were made and deliuered vnto Chester, Shrewsbury, and to other places for to let mine entrie into the same.

Item, about all wrongs and iniuries abovesaid done vnto me of mallice, without any cause, I being in your land of Ireland, in your honourable seruice, certain commissions were made and directed vnto diuers persons, which for the execution of the same, sate in certaine places, and the Iuries impanelled and charged, to the which Iuries, certaine persons laboured instantly to haue me indicted of treason, to the intent for to haue vndone me and mine issue and corrupted my blood, as it is openly published: beseeching your Maistrie to call, of your right-wisenes, to examine these matters, and thereupon to doe such iustice in his behalfe as the cause requirith: for mine intent is fully to pursue to your highnes for the conclusion of these matters.

Colin, we haue seene the bill that ye make vnto us, and also vnderstande the good humble obedience that ye in your selfe shewe vnto vs, as well in word as in deed, wherefoze our intent is, the more hastily to ease you of such thinges as were in your said bill. Howbeit that at our more leisure we might answer to your said bill, yet we let you to wist, that for the causes abovesaid, we will declare you none our intent in these matters: sith it is that a long time among the people hath bene vpon you many straunge language, and in especiall anon after your disobedinate and vnlawfull slaying of the Bishopp of Chester, diuers and many of the untrue shipmen and other, said in their manner, wordes against our estate, making manare to our owne person by your sayings, that ye should be fetched with many thousandes, and ye should take vpon you that, which ye myghter ought, nor as we doubt not, ye will not attempt, so farre forth that it was said to our person by diuers, and especially we remember of one Waines which had like wordes to vs. And also there was diuers of such false people, that went on and had like language in diuers of our Townes of our land, which by our subiectes were taken and duely executed: wherefoze we sent to diuers of our courtes and places, to hearken and to take hede if any such manner comming were, and if there had bene, for to resist it: but comming into our land our true subiecte as ye did, our intent was not that ye, nor lesse of estate of our subiectes, nor none of your seruantes should not haue bene letted nor warned, but in godly wise receiued: howbeit that peraduenture your suddaine comming, without certaine warning, caused our seruantes to do as they did, considering the causes abovesaid. And as to the enditement that ye spoke of, we thinke verily, and holde for certaine, that there was none such. And if ye may truly proue that any person was thereabouts, the matter shall be demeaned as the case shall require, so that hee shall know it is to our great displeasure. Vpon this for the easing of your heart in all such matters, we declare, repute, and admit your our true and faithfull subiect, and as our welbeloued Cousin.

I praye it your highnes tenderly to consider, that great murmur and grudging is vniuersally in this your Realme, in that Iustice is not duly ministred to such as trespass and offend against your lawes, and in especiall of them that be endited of treason, and other being openly noised of the same, whereby great inconueniencies haue fallen, and great is like to fall hereafter in your said Realme, which God defende, but if by your highnes prouision couenable be made for due reformation and punishment in this behalfe. Wherefore I your humble subiect and true liegeman, Richard Duke of Yorke, willing as effectually as I can, and desiring the suretie and prosperitie of your most royall person, and the welfare of this your noble Realme, counsell and aduertise your excellencie for the conseruation of good tranquillitie and peaceable rule among all other subiects, for to ordeine and prouide, that true iustice be had, against all such that so be endited, or openly named, wherein I offer my selfe, and will put my endeuous for to execute your commaundement in the premises, for the punishing of such offenders, and redresse of the sayde miscarres, to my might and power. And for the hastie execution hereof, like it your highnes to aduersse these letters of priuilege and writs to your officers and ministers, to doe, take, and arrest all such persons so noised and endited, of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer they be, and them to commit to the Tower of London, and to other of your prisons, there to abide without baile or mainpryse, vntill the time they be utterly tried, and determined after the course of your lawes.

King Henry to
Yorke.

Cousin, as touching your bill last put vp to vs, we vnderstand well that ye of god hart, counsell and aduertise vs to the setting vp of iustice, and to the speeie punishing of some persons endited or noised, offering your seruice to bee readie at commaundement in the same, sith it is that for many causes mouing vs to haue determined in our soule to establish a sad, and a substantiall Counsell, giuing them moze ample authoritie and power than euer wee did asoie this: in the which wee haue appointed you to bee one. But sith it is not accustomed sure, nor expedient, to take a conclusion and conduct by aduise or counsell of one person by himselfe for the conseruation, it is obserued that the greatest and the best, the rich and the poore, in libertie, vertue, and effect of your voyces be equal: we haue therefore determined within our selfe to send for our Chancelloz of England, and for other Lordes of our Conncell, yea and all other, together within short time ripely to commune these and other our great matters, in the which communication, such conclusion by the grace of God shall be taken, as shall sound to his pleasure, the weale of vs and our land, as well in these matters as in any other.

At length it was agreed by the King, that the Duke of Somerset should be committed to warde there to abide and answer such articles as the Duke of Yorke would lay against him, vpon which promises so made by the King to the Duke, who saue that the people of Kent, and of other places

came not to him as they had promised, and that they were not strong enough, for the Kings part was much moze than his, he brake vp his field on the first of March, and yelded himselfe to the King at Dertford, where contrary to promise before made, he found the Duke of Somerset chiefe about the King. When was the Duke of Yorke sent before to London, and holden partly as prisoner, and straighter should haue been kept, but it was noised that Sir Edward Earle of March, sonne to the said Duke of Yorke was coming to ward London with a strong power of Welshmen, which feared so the Quene and Counsell, that the Duke was set at full libertie. And on the tenth of March, the said Richard Duke of Yorke made his submission, and toke his oath to be true, faithfull, and obedient subiect to King Henry the first, King of England, in St. Pauls Church at London, there being present the King and most of his Nobilitie, that is to say, the Dukes of Buckingham, Northampton, and Somerset: the Earles of Warwike, Arundel, Salisbury, Shropshire, Devonshire, Willeshire, Northumberland, Stafford and Dorset: bishoppes of Beaumont and Wells: barons Fitz Warren, Saimmond, Cobham, Douglas, and others: Bishoppes, the Cardinall, Archbishop of Yorke, and Caunterbury, Winchester, Ely, and London, in these wordes following.

I Richard Duke of Yorke, confesse and beknow that I am and ought to be humble subiect and liegeman to you my soueraigne Lord King Henry the first, and owe therefore to beare you faith and truth, as to my soueraigne liege Lord, and shall doe all dayes vnto my liues ende, and shall not at any time will or assent that any thing be attempted or done against your most Noble person, but wheresoever I shall haue knowledge of any such thing imagined or purposed, I shall with all speeie and diligence possible to mee, make that your highnes shall haue knowledge thereof, and ouer that doe all that shall bee possible to mee, to the withstanding and let thereof, to the bittermost of my life: I shall not any thing take vpon mee against your royall estate or obeyfance that is due thereto, nor suffer any other man to doe, as farre forth as it shall bee in my power to let it: And also shall come at your commaundement whensoever I shall bee called by the same, in humble and obedient wise, but if I bee letted by any sickness or impotence of my person, or by such other cause as shall bee thought by you my soueraigne Lord reasonable. I shall neuer hereafter take vpon mee to gather any rowt, or to make any assembly of your people, without your commaundement or licence, or in my lawfull defence, in interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defence, I shall reposit mee at all times to your highnes, and if the case require, to my pères, nor any thing attempt against any of your subiects, of what estate, degree, or condition that they bee. But whensoever I finde my selfe wronged and aggraued, I shall sue humbly for remedie to your highnes, and procéde after the course of your lawes, and in none otherwise, saving in mine owne lawfull defence in manner aboue sayde, and otherwise haue to your highnes as an humble and true subiect ought to haue him to his soueraigne Lord. All these things abovesaid I promise you truly to obserue and keepe, by the holy Evangelists

uangelists contained in the booke that I lay my hand here vpon, and by the holy Crosse I here touch, and by the blessed sacrament of our Lordes body, that I shall now with his mercie receiue. And ouer I agree me and will, that if I any time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer shall, any thing attempt by way of seate or other wise against your royall Maestie and obedience that I owe thereto, or any thing take vpon me other wise than is above expressed, I from that time forth be vnable, held and taken, as an vntrue and openly forsworne man, and vnable to all manner of worship, estate, and degree, be it such as I now occupie, or any other that might in any wise growe vnto me hereafter. And this I haue here promised and sworn, p̄cedeth of mine owne desire and free volunte, and by no constraining or coaction. In witness of all the which things aboue wyitten, I Richard duke of Yorke aboue wyit subscribe, with mine owne hand and seale.

An. reg. 31. This oth he also toke at Westminster, and at Couentre, at sundrie times, although he little esteemed thereof, as by the sequelle may appere.

This yeere deceased Iohn Scalford Archbishop of Canterbury, late Lord Chancellor of England, and was buried at Canterbury. After him succeeded in the archbishopricke Iohn Kemp, bozne at We in Kent, doctor of lawes, first bishop of Rochester, then of Chichester, then of London, then Archbishop of Yorke, Chancellor of England, and Cardinall of S. Albin: and now Archbishop of Canterbury, and Cardinall of S. Rufine, & was intyponised at Canterbury on the 11. of December.

1453. On the twelfe day after Christmas, the King holding his Christmas at Westminster with great sollemnitie, made his two byetthen by the mothers side knights.

The Earle of Kendall, and the Lord Lescare came Ambassadors from the cheefes Magistrates of the citie of Burdeaur, which signified to the counsell, that if they woulde send an armie into Gascoigne, the people of the countrie woulde revolt from the French part, and againe become English. This newes soze troubled the heades of the Counsell, which caused them, least inwarde sedition might hinder outward victorie, to let the duke of Yorke at libertie, and permitted him to goe to the castell of Aligmoze in the marches of Wales, by whose absence the duke of Somerset rose in such high fauour, both with the King and the Queene, that his word was once heard and regarded. The Counsell hoping now to haue the citie of Burdeaur, with the countrey round about, appointed Iohn Lord Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, to go thither with an armie, who arriuing in the Isle of Wyke, passed forth with his power, being scant thre thousand men, and toke the stronge towne of Fronlake, and diuers other towne and fortresses. The inhabitants of Burdeaur hearing of the Carles arriuall, sent to him messengers in the darke night, requiring him with all speede, to come and receiue the citie. The Earle hastened forth, and came before that citie, ere the Frenchmen within understood any thing of the citizens purpose. But when they heard that there was a gate set open for the Englishmen to enter, they thought to haue escaped secretly by a posterne, but they were pursued, slaine, and taken by the Lord de Lescare, and other of the English armie.

After the regaining of Burdeaur, there arriued at Blay, the bastard of Somerset, sir Iohn Talbot Lord Lile by his wife, sonne to the said Earle of Shrewsburie, the lord Molins, the lord Harington, the lord Carnes, sir Iohn Howard, sir Iohn Mountgomeric, sir Iohn Vernon with 2000. men, victuals and munitions.

In the moneth of March, was the towne of Harflew won by the French men, and shortly the citie of Bayons was giuen by appointment, that the soldiers should leane their armour behind them.

When the Earle of Shrewsburie was furnished as is aforesaide, first he fortified Burdeaur with Englishmen, and store of victuals, and artilerie, then he rode into the countrey abroad, where he obtained cities and townes, without stroke, amongst other townes, the towne and castle of Chastillon in Perigot was to him deliuered, the which he fortified.

In the meane time the French King being aduertised of these thinges, raised an armie to resist the inuasion made by the Earle, and first he appointed his capitaines to besiege the towne of Chastillon, to the rescue whereof the Earle hastened forward, hauing in his companie eight hundred bozemen, vnder the leading of his sonne the lord Lile, the lord Molins, the lord Carnes, sir Edward Hull, sir Iohn Howard, and sir Iohn Vernon: hee appointed also five thousand footemen, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Kendall, and the lord de Lescare to follow him with speede. In his way he toke a tower, which the Frenchmen had before taken, and slue all that hee found therein, and after by the way hee met five hundred Frenchmen a foraging, of whom he slue the more part, and chased the other to the campe.

The Frenchmen that lay at the siege, perceiuing by these runners a way that the Earle approached, left the siege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched and fortified. The Earle aduertised how the siege was removed, hastened forward toward his enemies, doubting least they would haue been fled, and gone before his coming: but they abode the earles coming, and so receiued him, that though by many courage hee first won the entrie at their campe, yet at length, they compassed him about, and shooting him through the thigh with a hand gun, slue his horse, and finally killed him, lying on the ground. There died also the lord Lile his sonne, & his bastard sonne Henrie Talbot, and sir Edward Hull, and thirte other men of name, the lord Moleins was taken prisoner with threescore others. Wherefore of the English people fled to Burdeaur and other places, of whom in the flight were slaine aboue a thousand persons.

Thus at this battell of Chastillon fought the twentie of June, ended his life Iohn Lord Talbot, & of his progenie the first Earle of Shrewsburie, after that he had valiantly made war in seruice of his prince 24. yeeres, he was buried at Wykechurch in Shropshire.

An. reg. 32.

After this, the towne of S. Millan, Liboyne, and all other townes which the Earle of Shrewsbury had conquered, rendered themselves to the French men, Bourdeaux onely excepted. The which Citie being the last refuge of the English people, the French King in person besieged with all his puissance, and in conclusion constrained both the garrison and inhabitants to yelde, so that the Englishmen and Gascoignes might safely depart with all their substance,

Description of Aquitaine.

Thus was the Dutchie of Aquitaine, which had continued in the possession of English, from the pere of our Lord. 1155. unto this pere 1453. which is nere hand thre hundred yeres, by the marriage of Alienor, daughter and heire to William Duke of Aquitaine, wife to King Henry the second, finally reduced and brought againe to the French obedience and seruitude. Within that onely dutchie be foure Archbishops, foure and twentie Bishops, fiftene earldomes, two hundred and two barones, and aboue a thousand captainships, and halfe witkes, whereby ye may perceiue what a losse this was to the Realme of England.

The 13. day of October, the Quene at Westminster was deliuered of hir first sonne, who was named Edward.

When the wars were ended in foraine parts, ciuill dissention began againe to renew within the Realme, being diuided into two seuerall factions: for King Henry descended of the house of Lancaster, claiming the crowne from his grandfather King Henry the fourth; and Richard Duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionell Duke of Clarence, third sonne to King Edward the third, wrestled for the game, by reason whereof, the nobles, as well as the common people, were into many parts diuided, to the bitter destruction of many a man, to the great ruine and decay of this Realme. For while the one partie studied to destroy the other, all care of the commonwealth was set asleepe, iustice and equitie clerely crield.

the Duke of Yorke.

The Duke of Yorke above all things, first sought meanes howe to prouoke the malice of the people against the Duke of Somerset, imagining that hee being made away, his purpose should shortly come to condusion.

He also practised to bring the King into the hatred of the people, for that he was not a man of stomache sufficient to supply the ryme which he held. Many of the high estates not liking the world, and disallowing the acts and doings both of the King and his counsell, determined to practise how things might come to some alteration: which when the Duke understood, he chafely entertained and won the fauour of the two Neills, both named Richards, the one Earle of Salisbury, the other Earle of Warwick, the first being the father, and the second the sonne. This Earle of Salisbury, was second sonne to Ralph Neuill Earle of Westmerland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married, and the said Richard was espoused to lady Alice the only child, and sole heire of Thomas Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, slain at the siege of Orleans, of which woman he begat Richard, Iohn and George, Richard the eldest sonne espoused Anne, the sister and heire of the entire blood to Henry Beawchampe

Beawchampe Earle, and after Duke of Warwick, in whose right and title he was created Earle of Warwick.

The Duke of Yorke with his friends wrought so effectually, and handled his busines so politickely, that the Duke of Somerset was arrested in the Quenes great chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, where he kept his Christmas without great solemnity, against whome, in open Parliament, were laid diuers articles, beginning thus: These articles and points following, giue and minister I Richard Duke of Yorke, your liege man, and seruant unto your highnes, humbly proposing and declaring them, against Edmond Duke of Somerset, for the great welfare, and the common auale and increase of your maiestie royall, and of this your noble Realme, as well to bying to knowledge and vnderstanding the meanes and causes of the great mischieses and inconueniences, which late befell unto this your noble Realme, as in losse of your liuelode beyond the sea, and otherwise in punishment of deserters, and ercule of innocency, and also in putting aside, and eschuing of the great and impotable hurt and psequice which been like, withouten that purueyance he had of remedie, to succedd in short time. To the which articles of enery of them, I the said Duke of Yorke desire of your equall and indifferent right wisesnes, that the said Edmonde answer by his faith, & truth the sacrament of his oth thereupon made duely and truly as law and conscience requirerth, &c. as I haue at large set downe in my larger Chronicle.

The king at that time hauing laine long sick at Clarendon, was conueyed to London, by reason whereof, no finall determination proceeded in this waightie cause, but all was put in suspence, till the next assemble of the high court of Parliament.

This yere wheat, and other graines were in such plenty, that a quarter of wheat was commonly solde for twelue pence, and fourteene pence: a quarter of malt for sixtene pence, and seuentee pence at the most, and not aboue. A certaine farmer dwelling in the towne of Cruse Wolfe, or Wolfe towne in Hartfordshire, wanting money, sold twenty quarters of wheat the best, for twenty shillings.

Iohn Kempe Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, and was buried at Canterbury. This Kempe was borne at Wile in Kent, whereupon, when he was Archbishop of Yorke, he made the parish Church of Wile, a Colledge, where the gouernour was a prebend, and the other were ministers for diuine seruice, and to instruct youth in grammer and learning, according to his foundation. Which Colledge, at the suppression the 36. of Henry the eight was valued 93. pound, two shillings by yere. The father of this Archbishoppe Kempe lieth buried in the said Church of Wile, with this Epitaph following,

Idem Thomas obiit Anno Domini 1428. 30. die Mensis Maij.

Unto this Iohn Kempe succeeded in the archbishopricke of Canterburie; Thomas Bourcher brother to Henrie earle of Essex, brane of Saint Martins, first bishop of Winchester, then of Ely, and then archbishop of Canterbury, and cardinall of Saint Ciriac, and William Grey was made bishop of Ely: and Richard Neuell earle of Salisburie, was made lord chancelor of Eng-land.

Whilste king Henry lay sicke, Richard duke of Yorke bare all the rule and gouerned as regent, and did now discouer the sparks of his hatred, his under dissimulation, against the Duke of Somerset: but when the king had recovered his strength againe, and resumed to him his princelie gouernement, he caused the Duke of Somerset to be set at libertie, and preferred him to be Capitaine of Calcis, wherewith not onely the Commons, but many of the nobilitie (sauers of Richard duke of Yorke) were greatly grieved and offended, saying that he had lost his manhood, and would lose Calcis.

The duke of Yorke and his adherents, perceiving that their accusing of the duke of Somerset prevailed not, determined to reuenge their quarrel, and obtaine their purpose by open warre: and so he being in Wales accom-panied with his especiall freinds, the earles of Salisburie, and Warwick, the lord Cobham, and others, assembled a power of warlike persons, and marched towards London.

The king being informed thereof, assembled likewise an host, and mean- ing to meete with the duke, rather in the north parts then about London, where it was thought he had to many freinds, with great speede, being ac- companied with Humfrey duke of Buckingham, and Humfrey his eldest sonne earle of Stafford, Edmond duke of Somerset, Henry Percie earle of Northumberland, James Butler earle of Wiltshire, and of Desmond, John Bewford earle of Dorset, Jasper Tewder earle of Pembroke, brother to the king, Thomas Courtney earle of Devonshire, John lord Clifford, the lordes Sudley, Barnes, Rose and others, being in all aboue 2000. men of warre, departed from Westminster the 21. day of May, toward Saint Albons, to meete with the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwick and Salisburie: the king lodged that night at Watford, or Watford ouer this side Saint Al- bons, and on the morow in the morning earlye he came to Saint Albons. And about the same time, were there assembled Richard D. of Yorke, John D. of Norfolk, Richard earle of Warwick, Richard earle of Salisburie, William Fauconbridge, Edward L. Cobham, and many other knights and esqui- ers, the kings enemies, in a place called Keyfelde, beside Saint Albons.

the King bearing of the Dukes coming with the Lords aforesaid, plight his banner in a place called Goselowe, which place was sometimes called Sand- forth in Saint Peters Crete, and commaunded in strong manner to kepe the wards and barriers of the same Towne. The Duke of Yorke knowing the strength made against him abiding in the fiede aforesaid, from seven of the clocke in the morning, untill it was almost ten of the clocke without any stroke smitten on either part, by the aduise of his counsell sent vnto the King vnder these words following.

Please it vnto your excellent Grace, Richard Duke of Yorke, to take him as your true liegeman and humble subiect, and to consider and tender at the reuerence of God, and in the way of charitie, the true intent of my coming, and to be good and gracious Soueraigne vnto me, and all other your true liege men, which, that with all their power and might will be ready to live and die with you in your right, and to do all things as shall like your Maiestie royall to commaund us, if it be to the worship of the Crowne of England, and the welfare of this your noble realme. Your ouer, gracious Lord, please it vnto your Maiestie Royall, of your great goodness and rightwisenesse, to incline your will to heare and seele the rightwile part of us your true subiects and liege men. First, praying and beseeching to our Soueraigne Christ Iesus, of his high and mightie power, to giue the vertue of prudence, and that through the prayer of the glorious Martyr Saint Albon giue you very knowledge of our troubles, and to know the intent of our assembling at this time: For God that is in heauen knoweth, our intent is rightfull and true. And therefore we pray vnto that mightie Lord in these words: Domine sis clypeus defensionis nostræ: where- fore gracious Lord, please it your Maiestie Royall to deliuer such as we will accuse, and they to haue like as they haue deserved. And this done, you to be honourably worshipped as most rightfull King and our true gover- nor. And if we should now at this time be promised, as aforesaid this time is not unknowne haue been promises broken which haue ben full faithfull- ly promised, and thereupon great othes sworn, we will not now cease for no such promises, nor oth, till we haue them which haue deserved death, or else we to die therefore.

King Henry charge and commaunde, that no manner person of what de- gre, estate, or condition fouere he be, abide not, but that they anioide the felde, and not be so hardie to make resistance against me in my own Realme. For I shall knowe what traytors dare be so bolde to arise any people in mine owne land, where though I am in great disease and heavinesse: by that faith I owe vnto Saint Edward, and vnto the Crowne of England, I shall destroy them every mother sonne, and eke they to be hanged, beate, and quartered, that may be taken afterward of them, in example to make all such Traytors to beware, for to make any rising of people within mine mine owne land, and so trayterously to abide their King and gouernour. And so; a conclusion, rather then they shall haue any Lord that here is with mee, at this time, I shall this day for their sake in this quarrell my selfe lue and die.

The words of the Duke of Yorke to all gentlemen and other assembled with him.

Sirs, the King our Soueraigne Lord will not be reformed at our beseeching ne prayer, nor will not in no wise vnderstand the intent wherefore we be here assembled and gathered at this time, but onely is in full purpose to destroy vs all, and thereupon a great oth hath made, that there is none other way, but that he with all his power will pursue vs, and if we be taken, to giue vs a shameful death, taking our liuelode and goods, and also our heires shamed for euer. Therefore sirs, now sith it will none otherwise be, but that we shall utterly dye, better it is to vs to dye in the field, than cowardly to be put to an bitter rebuke and shameful death, for the right of England standeth in vs. Considering also in what perill it standeth at this time, and so; to redresse the mischiefe thereof, let euery man helpe to his power this daye, and in that quarrell to quite vs like men, to the Crowne of England, praying and beseeching vnto that Lord the which is eternall, that raigneth in the glorious kingdome celestiall, to keepe and saue vs this daye in our right, and thorough the giftes of his holy grace we may be made strong to withstand the great abhominable and horrible malice of them, that purpose to destroye vs and the Realme of England, and put vs to a shameful death: praye we therefore vnto that Lord to be our comfort and our defendor, saying these wordes, Domine sis clipeus defensionis nostri. And when these wordes were saide, the Duke of Yorke, and the Carles of Warwicke and Salisburie, with their host, betwene eleuen and twelue at none brake in, in thre severall places of the saide strate. The King then being in the place of Edmond Westby, Hundreder of the sayde Towne of Saint Albons, hearing of the sayde Dukes coming, commanded his host to slay all manner Lords, knights, squiers, Gentlemen and premen, that might be taken on the partie of the foresaide Duke of Yorke. This done, the Lord Clifford kept so strongly the barriours of the same Towne, that the foresaide Duke of Yorke might in no wise with all the power that he had enter, nor brake into the sayde Towne. The Earle of Warwicke knowing thereof, took and gathered his men together with him, and brake in by the Garden side into the sayde Towne, betwene the signe of the Keye, and the Erchequer in Holywell strate: and anon as they were within the sayde Towne, they blew vpe the Trumpet and cried with an high voyce, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, that maruaile it was to heare. And till that time the Duke of Yorke might neuer haue entrie into the Towne, and then with strong hand they brake vpe the Barriers, and fought a fierce and cruell Battaille, in the which were slaine on the Kinges parte Lordes of name, Edmonde Duke of Somerset, Henry Earle of Northumberland, the Earle of Stafford, the olde Lord Clifford, Sir Robert Vere, Barcin Entewell, William Chamberlaine, Richard Fortescue, and Ralph Ferrers knights, Oliuer Maleuory, Oliuer Alterton, Gilbert Scaresbrooke, Iohn Garhe, Thomas Packington, Roger Morecroft, William Tarwin, Iohn Rensfede, Iohn Alford, Reginalde Griffith, Humfrey Acworth, Henric Hawlin the Quenes messenger, Richard Chancler poster to the King, Alexander Breakespeare, Gilbert Hilding, poster to the King, William Souche, Iohn Boteraux, Ralph Babthorpe sewer to the King, and Ralph his sonne, the Kings Attorney, William Coruin, William Cotton of Conington in Huntingdon-shire, receiuer of the butche of Lancaster, Gilbert Faldingar, Iohn Daues, Ellis Wood, Robert Woodward, and Ralph Willoughby squiers, Hawling the Kings poster, and William Butler yeoman, Iohn Apinken, Iohn Daue, Iohn at Herthe, Hughe North, William Porter, Iohn Page, Thomas Barker, Iohn Taylor of Henley, Robert Purton, and Henry Himingley yeoman of the crowne, Nicholas of the pantrie, Iohn Clarke, William fishmonger to the duke of Buckingham, Allen Sutton clerke chaplein, and many other slaine, to the number of 5000. and on the other part was slaine about 600. persons, of them that were slaine, ben buried at Saint Albons eight and forty persons. And at that battell were wounded Lordes of name, the King shot into the necke with an arrowe, Humfrey duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Sudley, in the visages with arrowes, Humfrey Earle of Stafford in the right hand with an arrowe, the Earle of Dorset was so hurt that he might not goe, but was slaine to be caried home in a cart, and Sir Iohn Wenloke knight in likewise hurt and caried from thence in a chaire, and diuers other knights and squiers so hurt, and the substance of the Kings horse despoiled of their harness, at their owne request, made deliuey to the dukes horse for saluation of their liues and fled. The earle of Wiltshire, and Thomas Thorpe, Lord the baron of the Erchequer, with many other fled, and cast away their harness in ditch and woods. This done, the duke of Yorke, the Carles of Warwicke and Salisburie, came vnto the King where hee was, and besought him on their knees, of grace and forgiveness of that they had done in his presence, and besought him of his highnes to take them to grace, and as his true liege men. The King desired them to cease their people, that there should be no more hurt done, and to obey his commandement, did cause to be proclaimed in the Kings name, that all manner of people should cease off their malice, and not to smite one stroke more, and so ceased the battaille. And upon the day next after, the King and the Duke of Yorke, the Carles of Warwicke and Salisburie, came to London, and were lodged in the bishops pallace of London, where they kept their Whitsontide with great ioye and solemnitie, concluding there to hold a Parliament, the same to begin on the ninth of Iulij next following.

The parliament began at Westminster on the ninth day of July as was appointed, in the which session, the Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, late deceased at Bery in Suffolke, was openly declared to haue bene a true subiect to the King and Realme: besides this it was enacted, that no person should fudge or repoze any point of vntruth of the Duke of Pojke, the Earle of Salisburie, and Warwicke, or of any Knight, Esquire, archer, or other coming in warlike aray against the King at Saint Albones, considering their enterpryse, was only to see the Kings person in safegarde. And all the blame was put vpon the Duke of Somerset, Thomas Thorpe baron of the Erchequer, and William Ioseph Esquier the Kings colaterall companion, because they vpon malicious purpose kept a certaine letter from the Kings knowledge, and would in no wise suffer it to be deliuered vnto him, notwithstanding the same made to the aduancement of some good assured peace, if it had bene throughly and aduisedly read, wayed and considered: in which letter they declared that as humble and faithfull subiects, they onely required that it would please the King, whose honor, health, suretie, and preservation they chiefly wished, not to giue credite to their aduersaries malicious suggestions, till their coming to his presence, vnto the which they humbly besought him that they might be admitted, as his faithfull liege people, to shewe the intent and purpose of their coming, which was to none other end, then to enlarge their libertie, and allegiaunce towarde his most dread person, intending to put themselves with as much diligence, industrie, and trauaile, in all things that might prefer and aduance his honor, suretie, and safeguard, as any subiect he had liuing. The keeping backe of this letter did minister matter sufficient to the parliament, to colour, and iustifie for well done all transgressions, committed in the late battaille at Saint Albones.

In this Parliament was the Duke of Pojke made Protector of the realme: the Earle of Salisburie was made Lord Chancellor, and had the great scale to him deliuered: And the Earle of Warwicke was made Captaine of Calais, and the territories of the same. And thus the rule of the Realme rested in the Duke and Chancellor, and all the warlike affaires remained principallie in the Earle of Warwicke. And so amongst them it was agreed, that King Henrie should still raigne in name and dignitie, but neither indeed nor in authoritie, not minding to destroy him, least they might sodainly prouoke the furie of the common people against them, because that of the common people hee was for his holynes of life, and aboundant Clemencie, much fauoured and highly esteemed.

So that the Duke of Pojke, and his adherentes had wrested the whole rule and government into their hands: all such persons, as either loued or the Quene fauoured, were put beside the priue counsell, and such put in their places as were knowne to fauour the house of Pojke.

Also

Alls all officers were changed throughout the Realme at the will of the Protector, Chancellor, and Captaine of Calais, so that they constituted and ruled all things at their owne wills: but they were noted with an execrable offence, of diners spirituall persons, and namely of the Duke of Gloucester, late out of Banckwarre, and sent to Pontefract Castle. Ann. reg. 34.

But Henry Bewford newly inuested Duke of Somerset, and Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, who had lost his sonne in the same battaille, and other Lordes and men of authoritie fauouring the partie of Kinge Henry, and bewayed the vntrue estate of the same King, because they perceived wherunto the cloyed curtisie, and dissembled manner of the Duke of Pojke did haue, thought it necessarie to puruey for a remede ere the mischance happened: hereupon they consulted with the Quene, and by her aduise was a great council called at Greenewich, where the Duke of Pojke was discharged of his Protectorship, and the Earle of Salisburie deprived of his office of Chancelorship, which change amongst the nobilitie, caused sodain alterations, and seditious attempts to spying in the communalitie, especiallie in the Citie of London.

In the Moneth of May an Italians seruant walking through Cheape of London, with a dagger hanging at his girdle, a Merchant seruant that before time had bene in Italie, and there blamed for wearing of the like weapon, chalenged the stranger, howe he durst be so bolde to beare weapon, considering hee was out of his native countrey, knowing that in his countrey no stranger was suffered to weare the like: To the which question such answere was made by the stranger, that the Mercher took from him his dagger and brake it vpon his heade, whereupon the stranger complained to the Mayor, who on the morrowe sent for the yong man to the Gaild-hall: wherfore after his answere made vnto the complaint, by agrément of a full Court of Aldermen, hee was sent to wards: and after the Court was finished, the Mayor, and sherifes walking homewarde through Cheape, were there met by such a number of merchers seruantes and other, that they might not passe, for ought that they could speake or doe, till they had deliuered the yong man that before was by them sent to prison.

And the same daie in the afternoone sodainly was assembled a multitude of lewde and poore people of the Citie, which without heade or guide ranne vnto certaine Italians houses, and especially to the Florentines, Lukelles and Venetians, and there toke and spoiled what they found, and did great hurt in sundrie places, but moose in fowler houses standing in Broadstrate wards, wherof three were in Sainte Bartholomewes Parish the little, and one in the Parish of Sainte Benets Church.

The Mayor, Aldermen and worthyfull commoners of the Citie, with

all their diligence resisted them what they coulede, and sent diuers of them to Newgate: and finally, not without shedding of blood, and murther of diuers Citizens, the rumour was appeased. The young man beginner of all this businesse, toke Sanctuary at Westminster, and not long after the Duke of Buckingham with other noble men were sent from the King into the Citty, who there charged the Mayor by vertue of a commission, that inquirie shoulde bee made of this ryot, and so called an open determiner at the Guild-Hall, where sate for Judges the Mayor, as the Kinges lieutenant, the Duke of Buckingham on his right hand, the chiefe Justice on the lefte hande, and many other men of name, where while they were empanelling their inquestes, the other commons of the Citty, many of them secretly put them in armour, and went to haue rung the common bell, so to haue raised the whole force of the Citty, and so to haue deliuered such persons as before for the robberie were committed to ward.

But this matter was discretely handled by the counsell and labour of some discrete commoners, which appeased their neighbours in such wise, that all this furie was quenched: but when word was brought to the Duke of Buckingham, that the communitie were in barmesse, hee with the other Lordes tooke leaue of the Mayor, and departed, and so ceased the inquirie for that day.

Upon the morrowe the Mayor commaunded the common counsell with the Wardens of fellowshippes to appere at the Guild-Hall, where by the Recorder in the Kinges name and the Mayor, was commaunded euery Warden, that in the afternone eyther of them shoulde assemble his whole fellowship at their common Halles, and there to giue streight commandement, that euery man see the kings peace kept within the Citty. After which time the Citizens were brought to such quietnesse, that after that day, the enquire was duelle perused, and thre persons for the said riot put in execution and hanged at Wyborne, whereof two were Sanctuary men of St. Martins le Graund, the other a shipman, for robbing of Anthony Mowricane and other Lombardes.

The french nation hearing of the ciuill dissention within the Realme of England, thought to worke some damage to the English people, in reuenge of olde injuries, whereupon were two franchises appointed to invade the townes standing vpon the riuage of the sea. The Captaine of the one frate, was William Lord Pomyars, and of the other sir Pierce Bressly Captaine of Dope. These two Captaines taking their course out of the mouth of Heyne, secured themselves, the one Westwarde, and the other Eastwarde, which was sir Peter Bressly, this lustie Captaine sayling almost all the coastes of Sussex, and Kent, durst not once take lande till he arriued in the Downes, and there hauing perfect notice that a little before the chiefe Rulers of the Towne, were departed from thence to avoid the plague which then there raigne, entered the Haven with fiftene thousand men, and their shippes all landing at Sandwich, whereof 7000.

The Lord Pomyars likewise toke his course westward, and by night bent for way and other certaine townes in Denonshire, in the month of August, and with his pillage returned into Britaine.

The Scottes also entred Northumberland, and burned certaine cottages and houses, but hearing that the Duke of Poike was marching thitherwarde with a great Arme, they with all haste returned into Scotlande.

In this yere was a great fraie in the North countrey betwene the Lord Rob. Fabian. Egremonde, and the Earle of Salisburie sonnes, whereby many were maimed and slaine, but in the ende the Lord Egremonde was taken, who was by the kings counsell found in great default, and therefore condemned in great sommes of money, to be paid to the Earle of Salisburie, and in the meane time committed to Newgate.

Not long after this sir Thomas Percie Lord Egremount, and sir Richard Percie his brother being prisoners in Newgate, condemned in a great summe to the Earle of Salisburie as is aforesaid, brake out of prison by night, and went to the king, the other prisoners toke the leades of the gate and defended it a long while against the sherifes and all their officers, insomuch that they were forced to call more ayde of the Citizens, whereby they lastly subdued them.

Wherefore I miserable sinner which here before long time haue walked in darkness, and now by the mercie and infinite goodnes of God reduced into the right way, and light of truth, and considering my selfe greuously haue sinned and wickedly haue informed and infected the people of God, returne and come againe to the vnitie of our Mother holy Church, and all heresies and errors written and contained in my sayde booke, woordes and writings, here solemnly and openly reuoke and renounce, which heresies and errors and all other spices of heresies I haue before this time before the most honorable father in God, and my good Lord of Canterbury in diuers and lawfull forme iudicially abused, submitting my selfe, being then and also now at this time a very contrite and penitent sinner, to the correction of the Church and of my said Lord of Canterbury.

And ouer this, exhorting and requiring in the name and vertue of almighty God, in the saluation of your soules and mind, that no man hereafter giue faith and credence to my said pernicious doctrines, heresies and errors, neyther my said Booke keepe, hold, or read in any wise, but that they all such Booke, woordes, and writings suspect of heresies, deliuer in all goodly hastes vnto my said Lord of Canterbury, or to his Commissioners and Deputies, in eschewing of many inconueniences and great perils of soules, the which else might be cause of the contrary. And ouer this declaration of my conversion and repentance, I here openly assent, that my said Booke, woordes, and writings, for declaration and cause aboue rehearsed, be deputed vnto the fire, and openly bent in ensample and terror of all other, &c. After this, he was depriued of his Bishopricke, hauing a certaine pension assigned vnto him for to liue on in an Abbey, and sone after he died. His Booke were intituled:

- 1 Of Christian Religion, and a Booke pertainyng thereunto.
- 2 Of Matrimonic.
- 3 Just arising of holy Scripture, deuied into three parts.
- 4 The Donet of Christian Religion.
- 5 The follower of the Donet.
- 6 The Booke of Faith.
- 7 The Booke filling the foure Tables.
- 8 The Booke of Worshipping.
- 9 The Prouoker of Christian men.
- 10 The Booke of Councell.

In the moneth of January died the Earle of Denonshire, in the Abbey of Abington, poisoned (as men said) being there at that time with Quene Margaret, King Henry and his adherents perceiving that the Duke of Poike lay still and stirred not, returned to London, and there called a great councell, openly declaring that the French and Scots, emboldened by the small discord within the Realme, would attempt to annoy the same, as of late they shewed apparant tokens of their malicious meaning, and would not cease vpon occasions to doe further displeasures, till they percelued a perfect concord, and vnfaired amity to be concluded betwene him and his friends, and those of the contrary part and confederacie. And to the intent, he would be the author of peace, he promised so to entertaine the Duke of Poike, and his followers, that all old grudges being not onely inwardly forgotten but outwardly forgotten, should be the cause of perpetuall loue and assured amitie. This deuise was of all men present well taken, and aduinged for the best. Whereupon diuers graue persons were sent to the Duke of Poike, and all other the great estates of the Realme, which since the battell of S. Albons neuer met oꝝ communed togither, commaunding them foꝝ great causes to refort to the kings pallace without delay. At whose commaundement came to London, the Earle of Salisbury on the 15. of January with 500. men, and was lodged in his owne house called the Werber: and on the 26. day came Richard Duke of York with 400. men, and was lodged at Barnards Castell being his owne house. Then came the Dukes of Excester and Somerset with 800. men, and were lodged without the walle barre, and the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford came with 1500. men, and lodged without the Citie. And on the 14. of February came the Earle of Warwick from Calais with 600. men, all in red sackets, embordered with ragged flaves before and behinde, and was lodged at the grey friers. And on the 17. of March, the King and Queen with a great retinue came to London, and were lodged in the Bishops pallace. And because no nozious attempt oꝝ bickering should be begonne betwene any of the parties, oꝝ their retinues, the Mayor of London, Godfrey Boloigne, and Aldermen of the City kept great watch, as well by day as by night, riding about the Citie, by Holboigne and Fleetstreet with 2000. men well armed, to see good order & peace to be kept. The Lords which lay within the Citie held a daily counsell at the blacke friers. The other part sojourning without the walles, assembled like wise in the chapter house at Westminster.

At the length by the diligent trauaile, good exhortation, and prudent aduice of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and other learned and vertuous Prelates, both partes were perswaded to come to a communication, where after long debating of their grieuances, they were accorded, promising to forget all olde rancours, and to be friends each to other, and obedient to the king, whereof writings were made and sealed. The principall points whereof, the king being reputed as whole arbitrator, consisteth herein.

First, that at the costes and expences of the Duke of York, the Earles of Warwick and Salisbury five and forty pounds of yearly rent should be given unto the Monastery of Saint Albons, to be employed foꝝ Edmond late Duke of Somerset, Henry late Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Clifford, which being slaine in the late battell of Saint Albons, were buried in the Abbey Church. The same Duke of Somerset, Earle of Northumberland and Lord Clifford, were declared foꝝ true liege men to the king at the day of their deaths, as well as the Duke of York, the Earles of Warwick and of Salisbury. Moꝝe, the Duke of York should giue to Elianor Dutchesse of Somerset, and to Henry Duke of Somerset her sonne, the summe of five thousand markes, &c. The Earle of Warwick should giue unto the Lord Clifford the summe of one thousand markes: Divers other awardes betwixt parties were there made, which I am forced to ouerpasse foꝝ breuities sake.

For the outward publishing of this topfull agreement, there was by our Lady day in Lent, oꝝ five and twentieth day of March, a solemne procession celebrated within the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule in the Citie

Citie of London: at the which the King was present in his habite royall, with the Crowne on his head, before him went hand in hand, the Duke of Somerset, the Earle of Salisbury, the Duke of Excester, and the Earle of Warwick, and so one of the one faction, and another of the other. And behind the King, the Duke of York, and the Queen with great familiarity to all mens sights, whatsoeuer was meant to the contrary, which appeared afterward.

The thirteenth day of Aprill there was a great fray in Fleetstreet, betwene men of court and the inhabitants of the same streete, in which fray the Quenes Attourney was slaine. For this sate, the king committed the principall gouernours of Furniuals, Cliffords, and Barnardes Inne to prison in the Castell of Hertford, and William Tailor Alderman of that ward, with many other, were sent to Windsoꝝe Castell the seventh of May.

On Thursday in Whitsun weeke, the Duke of Somerset with Anthonie Ruers and other foure, kept tussles before the Queen in the Tower of London, against thre Equiers of the Quenes: an in like manner at Greenwich the Sunday following.

On the Trinitie Sunday oꝝ Monday following, certaine shippes appertaining to the Earle of Warwick, met with a flete of Spaniards, and after long and cruell fight took fire of their ships laden with yron & other merchandise, drowned, and chased to the number of 26. not without shedding of blood on both parts, foꝝ of the Englishmen were slaine 100. and many moꝝe wounded and foꝝe hurt.

The King and Queen being at Westminster, the ninth day of Nouember fell a great debate, betwene Richard Earle of Warwick, and them of the kings house, inasmuch, that they would haue slaine the Earle: and onneth he escaped to his barge, and went after to Calais, foꝝ he was not long before made Captaine thereof by authoritie of the Parliament. Some after, the young Duke of Somerset by stirring of them that hated the Earle of Warwick, was made Captaine of Calais, and a priuie seale directed to the Earle foꝝ to discharge him of the Captaine ship: but the Earle, soasmuch as he was made by Parliament, he would not obey the priuie seale, but continued soꝝth in the said office.

James Earle of Wiltshire was made treasurer of England after Walter Hungerford knight.

The noble Science of Printing was about this tme found in Germany at Haguenue by one Lo. Cuthemburgus a knight: one Conradus an Almain brought it into Rome: William Caxton of London brought it into England about the yere 1471. and first practised the same in the Abbey of S. Peter at Westminster: after which time, it was likewise practised in the Abbies of S. August. at Canterbury, S. Albons, and other Monasteries of England.

The Earle of Warwickke Admittall, Captaine of Calais with a fourtene well appointed ships, sailed abroad to strower the seas, and by chance met with five great ships, whereof thre were Carickes of Gene, and the other two were of Spaine, bigger in height and length, than the Carickes. The

Carle though he were bineth able to deale against them, yet he ballantly encountering them, there was a soze battayle fought betwixt them, soze lasted almost the space of two daies, yet in the ende the English had the victorie: so that two of those shippes being forced to saue themselves by flight, the other three were taken, which the Carle brought to Calcis, with all the marchandise aboord in the same, the value whereof in wine, oyle, ware, pyn, cloth of golde, and other riches was esteemed to the value of tennethousand pound and better, by reason whereof, those wares were solde wonderfull cheape: there were taken a greate number of pylsoners, beside a thousand persons slaine in the fight, and of the Carles part about the number of fiftie.

Now in this meane time, after that the Carle of Marwicke was departed the Realme and gone over to Calcis, the Duke of Poike, and the Carle of Salisburie falling to consultation, it was agreed betwixt them, that the said Carle of Salisburie with a warlike company should march toward the King, and signifie to him by way of complaint, both the manifest iniurie done to his sonne, and also the vncourteous breach of the swozne amitie and late agreement, in which late if he prevailed, he should not then let passe the occasion giuen for reuenge of displeasures to him done, both by the Quene, and her counsell. The Carle of Salisburie therefore removed from Spilsham Castle, with foure or fise thousand men, taking his way through Lancashire towards London.

In the meane season the Quene assisted by the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, hauing a diligent eie to al her busines, imagined that the Carle of Marwicke had hindered this aie, to the intent, to set the Crowne on the Duke of Poikes head: wherefore she appointed James Twiche Lord Audley (because his power lay in those parts) to raise an host of men, and to giue battaile to the same Carle, if he saw cause, & place in convenient: she allied him to her all the knights and Esquiers of Cheshire for to haue their fauour: she held open househols among them, and made her sonne the Prince, to giue a liuerie of Swans to all the gentlemen of that countrey, and to many other through the land, trusting through their strength to make her sonne King, making promise meane to some of the Lords to moue the King to resigne the Crowne to her sonne, but she could not bring it to passe.

An. reg. 38.

The 21. day of September Richard Carle of Salisburie hauing gathered a well appointed army, toke his way toward Ludlow, where at that time the Duke of Poike lay, to the intent that they both together would haue ridden to the King to Colshill in Staffordshire, to haue excused them of certaine articles laide against them by malice of their enemies, as they saide. Whereupon those that were about the King, and also the Quene, who lay at Egghall, moued him to assemble a great power, whereof James Twiche Lord Audley was made chiefe, and had the leading of them into the fielde called called Blozeheath nere vnto Bucklestone, by the which the said Duke and the Carle must needs passe, and there both hostes met and fought a most tall battell, wherein the Lord Audley was slaine with Hugh Venables of Binton, Thomas Dutton of Dutton, Richard Molinoux of Stratton, William Trowbecke, John Legh del Bothes, John Donne of Wiltinton, and John Egerton of Egerton knights, Richard Donne of Croton, John Dukes Esquiers, and many other, in all to the number of 2400. persons, but the greater losse fell to the of Cheshire, that had received the Princes liuerie of Swans: but there were taken prisoners the Carle of Salisburie two sonnes Thomas and John, and sir Thomas Harrington, which were sent to Chester, but sone after deliuered. After this discomfiture at Blozeheath, the Duke of Poike percelusing his destruction to be intended, and his priuite intents throughly disclosed to the King and Quene, he thought god no longer to linger his busines, but with all diligence to display and auance his banner, and therefore sending for the Carle of Salisburie, after long communication, they determined to raise an armie, and by fine force eyther to die, or to winne their purpose. Whereupon were men forthwith assembled, both out of the North, & of the Welch, which all came to the Marches of Wales, determining there to abide their enemies, or to meet them as occasion serued. There came to him from Calcis the Carle of Marwicke, bringing with him a great number of expert men in martiall feats, whereof two were Captaines of great experience, the one called Andrew Trollope, the other John Blunt.

The King hauing aduertisement of the Dukes doing, sent forth Commissioners to giue a power in all parts of the Realme, where he thought to haue any faithfull fauourers, by reason whereof a great number of men were assembled, then the King accompanied with the Dukes of Somerset and Gloucester, and other that fauoured the house of Lancaster, marching toward came vnto Worcester, where he stayed for a time, and sent to his adherentes a messenger, to wit. the Bishoppe of Salisburie Richard Beauchampes, to offer vnto them a free generall pardon for all trespasses whatsoeuer, if they would giue over their enterprise and become true and obedient subiectes. To whom they answered by the mouth of the Carle of Marwicke, in these pointes: First, that as concerning the pardon, they durst not trust vnto it. Secondly, that notwithstanding such pardons, those that were about the King were vncruy, and cared not to breake the Kings commaundment. Thirdly, although such a Lord, being called to the Parliament, ought freely to come, and safely to depart, yet the said Carle of Marwicke, at a certaine counsell holden at Westminster, was in danger of death, if the Lord above had not the better provided for his escape, for the which cause he sith the Kings pardon may be likened to a buckler of glasse, or a flasse of fre, of the which there is no trust: we dare not commit our selues vnto the defence of any such pardons.

The King receiving such an answer was nothing contented therewith, and therefore commaunded his standartes to be advanced: but before became nere to the place where the said Lords were incamped, they wrote a letter letter to the King, whereof the tenour was thus.

Most Christian King, right high and mightie Prince, and our most dread soueraine Lord, after as humble recommendations to your high excellency as will suffice. Our true intent to the prosperitie and augmentation of your high estate, and to the Commonweale of this Realme, hath bene shewed unto your highnes in such writing as we make thereof. And our that an Indenture signed by our hands in the Church Cathedrall of Worcester, comprehending the p[ro]ofe of the truth and dutie that (God knoweth) we beare to your said estate, and to the preheminent and prerogative thereof, was sent unto your god grace by the Bp[is]hop of the said Church, and diuers other Doctors, and among other, by Maister William Linwoode Doctor of divinitie, which ministered unto vs generally the blessed sacrament of the bodie of Iesus, whereupon we and euery of vs depose for our said truth and duty, according to the tenour of the said Indenture. And sith that time we haue certified at large in writing and by mouth, by Garcarthking of armes, not onely to your said highnesse, but also to the god and worthy Lordes being about your most noble presence, the largenesse of our saide truth and duty, and our intent and disposition, to search all the motions that might serue conveniently to the affirmation thereof, and to our perfect sureties from such inconvenient and dangerous jeopardies as we haue bene put in diuers times here before. Whereof we haue cause to make, and ought to make such exclamation and complaint, not without reason, as is not unknowne to the said worthy Lordes, and to all this land, and will offer vs to your high presence, to the same intent, if we might so doe without said surety, which onely cauleth vs to keepe such fellowship as we doe in our last manner. And hereto we haue sojourne and avoided all thinges that might serue to the effusion of Christian blood, of the dread that we haue of God, and of your royall Maiestie: and haue also eschewed to approach your said most noble presence, for the humble obisance and reuerence wherein we haue, and during our life will haue the same. And yet neuertheless we beare, that we be proclaimed and diffamed in our name unrightfully, unlawfullie, and sauing your high reuerence, untruely, and otherwise (as God knoweth) than we haue giuen cause, knowing certainly that the blessed and noble intent of your said god grace, and the righte iustnesse thereof is, to take, repute and accept your true and lawfull subsidies, and that it accordeth neither with your saide intent, nor with your will or pleasure, that we should be otherwise taken or reputed. And our that, our Lordships and tenants bene of high violence robbed and spoiled, against your peace and lawes, and all righte iustnesse. We therefore, as we suffice, beseech your said god grace to take, repute, and receive thereunto our said truth and intent, which to God is knowne, as we shew it by the said tenour of the same Indenture, and not apply your said blessednes to the great righte iustnesse and quiette wherewith God hath endued your high nobilitie, to the impoyntine impatience and violence of such persons as intend of extreme malice to procede vnder the shadowe of your high might might and presence, to our destruction, for such inordinate counsaile (whereof God is not pleased) as they haue to our lands, offices, and goods, not letting or sparing therefore, to put such things in all lamentable and to sorrowfull icopardy, as might in all wise take effect, by the mystery of Gods wil power, nor not having regard to the effusion of Christian blood, ne any tendernes to the Noble blood of this land, such as serue to the tuition and defence thereof, ne not waighing the losse of your true liege men of your said Realme, that God defend, which knoweth our intent, and that we haue avoyded therefrom, as farre as we may with our sureties, not of any dread that we haue of the said persons, but onely of the dread of God and of your said highnes, and wil not vse our said defence until the time that we be prouoked of necessity, whereof we call Heauen and Earth unto witness and record, and therein beseech God to be our Iudge, and to deliuer vs according to our said intent, and our said truth and duty to your saide highnesse, and to the said Commonweale. Most Christian King, right high and mightie Prince, and most dread soueraine Lord, we beseech our blessed Lord to preserve your honour and estate in loy and felicity. Written at Ludlow the tenth day of October: R. Yorke, R. Warwicke, R. Salisbury.

After their exclamation contained in this letter sent to the King, they withdrew them, and went into diuers parts beyond the seas, for the more surety of their persons. The Duke of Yorke went into Ireland, where he was honourably received: the Earle of March, Salisbury, and Warwick, not without great icopardy and perill, as well on the land as on the sea, went to Calais, and abode there.

Then was a Parliament holden at Couentry, wherein were attaint of treason, Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March his son and heire, Richard Earle of Warwick, Edmond Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, John Lord Clifford, Lord Clinton, sir Thomas Hasington, sir John Wenlocke, Thomas Neuill, John Neuill sonnes of the Earle of Salisbury, James Pickering, John Conyers, Thomas Par, William Oldhall, and Henry Ratford, Knights, John Bowler, Thomas Cooke, John Clay, Richard Gyron, Robert Browne, Edward Bowler, Thomas Vaughan, John Roger, Richard Grey, Walter Deuereux, Walter Hopton, Roger Kynderton, William Bowes, Foulike Stafford, the Lord Powis, and Alice Countesse of Salisbury, their goods and possessions escheated, and their heires diherited vnto the ninth degree, their tenants spoiled of their goods, beinained and flaine, the towne of Ludlow longing to the Duke of Yorke, was robbed to the bare walles, and the Duchies of Yorke spoiled of her goods.

In this moneth of October, Henry the young Duke of Somerset, Henry Lord Roos, and Lord Audley, with men of armes sailed towards Calais, to the intent the Duke should haue bene Captaine there: but when he came to land, they of Calais would haue taken him, so that he hardly escaped to the Castell of Swines: his souldiers were stripped out of their harnesse, and let go. The Lord Audley was taken into Calais, and the Lord Roos led into Flaunders, and after returned into England.

Not long after, Richard Lord Rivers was sent to Sandwich, to keepe the town and certain great ships which lay there at anchor: but when the Earle of Warwicke saw time convenient, he sent some of his men to Sandwich by night, the which took the Lord Rivers and Anthonie Woodville his sonne in their beds, and led them out to Calais, with all the great ships save one called Grace de Dieu, the which might not be had away because she was broke in the bottome. Sir Baudwine Fulford undertooke on paine of losing his head, that he would destroy the Earle of Warwicke, but when he had spent the King a thousand markes in money, he returned again. Then was the Duke of Grecester Admirall sent to the sea with a great flauy for to distresse the Earle of Warwicke and his flauy, he sailing from Sandwich to Dartmouth, for lacke of victuals and many his souldiers forsooke him there. And betwixt Sandwich and Dartmouth he met the Earle of Warwicke coming out of Ireland that had bene there for to speake with the Duke of Poike, and brought with him his mother that was fled thither for yeece, and led her to Calais: but the Duke of Grecester durst not set vpon the earle of Warwicke, nor the Earle would not distresse him, because he was admirall, and of the Kings blood, but let him passe by.

In the moneth of June yee men were sent to conuert the Duke of Somerset from Swines into England, but abiding the wind in the Port of Sandwich, the Earle of Warwicks men spoiled them of their harnes, killed their Capitaine Mountfort and many other. The Earles at Calais sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and at large to the commons of England certain articles in writing, beginning thus: Worthy sirs, we, the Duke of Poike, the Earles of March, Warwik, and Salisburie, felow, and offered to haue come vnto the King our seueraigne Lords most noble presence, to haue declared there afore him for our duty to God and to his highnes, and to the prosperity and welfare of his noble estate, and to the common weale of all his land as true liege men, the matters following, that is to say.

In primis, the great oppression, extortion, robbery, murder, and other villainies done to Gods Church and to his ministers thereof, against Gods and mans law.

2 Item, the pouerty and misery that to our great heavinesse our seueraigne Lord standeth in, not having any liuelode of the crown of England, whereof he may keepe his honourable household, which causeth the spoiling of his said liege men by the takers of his said household, which liuelode is in their hands that haue bene destroyers of his said estate, and of the said common weale.

3 Item, how his lawes be partially and unrightfully guided, and that by them that should most loue and tender his said lawes, the said oppression and extortion is most fauoured and supported, and generally, that all righte, onlines and Justice is euiled out of the said land, and that no man dreads to offend against the said lawes.

4 Item, that it will please his said godd grace to liue vpon his owne liuelode, liuelode, whereupon his noble progenitors haue in daies heretofore liued as honourably and as worthily as any Christian Princes, and not to suffer the destroyers of the said land, and of his true subiects, to liue thereupon, and therefore to lacke the sustentances that should be belonging to his said estate, and since his household vpon his poore commons, without payment, which neither accordeth with Gods nor mans law.

5 Item, how oft the said commons haue bene greatly and maruellously charged with taxes and tallages, to their great empourishing, whereof little good hath eyther growen to the King or to the said land, and of the most substance thereof the King hath left to his part not halfe so much: and other Lords and persons, enemies to the said commonweale, haue to their owne vse, suffering all the olde possessions that the King had in France and Normandy, Amtois and Maine, Gascoigne & Swian, won and gotten by his father of most noble memory, and other his noble progenitors, to be shamefully lost or sold.

6 Item, how they cannot cease therewith, but now begin a new charge of imposition and tallages vpon the said people, which neuer afore was seen, that is to say, euery to wneship to find men for the Kings guard, taking example therof, of our enemies and aduersaries of France, which imposition and tallage, if it be continued to heire, heires, and successors, will be the heaviest charge & worst ensample that euer grew in England, and the foresaid subiects, and the said heires and successors, in such bondage as their ancestors were neuer charged with.

7 Item, where the King hath now no more liuelode out of his Realme of England, but only the land of Ireland, and the towne of Calais, and that no King Christianised hath such a land and a towne without his Realme, diuers Lords haue caused his highnes to write letters vnder his priuy seale, vnto his Irish enemies, which neuer king of England did heretofore, whereby they may haue comfort to enter into the conquest of the said land, which letters the same Irish enemies sent vnto the said Duke of Poike, and marueled greatly that any such letters should be to them sent, speaking therein great shame and villany of the said Realme.

8 Item, in like wise the King by excitation and labour of the same Lords, wrote other letters to his enemies and aduersaries in other lands, that in no wise they should shew any fauour or good will to the towne of Calais, whereby they had comfort enough to proceed to the winning thereof. Considered also that it is ordained by the labour of the said Lords, that no where victuall nor other thing of refreshing or defence should come out of England, to the succour or reliefe of the said towne, to the intent that they would haue it lost, as it may openly appeare.

9 Item, it is deemed and ought greatly to be deemed, that after that the same Lords would put the same rule of England, if they might haue their purpose and intent, into the handes and gouernance of the same enemies.

10 Item, how continually with the piteous, shamefull, & sorrowfull murders ther to all England, of that noble, worthy, and Christian Prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the kings true uncle, at Burgh, it hath been labored, murdered, and conspired, to have destroyed and murdered the said Duke of York and the issue that it pleased God to send me of the royall blood, and also of us the said Charles of Warwick and Salisbury, for none other cause but for the true heart that God knoweth we ever have borne, and beare to the profit of the kings estate, to the commonweale of the same Realme, and defence thereof.

11 Item, how the Carles of Shrewsbury and Wilshire, and the Lord Beaumont, our mortal and extreme enemies, now, and of long time past, hauing the guiding about the most noble person of our said soueraign Lord, whose highnes they haue restrained and kept from the liberty and freedom that belongeth to his said estate, and the supporters and sauourers of all the premises, would not suffer the kings said good grace to receive and accept vs, as he would haue done, if he might haue had his owne will, into his said presence, breaching the charge that would haue bene laid vpon them, of the misfeiring, destruction, and wretchednesse of the said Realme, wherof they be causes, and not the King, which is himselfe as noble, as vertuous, as righteous and blessed of disposition, as any Prince earthly.

12 Item, the Carles of Wilshire and Shrewsbury, and the Lord Beaumont, not satisfied nor content with the kings possessions and his goods, stirred and excited his said highnes to hold his Parliament at Couentry, where an act is made by their prouocation and labour, against vs the said Duke of York, my sonnes March and Rutland, and the Carles of Warwick and Salisbury, and the sonnes of the said Carle of Salisbury, and many other knights and squire, of diuers matters falsely and vntruly imagined, as they will answer afoze Almighty God in the day of doome, the which the said Carles of Shrewsbury and Wilshire, and the Lord Beaumont prouoked to be made, to the intent of our destruction and of our issue, and that they might haue our liuelode and goods, as they haue openly robbed and dispoiled all our places and our tenements, and many other true men, and now proceed to hanging and drawing of men by tyranny, and will therein shew the largenes of their violence and malice as vengeably as they can, if no remedy be prouided at the kings highnesse, whose blessednes is neither assenting nor knowing thereof.

We therefore seeing all the said mischieses, hearing also that the French king maketh in his land great assembly of his people, which is greatly to be dread for many causes, purpose yet againe with Gods grace to offer vs to come again to the said presence of our said soueraign Lord, to open and declare there vnto him the mischieses aboue declared, and in the name of the land to sue, in as reuerent and lowly wise as we can, to his said good grace, to haue pittie and compassion vpon his said true subiectes, and not to suffer the same mischieses to raigne vpon them. Acquiring you in Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to assist vs, doing alway the duty of leges men in our persons to our said soueraign Lord, to his estate, prerogative, gaffe, and prebeminence, and to the surety of his most noble person, wherunto we haue ever bene, and will be as true as any of his subiectes alive, wherof we call God, our Lady Saint Mary, and all the Saints in heauen vnto witnes and record.

In the meane time, the Carle of Wilshire treasurer of England, the Lord Scales, and the Lord Hungerford went to Newbery, which longed to the Duke of York, and there made inquisition of all them that in any wise had fauoured the said Duke, wherof some were found guilty, and were drawn, hanged, and quartered, and all the inhabitants of the towne were spoiled of their goods. From thence the Carle of Wilshire went to Southampton, where vnder colour to take the Carle of Warwick, but especially to scale out of the Realme, as appeared after wards, he armed five great carlickes of Tene, and stuffed them with souldiers, taking victualles of the kings price without payment, and put a great part of his treasure into the said carlickes, and after sailed about in the sea, and at last scale into Dutchland, sending backe againe his souldiers into England. Then were the kings priuy seales directed to all Bishops, Abbots, Priors and other states spirituall and tempore, all to lend the king money, therewith to wage souldiers to keepe the sea coasts: but the commons of Kent breaching the like vengeance to be taken vpon them, as was done vpon them of Newbery, sent prinly messengers to Calais to the foresaid Carle, beseeching them in all haste possible to come to their succour, wherupon the said Carle sent ouer into Kent the Lord Fauconbridge, to know if their deides would accord with their words, and anon the people of Kent and other shires adioyning resorted to the said Lord Fauconbridge in great number, and made long proclamations, containing diuers articles and causes of their assembly, all which here I ouerlasse. When the Carle knew the willing hearts of those people, they prepared to come into this land, against whose coming, a long ballet was fired vpon the gates of Canterbury, made in fauor of the Duke of York and the said Carle, beginning thus: In the day of fast and spiriwall affliction, The celestiall influence of bodies transitorie, &c. The Carles of March, Warwick, and Salisbury, arrived at Sandwich, where met with them Thomas Boucher Archbishop of Canterbury, who with his crosse boyn before him, & a great number of other people, accompanied them to London, into the which City they entred on the second day of July: with them came the Popes legate, to treat of a peace, if need were.

Then was a conuocation of the Cleargy holden in Saint Pauls Church, where the said Carle being present, the Carle of Warwick receyted the cause of their coming into the land, with the misgovernments thereof, and then made open oth vpon the crosse of Canterbury, that they had neuer borne true faith and allegiance to King Henry. When the Carles of March and Warwick, with the Lords Fauconbridge, Clinton, Bourchier called Carle of Ewe, the Prior of Saint Johns, Audley, Burguenny, Say, and Scrope, the Archbishop, the Popes legate, the Bishops of Exeter, Ely, Salisbury, and Rochester, addressed them forth to the King at Poynthampton, thampton, leaving the Earle of Salisbury to be governour of the Citie in their absence. The Lord Scales and Hungerford, that before the coming of the Carles were in the Citie of London, and would have had the governance thereof, went to the Tower of London, and with them the Lords Velly, Lovell, Delaware, Kendale a Calcoigne: Knights, sir Edmond Hampden, Thomas Brune himselfe of Kent, John Bruin of Kent, Geruais Clifton treasurer of the Kings house, Thomas Tyrell, the Dutches of Excester and many other. Then was the Tower of London besieged both by water and land, that no victuals might come to them. And they that were within the Tower cast wild fire into the City, and shot many small guns, whereby they burnt and slew men, women, and children in the streets: also they of the Citie laid great guns on the further side of the Thames against the Tower, and brake the walles in divers places.

The King lying in the Friars at Southampton ordained a strong and mighty field in the meadows beside the Runny, having the river at his back. The Carles with their power coming to Southampton, sent certaine Bishops to the King, beseeching him to admit the Earle of Warwick to come to his presence, to declare their innocency: which request being denied by the Duke of Buckingham, the Carles sent an herald of armes, desiring to have hostages for his safe coming & going, but he might not be heard. The third time the Earle of Warwick sent word to the King, that at two houres after none he would speake with him, or die in the field. The Bishop of Hereford a white frier, the Kings confessor, incouraged the Kings part to fight, wherefore after the battell he was committed to the Castell of Warwick, where he was long prisoner.

The tenth day of July at two of the clocke after none, the Carles of March and Warwick let crye through the field, that no man should lay hand upon the King, ne on the common people, but on the Lords, Knights and Esquires: then both hosts encountered and fought halfe an houre, the Lord Edmond Grey of Ruthen that was the Kings vaward brake the field and came to the Carles party, and was a great helpe to them in obtaining the victory: many on the Kings side were slaine, and many that fled were drowned in the river, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earle of Shrewsbury the Lord Beaumont, and the Lord Egremont were slaine by the Kings tent, with many knights and esquires: the Kings ordinance of guns might not be shot, there was so great raine that day.

When the field was done, and the Carls had the victory, they came to the King, he being in his tent, and said in this wise: Most noble prince, displease you not though it have pleased God of his grace to grant us the victory of our mostall enemies, the which by their venomous malice have vntuly stirred & moved your highnesse to exile us out of your land, and would have us put to small shame and confusion: we come not to the intent for to vnto quiet ne grieve your high highnesse, but for to please your noble person, desiring tenderly the high welfare & prosperitie thereof, and of al your realme, and to be your true liege men while our liues shall endure.

The King with these words was greatly recomforted, and anon was led to Southampton with procession, where he rested thre daies, and came to London the sixteenth day of July, and was lodged in the Bishops palace.

The nineteenth day of July, they that were in the Tower of London, for lacke of victuals perished and came forth, of the which afterward some were by stone and beaded.

An. reg. 32.
Parliament.

The Eight of October a Parliament was begun at Westminster, unto the which came Richard Duke of York, that a little before was come out of Ireland, and being lodged in the palace, the king being there, he brake up the doores of the kings chamber, so that the king seeing him place, took an other chamber. Then the said Duke, as right heire by lineal descent from Richard the second, chalenged the Realme, purposing to have been crowned on Alhallowen day next following, and thereupon sent to the Parliament in writing his said claime, title, and pedigræ. The which claime after diligent deliberation had and approach, by the said Parliament, peace and concord betwene the King and the Duke on the bill of Alhallow was established and concluded, as in articles followeth.

The said title notwithstanding, and without prejudice of the said Richard Duke of York, tenderly desiring the wealth, rest, and prosperity of this land, and to set apart all that might be trouble to the same, and considering the possession of the said King Henry the first, and that he hath for his time been named, taken, and reputed for King of England and of France and Lord of Ireland, is contented, agreed, and consenteth, that he be had, reputed, and taken for King of England and France, with the royal estate, dignity and preeminence belonging thereunto, and Lord of Ireland during his naturall life. And for that time, the said Duke without hurt or prejudice of his said right and title shall take, worthily and honour him for his soveraigne Lord.

against the sayde lordes or any of them, by occasion of agreement or consent to the sayde accord, or assistance giving to the Duke and Carles, or any of them.

Item, it is agreed and appointed, that this accord, and every article thereof, be opened and notified by the Kings letters patents, or otherwise, at such times and places, and in manner as it shall be thought expedient to the sayde Richard Duke of Yorke, with the aduise of the Lordes of the Kings Councell. The king understandeth certainly, the sayd title of the sayde Richard duke of Yorke, iust, lawfull, and sufficient, by the aduise and assent of the Lordes spirituall and temporall, and the commons in this Parliament assembled, and by authoritie of the same Parliament declareth, approueth, ratifieth, confirmeth and accepteth the saide title iust, good, lawfull, and true, and thereunto giueth his assent and agreement of his free will and libertie. And ouer that, by the sayd aduise and authoritie declareth, entitleth, calleth, stablisheth, affirmeth, and reputeth the said Richard Duke of Yorke, very true and rightfull heire to the Coronas, roiall estate, and dignitie of the realmes of England and of France, and of the Lordship of Ireland aforesayde, and that according to the worship and reuerence that thereto belongeth, he be taken, accepted, and reputed in worship and reuerence, by all the states of the said realme of England, and of all his subiects thereof, lauding and ordaining by the same authoritie, the king to haue the sayd Coronas, realme, roiall estate, dignitie, and prebeminence of the same, and the said Lordship of Ireland during his life naturall. And furthermore by the same aduise and authoritie will, consenteth and agreeth, that after his deceale, or when it shall please his highnes to take from him the sayd Coronas, estate, dignitie, and lordship, the sayd Richard duke of Yorke, and his heires, shall immediately succede him in the said Coronas, roiall estate, dignitie, and lordship, and them then haue and enjoy, any act of Parliament, statute or ordinance, or other thing to the contrary made, or interruption, or discontinuance of possession notwithstanding. And moreover, by the sayd aduise and authoritie stablisheth, granteth, confirmeth, approueth, ratifieth, and accepteth the sayd accord, and all things therein contained, and thereunto freely and absolutely assenteth, agreeth, and by the same aduise and authoritie ordaineth and establisheth, that if any person or persons imagine or compass the death of the said Duke, and probably be attain of open dede done by folkes of that conditions, that it be deemed and adiudged high treason. And furthermore ordaineth and establisheth by the sayd aduise and authoritie, that all statutes, ordinances and acts of parliament, made in the time of the sayd king Henry the fourth, by the which he and the heires of his body coming of Henry late king of England the first, the same and heire of the sayd king Henry the fourth, and the heires of king Henry the first, were or be inheritable to the sayd Crownes and realmes, or to the heritage of the same, be annulled, repelled, damned, cancelled, void, and of none effect.

meth and establisheth, that all other acts and statutes made afoze this time by act of parliament, not repelled or annulled by like authoritie, or otherwise bold, be in such force, effect, and vertue, as they were afoze the making of these ordinances, and that no letters patents royall of record, nor acts iudiciall, made or done afoze this time not repelled, reuerced, ne otherwise void by law, be preiudiced or hurt by this present act. Also it was ordained by the same parliament, that the said Richard Duke of Yorke, should be called prince of Wales Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and protector of England.

The Englysh chronicle printed by William Caxton, and therefore called Caxtons chronicle, declareth how that in the parliament, while the commons of the realme were assembled in the common house, communing and treating vpon the title of the said Duke of Yorke, suddenly fell downe the crowne which hang then in the midst of the said house, which was the fratre of the abbe of Westminster, which was taken for a prodigy or token that the reigne of king Henry was ended: and also the crowne which stood on the highest tower of the castell of Dover, fell downe the same yere.

The agreement aforesaid being put in articles was engrosed, sealed, and sworn by the two parties, and also enacted in the high court of parliament: for for whereof, the king hauing in his company the Duke of Yorke, rode to the cathedra church of Saint Paul within the citie of London, and there on the day of All Saints, with the crowne on his head, went solemnly in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the bishops palace nere to the said church. And on the saturday next ensuing, Richard Duke of Yorke was by sound of Trumpet, solemnly proclaimed heire apparant to the crowne of England, and protector of the realme.

After this, the parliament kept at Conetrie the last yere, was declared to be a diuinely councell, and only celebrated for the destruction of the nobilitie, and no lawfull Parliament, because they which were returned, were neuer elected according to the due order of the law, but secretly named by them, which desired rather the destruction than the advancement of the common welth. When these agreements were done & enacted, the king dissolved his parliament, which was the last parliament that euer he ended. The Duke of Yorke wel knowing that the Quene would spurne against the conclusions agreed in this parliament, caused both hir and hir sonne to be sent for by the king: but the being a stout woman, by the counsell of the dukes of Gloucester and Somerset, not only denied to come, but also assembled a great army, intending to take the king by force out of the Lords hands.

The 21. of November, such abundance of waters overflowed in the countreies of Huntington, Suffolke, Cambridg, and the yle of Elpe, as the like had not beene sene before: for it ouerthrew the bridge, with a great part of the hospitall and fratre at Whetford in Suffolke, and the briges in Cambridg, running on the wheeles of the water mils there, destroying many houses, and comming in at the windowes of the rest.

folke, and the earle of Warwicke his trustie friends, to be about the king, and he with the earles of Salisburie and Rutland, and a convenient number of men, departed out of London the second of December, and sent to the earle of March his eldest sonne to follow him with all his power. The duke came to the castell of Sandall beside Wakefield on Christmas euen, and there began to assemble his tenants and friends. There came to him vnder a colour of friendship, the lord Neuill, brother to the earle of Westmerland, and required of him a commission for him to raise the people for to chastise his rebels, as he said: but when he had raised to the number of 8000 men, he brought them to the lords of the countrie, that is to say, the earle of Northumberland and the rest.

The Quene ascertained hereof, determined to make with him befoze his power were come together, and so, hauing in his company the prince his sonne, the Dukes of Gloucester and Somerset, the Earle of Devonshire, the lord Clifford, the lord Rose, and in effect all the Lords of the north parts, with an 18000. men, marched from Poike to Wakefield, where they placed themselves euen befoze the castell gates: the duke hauing with him not fully 5000. men (as was sayd) contrary to the minde of his faithfull friends, would needs issue forth to fight with his enemies. The duke of Somerset, and other of the Quenes part, deuised how to take them, and so appointed the Lord Clifford to lye in one skale, and the Earle of Wiltshire in another, and the Duke with other kept the maine battell. The duke of Poike with his people descended downe the hill in good order of aray, and was suffered to passe on toward the maine battell: but when he was in the plaine fildes betwene his castell and the towne of Wakefield, he was environed on euery side, so that he manfully fighting was within halfe an hower slaine, and his whole armie discomfited: and with him died of his trustie friends, his two ballard vnckles, sir Iohn, and sir Hugh Mortimers, sir Dauid Hall, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Neuill sonne to the Earle of Salisburie, William and Thomas a Parre, byrtzen, a Loyde Harington, Thomas Harington knight, sir Henry Ratford knight, and other, to the number of 2200. whereof many were young gentlemen, and heires of great parentage in the south parts. In this confusid was wounded and taken prisoner Richard Earle of Salisburie and was led by the Duke of Somerset to the castell of Pontefract, and had grant of life for a great ransom, but the common people of the country, who loved him not, took him out of the castell by violence, and smote off his head. There was also taken sir Richard Limbrooke, Ralph Stanley, Iohn Harow, capitaine Hanson, and diuers other. The lord Clifford perceiuing where the earle of Rutland was conueied out of the fild, by one of his fathers chaplaines, and schoolmaster to the same Earle, followed and ouertooke him, and stabbed him to the hart with a dagger as he knelt before him. The same Lord Clifford not satisfied herewith, came to the place where the dead corps of the Duke of Poike lay, and caused his head to be striken off, and set on it a crowne of paper, and fired it on a pole, and presented it to the Quene, not lieng farr from the

the field. The Dukes head with the Earle of Salisburies head were set vpon a gate of Poike. This battell was fought in the fourth fildes of Wakefield, by the faire stone bridge of nine arches, on the last of December. Poike of Wakefield shall be shewed in my larger volume that is to come, God willing.

The Earle of March so commonly called, but now after the death of his father, duke of Poike, lying at Gloucester, was wonderfully pained when the sorrowfull newes of these mishaps came to his vnderstanding: but being comforted by his friends, he remoued to Shrewsbury, & raised thereabout a puissant army to the number of 23000. ready to go against the Quene, & his fathers enemies. But when he was setting forthward, newes was brought him that Iasper Earle of Penbrooke, and James Butler Earle of Desmond & Wiltshire, had assembled a great number of Welchmen and Irishmen, suddenly to take and surprize him: he being therewith quickened, retired backe, and met with his enemies in a faire plaine nere to Mortimers Crosse, beside Ludlow, not far from Hereford east, on Candelmas day in the morning, at which time the sunne (as some write) appeared to the Earle of March like three sunnes, and suddenly ioined together in one: vpon which sight he took such courage, that he fiercely setting on his enemies, put them to flight: and for this cause men imagined he gave the sunne in his full brightness for his badge or cognizance. Of his enemies were slaine to the number of 3800. The Earles of Penbrooke and Wiltshire fled, but Owen Teuther (whome Leiland saith should be called Meredicke) father to the sayd Earle of Penbrooke, which Owen Teuther had married (as was said) Katherine mother to King Henry the first, was there taken and beheaded, and after ward buried in a chappell of the gray friers church in Hereford. There were also taken and beheaded, David Floyd, Morgan ap Reuther, sir Iohn Skidmore, and his two sonnes, Thomas Griffith, Iohn Throkemorton, Thomas fitz Henry, and other. During this season, the Quene encouraged with this late gained victory at Wakefield, with a great number of people out of the north, marched toward London, intending to recover the company of the king her husband, and to vnbode all that had bene done in the last parliament. These northmen people, after they were once passed the riuer of Trent, spoiled and wasted the countrie afoze them Andrew Trollope grand capitaine, and as it were leader of the battell, with a great armie of Scots, Welchmen, and other strangers, beside the northern men, destroyed the townes of Crantham, Stanfords, Peterborough, Huntingdon, Keston, Melleborne, and in maner all the townes by the way vnto Saint Albons, sparing neither Abbets, Priories, or parish churches, but bare away crosses, chalices, bookes, ornaments, and other things, whatsoeuer was worth the carriage, as though they had bene Saracens, and no Christians. At length they came downe to Dunstable, and so to S. Albons, and hearing that the dukes of Northfolke and Suffolke, and the earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the lords Bonville & other whom the Duke of Poike had left to gouerne the king in his absence, had by the kings assent assembled a great host, and were incamped with the king nere to the towne. Those northren lords and other that were with the Quene, made forwarde, and entering into Saint Albons, meant to passe through the towne, and so to cope with their enemies, but finding a sort of archers ranged, nere to the great crosse in the market place to defend their passage, they were received with such a storme of arrowes, which came flying about their eares as thicke as hail, that they were quickly repulsed backe, and with losse bryuen to retire into the west end of the towne, where by a lane that leabeth northwards vp to S. Peters strate, they made their entrie, and had there also a sharpe encounter against certaine bands of the Kings people: but yet after great slaughter on both parts, they got through, and vpon the heath, at the north end of the towne, called Barnard heath, toward a little towne called Synbridge, in a place called Romans land, they had a far greater conflict, with folwer of five thousand of the Kings armie, which gaue the onset so fiercely at the beginning, that the victorie rested doubtfull a certaine time, till at the length through the withdrawing many of the Kentishmen with their Captaine Louelace, that was the backward, King Henries part lost the field: the lords fled, and the King went to Quene Margaret that was come with the northren men (as is afore saide) and her sonne Edward. The Earle of Warwicke went toward the Earle of Sparch, that was comming toward London out of Wales. The lord Bonville would haue withdrawn him, but the King assured him to haue no bodily hurt: neuertheles at the instance of the Quene, the Duke of Excester, and the Earle of Devonshire, he was beheaded at S. Albons, and with him Sir Thomas Kiriell of Kent. This battell was fought on Shrouetueday, or the 17. of February, in the which battell was slain 1916. persons, of whome no nobleman is remembred, save sir Iohn Gray, which was the same day made knight in company of other twelue in the towne of Colny. The same day Thomas Thorpe baron of the Erchequer was beheaded at Highgate by the commons of Kent.

Now after the noble men were fled, and other were fled, and the King left in manner alone, without any power of men to garde his person, he was counselled by a squire called Thomas Hoo, a man well sene in the lawes, to send some conuenient messenger to the northren lords, aduertising them that hee would now gladly come vnto them (whome hee knew to be his friends, and had assembled themselves together for his seruice) to the ende he might remaine with them, as before hee had vnder the gouernment of the southerne lordes. According to this aduise, the King appointed the same Squire to beare the message, who first went and declared the same vnto the Earle of Northumberland, and returning backe to the King, brought certaine Lords with him, who conueyed the King first into the Lord Cliffords tent, that stood next to the place where the Kings people had incamped. This done, they brought the Quene and her sonne prince Edward vnto his presence, whome hee hospittally received, embracing and kissing them in most louing wise, and vndering heartlie heartie thanks to almighty God, whome it had pleased to strengthen the forces of the northren men, to restore his dearely beloued sonne againe to his possession. The Quene caused the King to dubbe her sonne prince Edward knight, with thirty other persons, which the day before had fought on her partie.

This done, they went to the Abbey, whereof the Abbot and the monks they were received with hymnes and songs, and so brought to the high altar, and after to the Chynne, and so to the Chamber, in which the king was wont to lodge. The Abbot made sute, that order might be taken to restrain the northren men from spoiling the towne, and proclamation was forthwith made to that effect, but it auailed not, for they maintained that the spoyle of all thinges was graunted them by covenant, after they were once passed the riuer of Trent: and so not regarding any proclamation, they spared nothing that they could lay hands on, if the same were meet for them to carry away.

The Quene hauing thus got the victorie, sent to the Maior of London, commanding him without delay, to send certaine carts laden with Lenten stufte, for the refreshing of hir armie, which the Maior incontinent granted, caused carts to be laden, and would haue sent them forwarde, but the commons of the citie would not suffer them to passe, but staied them at Triple gate: during which controuersie, diuers of the northren horsemen robbed in the suburbs of the citie, and would haue entered at Triple gate, but they were repulsed by the commons, and thye of them slaine, wherevpon the Maior sent the Recorder to Barnet to the Kings Councell, there to excuse the matter: and the Dutches of Bedford, the Lady Scales, with diuers Fathers of the spiritualltie went to the Quene to aduise hir displeasure, conceiued against the citie. The Quene therfore at their humble request by aduise of hir Councell, appointed certaine lords and knights, with 400. tall persons to ride to the citie, and there to viewe and see the demeanour of the people, and diuers Aldermen were appointed to meete them at Barnet, and to conuey them to London, but all these deuises were shortly altered into another forme, because true report came, not onely to the Quene, but also to the citie, that the Earle of Sparch, hauing vanquished the Earles of Penbroke and Wiltshire, had met with the Earle of Warwick, after the last battell at Saint Albons, at Chippingnoztton by Cotesholde, and that they with both their powers were comming towards London. The Quene therfore, hauing little trust in Essex, and lesse in them of Kent, but least of all in the Londoners, with hir husband and sonne, departed from Saint Albons into the north countrie, where their refuge onely consisted.

The Dutches of Yorke, seeing hir husband and sonne slaine, and not knowing what should succede of hir eldest sonne, sent hir two yongest sonnes George and Richard, ouer the sea to the citie of Arrich in Almaine, where they were of Philip duke of Burgoyne well receiued, and so remained there till their brother had got the Crowne.

The Carles of March and Warwike, hauing knowledg that the king and Quene were departed from Saint Albons, rode straight to London, entering the Citie with a great number of men of warre, the first weeke of Lent, or 28. of februarye, where hee was loyally receiued, whole coming thither was no sooner knowne, but that the people resorted to him out of Kent, Essex, and other parts in great numbers to see, aide, and assist this lustie prince in whom the hope of all their toy consisted.

This prudent prince, minding to take time when time serued, called a great Councell both of the Lords spirituall and temporall; and to them declared the title and right that hee had to the Crowne, rehearsing also the Articles concluded betwixt King Henry and his father by their writings signed and sealed, and also confirmed by act of Parliament, &c. Which after the Lords had considered, they determined, that because Kinge Henrie was insufficient of himselfe to rule the Realme, hee should be deprived of all kingly honour and soueraigntie, and incontinently was Edward Earle of March sonne and heire to Richard Duke of Yorke (by the lordes of that Councell assembled) named and elected for King and Governour of the Realme. On which day being Sunday, and the second day of March, the people of the Carles part being in their musters in Saint Johns fielde, and a great number of the substantiall Citizens there assembled to beholde their order, suddenly the lord Fawconbridge, which toke the musters, wisely declared to the people certaine Articles and points that King Henrie had offended in, and then it was demanded of them, whether the sayde Henrie were worthy to raigne still: but the people cried, Nay, nay. When was it asked, if they would haue the Earle of March to be their King, and they sayde, Yea, yea: then certaine Captaines were sent to the Earle of March at Baimards Castell, who told him that the people had chosen him King, whercof he thanked God and them, and by the aduise of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Excester, and the Earle of Warwike, with other, he toke it upon him. Many wealthy citizens of London, not altogether liking of this doing, conueied themselves out of the city, amongst the which were Philip Malpas Alderman of London, Thomas Vaughan Esquire, master William Asch, with many other, who fearing the Quenes coming to London, shipped them in a shippe of Antwerp, purposing to haue sayled thither: but by the way they were taken by a French ship named the Colmayne, and at length deliuered for great ranfome.

Edward Earle of March, being elected as is aboue sayd, on the next morning went in procession at Paules, and offered there, and after Te Deum being song, he was with great royaltie conueied to Westminster, and there in the Hall set in the kings seate with Saint Edwards scepter in his hande, and then asked of the people if they would haue him king, and they cried, Yea, yea. Then after certaine homages by him receiued, he was with procession conueied into the Abbey there, and set in the quire as king, while Te Deum was singing: that done, he offered at Saint Edwards shrine, and then returned by water unto Saint Paules, and was there lodged within

After Bungeate caused them to be brought from thence, and to be buried in the Churchyard of Sarton: the Lord Wacres hath there a meane tombe. Shortly after Quene Margaret obtained a great power of Scots and other her friends, and so bringing her husband with her, and leaving her sonne called prince Edward, in the towne of Barwicke, entred Northumberland, took the Castle of Bambrough, and stuffed it with Scottish men, and made therof Captaine, Sir Ralph Grey, and came forward to ward the Bishoppe of Durham. Wherof when the Duke of Somerset understode, he without delaie, resolted from King Edward, and fled to King Henry, so like wise did Sir Ralph Percie, and many other of the Kings friends, but many followed King Henry in hope to get spoyle, for his armie bent and spoiled to wnes wheresoener they came.

About Wholsummer the Scots with many French and Englishmen, laid siege to the Castle of Northham, but were forced to leave it as they found it. The Earle of Marwike wan the towne of Barwicke, where he made five Bannerets, and 22. knights, and went into Scotland, where he burnt Lathgibinaban, Tedwoyth, and Galowey, and many other townes, and returned to Barwicke.

This yere a quarter of wheate was solde for two shillings at London, Price of barley for two and twenty pence, pease for three shillings foure pence, and of otes for 14. pence, and in the countrey of Suffolke, a quarter of wheate was sold for 20. pence, malt for 20. pence, barley and otes for 12. pence.

In the month of Aprill, King Edward made great preparation against King Henry, and on S. Pakes day Ralph Percie li. Hungerford, with a great power purposing to haue distressed sir John Neuill, li. Mountacute, was himselfe slaine with many other.

The 15. of May King Henries power being at Berham, the li. Mountacute with a power came thither, & enclosed them round about. There were taken & slaine many lords that were with li. Henry, but he himself was fled foure dales befoze into Lancashire, where he & other lined in causes full hardly unknowne more than a yere. On Trinity Sunday li. Edward made the li. Mountacute Earle of Northumberland & warden of the Marches. The Earles of Marwike & Northumberland took Bambrough castle, and sir Ralph Grey being taken in Bambrough, for that he had twoze to be true to King Edward, was condemned, and had iudgement giuen upon him by the Earle of Worcester high Constable of England, as followeth.

Sir Ralph Grey, for thy treason, the King had ordained that thou shouldst haue had thy spurs striken off by the hard heeles, by the hand of the master coke, who is here ready to do as was promised thee, at the time that he took off thy spurs, and said to thee as is accustomed: That and thou be not true to the soveraigne Lord, he shall smite off thy spurs with his knife hard by the heeles: and so he shewed him the master coke ready to do his office with his axon and his knife. Whereover sir Ralph Grey, the King had ordeyned, here thou maist see, the kings of armes, and heralds, and thine owne proper coat of armes, which they should tear off thy bodie, and so thou shalt be thuswell be disgraced of thy worthip, nobles, and armes, as of thy order of knightthow. Also here is another coat of thine armes recuried, the which thou shouldest haue woyn on thy body, going to thy death wards, for that belongeth to thee after the law: notwithstanding the disgrading of knight, hood, and of thine armes, and noble a, the king pardoneth that, for thy noble grand-father, who suffered trouble, for the kings most noble predecessors. Now sir Ralph Grey this shall be thy penance: Thou shalt go on thy feete into the towines end, and there thou shalt be laid downe, and beauen to a scaffold maue for thee, and thou shalt haue thy head smitten off, thy body to be buried in the friers, thy head where the kings pleasure shall bee. This iudgment was pronounced at Doncaster, against the said Ralph Grey, for rebelling, and keeping of the castle of Bambrough against king Edward.

After this king Edward returned to Poike, where in despite of the Earle of Northumberland, which then kept himselfe in the Realme of Scotland, he created sir Iohn Neuill, L. Mountacute Earle of Northumberland, and in repossesse of Iasper earle of Penbrooke, hee created William lord Herbert Earle of Penbrooke: but after when the Earle of Northumberland was reconciled to his fauor, he restored him to his possessions, name and dignitie, and preferred the lord Mountacute to the title of Marquesse Monntacute, so that in degree he was aboue his brother the Earle of Marwicke, but in power and possessions far vnder him.

The Earle of Marwicke was sent ouer into France, to demand the lady Bona, daughter to Lewis Duke of Sauoy, and sister to the lady Carlot then quene of France, which Bona was then in the french court. The earle of Marwicke coming to the french king, as then being at Towres, was of him honorably receiued, & curiously entertained: his message was so well liked for the aduancement of the lady Bona, that his sister quene Carlot obtained both the good will of the king his husband, and also of his sister the foresaid lady, so that the matrimony on that side was clerely assented to, and the Earle of Dampmartine appointed with other to sayle into England, for the full finishing of the same: but in the meane while, on the first of May, king Edward took to wife Elizabeth, daughter to Iaquet ditches of Bedford, sister to the Earle of S. Paule, late wife to sir John Grey, slaine at S. Albons fiedon on king Henries part, which marriage was kept secret almost halfe a yere.

King Edward took the Chaucelozship from the Bishop of Excester, brother to the Earle of Marwicke, and gaue it to the Bishop of Bath.

In the month of Apr, the duke of Somerset, the L. Roos, the L. Molynes, Talbois earle of Elyne, sir Philip Wentworth, sir Thomas Findem, gathered an hoste in the North countrey, & sir Ioh. Neuill earle of Northumberland with 10000. men came vpon them, whom the comons forsaking, their captaines were taken & beheaded. A. Edward fearing the L. Mountacute, who he had of late made earle of Northumberland, he caused the men of the countrey to desire the rightfull heire Percie son to Henry that was slaine at Poike fiedon: & so Percie was restored, & Mountacute was made a Marques, and his son duke of Bedford, which should haue been the kings eldest daughter, and so by possibility should be king of England, thus was he sed with faire words, but nothing

The spinsters of Poike, the temple of Christs church in Pozwich, part of the priory of Christs church in London, the steeple of Saint spary spittle at London with the cloyster, were bent this yere.

This yere the 22. of January, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein it was enacted that no merchandise coming out of Flaunders, or out of any land of the duke of Burgoyne, should be sold within any ground of England. Also king Edward caused a new coyn to be made, which hee gained much, for he made of an old noble a royall, which he commanded to go for 10.s. neuertheless to the same royall was put 8.d. of alay, & so weised the moze by 8.d. being smitten with a new stampe: he likewise made halfo angels of 5.s. and farthings of 2.s. 6.d. anglelets of 6.s. 8.d. and half anglets, 3.s. 4.d. he made silver monies of 3. d. a grote, & so of other coines after that rate, to the great harme of the commons. I finde by recozde, that William lord Hastings the kings Chamberlaine, was made master of the kings mints or monies of gold or silver in the Tower of London, his Realme of England, territory of Ireland, and towne of Calais, with the Marches of the same: the which lord Hastings undertooke to make the same monies vnder for in following, to wit, of gold, a piece for 8. shillings 4. pence sterlings, which should be called a noble of gold, of the which there should be 50 such pieces in the pound weight of the tower, an other piece of gold 4. shillings 2. pence of sterlings, & to be of them 100. such pieces in the pound: and a thirde piece of golde weying the fourth part of the first, for two shillings one peny sterlings, and 200. such pieces in the pound, and enery pound weight of the sayd tower, to be worth 20. pound, 16. shillings 8. pence of sterlings, the which should be 23. Carrets, 3. graines and halfe fine, &c. And for silver, 37. shillings 6. pence of sterlings, the piece of 4. pence to be 112. groates, & 2. pence in the pound weight, &c. thus much out of the recozde.

On the Ascension day king Edward made 48. knightes of the Bath within the tower of London, amongst the which, was of that company sir Thomas Cooke, sir Mathew Philip, and Ralph Ioceline, and sir Henrie Waur Citizens of London made knightes: and vpon the 26. of May, Quene Elizabeth was crowned at Westminster with a great solemnitie: her father also was created Erle of Huiuers, and made high Constable of England, his brother lord Anthony was married to the sole heire of Thomas lord Scales: sir Thomas Grey, son to sir John Grey the Quenes first husband, was created Marquesse Dorset, and married to Cicely heire to the lord Bonville.

King Henry was taken in Cletherwode, beside Hungerley Hypping, stons in Lancastyr, by Thomas Talbot sonne and heire to sir Edward Talbot of Walsall, and Iohn Talbot his cousin of Coleby, which deceived him being at his dinner at Waddington Hall, and brought him towarde London, with his legs bounde to the stirrops, where he was met by the earle of Marwicke, and arrested at Celydon, and forthwith his gilt spurs were taken from his fête, doctor Manning Deane of Winsoze, doctor Bedle and young Ellerton being in his companie, with their fête bounde under the horse bellies, were brought through the Citie to the Tower of London, where the king was kept long time.

It was proclaimed throughout England, that the beakes or pikes of shone and bootes shoulde not passe two inches, upon paine of cursing by the clergy, and forfeiting 20. s. to be paid one noble to the king, one other to the Cordwainers of London, and the third to the chamber of London, and for other cities and townes the like order was taken. Before this time and since the yere of our Lord, 1382. the pikes of shoes and bootes were of such length, that they were faine to be tied by to their knees with chaines of silver gilt, or at the least with silke laces.

King Edward concluded an amitie & league with Henry King of Castile and John King of Aragon, at the concluding whereof, he granted licence for certain Cotswold shepe to be transported into y<sup>e</sup> countrie of Spain, which haue there since mightily increased and multiplied, to the Spanish profit, as it is said: but true it is, that long ere this were shepe in Spain, as may appere by a patten of king Henry the second, the 31. of his reigne, granted to the treasurers of London, that if any cloth were found to be made of Spanish wool, mixed with English wool, the makers of London shoulde for it bent.

Besides this, to haue amitie with his ner neighbour the king of Scots, he wished at the losse of Barwicke, and was contented to take a truce for fiftene yeres.

The 11. of februarye Quene Elizabeth was deliuered at Westminster of a daughter also named Elizabeth, who was long after married to King Henry the 7. whose Christening was done in the abbey with the most solemnities that might be, and the more, because the king was assured by his physicians, that the Quene was conceived with a prince, which passed of her wife as ye haue heard.

This yere was the Lord Hungerford, sir Thomas Hungerford knight, sonne to the Lord Hungerford, and Henry Courteney of right Earle of Devonshire, beheaded at Salisbury. The Lord Stafford of Southwicke procured the said Courteney's death, to be made Earle of Devonshire, as in breue he was shortly after.

King Edward though the refusal of the french kings sister in law (as ye haue heard) wan him enemies in France, wherefore in other places he procured him friends, but those friends had stand him in small keede, if fortune had not holpe him to another, euen at his elbow. This was Charles Earle of Charoloy, sonne and heire apparant vnto Philip Duke of Burgoyne, which Charles being then a widower, was counsailed to be a suter vnto King Edward to haue in marriage the Ladie Margaret, sister to the same king, a ladie of excellent beauty, and thought not but w<sup>o</sup>thy to match with the greatest prince of the world.

Anthony the Bastard of Burgoyne, called the earle of the Roche, brother to y<sup>e</sup> said earle Charoloy, a man of great wit, courage, & valiantie, was appointed pointed by his father Duke Philip to go into England in embassage about this sate, who being furnished for his estate, hauing in his company gentlemen and other expert in all feats of chivalry, and martiall prowes, to the number of 400. horses, toke ship, and arriued in England, where he was of the king and nobles honourably receiued. His message being declared, was toposilly heard of the king, the which by that assintie saw, how they mought be assured of a buckler against the French: the king therefore granted to the bastards request, and the said bastard openly in the kings great chamber contracted the said Ladie Margaret, for, and in the name of his brother the Earle of Charoloy.

Walter Blunt made Baron, and Lord Mountjoy.

The third of June, began a Parliament at Westminster, where in was returned to the kings hands, all manner of gifts that had bene giuen from the first day he toke possession of the Realme, to that tyme, except certaine things then excepted.

Also this yere in diuers places of England, many men were arrested, and treason suspected against them, wherethrough many of them were put to death, and the other escaped for great sums of money: amongst the which sir Thomas Cooke, sir John Plumer knights, Humfrey Heyford, and other Aldermen of London were arrested, and charged with treason, wherof they were acquite, but they lost of their goods to the king, to the value of 4000. markes, or more, as some haue written: and for example, the fornamed sir Thomas Cooke late Mayor of London, was by one named Hawkins apprehended of treason, for the which he was committed to the Tower: his place in London sealed by the Lord Rivers, and his Lady and seruants clerly put out thereof. The cause was this: the fornamed Hawkins, came by on a season vnto the said sir Thomas, requesting to lend him a 1000. markes upon good surety, whereunto he answered, that he would first kno<sup>o</sup> for to whom it should be, and for what intent: at length vnderstanding it should be for the use of Quene Margaret, he answered, he had no currant wares whereof any gift might be made without too much losse, and therefore required Hawkins to moue him no further for he intended not to deale withal, yet the said Hawkins required but one hundred pound, at length, and went without it, or the value of one peny, and neuer came againe to moue him, which so rested two or thre yeres after, till the said Hawkins was cast in the Tower, and at length brought to the stake, called the Duke of Excesters daughter (because he was the deuiser of that torture) by meanes of which paine he thewed many things, amongst the which the motion he had made to sir Thomas Cooke was one, by meanes wherof sir Thomas Cooke was troubled as ye haue heard, and one lury, by meanes of sir John Fogge, indited him of treason: after which, an iury determiner was kept in the Guildhall, in which sate with the Mayor, the Duke of Clarence, the earle of Warwick, the Lord Rivers, sir John Fogge, with other of the kings counsel, to the which place the said sir Thomas was brought, & there arraigned upon life and death, where he was acquitted of the said indictment, and sent to the counter in Breadstreet, and from thence to the Kings bench: being acquitted, his wife got again possession of his house, the which he found in an euill plight: for the seruants of sir John Fogge and the Lord Rivers had made haueock of what they liked. Also at his place of Stoddy hall in Essex, another sort had destroyed the dore in his park, his conies, and fish, & spared not brasse, pewter, bedding, and all what they might carry: for the which might neuer one penny be gotten in recompence, nor sir T. Cooke be deliuered, till he had paid 8000. pound to the king, and 800. pound to the Quene, and for that sir John Markham knight, chiefe Justice of the pleas, determined somewhat against the kings pleasure (that the offence done by sir T. Cooke was no treason, but misprision, the which was no desert of death, but to be fined at the kings pleasure) the Lord Rivers and the Dutches of Bedford his wife procured that he lost his office afterward in the 12. yere of Edward the fourth.

Justices in Smithfield.

The marriage aforesaid concluded, the bastard of Burgoigne chalenged the Lord Scales, brother to the Quene, to fight with him, both on horse back and on foot: which chalenge the Lord Scales gladly accepted, the king causing lists to be prepared in west Smithfield of London for these champions, the length of 120. fadlers yards, and ten fote: and in breadth 80. yards and ten fote, double barred, fenc foot betwene the bars, the timber & workmanship wherof cost two hundred markes, besides faire and costly galleries for the ladies and other. At the which martiall enterpryse, king Edward himselfe with his nobility was present. The first day being the Thursday next after Corpus Christi day, they met together with sharpe speares, and departed with equal honour. The next day they turneyed on horse backe, the Lord Scales horse had on his chafron a long sharpe pike of Steele, and as the two champions coaped together, the same horse thrust his pike into the nostrils of the bastards horse, so that for very paine he mounted so high, that he fell on the one side with his master, and the Lord Scales rode about him with his sword downe in his hand, till the king commaunded the marshall to helpe by the bastard, who openly said, I cannot holde me by the cloude, for though my horse faile me, I will not faile my encounter-companion, but the king would not suffer them to do any more that day. The next morning, the two noble men came into the field on foot, with two poleaxes, and fought balliantly, but at the last the point of the pollaxe of the Lord Scales happened to enter into the sight of the bastards helme, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knees: but the king suddenly cast downe his warder, and then the marshall severed them. The bastard not content with this chance, required the king of Justice, that he might performe his enterpryse: the Lord Scales refused not: but the king calling to him the constable & the marshall, with the officers at armes, after consultation had, it was declared for a sentence definitiue, by the Duke of Clarence then constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk then marshall, that if he would go forward with his attempted chalenge, he must by the law of armes, be deliuered to his aduersary, in the same state and like condition, as he stood when he was taken from him. The bastard bearing this iudgement, doubted the issue of the matter, and so relinquished his chalenge. Other chalenges were done, and balliantly achieved by the Englishmen, which I passe over. Shortly after came sorrowfull things to the bastard, that his father Duke Philip was dead, and thereupon taking his leaue of king Edward, and his sister the new Dutches of Burgoigne liberally rewarded, returned to his brother the new Duke. This yere diuers persons being common Trowes, such as at Assises were forsworne for rewards, or fauour of parties, were indged to ride from Selwgate to the pillory in Cornhill with miters of paper on their heads, and then againe to Selwgate: and this iudgement was giuen by the Sheres of London.

Charles Duke of Burgoigne desirous to see his new wife, wrote to king Edward, requiring him to send his sister ouer vnto him, according to the commandments passed betwene them.

King Edward on the other side not lacking the matter, first called a Parliament, which began at Westminster on the eight of May, wherein was granted two sixtines and a dismy.

Parliament at Westminster.

The 18. of June Margaret sister to king Edward the fourth, beganne her journey from the Wardrobe in London, toward her marriage with Charles Duke of Burgoigne: first she offered in the Church of Saint Paul, and then rode through the City, the earle of Warwick riding beside her, with earles and barons a great number, the Dutches of Norfolk, with other ladies and gentlewomen in great number. And at her entry into Cheap, the Sheres of London and his brethren the Aldermen presented her with a paire of rich basons, and in them an hundred pound of gold, and that night she lodged at the Abbey of Stratford, where the king then lay: from thence she toke her journey to Canterbury. The king riding after to see her shipping, on the first of July she toke the sea at Margate, and there toke leaue of the king her brother, and departed. There returned back again with the king, the Duke of Clarence, the Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of Warwick, Shrewsbury, & Northumberland. And there abode with her in the ship, the Lord Scales, the Lord Daeres chamberlaine, sir John Woodville, sir John Howard, and many other famous Knights and Esquires: she was shipped in the new Ellen of London, and in her naup the John of Spelwicke, the Mary of Salisbury, and many other royall ships, and on the morrow landed at Sluce in flanders, and as soon as her ship and company of ships were entred into the haven, there receiued her sir Simon de Lelien & the water bailly, in diuers boats & barks apparelled ready for her landing. The first estate that receiued her was the Bishop of Stright wel accompanied, & the countesse of Hozne bastard daughter to Duke Philip of Burgoigne, & with her many ladies & gentlewomen, and so proceeding in at the gate of the towne, the same towne was presented to her, she to be soueraigne lady thereof: also they gaue her 12. markes of gold Troy waight, the which was 200. pound of English money, and so she proceeded through the towne to her lodging, every householder standing in the street with a torch in his hand burning.

On

On the morrow the olde Dutches of Burgoigne came to her, accompanied with many great estates. On the thirde of July came the Duke of Burgoigne to Salace with twentie persons secretly, and was there openly affianced to the Lady Margaret, by the bishop of Salisbury and the Lord Scales, in presence of the Lord Dacre, the Dutches of Norfolk, the Lady Scales, and all the knights, Esquires, and Gentlewomen environing the chamber.

On the eight of July being Saturday, by the Duke of Burgoignes appointment, the Lady Margaret removed by water to the Dame. And on the Sunday in the morning betwixt five and six of the clocke, the marriage was solemnized betwixt them by the Bishops of Salisbury and of Turney, there being present the olde dutches of Burgoigne, the Lord Scales, the Lord Dacre, with the knights, Esquires, Ladies and Gentlewomen that came out of England: the great triumphs, feasting, the wes of pagants, with other strange deuises and iustings, were such as I haue not read the like, and would beouer long in this place to set downe.

In the ende of August the Castell of Harlow was won by the assault of the Lord Herbert, the which Castell was one of the strongest holdes in Wales.

This yere many murmurous tales ranne in the City between the Earle of Warwicke and the Quenes blood, the which Earle was euer had in great fauour of the commons of this land, by reason of the exceeding house hold which he daily kept in all countries where euer he sojourned or lay: and when he came to London, he held such an house, that sixe Oren were eaten at a breakfast, and every Lanerne was full of his meat, so: who that had any acquaintance in that house, he should haue had as much sodden and rost as he might carpe upon a long dagger.

This Duke of Clarence went to Calais, and there wedded Isabell one of the daughters of the Earle of Warwicke. Sir Iohn Coniers knight, Robert Hilliard, who named himselfe Robin of Riddale, and other, gathered an host of 2000. men in the North, against whom king Edward sent W. Herbert late made Earle of Pembroke, with 18000. Welchmen, and Humfrey Stafford of Southwicke, late made Earle of Deuon, with 6000. good archers, which two Carles falling out for lodging in the towne of Banbury, Humfrey Stafford departed with his power, whereby G. Herbert and Ric. Herbert his brother were overcome and taken by them of the north, and 5000. (saith Hall) of the Welchmen slain in a plaine called Dances more nere to the towne of Edgercote, thre miles from Banbury, the 26. of July. The men of name slaine of the Welch party, were sir Roger Vaughan knight, Henry ap Morgan, T. ap Richard Vaughan Esquire, W. Herbert of Brecknocke Esquire, Warkin Thomas sonne to Rog. Oliuer Audley Esquire, Th. Wakes sonne and heire to W. Mallery Esquire: Richard Woodville Lord Riuers with Iohn his sonne were taken in the forefront of Deane, and brought to Southampton, where they with sir W. Herbert and Richard his brother were all foure beheaded by the commaundement of George Duke of Clarence and the Earle of Warwicke. T. Herbert was slain at Bristow. T. Stafford was by the commons taken at Bidge water and beheaded. King Edward was taken at Alnag, a village beate Southampton, by the Archbishop of Yorke, and brought to Warwicke Castell, and thence to Yorke, from whence by false promises he escaped, and came to London.

The 29. of September, Humfrey Newill knight, and Charles his brother were taken by the Earle of Warwicke, and beheaded at York, king Edward being present. In the moneth of March, the Lord Willoughby, Rich. Lord Wels, sir Robert his sonne, sir Tho. Delaband, sir Tho. Dimocke the kinges Champion, came out of Lincolnshire sir Tho. Burgh a knight of the kings house, pulled downe his place, and toke all his goods and cattell, and with 30000. of the commons, cried king Henry. King Edward gaue Lord Wels his pardon, and sent for him, and hauing him in custody, commaunded him upon paine of death, to cause the Lincolnshire men to lay downe their best, and so he wrote, but all in vaine: whereupon the Lord Wels his head was cut off. King Edward dispersed the Lincolnshire men with his ordinance, and slae many of them: sir Robert Wels, sir Thomas Delaband, & sir Thomas Dimocke were taken and beheaded before Stamford the 13. of March: and the 19. day the Lord Willoughby was beheaded at Doncaster.

King Edward coming to Hampton, caused Iohn Tiptoft Earle of Worcester (and Constable of England for terme of his life) to sit in iudgement upon Clapham, and other Gentlemen taken in the ships, at a skirmish of Southampton, where to the number of twenty persons gentlemen and peomen were hanged, hanged and beheaded: and after hanged by the legs on a gallows of a paire of butts long, and then haining flukes put in their fundaments, their heads were set on those flukes (an horrible spectacle) and so suffered to hang a long time after, to wit, till the 15. of May. The Duke of Clarence, and the Earle of Warwicke fled into France, where they made a marriage betwixt Prince Edward sonne to king Henry the first, and one of the Earle of Warwicks daughters. At this marriage was concluded, that king Henry should raigine againe, and Prince Edward after, and so: lacke of their heires George Duke of Clarence, and his heires, &c.

The 13. day of September, George Duke of Clarence, Iasper Earle of Pembroke, Richard Earle of Warwicke, the Earle of Oxford, with the barons Fauconbridge, and many other arrived at Plymouth, and another host at Dartmouth, of whom the Earle of Pembroke went into Wales, the other toward Exeter, proclaiming in the name of King Henry, that all men betwixt the ages of 16. & 60. should be ready to assist the said Lords on the behalfe of King Henry, against King Edward. and proves, that Henry was true and lawful king of England, and not king Edward. Moreover, the Marques Mountacute, who had gathered a five thousand men in king Edwards name, and was come hère unto the said Edward, he told them how king Edward had served him: first, making him Earle of Northumberland, and after giving the same earldome to Thomas Percy, made him marques Mountacute, allowing him a pices neck to maintaine it withal: wherefore he would leave to serve him, & take part with the Earle of Marwick his brother. Whereof when king Edward understood, he fled from his host, besides Nottingham, and the third day of October, he with the Lord Rivers, Lord Hastings his chamberlaine, the Lord Say, and other to the number of seven or eight Carles, took shipping at Lin, and sailed to ward the Duke of Burgoigne his brother in law.

The Quene had before that, to wit, on the first of October stole secretly in the night out of the Tower of London by water to Westminster, and there taken sanctuary. This time was great watch kept in the City of London: for the Kentishmen had assembled themselves in great companies, and so had come to the outer part of the Citie, as to Ratclif, Saint Kathrines, Southwarke, and other the suburbs, and many of them were entred the citie, where they robbed the Flemmings at Blanchapleton, and other places, making them to flee out of the citie with sorrow ynough.

On Wendesday following, the tower of London was yielded to the Duke and his brethren the Aldermen, who forthwith entred the same, and delivered king Henrie of his imprisonment, and lodged him in the Kingles lodging. On the Friday following came to London the Archbishop of Yorke, brother to the Earle of Marwick, the lord Bishop of Saint Johns, and other to the number of two thousand men of armes. On the morrow following, came the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Marwick, the bassarde Fauconbridge, with other to the number of foure thousand men. On the first day of October the duke of Clarence, the Earle of Marwick, the archbishop of Yorke, the lord of Saint Johns, with other entred the tower of London, and king Henrie being there prisoner nigh the space of nine yeres, they elected him to be their lawful king, and forthwith rode with him through London to the Bishoppes pallace, where hee rested till the 13. of October, on which day hee went a procession crowned in Pauls Church: the Earle of Marwick bare his traine, and the earle of Orford his sword, &c.

King Edward was proclaimed usurper of the crowne, and John Tiptoft earle of Worcester being found in the top of an high tree in the foreest of Waibridge in the county of Huntington, was brought to London at parliament arrested and condemned to death by sir John Vere earle of Orford, and beheaded at the tower hill, and after buried at the Blackfriars.

Quene Elizabeth wife to Edward the fourth, being in the sanctuary at Westminster, was delivered of a prince on the fourth of November, who was after king Edward the fifth.

there the Earle of Orford his brother put them off, and after hee landed soze weather-beaten at Ravenspoyne, within humber on Holderness, and there rose on him Holborne sicke me, whose captaine was sir John Wetterdale a priest, after cast into the Bartholmea at London. As king Edward passed the country, he showed the earle of Northumberland's letters and scale, that sent for him, saying, that he came to claime no title of the crowne, but only his dukedome of Yorke, nor would not have done afoze, but at the erecting of the earle of Marwick, & cried in every place, king Henry, & prince Edward, wearing an Erich leather ynlince Edwards livery. King Edward came to Nottingham, where sir William Stanley, sir William Norris, and divers other brought him men, so that hee had then 4000. or more. Then Edward marched toward Leicester, where the earle of Marwick and marques Mountacute had 4000. men, and would have fought with king Edward, but that hee had received letters from the Duke of Clarence, that he should not fight untill he came. Whereupon hee keeping Leicester still, suffered Edward to march toward London. A little out of Marwick the duke of Clarence with 7000 men meeting with king Edward, agreed to him and bade al the promises made in France. King Edward coming to London, by master Walslake the Recorders means, and others, entred into the bishop of Londons palace by a posterne, and there took king Henry and the archbishop of Yorke, and sent them both to the tower on Saunday thursday.

The Earle of Marwick, the Duke of Excester, marques Mountacute, and the earle of Orford, with many knights, came with their host toward Barnet: wherefore king Edward took king Henry with him, and procured the towne of Barnet all the night: the Earle of Marwick and his retinue remained on the plaine without the towne, shooting guns one at the other. And in the morning being Easter day, and the 14. of Aprill, they fought in a thicke mist from fower of the clove in the morning til ten, and divers times the earle of Marwick's men supposed that they had got the victory of the field, but it happened that the earle of Orford's me had a flag with streames both before and behind on their liveries, and king Edwards men had the sun with streames on their livery: whereupon the Earle of Marwick's men, by reason of the mist not well discerning the badges so like, shot at the Earle of Orford's men that were on their owne part, and then the earle of Orford and his men cried treason, and fled with eight hundred men. The marques Mountacute was piously agreed with Is. Edward, and had gotten on his livery, but one of his brothers the Earle of Marwick's men elpping this, fell upon him and killed him.

The earle of Marwick seeing his brother dead, and the Earle of Orford fled, leapt on a horse to fly, and committing to a towpe where was no passage, two of king Edwards men came to him, killed him, and spoiled him to the naked skin. Sir William Tyrrell knight was killed on the earle of Marwick's part. The Duke of Excester fought manfully and was disloyed, wounded, & left for dead from seven in the morning til fower of the clocke in the after-noon, and then being brought to a servants house of his there by

At this time Quene Margaret, and Prince Edward her sonne had lien on the sea 17. daies licted with foule weather, and on Caffer day at dawn they landed with their french Raup at Weymouth, and so came to Excester, from thence to Tewkesbury, and pitched their field by Seuerne. Edward the fourth being come from London, fought with prince Edward at Tewkesbury on the fourth of May, took Quene Margaret prisoner with prince Edward her sonne, whom cruelly he smote on the face with his gantlet, and after his servants due him, Edmond Duke of Somerset, and sir Hugh Courtney fled from Prince Edward & lost him the field. There was slain Courtney Earle of Devonshire, Lord John of Somerset, Lord Wenlocke, sir Edmond Hamden, sir William Whittingham, sir William Vaus, sir Nicholas Harwic, sir John Deluis, sir William Filding, sir John Leukenor, sir VV. Lirmonth, sir John Viman, sir T. Seamer, sir VV. Rowle, sir Thomas Henry. King Edward entring a Church in Tewkesbury with his sword drawn, a Priest brought the sacrament against him, and would not let him enter untill he had granted his pardon to these that follow: Edmond Duke of Somerset, John Bouge Strother Lord of Saint Johns, sir Humfrey Audley, sir Geruis of Clifton, sir VVilliam Grimesby, sir VVilliam Carie, sir Henry Rose, sir Thomas Trefham, sir VVilliam Newbrough, knights, Henry Trefham, VValter Courtney, John Florie, Lewes Miles, Robert Jackson, James Gower sword bearer to Prince Edward, James Deluis sonne and heire to sir John Deluis: all these, where they might have escaped, carried in the Church (trusting in the kings pardon) from saturday till monday, when they were taken out and beheaded.

About this time sir VValter VVroile, and sir Geoffrey Gates knights, governors of Calais, sent sir George Broke knight from Calais with three hundred soldiers, to Thomas the bassard Fauconbridge, Captaine of the Earle of Marwicks garrison, willing him to raise the countie of Kent, and to go to London, there to take king Henry out of the Tower, and then to go against King Edward.

ny of shipmen, and other of Essex and Kent, came to London, where being denied passage through the city, he set upon Bishopps gate, Aldgate, London bridge &c. along the Thames side, shooting arrows and guns into the city, fired the suburbs, and burnt more than 60. houses, wane the ballworks at Aldgate, and entered the city, but the porteclose being let down, such as had entered were slain, and then the citizens pursued the rest so far as Stratford and Blackwall, slaying many, and took many prisoners. Thomas the bassard went from London westward, as far as Ivingstone upon Thames, to prosecute B. Edward, but the Lord Scales, with Nicholas Faunt Prior of Canterbury, by faire words caused Fauconbridge to returne to Blackheath in Kent, from whence in the night he stole from the host with 600. horsemen to Rochester, and so to Sandwich, where he abode the kings coming.

The one and twentieth of May king Edward came to London with his tie house and men: and the same night king Henry was murdered in the Tower of London. On the morrow he was brought through Cornhill, from the Tower with a great companie of men bearing weapons as they should have led him to some place of execution, to St. Pauls church in London, in an open coffin bare faced, where he bled: thence he was carried to the Blacke Friers, and there bled: and thence to Chertsey Abbey in a bote, where he was then buried, but since by king Richard the third, in the second year of his reign, removed to Windsor, where hee was buried without the chancel, at the south doore of the quire of Windsor chappell, where he was worshipped by the name of holy king Henric: whose redde hat of velvet was thought to break the head of such as should put it on their heads, there he rested for a time, but now his tombe being taken thence, it is not (commonly) knowne what is become of his bodie.

Thus ended the king his transitorie life, having enjoyed as great prosperitie, as favourable fortune could afford, and as great troubles on the other side, as the frowning could power out: yet in both states hee was patient, and vertuous, that hee made bee a patterne of most perfect vertue, as hee was a worthy example of fortunes inconstancie: he was plaine, upright, farre from fraude, wholie given to prayer, reading of Scriptures, and almesdeeds, of such integritie of life, that the Bishop which had bene his confessor tenne yeres, touched that he had not all that time committed any mortal crime: So continent as suspicion of unchastitie never touched him: and having in Christmasse a flock of young women with their bare braides laid out, presented before him, he immediately departed; with these wordes, sir, for shame, forsooth you bee to blame: before his marriage hee liked not that women should enter into his Court, and for this respect hee committed his two brethren by the mothers side, Jasper and Edmond, to most honest and vertuous Prelates, to bee brought up. So farre hee was from covetousnesse, that when the executors of his uncle the Bishoppe of Winchester, surname the rich Cardinall, would have given to him two thousand pounde, hee plainly refused it, willing them to discharge the will of the departed, and would scarcely condescende at length to accept the same summe of money

Wh he used none, but in most earnest matters these words: forsooth, and forsooth; he was so pittifull, that when comming from Saint Albons, hee saue the quarter of a traitour against his crowne ouer Cripple gate, hee willed it to be taken awate, with these wordes: I will not haue anie Christian so cruellie handled for my sake; manie greate offences hee willinglie pardoned, and recleuing at a time a greate blowe by a wicked man, which compassed his death, hee onlie saide, forsooth, forsooth, yea so folle to smite a king annointed so. Another also which thrust him in the shoe with a sword, when hee was prisoner in the Tower, was by him pardoned, when hee was restored to his state and kingdome: not long before his death, beeing demanded why hee had so long helde the Crowne of Englande vniuersitie, hee replied, my Father was King of Englande, and eitle enioying the Crowne all his Reigne, and his father my Grandfather was also King of Englande; and I, euen a Child in my Cradle, was proclaymed and Crowned King without anie interruption, and so helpe it fortie peeres well nere, all the States dooing homage unto mee, as to my Auncellores; wherefore I maie saie with King David: The Lord is fallen vnto mee in a faire grounde, yea, I haue a goodlie heritage, my helpe is from the Lord which sanctifieth the brighte in heart. Hee reigned eyght and thirtie peeres, ffre monethes and odde dayes. And after his redemption of the crowne nine monethes; he liued 52. yeres, hauing by his wife one onely son, called Edward Prince of Wales, deceased as ye haue heard; hee was of famly stature, of body slender, his face beautifull, of his owne naturall inclination, hee abhorred all the vices as well of the body as of the soule.

And now to returne to king Edward. At his comming to London, the Spaloz, Aldermen and other citizens meeting him one mile without the Citie, to witte, butwist Iffeldon, and soile ditch, in the high way hee made knights the se Aldermen, Sir Iohn Stokton Spaloz of London, Sir Ralph Verney, Sir Richard Lee, Sir Iohn Yong, Sir William Taylor, Sir George Ireland, Sir William Stocker, Sir Mathewe Philip, Sir William Hampton, Sir Thomas Stalbrok, Sir Iohn Crosby, Sir Bartlemew James, Sir T. O. Richard Yrwise, Recorder of London, all the he made knights, in reward of good seruice the Londoners had don to him. On the 24. day of May king Edward after he had made baronets, Sir Thomas Grey, Sir Richard Hastings, Sir Iohn Courtney, Sir Nicholas Latimer, Sir Ralph Hastings, Sir Roger Tegets, Sir Iohn Stanley, Sir Simon Mountfort, Sir Iohn Heningham, Sir William Stanley, &c. hee toke his tourney into Kent, with all his army following the bastard, and other his complices to suppress them, if they were in anie place assembled to resist him; but after they were once dispersed, they durst not shew their mielnes again in arms, those onelie excepted that were with: aunc vnto Sandwiche with the bastard, which for the more parte were mariners, an 8. or 9. hundred, with the he kept the town, hauing in the hauen 47. ships great and smal under his gouernment; but the 3. appoynting, they sent to him for pardon, which the king granted, and being being in the citie of Canterburie, he sent vnto Sandwiche his brother Richard duke of Gloucester, to receiue them to mercie, together with all the shippes, which they deliuered: whereupon king Edward not onlie pardoned the bastard, but made him knight, and Vice-admirall. The Lord Denham and Sir Iohn Fog, with other were left in Kent, to sit in iudgement of the rebels of Kent, Sussex, and Essex, whereof were a greate number punished by the Purse, some 200. marks, some 200. l. some more, some lesse. The king Edward returned out of Kent with much good, and little loue. Nicholas Fant Spaloz of Canterbury (that had serued the earle of Warwicke, and had of late perswaded the bastard to depart from his office, and diuers other of his countrey men) were hanged and quartered, and the heads of Spiling and Quinten were set vpon Albegate of London. On the 4. day of June, George Neuell archbishop of York, and brother to the late earle of Warwicke, and the Marques Mountacute, was deliuered out of the Tower of London, and discharged of his imprisonment.

The 1. of July Edward the son of king Edward, was made prince of Wales, duke of Lancaster, and earle of Cornewall.

In the month of September Thomas the barbarde Fauconbridge, was taken at Southampton by Richard Duke of Gloucester, hee was conueied to the Castell of Middleham in Yorkshire, and there beheaded, notwithstanding that hee had the kings pardon, his head was sent to London, and set on London bridge.

The 12. of December the lady Anne the kings sister, was disioined from Henry Holland duke of Excester, by meanes of her owne sute.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at Westminster, where hee with his quene on the same feast daie late crowned, and likewise on the Twelste daie the king was again crowned, and went on procession crowned, but the quene was not then crowned, because she was nere her time of deliuerance, but she went on procession with him; the king kept his estate in the White-hall, with his Prelates and noble estates, where also dwined the Spaloz of London, the aldermen, and manie of the wealthy citizens.

Embassadors sent into Burgundy.

This yere were sent Ambassadors from king Edward to the Duke of Burgoigne, who landed at Wylges on the 2. of April, where they were honorably received without the tolene by the lord Grancheuse.

The names of the Ambassadors were, Sir John Scot knight marshall of Caleis, master William Hatcliffe Secretarie to the king, master John Russell Doctor and Archdeacon of Warbshyre, master Richard Maron Archdeacon of London, Sir John Yong knight, and merchant of London, and Sir John Crosby merchant of London: on the 4. of April they were conveyed on horsebacke to the Dukes lodging, &c. They passed from thence to the Duke of Britaine, to haue gotten there the two earles of Penbryake and of Richmont.

Dorke spotted, and sent to prison.

George Neuill Archbishop of Dorke, being at Windsoze with king Edward on hunting, the king promised the Archbishop to come to the Spore (a place in Warbshyre, which the Archbishop had purchased and builded commodiously) there to hunt and make merrie with him, whereupon the Archbishop taking his leaue of the king, went home to his manor of the Spore, and there made great provision for the king, and sent for much plate that he had by, at the time of Barret and Tewkesburie feldes, and besides this, borrowed much of his friends, and puruised for the king for two or three daies meate, drinke, and lodging, as royally as hee coude: but the date before the king had promised to haue come to the Spore, the king sodainly sent for the Archbishop to come to Windsoze, where he was arrested of Treason, that he should helpe the earle of Arfozbe, and so sent to Caleis, and to Wames, where he continued long after prisoner: all which time the king kept the Archbishopricke in his owne handes. In this meane while Sir William Par knight, and Sir Thomas Vaughan Esquire, and other were sent to the Spore to seale all his goods for the king, which came there to the summe of 20000. l. and all other lordships and lands that the said Archbishop had within England, and all his stiffe and riches.

In Edward at this time brake the bishops miter, that had many rich stones, and made thereof a crowne for himselfe. Thomas Bylling chiefe Justice of the kings bench, and so continued till the first of Richard the third.

Also Sir Jo. Vere earle of Oxford, that had withdrawn himselfe from Warre, first into Scotland, after into France, then getting much goods on the Sea, landed in the West Country, and entred S. Michells Mount, with 77. men, the last of September, whereon he was, by the kings appointment, besieged by Bodrigan and other, but with such fauor, that the earle reituailed the Mount. Then was Richard Fortescue Esquire for the boote, and Sheriffe of Cornewall sent thither to continue the sieges, and king Edward sending pardons to the earles men, so long praied with them, that at the last if the Earle had not submitted himselfe to king Edward, he had bene taken of his owne men, and so Fortescue entering the Mount the 15. of februarie, found blood all pynough there to haue serued them till September after: John Vere earle of Arfozbe, the Lord Beaumont, two brothers of the said Earle, and Thomas Clifford were brought prisoners to the king. The earle of Arfozbe was sent prisoner to Swines, where he remained so long as this king reigned. 30 all all which time the Lady his wife might neuer come to him, or had any thing to lye vpon, but what people of their charities would giue her, or what she got by her needle.

In the moneth of September Lewis de Bruges Lord Granthuse, came into Englands from Charles Duke of Burgoigne, and on the thirtieth of October was created Earle of Winchester openlie in the Parliament chamber.

The first of October beganne a Parliament at Westminster by authority, whereby an aide was graunted to the king, towards the charge of his warres, which was leuied of mens landes, as well of Lordes as of other.

An. reg. 13.
Westminster.

The Duke of Burgoigne hauing great warres with the French king, sent Ambassadors into Englands to requyre king Edward his brother in laue to make warre on the French king, vnto the which request king Edward easily granted, because hee wished to be reuenged on the French king, as of his enemy, for aiding the Earle of Warwicke, Anne Margaret and her sonne Prince Edward, and their complices: whereupon he promised and also determined in the beginning of the next yere, to bryng a great armie ouer to Caleis, and to inuade the kingdome of France. And forthwith with all diligence prepared all thinges ready for his iourney, making many thiftes for the provision of money to serue his turne. And because the last yere great summes of money were granted him by the Parliament, he deuised this thifte, to call asoze him a great number of the wealthiest sort of the people of his Realme, and to them declared his neede, and the requisite causes thereof, hee demaunded of euerie of them some portion of money, which they stiked not to giue, and therefore the king willing to thewe that this their liberalitie was verie acceptable to him, hee called this grant of money, a Beneuolence, notwithstanding that many grudged thereat, and called it a Spenuolence: but the king bled such gentle meanes towarbes them for their assistance in his necessitie, that they could not otherwise doe, but frankly yelde and giue him competent sums, therewith he prepared a great armie.

This yere Henry Holland the Duke of Excester was found dead in the sea betwene Dover and Caleis, but howe he came there the certaintie could not be knowne.

King Edward hauing prepared his armie, led the same to Dover, from thence to crosse the seas to Caleis. The force that passed with him at this present was the greatest that euer came into France, most of them being horsemen, all in very good order well armed. All the nobles of the realme were there, a fewe excepted, they were sixtene hundred men of armes very well mounted, and the most of them barbed and richly trapped, after the manner of the French warres, and well accompanied with horsemen of their retinue, they were at the least sixtene thousand archers on horsebacke, and a great number of footemen and others, as well to pitch their tentes, thereof they were well furnished, as also to attend vpon their artillery, and inclose their campe, and in all their army they had not one pledge. Besides this, were 3000. Englishmen appointed to land in Byspaine.

When king Edward came to Dover, the duke of Burgoyne to helpe his passage, sent 500. Boates of Holland, and Zeland, called cutes, which are flatte and lowe, bulke therie commodiously for transporting of horses: but notwithstanding all this helpe they had from the Duke, and all the king of Englande coulde commande himselte, hee was aboute thre weekes in passing betwene Dover and Calcis, one ship of woe toke 2. or 3. of his small passengers. Before king Edward embarked, he sent from Dover to the king of France one Herault alone called Carter a young man borne, who brought a letter of defiance from the king of Englande, in verie good language, and so excellentlie well penned, that mine Authour was perswaded it was neuer Englishmans drawing. The contentes whereof were, that the King shoulde yelde unto him the realme of France, being his inheritance, to the end he might restore the cleargy and nobility to their ancient libertie, ease them of the great charges they sustained, and deliver them of the miseries they were in, which if he refused to do, he protested what great mischief should ensue thereof, in maner and forme as in such cases is accustomed. The king read the letter softly to himselfe, and afterwards all alone withdelve himselfe into a Wardrobe, and commanded the Herault to be brought to his presence, to whome he made this answer.

First, that he knew well that the king of Englande had not passed the seas of his owne free motion, but by the perswasion of the duke of Burgundie, and the communalitie of England.

Secondly, that the summer was now almost past, and that the duke of Burgoyne was returned from Spain, as a man discomfited and bitterlie vnturned of all things.

Thirdlie, as touching the Constable of France he knew well (he said) that the intelligence with the king of England, because he had married his niece: but would deceiue the king his master as he had him, notwithstanding all the great benefites that he had receiued of him, which hee then rehearsed, adding therunto, that the saide Constable mente to liue in continuall dissimulation, and entertaine euerie man to make his profite of him.

At last of all, he alledged to the Herault diuers reasons to perswade the king his master to peace, and gaue him with his owne hand 300. crownes, promising him a thousand more if the peace were concluded: further openly he gaue him for a present, a goodly peece of crimson velvet of thirtie els. The Herault answered, that he would traue the best he could for peace, and thought the king his master would easilie be wonn therunto: but he willed the king of France, to send an Herault to the English campe to demand a safe conduct for certain Ambassadors, that hee would sende to the king of England, and to direct his letters to the Lord Howard, or to the Lord Stanley, and to himselfe also to conuerie his Herault. At one time in a maner both the king of England landed at Calcis, and the duke of Burgoyne departed from before Spain, who in great haste rid straight to Calcis, to the said king with a very small train, for he had sent his army to spoile the Countrey of Barrois and Lozaine. The king of England departed from Calcis in company of the duke, and passed through Boloigne, & from thence marched to Peronne, where the duke gaue the Englishmen but cold entertainment, for he caused the gates to be strightlie kept, and woulde suffer but fewe to enter, so that the greatest part of them lodged in the fields. After they were come to Peronne the Constable of France sent to the duke of Burgoyne one of his seruants, by whome he created himselfe for the withholding of S. Quincins, alleging that if he had restored it hee could haue stood him in no stead in the Realme of France, for he should bitterlie haue lost his credite and intelligence, but now seeing the king of England was come and in person, he promised to do hereafter all that the duke should command him, whereof the better to assure him, hee sent him a letter of credite to the declaration of the duke. Furthermore he gaue the duke his faith in writing, to serue and succor him, his friends, and confederates, as well the king of England as others, against all men none excepted.

The duke deliuered the king of Englande his letter, and all the matter of credite, adding somewhat thereto of his owne heade: for hee assured the king, that the Constable woulde deliuer into his handes, both Saynt Quincins, and all his other places, which the king easilie beleued, partlie because hee had married the Constables niece, and partlie because hee sawe him in so greate feare of the king of France, that hee thought hee durst not faile his promise made to the Duke and him: and the Duke beleued it also. But the Constable ment nothing lesse, for the feare hee was in of the French king was not so great that it could force him thus far, but he vied still his wonted dissimulation.

The king of Englande reioycing at this passage sente by the Constable, departed from Peronne with the duke of Burgoyne, towarde Saint Quincins, whereunto when hee approached, a greate bande of Englishmen ranne before, thinking that the Welles shoulde haue bene roong at their coming, and that the Citizens woulde haue receyued them with Trosse and Holle water, but when they drew nere to the Towne, the Artillerie shot, and the souldeors issued forth to the skirmish, both on horsebacke and on foote, so that two or thre Englishmen were slayne, and some taken: and in this state returned they in greate rage to their campe, murmuring against the Constable.

The next morning the duke of Burgondy would haue taken his leaue of the king of Englande to depart to his army in Barrois, promising to doe martialles in his fauor.

The French king sent a seruant of the Loyde Halles in the likeness of an Herault, with a coate made of a Trumpets Banner, to the English campe, where when hee came, hee was brought to a Tent, and after dinner talked with the king: his message was chiefeleie grounded upon the greate desire the king had of long time to bee in peace with the king of Englande, saying further, that since hee was crowned king of France, hee neuer had attempted anie thing agaynst the king of Englande or his Realme.

Secondlie, he excused himselfe, for receiuing in times past the earle of Warwick into his dominions, saying, that he did it only against the duke of Burgoyne and not him.

Further, he declared that the said duke of Burgoyne had for no other cause called him into France, but that by the occasion of his coming, he might conclude a better peace for himselfe with the king: and if happlie anie other furthered the matter, it was onely to amend the broken estate of their owne affaires, and for their owne private commoditie: but as touching the king of Englands good successe, they were altogether careless thereof. He put him also in minde of the time of the pére, alleading that winter approached, and likewise the great charges he sustained.

Lastly hee saide, that notwithstanding a great number in England desired warre with France, yet if the king of Englande incline to peace, the king for his parte would condescende to such conditions as hee doubted not but hee and his Realme would allowe of: Finally, hee demaunded a safe conduct for certaine Ambassadors, to come well enformed of his masters pleasure.

The king of Englande and part of his nobles liking these overtures very well, granted to the Heraulde of France, as large a safe conduct as hee demanded, and gave him foure Nobles of Golde for a rewarde. He also sent an English Heraulde with him to bring the like safe conduct. And in the next morning in a Village nere to Amience, the Commissioners of both Princes met, being these. For the king of France, the barons of Bourbon Admirall of France, the Lord of Saint Pierre, and the Bishop of Cureau, called Heberge: And for the king of Englande, the Lord Howard, one Challenger, and Doctor Morton. Many Articles of peace were treated of, but the last resolutions were these: That the French king should paie to the king of Englande presentlie before his departure out of France, seuentie thousand Crownes, that the Dolphin should marrie king Edwardes eldest daughter, and that she should haue the Duchie of Guien, for her maintenance, or five thousand Crownes yerele to be paid in the Tower of London, the space of nine yeres, which terme expired, the Dolphin should peaceably enjoy the revenues of the whole Duchie of Guien; and then the king of France to be cleerelie discharged of all payementes to the king of Englande. Further it was decreed, that the two Princes should meet together, and bee sworn to the treatie, which meeting was obserued in a Towne called Picquigny, on the 29. of August.

The king of England upon receit of his money, departed toward Calais in great hast, fearing the duke of Burgognes malice, and his subtiles.

At his departure he left for Hostages with the king of France, till his returne into England, the Lord Howard, and the master of his Horse called Sir Iohn Cheyne. King Edward toke Shipping at Calais, and landed at Dover, and was receiued on the Blackheath by the Maior of London and his brethren in scarlet, and 500. commoners, all clad in Spurre, and so conueied to London through the city to Westminster, on the 28 of September.

The

The French king to compasse his purpose for the getting of the Constable into his handes, toke truce with the Duke of Burgoyne for nine yeres, as a contractour in the league, and not as a Prince alle. King Edward of Englande aduertised hereof, sent ouer Sir Thomas Mountgomerie to the French king offering to passe the seas againe the next sommer to aid him, and to make warre on the duke of Burgoyne, so that the French king should paie to him 50000. Crownes for the losse which he should sustaine in his custome, by reason that the wooles of Calais, could haue no vent: and also paie halfe the charges, and halfe the wages of his souldiers and men of war. The French king thanked king Edward for his offer: but hee alleaged that the truce was already concluded, so that hee coulde not attempt anie thing against him, without reproch to his honor: so Sir Thomas Mountgomerie was with plate dispatched. Hee returned with him the Lord Howard, and Sir Iohn Cheyne, which were hostages with the French king, till the English armie were returned into England.

The eighteenth of Aprill, were inhaunted to the honor of knighthood, after the custome of England, in the time of peace, his eldest sonne Edward prince of Wales, Duke of Cornetwall, and earle of Chester, his seconde sonne the Duke of Yorke, and with them the earle of Lincolnes Sonne and heire, the Duke of Suffolke, the Lord Thomas Grey the quenes Sonne, and Richard his brother: the earle of Shrewsburie: the earle of Salisburie, Master Edward Woodville: the Lord Neill: the Lord Barkleys sonne and heire: the Lord Awdeles sonne and heire: the Lord Saint Amand: the Lord Stanley sonne and heire: the Lord Sturtons sonne and heire: the Lord Hastings sonne and heire: the Lord Ferrers of Chartleys sonne and heire: Sir Harbert brother to the earle of Denbome, Master Vaughan chiefe Judge: Littleton one of the Judges of the Common pleas, Master Bodringham, Master Brian Stapleton, Kneut, Pilkinton, Ludlow, Charleton, &c. The same daie the king created the lord Thomas Marques Dorset before dinner, and so in the habit of a Marques above the habite of his knighthood, he beganne the table of knights in Saint Edwardes Chamber. At that time hee ordained that the kings chamberlaine should go with the ancient and well nurtured knight to aduertise and teach the order of knighthood, to the squiers being in the baile. The king himselfe came in person and did honor to al the company with his noble counsell.

King Edward hauing established all things in good order, both within his Realme and without, was yet troubled in his mind, for that the earle of Richmond, one of the blood of king Henry the first on the mothers side, was alive, and at libertie in Bytaine: therefore he sent ouer to Francis duke of Bytaine, one Doctor Scillington, and other Ambassadors laden with no small sum of golde. These Ambassadors declaring their message, affirmed that the king their master, willed to haue the earle of Richmond onlie to ioine with him in alliance by marriage, and so to plucke vp al the remnants of discord, betwixt him and them of the contrary faction. The duke thought at the first, that king Edward would giue to the earle his eldest daughter the lady Elizabeth in marriage, he therefore consented to deliuer him, and receiued of the English quays a great sum of money.

money: but ere they were imbarqued with their pray, the Duke being advertised, that the Earle of Richmond was not so earnestly sought for, to be coupled in marriage with king Edwards daughter, as to have his head parted from his bodie with an axe, and therefore caused his treasurer Peter Landoyse to convey the said earle of Richmond into a sanctuary at S. Spalo, where the English Ambassadors then lay, shaping for a convenient winde: who complained that they were evill used to be spoiled both of their money and merchandise: yet because the matter was so handled, that it seemed the earle escaped into sanctuary through their owne negligence, after that they had received him, they were answered that the earle should be safely kept, either in sanctuary, or else as a prisoner in the Dukes house, and thus the king purchased for his money, the keeping of his money for a little time.

King Edward was somewhat displeased with the chance about the Earle of Richmond, but trusting that the D. of B.taine would according to promise keepe him from doing any grievance to him, put all doubts thereof out of his minde, and began to study how to keepe a liberall Princely house, and thereupon stoying his chylles with money he employed no small portion in good house keeping.

John Duke of Suffolke deceased, on the tuesday after the feast of St. Epiphane, the 15. of E. 4.

An. reg. 16.
Order of Saint Georges feast.

This yere King Edward kept the feast of St. George, and order of the Carter at Westminster in most royall manner, first on the saturday before none, the king being Soueraigne with the knightes of the order, entered the chapter within the castle, which Chapter was also continued in the afternoon, in this manner, towards evening time, being all mounted on horsebacke in their habites of blew, rode to the chapter, from whence they went to the quire on foot, where they remained while evening was done, and then rode againe to the Castle (in their habites as afoye) where they had their bolde of spices, &c.

On Sunday morning, the Soueraigne with the knightes rode to maffens, which being ended, they entered the chapter, from whence they went to the Deans house to breakfast, and after to the quire againe every man to his own stall. Then came the Quene with the Lady Elizabeth her eldest daughter, the Dutchesse of Suffolke the kings sister, the Lady Marchionesse of Montague, the Lady Marchionesse of Dorset, the lady Hastings, &c. all in one livery of murrey embordered with garters, except the Marchionesse of Montague, who rode in a gowne of like, and these Ladies were placed in the rowe last. And in the same order and habite came the Soueraigne, and knightes, with the Quene and her Ladies in the after none to evening. The King this day dined in his great chamber, on whose right hand sat Richard Bewchampe Bishop of Salisbury, Chancellor of the order, and on the left hand the D. of Clarence, and the D. of Suffolke. At a side table sat the Marquesse of Dorset, the Carles of Arundale, Northumberland, and Essex, the L. Maltravers, the Earle Douglas, the Lordes Dudley, Ferrers, and Howard, and Sir John Afceley knight all on one side. And at a table on the other side, sat Master Dudley Deane of Saint Georges chappell, and with him all on oneside, the Chanons of the same chappell in their mantles of murrey, and rundlet of S. George.

On the Sunday the Soueraigne and knightes of the order entered the chapter, where they had a host communication, from whence they went to the quire, where every knight stood before his stall while the king had offered a rich sute of vestments, and certaine coapes of the same sute, which the deane received: that done, the k. went to his stall, and every knight fate him downe in their owne stals, till the offertory, and then the Marques Dorset and the D. of Suffolke offered the sword of John Mowbray late D. of Suffolke deceased, the lords Maltravers and Howard, his helme: which being done, & obediace made, every knight rode before their stals, while the k. had offered, and then every knight offered according to his stall, to wit, the D. of Clarence, the Marques Dorset, the Duke of Yorke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Essex, and the D. of Suffolke, the Earle of Northumberland, the Earle of Douglas, the L. Maltravers, and the L. Howard, the L. Dudley, the Lord Ferrers, Sir John Afceley. The masse being ended, they went to the chapter, and thus the feast was ended, from the which were absent of the order out of the Realme, the k. of Sicely, the king of Portugale, the D. of Burgoigne, the D. of Erbin, the Lord Rivers, the lordes Scrope, the lordes Dursle. Absent within the Realme, the Prince, the D. of Gloucester, the Duke of Buckingham, the lord Hastings, and Sir William a Par.

This yere Charles D. of Burgundy was slaine by the Switzers, before the towne of Nancy in Lozaine, after whose death the French k. won all the townes which the said D. had holden in Picardy and Artois, and because the towne of Boloigne, and county of Bolongnos appertained by right of inheritance unto the L. Bertrane de la Toure Earle of Auvergne, the French king bought of him his right and title in the same, and recompensed him with other lands in the county of Fforest, and in other places. And because the forenamed towne and county were holden of the earldome of Artois, he changed the tenor, and allowed to holde the same towne and county of our lady of Boloigne, and thereof did homage in the great church of Boloigne, offering there an heart of gold, weighing 2000. crownes, obtaining further, that his heires and successors at their entrie into their estates, by themselves or their deputies, should offer an heart of like weight and value, as a reliefe and homage for the same towne and country.

This yere T. Burdet an esquire of Artois in Fflartowshire, son to Sir Nicholas Burdet (who was great butler of Henry in Henrie the sixts daies) was beheaded (as was said) for a word spoken, in this sort. k. Edw. in his progress hunted in T. Burdets park at Artois, and slew many of his dere, amongst the which one was a white bucke, whereof Th. Burdet made great account, & therefore when he understood thereof, he wished the bucks head in his belly that moved the king to kill it. Which tale being told to the king, Burdet was apprehended and accused of treason, for wishing the bucks head bores all in the kings belly.

belly. This was the report, and true it is (though some have said the contrary) that there was a park at Arrow; for king Edward the third, in the seventh year of his reign, gave licence to Rob. Burdet to inclose his wood of Arrow into his park (as appeareth by patten in record). And the Record also telleth that the said Thomas Burdet was accused of poisoning, for certe and inchantment, for the which he was attained, by parliament condemned, drawn from the Tower of London to Tiboyne, and there beheaded, and then buried in the Grey Friars church at London. This Thomas Burdet (by licence obtained of Edward the fourth in the twelfth year of his reign) alienated his lands from his eldest sonne, and true heire, to others at his pleasure, whereof he after soze repented him: And being drawn from the Tower toward his ende (as is afore shewed) sleeping his said eldest sonne in west Cheape, over against the hospitall of Thomas Becker, he procured himselfe to be stoned, and there asked his sonne forgiveness, confessing himselfe grievouslie to have offended God, in wronging him of his inheritance, which he toke to be the cause that God had so justly plagued him, by the princes pleasure, to come to such an ende.

The 15. of January king Edward the fourth solemnized the matrimoniall feast of his son Richard the Duke of Yorke, and the Lady Anne daughter and sole heire to John Mowbray Duke of Norfolk with great solemnitie. By which marriage, the said Richard was created Duke of Yorke and Norfolk, Earle marshall, Warren and Nottingham.

Parliament
at Westminster.
At which the attendants of
Clarence.

The 16. day of January began a Parliament at Westminster, wherein George D. of Clarence king Edwards brother, was attained of treason: In the which attainder (which I have read) is declared, that the said George Duke of Clarence, against the king his soveraigne Lord, had caused divers his servants to informe the people, that Thomas Burdet his servant (which was lawfully and truly attainted of treason) was wrongfully put to death. To his servants of such disposition he gave large sums of money, venison, &c. therewith to assemble the kings subjects, to feast them, and then to induce them to beleeve, that the said Burdet was wrongfully executed. He also by such servants, laboured to make the people beleeve that the king wrought by sorcery, magicke, and used the craft to poison his subjects, such as him pleased, to the great dishonour of the king, and incouraging his subjects against him. And over that, the said D. being in full purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the regallie and crowne of England, and secretly in opinion to put aside from the same for ever, the king and his heires, upon one the falsest and most unnaturall coloured pretence that man might imagine, falsely and untruly published, that the king was a bastard, and not legitimate to reigne. And to continue this his most malicious and traitorous purpose after this seditious language among the people, he induced divers of the kings natural subjects to be sworn upon the blessed sacrament, to be true to him and his heires, none exception reserved of their allegiance: and after the same oath made, he shewed to many, that the king had taken his kinde from him, and his men were dishonoured, ted, but he would endeavour to get them their inheritance, as hee shoulde do his owne: hee shewed also, that the king intended to consume him, in like sort as a candle consumeth in burning, whereof hee would in briefe quite him. And over this, the said Duke got an exemption under the great seale of Henry the first late king, wherein was contained, that if the said Henry and Edward his sonne died without issue male, that the said Duke and his heires shoulde be kings, &c. Thus much for his attainder.

An. reg. 18.

And on the 11. of March, after hee had offered his owne masse penie in the tower of London, hee made his ende in a beddell of apoplexie, and was after buried at Ewbury, by his wife sometime daughter to the Earle of Warwick, which being with child died of poison but a little before him.

Duke of Clarence put to death.

This George Duke of Clarence left behind him two young infants begot on his wife, the daughter of Richard earle of Warwick, which children succeeded their ancestors in semblable evil chance: for Edward his heire, whom king Edward had created earle of Warwick, was 14. years after in the time of Henry the 7. attained of treason, and on the tower hill lost his head: And Margaret his sole daughter, married to sir Richard Pole knight, and by Henry the 8. restored to the earldome of Salisbury, was attained 62. years after her father had suffered, and was in the tower beheaded: in whose person died the surname of Plantagenet. This year was a great mortality and death of the pestilence, not onlie in London, but in divers partes of the realme, which began in the latter end of September, in the year last before passed, and continued all this year till the beginning of November, which was about 14. monethes, in the which space died innumerable of people in the said citie and else there.

Great pestilence.

William Grey bishop of Ely deceased at Downham, and was buried at Ely, betweene two pillars of marble: he gave much money toward the reparation of the great steeple at Ely, John Morton doctor of the civill lawe succeeded him in that Bishopricke.

This year king Edward more then hee was accustomed, began to search for the feitures of penall lawes and statutes, as well of the chiefe of his nobilitie, as of other gentlemen, being proprietors of great possessions; and abundantly furnished with goods, likewise of merchants, and other inferior persons: by reason whereof, it was of all men judged that he would prove hereafter a soze and rigorous prince among his subjects: but this his new invented practise, and comons meaning (by reason of foraine affaires, and ablygement of his daies in this transitory life, which were within two years after consumed) toke some but no great effect.

An. reg. 19.
Penall lawes & statutes looked to.

This year king Edward began to keepe his feast of Christmas nativitie at Woking, but at five daies end removed from thence to Greenwich, where he kept out the other part, with great roialtie.

The 22. of February, notable theures were put to death at London, for robbing of Churches and other places, especially the Colledge of S. Martinie grand in London, for the which three of them were drawn to the tower hill, and there hanged and bent, the other two were pressed to death.

Church robbers hanged, burned, and pressed to death.

Ambassadors were sent to and fro betwixt the kings of England and of France.

An. reg. 20.

France, and still the French king fed the king of England with faire words, putting him in hope to match his sonne and heire the Dolphin with the Lady Elizabeth daughter to king Edward, according to the conclusions of agreement had and made piously betwixt them, although in very deede hee meant nothing lesse: his embassadours ever made excuses if any thing were amisse, and he vied to send change of Embassadours, so that if those which had bene here afore, and were returned, had saide, or promised any thing (though they were authorized so to do) which might turne to their masters hinderance, the other that came after mought excuse themselves by ignorance of that matter, affirming that they wanted commission once to talke or meddle with that matter, or if he perceived that any thing was like to be concluded contrarie to his minde, for a shift, he would call his Embassadours home in great haste, and after send an other with new instructions, nothing depending on the old. Thus the French king by cloaking his inward determinate purpose, with great dissimulation and large promises, kept himselfe in friendship with the king of England, til he had wrought a great part of his will against the young Dutches of Burgoyne, which is, Edward would not have suffered if hee had put any great doubt in the French kings faire promises, considering that the Crowne of France was in this meane time so much increased in dominions, to the great reinforcement of that Realme.

On the 9. of November was borne king Edwards third daughter, named Briget at Eltham, and was christened in the chappell there by the Bishop of Chichester.

James king of Scots sent into England Ambassage, for to haue the Lady Cicely king Edwards second daughter, to be married to his eldest son James Prince of Scotland, Duke of Rothesay, and Earle of Carlike. King Edward and his Councell, perceiuing that this affinitie should bee both honorable and profitable to the realme, did not onely grant to this his desire, but also before hand disbursed certaine sums of money, to the intent that the marriage should hereafter neither be hindered nor broken, with condition that if the said marriage proceeded not, then the proposall & merchants of the towne of Edenborough, should be bound for repayment of the saide summe againe. But King James was a man wedded to his owne will so much, that he could not abide any that would speake contrary to his fancie, by means whereof, diuers of the Nobilitie of his Realme were greatly troubled, amongst whom Alexander D. of Albany, brother to king James being criled into France, & passing through England, tarried with king Edward, and upon occasion moued him to make warre against his brother the saide king James, for that he forgetting his othe, promise and affinitie concluded with king Edward, caused his subsidies to make roades into the English borders. King Edward set on by the Duke of Albany determined to invade Scotland, with an armie: whereupon all the winter season hee mustred his men, rigged his shippes, and left nothing vnprovided for such a iourney, so that in the beginning of the yeare, all things for the warre was in a readinesse: towards the charges whereof, king Edward had borrowed many great sums of money, amongst other, the Citizens of London don granted him 5000. markes, which was repaid to them againe in the next yeare following.

King Edward appointed to be his chiefe taine of his host toward Scotland, and lieutenant generall, Richard Duke of Gloucester, and with him were appointed as associates, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas L. Stanley Lord steward of the kings house, the L. Louel, the L. Graystoke, and diuers other noble men, and worthy knights. These came to Alnethke in Northumberland about the beginning of the moneth of Iulie, where they marshalled their host: The forewarde was led by the Earle of Northumberland, vnder whose standard were the Lordes Scrope of Bolton, Sir John Middleton, Sir John Dickfield and other, and souldiers to the number of 6700. In the middle ward was the Duke of Gloucester, and with him the D. of Albany, the L. Louel, the L. Graystoke, Sir Edward Wooduile, and other to the number of 5800. The L. Neuil was appointed to follow with 3000. The Lordes Stanley led the wing on the right hand of the Dukes battell with 4000. men. The Lord Fitz Hugh, Sir William a Par, Sir James Harington with the number of 2000. guided the lefts wing. And besides these, 1000. to attend the ordinance. This royall armie came soaile by the water side to the towne of Berwikke, & entered the towne: but Earle Bothwell captaine of the Castle, would in no wise deliuer it: wherefore the captaines planted a strong siege round about it. The two dukes and all the other souldiers (except the Lord Stanley, Sir John Elington treasurer of the kings house, Sir William a Par and foure thousand men left to keepe the siege before the castle) departed toward Edenborough, and in marching bent many towne and castles. King James kept himselfe within the Castle of Edenborough. The Duke of Gloucester entered the towne, and at the speciall desire of the Duke of Albany, saued the towne, and the inhabitants from fire, blood, and spoile, taking onely such presentes as they offered to him and his captaines. The Lordes of Scotland lying at Haddington, on the second of August wrote to the Duke of Gloucester, requiring that the marriage betwixt the Prince of Scotland and H. Edwards daughter might be accomplished, according to the covenants: and further, that a peace from thenceforth might be concluded betwixt both realmes. The Duke of Gloucester answered, that for the marriage hee knew not his brothers pleasure, but hee required restitution of all the money pressed out in loane upon the same marriage: and for peace hee would agree to none, except the Castle of Berwikke might be to him deliuered. The Scots excused the matter touching the repayment of the money, for that the time of the contract of the saide marriage was not yet come: and as touching the Castle of Berwikke, they affirmed it to appertaine to the realme of Scotland as of olde inheritance. The same time the Archbishop of St. Andrews, the bishop of Dunkill, the Earle of Argyle, Lord Cambell, and Andrew Lord of Anandall Chancellor of Scotland, wrote to the duke of Albany a solemn instrument signed and sealed with their seales, concerning a gene-call pardon to him and his seruants upon certain condictions to be granted, & reasonable, that the duke of Albany willingly accepted of the same: but before he departed, he promised the duke of Gloucester to do and perforce all whatsoeuer before he had sworn, and promised to king Edward: and for performance hereof, he againe took a coppie; all othe, and sealed a writing at Lewington the third of August.

After he was restored, the Lords of Scotland proclaimed him lieutenant of Scotland: and not long after the castle of Berwick was delivered to the Lord Stanley and other, where the duke of Gloucester made Sir T. Molineux knight banneret. The duke of Albany also caused the prouost and burgesses of Edinburgh to become bound for the repayment of the money lent by king Edward, And then the duke of Gloucester returned to Sherebulton, &c.

King Edward so greatly favored William Harriot Spaloe of London, that he took him with certaine of his brethren the Aldermen, and Commoners of the cite of London, into the forest of Waltham, where was ordained for them a pleasant lodge of greene boughes, in the which lodge they dined, with grates there, and the king would not go to dinner til he saw them served. After dinner they went a hunting with the king, and slew many deere, as well red as fallow, whereof the king gave unto the Spaloe and his company good plenty, and sent unto the Ladie Spaloe and her sisters the Aldermens wives, two harts, six bucks, and a tunne of wine to make them merry with, which was eaten in the Waplers Hall.

King Edward held his feast of the natiuitie of Christ in his manor of Eltham, and kept his estate all the whole feast in his great chamber, and the Quene in her chamber, where were daily more then 2000. persons served.

The same yeere on Candlemas day, he with his Quene went on procession from St. Stephens chappell into Westminster hall, accompanied with the earle of Anguise, the Lord Grey and sir James Liddall Ambassadors from Scotland, and at his proceeding out of his chamber he made sir Richard Wood under treasurer of England, and sir William Catesby, one of the iudices of the Common place, knights.

Although king Edward reioiced much that his businesse was come to good conclusion with the Scots, yet he was not so disquieted in his minde towards the French king, whome hee now perceived to haue dallied with him, as touching the agreement of the marriage to be had betwixt the Dolphine and his daughter Elizabeth: for the Lord Howard being returned out of France, certified the king of his owne knowledge, that he being present, saw the Lady Margaret of Austria daughter to the duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperour Frederike, receiued into France with great pompe and roialtie, and at Ambros to the Dolphine contracted and espoused. King Edward highly displeased with such double dealing of the French King, called his nobles together, and opened unto them his griefes, who promised him for redresse thereof to be readie with all their powers, to make warres in France at his pleasure and appointment. But while he was busie in hande to make his puruiuaunce for warres thus against France, whether it was of melancholie and anger which hee had taken with the French kings doings, as it were by anie superfluous caret, to the which he was greatlie giuen, he so dainely fell sicke, and was so grievouslie taken, that he ended his life, as it were euen suddenly, at Westminster on the ninth daie of April, the yeere of Christ 1483. at the age of 41. yeeres, when hee had reigned 21. yeeres, one moneth, and odder daies, and was buried at Westminster, where he had before provided his resting place: for leaving the old chappel or college Church builded by king Henry the first, hee laid a newe foundation from the west end thereof, and builded the beautiful large newe chappell now frequented, almost to the roose, which the Lord Reginald Bray (with some small helpe of the knights of the order) after was finished. King Edward the fourth took from the college of Eaton, and the kings college in Cambridge, which king Henry the 6. had founded (saith sir Tho. Smith) almost 1000. pounds by yeere, and gaue to the colleges of Westminster: hee with sumptuous buildings repaired the castles of Spittingham and Dover, the Tower of London, the house of Eltham, and builded at Westminster.

Philip de Comineus writeth of the death of this king in manner following: Philip Comineus. I haue not sene (saith he) the late king of England Edward the 4. before of the house of York, bitterly destroy the house of Lancaster, under the which both his father and he had liued many yeeres: Further hee said, king Edward having done homage to king Henry the 6. being of the house of Lancaster, did he not afterward hold him prisoner many yeeres in the tower of London, where in the end he was murdered? I haue not sene also, the earle of Warwick, principal governor of all the said king Edwards offices (after he had put to death all his enemies, especiallie the duke of Somerset) in the end became deauble enemy to the king his master, gaue his daughter in marriage to the Prince of Wales son to sir Henry, attempted to set up againe the house of Lancaster, passed with the said prince into England, discomfited in the field and slain, both he and his brethren, and kinsmen, and diuers noblemen of England, who in time past had done the like to their enemies: After all this the children of these, when the world turned, reuenged themselves, and caused in like manner the other to die: which plagues we may be assured hapned not, but by the wrath of God. For after king Edward was quiet in his realme, and receiued payelle out of France 50000. crownes paid him in the tower of London, and was grown so rich, that richer he could not be, he died suddenly, as it were of melancholie, because of the French kings marriage with the lady Margaret the W. of Austries daughter, so in soone as he was aduertised thereof he fell sicke, and began then to perceive how he had bene abused, touching the marriage of his daughter, whome he caused to be called the Lady Dolphine. When also was the pension which he had receiued out of France taken from him, which he called tribute, although it were neither the one nor the other. Thus much out of Comineus concerning the death of Edward the fourth, who also affirmeth, that within his remembrance in the Citie warres of Englande died about 80. persons of the blood royal. King Edward left issue by Elizabeth his wife, two sons, Edward prince of Wales, and Richard duke of York; he, and three daughters, to wit, Elizabeth that after was Q. married to king Henry the seventh, Cicilie married to

King Edward, of that name the fourth, after that he had liued fiftie and thre yeres (it should bee fortie and one yeres) leauens moneths, and sixe daies, and thre of raigned two and twentie yeres, one moneth, and eight daies, died at Westminster the ninth day of April, the yer of our redemption a thousand foure hundred fourescore and thre, leauing much faire issue, that is to witte, Edward the Prince, of thirtene yeres of age: Richard W. of Boke, two yeres younger: Elizabeth, whose fortune and grace was afterward to be quene, wise vnto is. Henry the seventh and mother vnto the eight: Cicely, not so fortunate as faire: Briger, which representing the vertue of her, whose name she bare, professed and obserued a religious life in Wertsford, an house of close Nuns: Anne, that was after honourably married vnto Thomas then Lord Heyward, and after earle of Surrey: and Katherine, which long time toiled in either fortune, sometime in wealth, ofte in aduersitie, at the last, if this be the last, for then the liued, is by the benignitie of her nephew king Henry the eight, in very prosperous estate, and in this her birth and vertue.

people.

This noble Prince deceased at his palace of Westminster, and with great funeral honour and beaunetie of his people from thence conueyed, was enterr'd at Windsoze. A king of such gouernance and behauiour, in time of peace (for in war each part must needs be others enemye) that there was neuer any Prince of this land, at attaining the crowne by battell, so heartily beloved with the substance of the people: nor he himselfe so specially in any part of his life, as at the time of his death: which fauour and affection, yet after his decease by the crueltie, mischief, and trouble of the tempestuous world that followed, highly toward him more increased. At such time as he died, the displeasure of those that bare him grudge, for king Henries sake the first, whome he deposed, was well asswaged, and in effect quenched, in that, that many of them were dead in more than twenty yeres of his raigne, a great part of a long life: and many of them in the meane season growne into his fauour, of which he was neuer strange. He was a goodly personage, princely to behold, of heart courageous, politike in counsell, in aduersitie nothing abashed, by prosperitie rather topfall than prosperitie, in peace iust and mercifull, in warre sharpe and fierce, in the field bold and hardy, and in the lesse no further than wisdom would, aduenturous, whose wars were so well considered, bee shall no lesse commend his wisdom where he boynded, than his manhood where he vanquished. He was of visage lovely, of bodie mightie, strong, and cleane made: howbeit in his latter daies with ouer libell diet, somewhat corpulent and bowely, and in the lesse not vncomely: he was of youth greatly giuen to fleshy wantonnesse; from which, health of body in great prosperitie and fortune, without a speciall grace hardly refrained.

This fault not greatly grieved the people: for neither could any one mans pleasure stretch and extend to the displeasure of very many, and was without violence, and ouer that, in his latter daies lesse and well left. In which time of his latter daies, this realm was in quiet and prosperous estate, no feare of outward enemies, no war in hand, nor none toward, but such as no man looked for: the people toward the prince, not in a constrained feare, but in a willing and loving obedience: among the miseries, the commons in god peace. The lords whom he knew at variance, himselfe in his death bed appeared: he had left all gathering of money (which is the only thing that with a wealth the parts of Englishmen from the Prince) nor any thing intended to be taken in hand, by which he should be giuen thereto: for his tribute out of France he had before obtained: and the yere foregoing his death, he had obtained Berwick. And albeit, that all y time of his raigne he was with his people, so benigne, so courteous, and so familiar, that no part of his vertues was more esteemed: yet the condition, in the end of his daies (in which many princes by a long continued soveraigntie, decline into a proud port from debonaire behauiour of their beginning) maruellously in him grew and increased: so far so, that in summer the last that euer he saw, his highnesse being at Windsoze in hunting, sent for the mayo: and aldermen of London, to him for none other errand, but to haue them hunt and be merry with him, where he made them not so statly, but so friendly and so familiar cheare, and sent venison from thence so freely into the city, that no one thing in many daies before, gat him either mo harms or moze harp fauour amongst the common people, which oftentimes moze esteeme and take for greater kindnes, a little courtesie, than a great benefit. So deceased (as I haue said) this noble king, in y time, in which his life was most desired: whose loue of his people, and their entire affection toward him, had bin to his noble children, (hauing in themselves also as many gifts of nature, as many princely vertues, as much goodly towardnes as their age could receive) marvellous forresse and sure armor, if diuision & dissention of their friends had not harmed them, and left them destitute, and the execrable desire of soveraigntie prouoked him to their destruction, which if either kind or kindnesse had holden place, must needs haue bene their chiefe defence. For Richard the W. of Gloucester, by nature their vnckle, by office their protectour, to their father beholden, to themselves by othe and allegiance bounden, all bands broken that binden man and man together, without any respect of God or the world, vnaturally contrived to decrease them, not only of their dignitie, but also their liues.

But

But forasmuch as this dukes demerito ministereth in effect all the whole matter whereof this Duke shall entreat, it is therefore convenient, some what to shew you ere we farther go, what manner of man this was, that could find in his heart so much unchastite to conceive.

Richard duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by war, but by law to challenge the crowne, putting his claime into þe parliament, where his cause was either for right or fawre so farre forth advanced, that king Henry his blood (albeit he had a goodlie prince) bitterlie reieced, the crowne was by authority of parliament entailed to the duke of Yorke and his issue male in remembrance, immediately after the death of king Henry. But the duke not tarrying so long to tarrie, but intending under pretext of dissention and debate arising in the realme, to prevent his time, and to take upon him the rule in king Henry his life, was with many nobles of the realme at Wakefield slaine, leaving 3. sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard. All three as they were great States of birth, so were they great and sturte of stomache, growp and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners: Edward reuenging his fathers death, deploied king Henry, and attained the crowne: George duke of Clarence, was a goodlie noble prince, and at all points fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enuie of his enemies his brother against him. For were it by the queene and lords of her blood which highly maligned the kings kinred (as women commonly not of malice, but of nature hate them whome their husbands loue) were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be king: at leastwise heinous treason was there laide to his charge, and finally, were he faulty, were he faultles, attained was he by parliament, and indged to death, and therupon hastily brotween in a But of malice, whose death is Edward (albeit he commanded it) when he list it was done, pittiously bewailed, and sorrowfully repented.

Richard the 3. son, of whome we now entreat, was in wit and courage equal with either of them, in body and prowesse far vnder them both, little of stature, ill featured of limbs, crooke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard favoured of visage, and such as is in states called warrelly, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth cruel toward. It is for truth reported, that the dutchesse his mother had so much adoe in her trauell, that she could not bee deliuered of him vncut, and that hee came into the world with the fate for warde, as men bee borne outwarde, and (as the same runneth) also not untouched, whether men of hatred report about the truth, or else that nature chaunged her course in his beginning, which in the course of his life many things unnaturalie committed. So euill Captaine was he in the war, as to which his disposition was more meetly, than for peace: sundry victories had he, and sometimes overthrowes, but neuer in default as for his owne person, either of hardinesse or politike order: free was hee called of dispence, and somewhat about his power liberal: with large gifts hee gat him vniuersall friendship, by which hee was sayne to pill and spoile in other places, and gette him stedfast hatred. He was close and secrete, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly complaisable

where he inwardly hated, not letting to kisse whom he thought to kill: dispiteous and cruel, not for euill will alway, but offer for ambition, and either for the surety or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was many what indifferent, where his advantage grew: he spared no mans death, whose life withstode his purpose. He slew with his owne hands king Henry the first, being prisoner in the tower, as men constantly said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, which would undoubtedly, if he had intended that thing, haue appointed that butcherly office to some other, than his owne boine brother.

Some wise men also wene, that his dytt couertly conueyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother of Clarence to his death: which he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, than he that were heartily minded to his wealth. And they that thus deme, thinke that hee long time in Edwards life, for thought to be king, in case that the king his brother (whose life he looked that euill died should shorten) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were yong. And they deme, that for this intent hee was glad of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must needs haue hindered him so intending, whether the same duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the yong king, or entered passed to be king himselfe. But of all this point, is there no certainty, & who so diuinely upon coniectures, may as well shewe too far as to short. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the selfe night in which Edward died, one Mistlebrooke long ere morning, came in great haste to the house of one Potter dwelling in red Crosse street without Cripplegate in London: and when he was with haste rapping quickly letten in, he shewed vnto Potter that king Edward was departed. By my truth man, quoth Potter, then will my master the duke of Gloucester be king. What cause he had so to thinke hard it is to say, whether hee being toward him, any thing knew that he had such thing purposed, or other wise had any inkling thereof: for he was not likely to speake it of nought.

But now to returne to the course of this history. Where it that the Duke of Gloucester had of old fore-minded this conclusion, and was now at erst therunto moued, and put in hope by occasion of the tender age of the yong prince his nephew (as opportunity and likelihood of speeche, putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certaine it is, that he contriued their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignity upon himselfe. And forasmuch as, he well list, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge & hart-burning betwene the queens kinred, and the kings blood, either partly enuying others authority, hee now thought their diuision should be (as it was indeed) a further beginning to the pursute of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might first, vnder the pretext of reuenging old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one partie, to the destruction of the other, and then winne to his purpose as many as hee could, and those that could not be won, might be lost ere they looked therefore: for of one thing was hee certaine, that if his intent were perceived, he should soone haue made peace betwene both the parties with his owne blood.

somewhat liked him: yet in his god health he somewhat the lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoeuer business should fall betwene them, himselfe should alway be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickness, when he perceived his natural strength so sore enfeebled, that he despaired al recovery, then he considering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted than that that happened; yet wel forseeing that many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discretion of themselves, and god counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for; their owne commoditie, and rather by pleasant aduise to win the themselves fauour, than by profitabill aduertisement to do his children good, he called some of them before him that were at variance, and in especiall the Lord Marques Dowlet, the quenes son by her first husband, & William the lord Hastings a noble man then lord Chamberlaine, against whom the quene specially grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him: and also for that she thought him secretly familiar with the king in wanton company. Her hinted also bare him sore, as well for that the king had made him captain of Calais, which office the Lord Riuer brother to the quene claimed of the kings former promise, as for diuers other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. When these lords with diuers of both the parties were come in presence, the king sitting by himselfe and vnder set with pillowes, as it is reported, on this wise saide vnto them:

My lords, my deere kinsmen and allies, in what plight I lie, you see, and I feele. By which, the lesse while I looke to liue with you, the more deeply am I moued to care in what case I leave you, for such as I leave you, such bee my children like to find you. Which if they should (that God forbid) find you at variance, might hap to fall the themselves at war, ere their discretion would serue to set you at peace: yee see their youth, of which I reckon the onely suretie to rest in your concord: for if I misseeth not, that all you loue them, if each of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulness happily would suffice; but children must be maintained by mens authoritie, & disper youth vnderpropped with elder counsell, which neither they can haue, but ye giue it; nor ye giue it, if ye graue not. For where each laboureth to breake that the other maketh, & for hatred of each of others person, impugning each others counsell, there must it needs be long ere any god conclusion go forward. And also while either party laboureth to be chiefe, flatterie shall haue more place than plaines and faithfull aduise, of which must needs ensue the euill bringing by of the prince, whose mind in tender youth infect, shall readily fall to mischief & riot, and dash down with his noble realme to ruine: but if grace turne him to wisdom, which if God send, then they that by euill means before pleased him best, shall after fall furthest out of fauour, so that euer at length euill dists dash to nought, and god plaines waies prosper. Great variance hath been long bin betwene you, not alway for great causes: sometime a thing right wel intended, our misconstruction turneth to toofe, or a small displeasure don vs, either our own affection or euill tongue agreeth. But this not I well, ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue of loue: that we be all men, that we be christian men, this shall I leave for preachers to tell you (yet I wot nere whether any preachers words ought more to moue you, than his that is by and by going to the place that they all preach of.) But this that I desire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my blood, the other of mine allies, & each of you with other either of kindred or affinity, which spirituall kindred of affinity, if the sacraments of Christs church beare that weight with vs, that would god they did, should no lesse moue vs to charity, than the respect of fleshy consanguinity. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the worse for the lesse cause that you ought to loue the better: and yet that hapneth, and no where find we so deadly debate, as among them, which by nature & law most ought to agree together. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition, Ambition. and desire of beinglorie and loweraignty, which among states where he once entreteth, creepeth forth so far, till with diuision and variance hee turneth all to mischief, first longing to be next the best, afterward equally with the best, and at last chiefe and aboue the best. Whiche immoderate appetite of towshtip, and thereby of debate & dissention, what losse, what sorow, what trouble hath within these few yeres growen in this realme, I pray God as well forget, as we wel remember. Which things if I could as wel haue foreseen, as I haue with my more paine than pleasure proued, by Gods blessed lady (that was euer his other) I would neuer haue won the courtie of mens knees, with the losse of so many heads. But such things passed cannot be gainelessly, much ought we the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken so great hurt afore, that we offenes fall not in that occasion againe. Now be those griefes passed, and all is God be thanked quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder your cousins my children, if God send them life, and you loue. Of which two things, the lesse losse were they, by whom though God did his pleasure, yet should the realme alway finde kings, and peraduenture as good kings: but if you among your selves in a childes reign fall at debate, many a god man shall perishe, and happily be to, and ye to, ere this land finde peace againe. Wherefore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speake with you, I exhort you and requite you all, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me: for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you: for the loue that our lord beareth to vs all, from this time forth ward all griefes forgotten, each of you loue other. Which I verely trust you will, if ye any thing easily regard, either God or your king, affinity or kindred, this realme your owne countrey, or your owne suretie. And the worse all the king no longer induring to sit by, laid him downe on his right side, his face toward them: and none was there present that could reframe from weeping. But the Lords recomforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence, as by their wordes appeared, each forgave other, and loyned their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their wordes) their hearts were far asunder. As some as the king was departed, the noble prince his son dash toward London, which at the time of his decease kept his household at Audolove in Wales, which countrey being far off from the law and recourse to iudice, was begun to be far out of god will, and warden to the robbers and reuers, walking at liberty vncorred.

And for this reason the prince was in the life of his father sent thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence, should restraîne enill disposed persons to the boldnes of their former outrages. To the gouernance and ordering of this young Prince at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthonie Woodville Lord Rivers, and brother vnto the Quene, a right honorable man, as valiant of hand, as polittike in counsell. Abloined were the re vnto him other of the same party, and in effect euerie one as he was next of kinne vnto the Quene, so was planted next about the Prince.

That blift by the Quene not vnwiselie deuised, whereby her blood might of youth be rooted in the princes fauour, the Duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction, and vpon that groundes set the foundation of all his unhappie building. For whome soeuer he percelued either at variance with them, or bearing himselfe their fauor, he brake vnto the, some by mouth, some by writing & secret messengers, that it was neither reason, nor in anie wise to bee suffered, that the young king their master and kinsman, should be in the hands and custody of his mothers kindred, sequestred in maner from their company and attendaunce, of which euerie one ought him as saythfull seruice as they, and manie of them far more honorable part of him then his mothers side. Whose blood (quoth he) sauing the kings pleasure, was full vnmetely to be matched with his: which now to be as who sale removed from the king, and the lesse noble to bee left about him, is (quoth he) neither honorable to his maiestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no suretie, to haue the mightiest of his friends from him, and vnto vs no little propable, to suffer our well proued enill willers to growe in our great authoritie with the prince in youth, namely which is light of belaise & some perswaded. We remember I trow king Edward himselfe, albe it hee was a man of age and discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then God either with his honour, or our profit, or with the commoditie of anie man els, except only the immoderat advancement of himselfe. Which whether they forer thirsed after their owne weale, or our too, it were hard I wote to gesse. And if some folles friendship had not holden better place with the king, then anie respect of kindred, they might peraduenture easilie haue betrapped and brought to confusion some of vs ere this. Why by not as easilly as they haue done some other already, as nere of his roiall blood as we? Vnto our Lord hath wrought his will, and thanks be to his grace that perill is past. Whobbeit as great is groweing, if we suffer this young king in our enemies hande, which without his witting might abuse the name of his commandement, to anie of our vndowing, which thing God and good prouision forbid.

Of which good prouision none of vs hath anie thing the lesse neede, for the late made attonement, in which the kings pleasure had more place then the parties wills: nor none of vs, I beleue, is so vnto ouer soone to trust a new frende made of an old fo, or to thinke of an holwerly kindnes, suddenly contra in one howe, continued yet scant a fortnight, should be deeper settled in their stomach, then a long accustomed malice manie pears rooted. With these wordes and wilkings and such other, the Duke of Gloucester some set a fire them that were of themselves eath to kinde, and in especiall twaine, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William lord Hastings and chamberlaine, both men of honor and of great power: The one by long succession from his ancestrie; the other by his office, and the kings fauor.

These two not bearing eath to other so much loue, as hatred both vnto the Quenes part, in this point accorded together with the Duke of Gloucester, that they would utterly amoue from the kings company all his mothers friends, vnder the name of their enemies.

Vpon this concluded, the Duke of Gloucester vnderstanding that the Lords which at that time were about the king, intended to bring him vp to his coronation, accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be harde to him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering a great assemble of people, and in maner of open war, whereof the end hee wold was doubtfull, and in which the king being on their side, his parte should haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretly therefore by diuers meanes caused the quene to be perswaded and brought in the minde, that it neither were neede, and also should be ieopardous, the king to come vp strong. For whereas now euerie Lord loued other, and none other thing studied vpon, but about the coronation and honor of the king; if the Lords of her kindred should assemble in the kings name much people, they should glue the Lords atwixt whome and them had bene sometime debate, to feare and suspence, least they should gather this people not for the kings safegarde, whome no man impagned, but for their destruction, hauing more regarde to their old variance, then their new attonement: for which cause they should assemble on the other partie much people againe for their defence, whose power shee wold well farre stretched. And thus should all the Realme fall on a rose. And of all the hurt that there of should ensue, which was likely not to be little, and the most harme there like to fall where the least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the twight, and sape that they had vnwiselie and vntroly also broken the amitie and peace, that the king her husband so prudently made betwene his kin and hers in his death bed, and which the other party faithfully obserued.

The Quene being in this wise perswaded, such wordes sent vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother, being about the king, and ouer that the Duke of Gloucester himselfe and other Lords the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the king to reuerentlie, and to the quenes friends there so lovinglie, that they nothing carthlie mistrusting, brought the king vp in a great baffe, not in god spere, with a sober company. Now was the king in his waie to London gone from Bockinghampton, when the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the Lord Rivers the kings vnckle, intending on the morowe to follow the king, and be with him at Stony Stratford, twelue miles thence, early ere he departed. So was there made that night much friendly chere between these two Dukes and the Lord Rivers a greete while: Vnto incontinent after that they were openlie with great curtesie departed and the Lord Rivers lodged, the Dukes secretly with a fewe of their most priuie friends, sette them downe in Counsell, wherein they spent a great part of the night: and at their rising in the dawning of the daie, they sent out priuillie to their seruants in their Innnes and Lodgings about, gluing them commandeement, to make themselves shortly shortly readable, for their Lordes were to horse backe warde. Upon which messages, manie of their folke were attendant, when manie of the Lord Rivers servants were unreadable. Nowe had these Dukes taken also into their custodie the keyes of the Turre, that none shoulde passe forth without their licence: And once this, in the high waite toward Stony Stratford where the king laye, they had bestowed certaine of their folke, that shoulde sende backe againe, and compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towardes Stony Stratford, till they shoulde give other licence: For as much as the dukes themselves intended for the shew of their diligence, to bee the first that shoulde that day attend upon the kings highnes out of that Towne: thus bare they folke in hand. But when the Lord Rivers understood the gates closed, and the waies on every side beset, neither his servants nor himselfe suffered to go out, perceiuing well so great a thing without his knowledge not begunne for naught, comparing this manner present, with his last nightes chere, in so fewe holvers so great a change, marvellouslie misliked. Howbeit, sith hee coulde not get awaie, and keepe himselfe close he would not, least hee shoulde seeme to hide himselfe for some secret feare of his owne fault, whereof he sawe no such cause in himselfe: he determined upon the faretie of his owne conscience, to go boldly to them, and inquire what this matter might meane: whom as some as they sawe, they began to quarrell with him, and say, that he intended to set distance betwene the king & them, and to bring them to confusion, but it shoulde not lie in his power. And when he began (as he was a very wel spoken man) in goodly wise to excuse himselfe, they tarried not the ende of his answer, but shortly toke him, and put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horsebacke, and toke the waite to Stony Stratford, where they founde the king with his company, ready to leape on horsebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, because it was too freight for both companies. And as some as they came in his presence, they alight doونه with all their companie about them: To whom the duke of Buckingham said, go afoze gentlemen, and you men keepe your comers.

And thus in goodlie arraye they came to the king, and on their knees in verie humble wise salued his grace, which receiued them in verie iolous and amiable manner, nothing earthly knowing nor mistrusting as yet: But euen by & by in his presence they picked a quarrell to the Lord Richard Grey, the kings other brother by his mother, saying, that he with the Lord Sparques his brother, and the Lord Rivers his uncle had compassed to rule the king and the realme, and to set variance among the states, and to subdue and destroy the noble blood of the realme: Toward the accomplishing whereof, they said that the Lord Sparques had entred into the tower of London, and thence taken out the kings treasure, and sent men to the Sea.

All which thinges the Duke well wist were done for god purposes and necessarie, by the whole councell at London, saying that somewhat they must say. Unto which words the king answered: What my brother Marques hath done I cannot say: but in god faith I dare well answer for mine uncle Rivers and my brother here, that they be innocent of any such matter. Hea my Liege, quoth the duke of Buckingham, they have kept their dealing in these matters farre from the knowledge of your god grace. And forthwith they arrested the Lord Richard and Sir Thomas Vaughan knight in the kings presence, and brought the king and all backe unto Northampton, where they toke againe further Councell: And there they sent awaie from the king whom it pleased them, and set new servants about him, such as liked better them then him: at which dealing he wept, and was nothing content, but it boded not. And at dinner, the duke of Gloucester sent a dish from his owne table to the Lord Rivers, paying him to be of god chere, all shoulde be well enough: and he thanked the duke, and praised the messenger to beare it to his nephew the Lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such aduertitie was strange, but himselfe had borne all his daies in tye the reuolt, and therefore coulde beare it the better. But for all this comfortable curtisie of the duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lord Rivers and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan, into the North country, into diuers places to prison, and afterwarde all to Pontfract, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

In this wise the duke of Gloucester toke vpon himselfe the order and gouernance of the young king. Whome with much honor and humble reuerence hee conueied toward toward the citie. But anone the tidings of this matter came hastily to the Quene a little before the midnight following, and that in the so rest wise, that the king her son was taken, her brother, her sonne, and other friends arrested, and sent no man with together, to be don with. God wot what. With which tidings, the Quene in great fright and heauines betwalling her gyltes raigne, her friendes mischance, and her owne infortune, damning the time that euer she disturbed the gathering of powder about the king, gate herselfe in all the hast possible with her younger son and her daughters, out of the palace of Westminster, in which she then lay, into the sanctuary, lodging herselfe and her company there in the abbots place.

So came there one likewise not long after midnight from the Lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbishop of Yorke then Chancellor of Englarde, to his place not far from Westminster: And so that he thewed his servants that he had tidings of so great importance, that his master gaue him in charge, not to forbear his rest, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admit this messenger vnto his bed side. Of whom he heard that these dukes were gone backe with the kings grace from Stony Stratford vnto Northampton: Notwithstanding sir quoth he my Lord sende thy pour Lordship word, that there is no feare, for he assuredly thou that all shall be well. I assure him, quoth the Archbishop, bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee so well as we haue saide it: and thereupon by and by after the messenger departed, he caused in all the haste all his servants to be called vpp, and so with his owne household about him, and euerie man beapored, he toke the great scale with him, and came pet before daie vnto the Quene. About whom he found much heauinesse, rumber, haste, and busines, carriage and conuenance of her stuffe into sanctuary, chests, coffers, packes, favets, trusted all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, some laiding, some going, some discharging, some comming for more, some breaking downe the wals to bying in the next way, and some yet byelwe to them to helpe to carry a wyong way.

The Quene her selfe late alone alowne on the rushes all desolate and dismayed, whome the archbishop comforted in the best manner he could, shewing her that he trusted the matter was nothing so sore as she took it for, and that he was put in god hope and out of feare by the message sent him from the lord Chamberlaine: Ah too woorthy him (quoth she) for he is one of them that labour to destroy me and my blood.

Spadam (quoth he) be yoe of god chere, for I assure you, if they crowne any other king than your sonne, whom they now haue with them, we shall on the morrow crowne his brother whom you haue here with you. And here is the great scale, whiche in like wise as that noble prince your husband deliuered it vnto me, so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behaue of your sonne, and therewith he betooke her the great scale, and departed home againe, yet in the dawning of the day. By which time, he might in his chamber window see all the Chamis full of boates of the duke of Glocesters seruants, watching that no man should go to sanctuary, nor none could passe vnsearched: Then was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as specially in the citie, the people diuersly doining vpon this dealing. And some lordes, knights, and gentlemen, either for fauor of the Quene, or for feare of themselves, assembled in sundry companies, and went flocke meale in harnesse: and many also, for that they reckoned this demeanour attempted, not so specially against the other lordes, as against the king himselfe in disturbance of his coronation. But then by and by the lordes assembled together, toward which meeting, the archbishop of Yorke fearing that it would be ascribed (as it was in dede) to his ouermuch lightnes, that he so so daingly had yelued by the great scale to the Quene, to whome the custodie thereof nothing pertained, without speciall commandement of the king, secretly sent for the scale againe, and brought it with him after the custumable manner. And at this meeting, the Lord Hastings, whose truth toward the king, no man doubted nor needed to doubt, perswaded the lordes to beleue, that the duke of Glocester was fure and fastly faithfull to his prince, and that the lord Rivers and lord Richard, with the other knights, were for matters attempted by them against the dukes of Glocester and Buckingham, put vnder arrest for their surety, not for the kings covard: and that they were also in safegard, & there no longer should remaine than till the matter were, not by the dukes only, but also by all the other lordes of the kings counsell indifferently examined, and by other discretions ordered, and either iudged or appeased.

But one thing he aduised them beware, that they iudged not the matter too far forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their private grudges into the common hurt, irking & prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings coronation, toward which the dukes were coming by, that they might peradventure bying the matter so far out of ioint, that it should neuer be brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should happen, as it were likely, to come to a felde, though both parties were in all things equal, yet should the authority be be on that side where the king is himselfe. With these perswasions of the lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe beleued, of part hee with the contrarie, the se commotions were somewhat appeased, but specially by that, that the dukes of Glocester and Buckingham were so nere, and came so shortly on with the king, in none other manner, with none other voice or semblance than to his coronation, causing the same to be blotten about, that these lordes and knights which were taken, had contriued the destruction of the dukes of Glocester and Buckingham, and of other the noble blons of the realme, to the end that they themselves would alone demeane and governe the king at their pleasure.

And for the colourable pious theof, such of the dukes seruants as rode with the carts of their stuffe that were taken, (among which stuffe no maruel though some were harnesse, which at the breaking vp of the household, must needs either be brought away, or cast away) they shewed vnto the people all the boales as they went: Lo here bee the barrells of harnesse that these traitors had pilouly conueied in their carriage to destroy the noble lordes withall.

This deuise, albeit that it made the matter to seeme more unlikely, well perceiving that the intenders of such a purpose would rather haue had their harnesse on their backs, than to haue bound them by in barrells: yet much part of the common people were therewith very wel satisfied, and said it were almes to hang them.

When the king approached nere to the citie, Edmond Shaa Goldsmith then spale, with William White and Iohn Matthew Sheriffes, and all the other Aldermen in scarlet, with 500. hoise of the citizens in violet, receiued him reuerently at Warrney, and riding from thence, accompanied him into the citie, which he entred the fourth day of May, the first and last yere of his raigne.

The king was lodged in the Bishops palace, where was kept a great counsell, and there was sworne to the king, the duke of Glocester, the duke of Buckingham, and all the lords.

But the duke of Glocester bare him in open sight so reuerently to the prince, with all semblance of lowlines, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, hee was suddenly fallen in to great trust, that at the counsell next assembled, he was made the onely man, chole and thought most mete to be protector of the king and his realme, so that (were it desirue, as were it folly) the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to keepe. At which counsell also, the Archbishop of Yorke Chancellor of England, which had deliuered by the great scale to the Quene, was thereof greatly repproued, and the scale taken from him, and deliuered to doctor Russell bishop of Lincoln, a wise man and a good, and of much experience, and one of the best learned men vnbondedly that England had in his time. Diuers lordes and knights were appointed vnto diuers romes. The Lord Chamberlaine and some other kept still their offices that they had before.

Now all were it, so that the protector so sore thirsted for the finishing of that he had begun, that thought every day a yere till it were achieved, yet durd he no further attempt, as long as he had but halfe his pray in his hand: well witting, that if he deposed the one brother, all the realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in Sanctuary, or should happily be shortly conveyed to his farther libertie. Wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords at the council, he proposed unto them, that it was a hainous deed of the Queene, and proceeding of great malice toward the kings Councellers, that the should keepe in Sanctuary the kings brother from him, whose special pleasure and comforte were to haue his brother with him. And that by her doinge to none other intent, but to bring all the Lordes in obloquie, and murmure of the people: as though they were not to be trusted with the kings brother, that by the assent of the nobles of the land, were appointed as the kings next friends, to the tuition of his owne roiall person. The prosperitie whereof standeth (quoth he) not all in keeping from enemies, or ill bland, but partlie also in recreation, and moderate pleasure, which he cannot in his tender youth take in the companye of ancient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be neither far vnder, nor far aboue his age, naye the lesse of estate convenient to accompany his noble maiestie, therefore, with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if anie man thinke this consideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that loueth the king) let him consider, that sometime without small things, greater cannot stand. And verily, it reboundeth greatly to the dishonour both of the kings highnes, and of all his that bene about his grace, to haue it ran in euerie mans mouth, not in this Realme onlie, but also in other lands: as euill wordes walke far, that the kings brother should be faine to keepe Sanctuary, for euery man will weene, that no man will so do for nought. And such euill opinion on once fastened in mens hearts, hard it is to wraff out, and many grow to more grieue then any man can here diuine: wherefore me thinketh it were not tooke to send unto the Queene for the redresse of this matter, some honorable trustie man, such as both tendereth the kings weale, and the honor of his council, and is also in fauour and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth me more meete, then our reuerende father here present, my Lord Cardinal, who may in this matter do most good of anie man, if it please him to take the paine, which I doubt not of his goodnesse hee will not refuse for the kings sake and ours, and wealthe of the young duke himselfe, the kings most honorable brother, and after my soueraigne Lord himselfe, my most dére stephen, considered that the rebys shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and oblique now going, and the hurts avoided that thereof might ensue, and much rest and quiet growe to all the realme. And if he be percase to obstinate, and so precisely let upon her own will, that neither his wisde & faithfull aduertisement can not moue her, nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine aduise, by the kings authoritie, fetch him out of that prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall companye he shall be so well cherished, & so honorably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor and her reproch perceiue, that it was only mallice, forwardnes, or folly that caused her to keepe him there: this is my mind in this matter for this time, except anie of your Lordships anie thing perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by God's grace so looe my selfe to mine owne will, but that I shall be ready to change it upon your better aduises.

Then

When the protector had said, all the Councell affirmed, that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the king and the Duke his brother, honorable, and a thing that should cease great murmure in the Realme, if the mother might be by good meanes induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishoppe of Yorke, whome they all agreed also to bee thereto most conuenient, toke vpon him to moue her, and therein to doo his bitternest deuoure. Howbeit, if she could be in no wise intreated with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he and such other as were of the spiritualty present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many yeres bene kept, which both kings and popes so god had granted, so manie had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then 500. yeres agoe by S. Peter in his own person in spirit accompanied with great multitude of angels by night so specially hallowed, and dedicate to God: for the prouise thereof, they haue yet in the abbey, Saint Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer so burdenout a king, that durst that sacred place violate, or so holie a bishop, that durst it presume to consecrate. And therefore (quoth the Archbys. Shop of Yorke) god forbid that any man should for any thing earthly enterpriue to breake the immunitie and libertie of the sacred sanctuarie, that hath bene the safeguard of so many a good mans life. And I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace, we shall not neede it. But for any manner need, I would not we should doot. I trust that they shall be with reason contented, and all thinges in good maner obtained. And if it happeth that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it so far sayd do my best, that ye shall all well perceiue, that no lacke of my deuoure, but the mothers dread and womanly feare, shall be the let. Womanly feare, naie womanly forwardnes (quoth the D. of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, the well knoweth the needeth no such thing to feare, either for her son, or for his selfe. For as for hir, here is no man that will be at war with women: Would God som of the men of hir kin were women too, and then should all be some in rest. Howbeit there is none of hir kinne the lesse loued, for that they be hir kin, but for their owne euill deseruing. And natheles, if wee loued neither hir nor hir kin, yet were there no cause to thinke that we should hate the kings noble brother, to whose grace we our selues be of kin: whose honour, if wee as much desired, as our dishonor, & as much regard toke to his wealthe, as to her owne will, they would be as loth to suffer him from the King as anie of vs be. For if she haue wit (as would God she had as good wit as the hath shee doth wit) shee reckoneth her selfe no wiser, then she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull mind the nothing doubteth, but verily be leue and knoweth, that they would be as loth of his harme, as hir selfe, & yet would haue him from her, if she bide there: and we al (I thinke) content, that both be with hir, if she come thence, and bide in such place, where they may with their honor be.

Now then, if she refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counsaile of them, whose wisdome shee knoweth, whose truth shee well trusteth: it is eate to perceiue, that forwardnes letteth her, and not feare. But go to, suppose that she

the feare (as who may let her to feare her owne shadowe) the more the feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we feare to leaue him in her hands. For if the call such fond doubts, that the feare his hurt: then will the feare, that he shall be fet by thence. For the will some thinke, that if men were let (which god forbid) vpon so great a mischief, the Sanctuarie would little let them: which god men might (as me thinke) without sinne, somewhat lesse regard than they doe.

Now then, if the doubt, least he might be fetched from her, is it not likelie enough that she shall send him some where out of the Realme: Clearly, I loke for none other. And I doubt not, but she now as she mindeth it, as we the let therof. And if she might happen to bring that to passe, (as it were no great matter, we letting her alone) all the world would say, that we were a wise sort of Counsaillours about a king, that let his brother be cast awaie vnder our noses. And therefore, I enfore you faithfully for my mind, I will rather manage her minde, fetch him awaie, than leaue him there, till her stowardnesse and sonde feare conuince him awaie. And yet will I breake no Sanctuarie the refore. For verely, with the priuiledges of that place and other like haue bene of long continued, I am not he that would be about to breake them. And in god faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should bee about to make them.

Yet will I not saie naie, but that it is a dede of pittie, that such men as the sea, or their euill debtours haue brought in pouertie, should haue some place of libertie, to keepe their bodies out of the daunger of their cruelled tortours.

And also, if the crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question while either part taketh other as traitors, I will well there be some places of refuge for both.

What as for thienes, of which these places be full, and which neuer fall from the crasse, after they once fall thereto, it is pittie the Sanctuarie should serue them: And much more, manquellers, whome God had to take from the altar and kill them, if their murder were wilfull. And where it is otherwise, there neede were not the Sanctuaries that God appointed in the olde lawe, for if either necessitie, his owne defence, or misfortune draweth him to that dede, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the king of pittie maie.

Then loke me now how few Sanctuarie men there be, whom anie famous necessitie compelled to go thither: and then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull iniquitie hath brought to naught.

What a rabble of thienes, murderers, and malicious hapnons traitors, and that in two places specially: The one at the elbow of the citie, the other in the verte bowels. I dare well now to, weepe the god that they doe, with the hurt that cometh of them, and ye shall finde it much better to lacke both, than haue both. And this I saie, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long haue bene, that I feare me ever they will be, while men be afraid to set their hands to the imprisonment, as though God and St. Peter were the patrons of vngations living.

Now vntill this riot, and run in debt, vpon the boldnes of these places, yea, and rich men run thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, and bid their creditours go whistle them.

Sanctuaries.

Mens wiues run thither with their husbands plate, and saie, they dare not abide with their husbands for beating.

Thienes bring thither their stolen goods, and there liue thereon.

There deuile they netue robberies, nightly they steale out, they robbe, and reave, and kill, and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onely a safegard for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more. What best, much of this mischief, if wise men would set their handes to it, might be amended, with great thanks of God, and no breach of the priuiledge.

The rethone, sith so long ago I wot neare what poe, and what prince more piteous than politike, hath granted it, and other men since, of a certaine religious feare, haue not broken it, let vs take a paine the with, and let it a gods name stande in force, as farre forth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this noble man, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a Sanctuarie man.

A Sanctuarie serueth alway to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onely, but also of lawfull hurt, for against lawfull harmes, neuer poe nor king intended to priuiledge any one place, for that priuiledge hath euerie place: knoweth any man, any place wherein it is lawfull one man to do another wrong?

What no man lawfully take hurt, that libertie, the king, the law, and beerie nature, forbiddeth in euerie place, and maketh to that regarde, for euerie man euerie place a Sanctuarie.

But where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth be the tuition of some speciall priuiledge, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries: from which necessitie, this noble Prince is free, whose loue to his king, nature and kindred proueth, whose innocencie to all the world, his tender youth proueth, and so Sanctuarie, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor also none can haue.

When come not to Sanctuarie, as they come to Baptisme, to requirer it by their Godfathers, he must aske it himselfe, that must haue it, and reason, sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him saie, neede to require it: what will then hath ponder babe: which and if he had discretion to require it, if neede were, I dare say would now be right angry with them that keepe him there: and I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of priuiledge, to be some what more homely with them that be there Sanctuarie men in dede.

For if one go to Sanctuarie with another mans goods, why should not the king leaue his bodie at libertie, satisfie the parties of his goods, euen within the Sanctuarie: for neither king nor poe can giue any place such a priuiledge,

that it shall discharge a man of his debts, being able to paie: and with that, diuers of the cleargie that were present, whether they saide it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreed plainly, that by the law of God and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuary man should be deliuered in payment of his debts, and solden goods to the owner, and onely libertie restored him to get his living with the labour of his hands. Clericly (quoth the Duke) I thinke you saie verie trath, and what if a mans wife will take Sanctuary, because shee list to run from her husband: I woulde wene if she coulde alleadge none other cause, bee male lawfullie without any displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that (saith he) will bide there, then if a child will take Sanctuary, because he feareth to go to schole, his master must let him alone. And as simple as that sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case than in that: for therein, though it bee a childish feare, yet is there, at the least, wise, some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary men, but I neuer heard earst of Sanctuary children. And therefore, as for the conclusion of my minde, who so may haue deserued to make it, if they thinke it for their libertie, let them keepe it. But he can be no Sanctuary man, that neither hath wisdom to desire it, nor malice to deserue it, whose life or libertie, can by no lawfull processe stand in iopardie. And hee that taketh one out of Sanctuary to doe him good, I saie plainly, that he breaketh no Sanctuary.

When the Duke had done, the temporall men whole, and a good part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt eathly ment toward the yong babe, concluded in effect, that if he were not deliuered he should be fetched: Howbeit, they thought it all best, in the answering of all manner of rumour, that the L. Cardinall should first assay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the counsell came into the star chamber at Westminister, and the L. Cardinall knowing the Protector with the counsell in the darre chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Quene, with diuers other lordes with him, were it for the respect of his honour, or that she should by presence of so manie perceiue that this errand was not one mans minde: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter, to trust any one man alone, or else, that if the finalle were determined to keepe him, some of that companie, had happely secret instruction incontinent, maugre her minde, to take him, and to leaue her no respite to conuery him, which she was likely to mind after this matter broken to her, if her time would in any wise serue her.

When the quene, and these lordes were come together in presence, the lord Cardinall shewed vnto her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole counsell, that her keeping of the kings brother in that place, was the thing, which highly sounded, not onely to the great rumour of the people: their obloquie, but also to the insupportable grieue and displeasure of the kings royall spatesse, to whose grace it were as singular comfort to haue his naturall brother in companie, as it was their both dishonour, and all theirs and hers also, to suffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother stood in danger & perill of the other. And he shewed her, that the counsell therefore had sent him vnto her, to require her the deliuer of him, that he might be brought vnto the kings presence at his libertie, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison, and there should he be demeaned, according to his estate, & she in this doing should both do good to the realm, pleasure to the counsell, and profit to her selfe, succour to her friends that were in distresse, and ouer that (which he wist well the specially touched) not only great comfort and honour to the king, but also to the yong duke himselfe, whose both great wealth it were to be together, as well for many greater causes, as also for their both disposall, and recreation: which thing the Lord esteemed no sleight, though it seemed light, well pondering, that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any stranger, for the consuetude of their both ages and estates, so meely in that point for any of them, as either of them for other.

Appoynted (quoth the quene) I say not naie, but that it were very convenient, that this gentleman whom ye require were in companie of the king his brother: and in good faith, me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet a while, to bee in the custodie of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but specially the yonger, which besides his infancie, that also needeth good looking to, hath a while bene so sore diseased, & sicker with sickness, and is so newly rather a little amended, than well recovered, that I dare put no person earthily in trust with his keeping, but my selfe onely, considering that there is (as physicians saie) and as we also finde, double the perill in the reciduation, that was in the first sickness, with which disease, Nature being sore laboured, sore wearied and weakened, warreth the lesse able to beare out and sustaine a new surfeit. And albeit there might be found other that would happily do their best vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, than I that so long haue kept him: or is more tenderly like to cherish him, than his owne mother that bare him. So man denieth, god & Adam (quod the carbinah) but that your grace were of all folke most necessary about your children: and so would all the counsell not onely be content, but glad that ye were, if it might stande with your pleasure, to be in such place as might stand with their honour. But if you do appoint your selfe to carrie here, then thinke they it more convenient that the Duke of York be with the king honourably at his libertie to the comfort of them both, than here as a Sanctuary man, to their both dishonour and obloquie, which there is not alwaies so great necessitie to haue the child to be with the mother: but that occasion maie sometime be such, that it should be more expedient to keepe him elsewhere, which in this well appeareth, that at such time as your dearest sonne then Prince, and now King, should for his honour, and good order of the countrey, keepe household in Wales, far out of your companie: your grace was well content the reuolt your selfe. Not verie well content, quoth the quene: And yet the case is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now sick: In which case, I marvell greatly, that my lord protector is so desirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the child in his sickness miscarrie by nature, yet might hee runne into slander and suspicion of fraude.

Protector.

The quene's answer.

And where they call it a thing to lose against my child's honour, and the less also, that hee bydoeth in this place: it is all their honours there to suffer him byde, where as yet doubteth he shall be best kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intende not to come forth, & leoparde my selfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in suretie with mee, than I were there in leoparde with them. Why madam (quoth another lord) know you any thing why they should be in leoparde? I say verily sir, quoth she, no; why they should be in prison neither, as they now be. But it is I trowe, no great marvel though I feare, lest those that haue not letted to put them in durance, without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause. The cardinall made a countenance to the other lord, that he should haue no more upon that string, and then said he to the Quene, that he nothing doubted, but that those Lords of her honorable kinne, which as yet remained under arrest, should upon the matter examined do well enough: and as towa. The her noble person, neither was, neyther coulde be anie manner leoparde. Whereby should I trust that (quoth the Quene) in that I am guiltles? as though they were guiltie, in that I am with their enemies better loued than they? When they hate them for my sake, in that I am so neere of kin to the king: and how far they be off, if that would helpe, as God send grace it hurt not, & therfore as for me, I purpose not as yet, to depart hence. And as for this gentleman's sonne, I mind that hee shall be where I am, till I see farther: for I assure you, for that I see some men so greedy, without anie substantiall cause to haue him: This maketh mee much the more feard to deliuer him. Cruele madame, quoth he, and the fearder that you be to deliuer him, the fearder bene o ther men to suffer you to keepe him, least your causelesse feare might cause you farther to conuey him: and many be there that think he can haue no ptielledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deserue it, and the refoze, they reckon no ptielledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if ye finally refuse to deliuer him, I verily thinke they will. So much dread hath my Lord his uncle, for the tender loue hee beareth him, least your grace should hap to send him away.

The Quene.

A sir (quoth the Quene) hath the protector so tender zeale, that he feareth nothing but least hee should escape him: Thinketh hee that I would sende him hence, which neither is in the plight to send out, and in what place could I reckon him sure, if he be not sure in the Sanctuarie? Whereof was there neuer tyrant yet so distrustful that durst presume to breake. And I trust, God is as strong per se to withstand his aduersaries, as euer he was. But my son can be serued no Sanctuarie, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forsooth he hath found a goodly gloze, by which that place that may defend a chiefe, male not saue an innocent. But he is in no leoparde, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Troth the protector, I pray god he make proue a protector, troweth he that I perceiue not wherunto his painted pocielle doaweth? it is not honorable that I abide here: it were comf; table for them both, that he were with his brother, bicause the king lacketh a platfellow to be sure. I praye God sende them both better platfellows than him, that maketh so high a matter upon such a trifling pretext: as though there could none be found to plaie with the king, but if his brother that hath no luste to plaie for sickness, come out of Sanctuarie, out of his safegarde to plaie with him. As though Princes as young as they be, coulde not plaie but with their pères, or chylzen coulde not plaie but with their kinned, with whom for the more part they agree much worse than with strangers. But the childe cannot requite the ptielledge: who told him so? He shall heare him aske it, and he will. Whombeit this is a gaie matter, suppose he coulde not aske it, suppose he would not aske it, suppose hee would aske to go out, if I saie hee shall not: if I aske the ptielledge but for my selfe, I saie hee that against my will taketh him out, breaketh the Sanctuarie. Serueth this li-bertie for my person onelie, or for my goods too? Fee male not hence take my childe from me, and male you take my childe from me: He also is my ward: for as my learned counsell sheweth me, sith hee hath nothing by descent holden by knights seruice, the law maketh his mother his guardian. When may no man I suppose take my warde from mee out of Sanctuarie, without the breach of Sanctuarie. And if my ptielledge coulde not serue him, nor he aske it for himself, yet sith the law committeth to me the custodie of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a childe a guardian only for his goods and lands, discharging him of the cure and safe keeping of his body, for which only both lands and goods serue.

¶ And if examples be sufficient to obtaine ptielledge for my childe, I neede not far to seeke. For in this place in which he now wee be (and which is now in question, whether my childe male take benefit of it) mine other son (now king) was bozne, and kept in his cradle, and preferred to a more prosperous fortune, which I praye God long to continue. And as all you know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuarie. For when my Lord my husband was banished, and thrust out of his kingdome, I fled hither, being great with childe, and here I bare the prince. And when my Lord my husband returned safe againe, and had the victorie, then went I hence to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the prince vnto his father, when hee first toke him in his armes. And I praye God that my sons palace may bee as great safegarde vnto him now reigning, as this place was sometime to the kings enemy. In this place I intend to keepe his brother, sith, &c. ¶ Wherefore here intend I to keepe him, since mans law serueth the guardian to keepe the infant. The law of nature bids the mother keepe the childe, Gods law ptielledge the Sanctuarie, and the Sanctuarie my son, sith I feare to put him in the protector's hands that hath his brother alreadie, and were (if both failed) in hereto; to the crowne. The cause of my feare hath no man to doo to eramine: And yet feare I no farther than the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, for bloodeth euery man the custodie of the m, by whose death hee may inherit lesse land than a kingdome. I can no more, but whosoeuer he be that breaketh this holy Sanctuarie, I praye God shortly send him need of Sanctuarie, when he may not come to it: for taken out of Sanctuarie would I not my mostall enemy were.

The Lorde Cardinall perceiving that the Quene waxed euer the longer the farther off, and also that shee beganne to kinde and chafe, and spake more biting wordes against the protector, and such as he neither beleued, and was also loath to heare, he said to her for a small conclusion, that he would no longer dispute the matter, but if she were content to deliuer the duke to him, and to the other Lords present, he durst lay his own body and soule both in pledge, not only for his surety, but also for his estate. And if he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrary, he would forthwith depart the twilfth, and shift who so would with this busines afterwards, for hee neuer intended more to moue her in that matter, in which she thought that he and all other also saue herselfe lacked either wit or truth. Wit, if she were so dull that they could no thing perceiue what the protector intended; truth, if they should procure her son to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they should perceiue towardes the child any euill intended.

The Duke with these wordes stood a good while in a great studie: And for asmuch as hir seemed y<sup>e</sup> cardinall readier to depart then some of the remnant, and the protector himselfe ready at hand, so that the verillie thought he could not keepe him there, but that he should incontinent be taken thence; and to conuete him else where, neither hadde shee time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all thinges vntready, this speeche came on her so sodaynelle, nothing lesse looking for, than to haue him sought out of Sanctuaries, which shee thought to bee now beset in such places about, that hee could not bee conueyed out untaken; and partelle (as shee thought) it might fortune, her feare to bee false, so well shee wiske it was either newlesse, or bootlesse: wherefore, if shee should needs goe from him, shee deemed it best to deliuer him. And ouer that, of the Cardinals sayth shee nothing doubted, nor of some other Lords neither, whome shee there saue, which as shee feared leaste they might be deceyued; so was shee well assured they should not bee corrupted: then thought shee it should yet make them the more warlike to looke to him, and the more circumspectie to see to his suretie, if shee with her owne handes brake him to them of trust. And at the last shee tooke the yong Duke by the hand, and said vnto the Lordes: My Lordes (quoth shee) and all my Lordes, I neither am so vnwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistruste your trackes: of which thing I purpose to make you each a prooffe, as if cyther of both lacked in you, might turne both mee to great sorrow, the realme to much harme, and you to great reproch. For so, here is (quoth shee) this gentleman, whome I doubt not but I could here keepe safe, if I would, whatsoeuer anie man saie: & I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wist where any of it lay in their owne bodie, they would let it out. Wee haue also experience that the desire of a Kingdome knoweth no kinred: The Brother hath bene the Brothers bane: and may the nephewes bee sure of their uncle: Each of these children is the others defence while they be asunder, and each of their liues lieth in the others bodie. Keepe one safe and both bee sure, and nothing for them both more perillous, than to bee both in one place. For what wisse merchant aduentureth all his goods in one shippe? All this notwithstanding, here I deliuer him, and his Brother in him, to keepe, into your handes, of whome

I shall aske them both afore God and the world: If any shall see be, that tooke I well, and I knowe well y<sup>e</sup> be wisse. Power and strength to keepe him if you like, neither lacke ye of your selfe, nor can lacke helpe in this case: And if ye cannot els where, then may you leaue him here. But onlie one thing I beseech you, for the trust which his father put in you euer, and for the trust I put in you now, that as far as ye thinke that I feare too much, be you well ware that you feare not as farre too little. And therewithall shee said vnto the child, farewell mine owne sweete sonne, God sende you good keeping: let mee kisse you yet once ere you goe, for God knoweth when wee shall kisse together againe: And therewith shee kised him, and blessed him, turned her backe and wept, and went her waie, leauing the child weeping as fasshe. When the lord Cardinall and those other Lords with him had recited this yong duke, they brought him into the Starre Chamber, where the protector tooke him in his armes and kised him, with these wordes: Gode welcome my Lorde, euen withall my verie heart: And hee sayde in that of likelihood as hee thought. Whereupon forthwith they brought him vnto the King his Brother, into the Wythoppes Palace at Paules, and from thence through the city honourable into the Tower, out of the which after that date they neuer came abroad.

¶ When the protector had both the children in his handes, he opened himselfe more boldly, both to certaine other men, and also chieflie to the Duke of Buckingham. Although I know that manie thought that this duke was p<sup>r</sup>sent to all the protectors counsell, euen from the beginning, and some of the protectors friends said, that the duke was the first mouer of the protector to this matter, sending a yong messenger vnto him, straight after his Edwards death. But other againe which knew better the subtil wit of the protector, denie that hee euer opened his enterpryse to the duke, untill hee had brought to passe the things before rehearsed. But when hee had imprisoned the queenes kinfolks, and gotten both hir sons into his owne handes, then hee opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whome he thought meete for the matter, and specially to the duke, who being woun to his purpose, hee thought his strength more then haile increased. The matter was broken vnto the duke by subtil folks, and such as were their craftes masters in handling of such wicked devices: who declared vnto him that the yong Duke was offended with him for his kinfolks sake, & if he were euer able he would reuenge them: who would pick him for ward the reuente if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment) or else if they were put to death, without doubt the yong Duke would be careful for their deatnes, whose imprisonment was grievous vnto him. And that with repenting the Duke should nothing auaille, for there was no way left to redeem his offence by benefits, but he should sooner destroy himselfe then saue the king, who with his brother and his kinfolks he saw in such places imprisoned, as the protector might with a becke destroy them all: and that if there no doubt but hee would do it in dede, if there were anie newe enterpryse attempted. And that it was likelie, that as the protector had promised plain garde to himselfe, so had hee swayed for the Duke, and trapnes to catch him, if hee should be against him, and that peradventure from them, whom he least suspected. For the state of things and the dispositions of men were then such, that a man could not well tell whom he might trust, or whom he might fear.

These things and such like, being beaten into the dukes mind, brought him to that point, that where he had repented a way that he had entred, yet would he go forth in the same, and since he had once begunne, he would stoutly go through. And therefore to this wicked enterprise which he believed could not be voided, he bent himselfe, and went through and determined, that since the common mischief could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie.

When it was agreed, that the Protector should haue the Dukes aide to make him king, and that the Protector only lawfull should marrie the dukes daughter, and that the Protector should grant him the quiet possession of the Earldome of Hertford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in king Edwards time: Besides these requests of the Duke, the protector of his owne mind promised him a great quantitie of the kings treasure, and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwene themselves, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the young king as they would haue it seeme: And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceiuing of their duties other where, the Lordes being sent for from all parts of the realme, came thicke to the solemnity: But the Protector, and the duke after that, that they had sent the lord Cardinall, the archbishop of Yorke then lord Chancellor, the bishop of Ely, the L. Stanley, and the L. Hastings then lord Chamberlaine, with many other noble men to commune and deuise about the coronation in one place, as fast were they in another place contriuing the contrarie, and to make the protector king. To which Councell, albeit there were admitted very few, and they were secret: yet began there here and there about, some manner of muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neuer wist what they feared, nor therefore were it that before such great things mens hearts of a secret instinct of nature misgave them, as the sea without wind swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest: or were it that some one man happily somewhat perceiving, stirred many men with suspicion, though hee shewed few men what he knewe. Notwith, somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the councell were close. For by little and little, all folke withyrew from the tower, and drew to Crosbies in Bishops gate strate, where the protector kept his household. The protector had the resort, the king in manner desolate.

While some for their businesse made suite to them that had the doing, some were by their friends secretly warned, that it might happily turne them to no good, to be too much attendant about the king without the protectors appointment, which remoued also diuers of the princes olde seruants from him, and set new about him.

Thus manie thinges comming together partly by chance, partly of purpose, caused at length not common people onely, that wound with the winde, but wise men also, and some lordes eke to marke the matter, and mune thereon, so farre forth, that the Lord Stanley that was after earle of Darby, wisely mistrusted it, and saide vnto the Lord Hastings, that he much misliked these two severall Councells. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in yone place, little wot we thereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while one man is there, which is neuer thence, neuer can there bee thing once moued, that should found a misse toward me, but it should be in mine eares ere it were well out of their mouthes.

This meant he by Catesby, which was of his more secret counsell, and whom Catesby. he verie familiarly vsed, and in his most weightie matters put no man in so speciall trust, reckoning himselfe to no man so liefe, sith hee well wist there was no man so much to him beholden as was this Catesby, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this land, and by the speciall fauor of the L. Chamberlaine, in good authoritie, & much rule bare he in all the countie of Leicesters, where the lord Chamberlains power chiefly lay. But sorely great pittie was it, that he had not had either more truth or lesse wit: for his dissimulation onely kept all that mischief by. In whom if the lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the lord Stanley and he had departed with diuers other lordes, and broken all the daunce, for many ill signes that he saw, which he nold construe all to the best. So surely thought he, that there could be no harme toward him in that counsell intended where Catesby was.

And of trust the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham made verie good semblance vnto the Lord Hastings, and kept him much in companie: And undoubtedly the protector loued him well, and loth was to haue lost him, fearing for feare least his life should haue quailed their purpose. For which cause hee moued Catesby to proue with some wordes call out a far off, whether he could thinke it possible to win the Lord Hastings vnto their part: But Catesby whether he assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them, that he founde him to fast, and heard him speake so terrible wordes, that he durst no further breake.

And of trust the lord Chamberlaine of very trust shewed vnto Catesby the distrust that other began to haue in the matter: And therefore he fearing least their motion might with the Lord Hastings minish his credence, whereunto onely all the matter leaned, procured the protector hastily to ridde him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death to obtaine much of the rule that the lord Hastings bare in his countrey: the onely desire whereof was the allectiue that induced him to be partner and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

Whereupon some after, that is to wit, on the fridaie the thirtieth daie of June, many lordes assembled in the tower, and there sate in councell, deuising the honorable solemnitie of the kings coronation, of which the time appointed then to nere approached, that the pageants and subtilties were in making daie and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed therefore, that after ward was cast away.

These Lordes so sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came

came in amongst them first about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and excusing himselfe that he had bene from them so long, saying merilie, that he had bene a sleeper that day.

And after a little talking with them, he said unto the bishoppe of Glouc: My Lord, you haue very good strawberries at your garden in Holborne, I require you let vs haue a messe of them. Gladly my lord (quoth he) would God I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that. And therewith in all the haste he sent his seruant for a messe of strawberries.

The protector let the lordes sit in communing, and thereupon praying them to spare him for a little while, departed thence: And some after one houre, betwene 10. and 11. he returned into the chamber among them all, changed with a wonderfull fower angrie countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lips, and so late him downe in his place, all the lordes much dismayed and soze maruelling of this manner of sudden change, and what thing should him aile. Then, when he had sitten still a while, thus he began: What were they worthy to haue that compasse and imagine the destruction of me, being so nere of blood unto the king, and protector of his rowle all person and his realme? At this question, all the lordes late soze astonished, making much by whom this question should bee meant, of which every man wist himselfe cleere.

Then the lord Chamberlaine, as he that for the loue betwene them thought he might be boldest with him, answered and said, that they were worthy to be punished as hainous traitors, what soeuer they were: And all the other affirmed the same. That is (quoth he) ponder forceresse my brothers wife, and other with her, meaning y<sup>e</sup> queene. At these wordes many of the other lordes were greatly abashed that fauored her. But the L. Hastings was in his mind better content that it was moued by her, than by any other whom he loved better: albeit his hart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he was of the taking of her kinred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before decessed to bee beheaded at Pontefract this selfe same day, in which he was not ware that it was by other decessed, that himselfe should be beheaded the same day at London. Then said the protector: Ye shall all see in what wise that forceresse, and that other witch of her counsell Shores kiste with this affinity, haue by their forcerie and witchcraft wasted my body: And therewith he plucked by his doublet sleeve to his elbowe upon his left arme, where he shewed a terribly withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other. And thereupon every mans minde soze misgaue them, well perceiving that this matter was but a quarrell: For they well wist, that the Duke was to wise to go about any such folly: And also if they would, yet would they of all folke least make Shores wife of counsell, whom of all women the most hated, as that concubine whom the king her husband had most loved: And also, no man was there present but well knewe y<sup>e</sup> his arme was euer such since his birth. Nayther lesse the lord Chamberlaine (which from the death of king Edward kept Shores wife, on whom he somewhat doted in the kings life, saying (as it is saide) bee that while forbare her of reuerence toward the king, or else of a certaine kind of of felicity to his friend) answered and said: Certainly my lord, if they haue so beinously done, they be worthy beinous punishment.

What (quoth the protector) thou seruest me I weene with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make god on thy bodie traitor: and therewith as in a great anger, he clapped his fist vpon the boord a great rap. At which token giuen, one cried treason without the chamber: There with a doze clapped, and in come there rushing men in harnesse, as many as the chamber might holde. And anone the protector said to the lord Hastings, I arrest thee traitor: What me my lord (quoth he) pea thee traitor, quoth the protector. And another let fly at the lord Stanley, which shynke at the stroke, and fell vnder the table, or else his head had been cleft to the teth: for as thoughtly as he shynke, yet came the blood about his eares. When were they all quickly bestowed in diuers chambers, except the lord Chamberlaine, whom the protector bad speeche and shynke him aspace, for by S. Paul (quoth he) I will not to stirre till I see thy head off.

It boted him not to aske why, but heauilie tooke a piteet at auenture, and made a short thrist, for a longer would not be suffered, the protector made so much haste to dinner, which he might not go to, till this were done, for saving of his oth. So was he brought forth into the greene beside the chappell with in the tower, and his head laide downe vpon a long log of timber, and there stricken off, and afterward his body with the head entered at Windsoe beside the body of king Edward.

A marvellous case is it to heare either the warnings of that he should haue boded, or the tokens of that he could not vobde, for the selfe night next before his death, the L. Stanley sent a trustie secret messenger vnto him at mid night in the haste, requiring him to rise and ride away with him, for he was disposed bitterly no longer to bide, he had so fearfull a dreame, in which him thought, that a boare with his tuskes so rased them both by the heads, that the blood ran about both their shoulders. And for as much as the protector gaue the boare for his cognizance, this dreame made so fearfull an impression in his hart, that he was thoroughly determined no longer to tarris, but had his horse readie, if the L. Hastings would go with him to ride yet so far the same night, that they should be out of danger ere day. A good lord (quoth the lord Hastings to this messenger) leaneth my lord thy master so much to such trildes, y<sup>e</sup> hath such faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantasisset, or doe rise in the nightes red by reason of his daie thoughts: Tell him it is plaine witchcraft to be leue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinkest he not that we might be as likely to make them true by our going, if we were caught and brought backe (as friends saile siders) for then had the boare a cause likely to race vs with his tuskes, as folke that steebe for some saluadge: wherefore either is there no perill, nor none there is in deede; or if any be, it is rather in going than biding. And if we should needes coost fall in perill one way or other, yet had I leifer that men should see that it were by other mens falseness, than thinke it were either by our owne fault, or saint heart: And therefore go to thy master man and commend me to him, and pray him to be merry, and haue no feare: for I ensure him I am as sure of the man that he wotech of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send grace Sir, quoth the messenger, and went his waie.

Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the towne the same morning in which he was beheaded, his horse tolde of thysle stumbled wth him, almost to the falling: which thing albeit each man wot well daily happeneth to them to whom no such mischance is toward, yet hath it bene of an olde witte and Cuiusdam obserued as a token of tentimes notable foregoing some great misfortune.

Now this that followeth was no warning, but an envious scoone.

The same morning ere he was vp, came a knight vnto him as it were of curtesie, to accompany him to the councell, but of truch sent by the protector: to haue him thitherwards, with whom he was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, and now of great authoritie.

This knight when it happened the Lord Chamberlaine by the waie to take his horse, and commune a while with a priest whom he met in the Towne street, brake his tale, and said merrilie to him, what my Lorde, I praye you come on, whereto talke you so long with that priest, you haue no need of a priest yet: and therewith he laughed vpon him, as though hee would say, ye shall haue sone. But so little wist the other what he meant, and so little mistrusted, that he was neuer merrier, nor neuer so full of god hope in his life, which selfe thing is often seene a signe of change. But I shall rather let any thing passe me, than the vaine surety of mans mind so nere his death.

Vpon the very towne wharfe, so nere the place where his head was stroke off soon after, there met he with one Hastings a puruant of his owne name: and of their meeting in that place, he was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before to meet in like manner together in the same place. At which other time the Lorde Chamberlaine had bene accused vnto King Edward by the Lorde Rivers the Quenes brother, in such wise as hee was for the while, but it lasted not long, farre fallen into the kings intiguation, and stood in great feare of himselfe: And for as much as he nowe met this puruant in the same place that he ordeie so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof, with whom hee had before talked thereof in the same place, while hee was the rein. And therefore hee saide: Ah Hastings, art thou remembered when I met thee here once with an heauie heart? Yea my Lorde quoth he, that remember I well, and thanked be God, they got no god, nor you no harme thereby. Thou wouldest say so, quoth he, if thou knewest as much as I know, which few know else as yet, and no shall shortly. What meant he by the Lordes of the Quenes kindred that were taken before, and should that daie be beheaded at Pontfrad: which he well wist, but nothing ware that the King ouer his owne head. In faith man, quoth hee, I was neuer so sore, no: neuer stood in so great dread in my life, as I did when thou and I met here: And so how the world is turned, now stand mine enemies in the danger, as thou maist say to beare more hereafter, and I neuer in my life so merrie, nor ever in so great suretie.

A good God, the blindness of our mortal nature, when he most feared, he was in god suretie: when he reckoned himselfe sure he lost his life, and that within two houers after.

Thus ended this honourable man, a good knight and a gentle, of great authoritie with his prince, of lining somewhat discoloure, plaine, and open to his enemy, and secret to his friend, easie to beguile, as he that of good hart and courage fore: studied no perills: a louing man, and passing well beloved: very faithfull and trustie enough, trusting too much. Now stee the same of this Lordes death swiftille through the citie, and so forth farther about like a wind in every mans eare.

But the protector immediately after dinner, intending to set some colour vpon the matter, sent in all haste for manie substantiall men out of the Citie into the towne: And at their coming, himselfe with the duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old ill faring Briganders, such as no man should wene that they would vouchsafe to haue put vpon their backs, except that some sudden necessity had constrained them.

And then the protector shewed them, that the lord chamberlaine and other of his confederates had contriued to haue suddenly distressed him and the Duke, yet the same daie in the Councell. And what they intended further was as yet not well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge before: at the clocke the same forenoone, which sudden feare diuine them to put on for their defence such harnesse as came next to hand. And so had God holpen the m, that the mischief turned vpon them that would haue done it. And this he requied them to report.

Euery man answered him false, as though no man misdeeded the matter, which of troth no man belieued. Yet for the further appealing of the peoples mind, he sent immediately after dinner in all haste, an Herald of arms, with a proclamation to be made through the Citie in the kings name, containing that the Lord Hastings with diuers other of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same daie, to haue slaine the Lorde protector and the duke Buckingham, sitting in the Councell, and after to haue taken vpon them to rule the king and the Realme, at their pleasure, and thereby to pill and spoile whom they like vnccontrolled. And much matter there was in that proclamation, deuised to the slander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an euill Counsellor to the kings father, enticing him to manie things sightly rebounding to the diminishing of his honour, and to the vniuersall hurt of his Realme by his euill companie, amiser procuring, and vnglacions ensample, as well in manie other thinges, as in the vicious living and inordinate abundance of his bodie, both with manie other, and also especiallie with Shores wife which was one also of his most secrete Councell of this heinous treason, with whom hee late nightlie, and namely, the night last past next before his death, so that it was the lesse maruell, if vnglacions King brought him to an vnhappie ending, which he was now put vnto, by the most breade commaundement of the Kings highnesse, and of his honourable and faithfull Councell, both for his demerites, being so openly taken in his falsly concealed treason.

also least the delaying of his execution might haue encouraged other mischievous persons partners of his owne conspiracie, to gather and assemble themselves together, in making some great commotion for his deliuerance: whose hope being now by his well deserued death politickely repressed, all the Malice should by Gods grace rest in good quiet and peace.

Now was this proclamation made within two holwers after that hee was beheaded, and it was so curiouslie indited, and so faire wrytten in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, that euery childe might well perceiue that it was prepared before. For all the time betwene his death and the proclaiming coulde scant haue sufficed vnto the bare wryting alone, all had it bene but in paper, and scribled forth in haste at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was scholemaster of Pauls, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnes of the time with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him: Heere is a gale goodlie cast, soule cast awaie for haste: and a merchant answered him, that it was wrytten by prophesie. Now then by and by as it were for anger, not for courtesie, the prelate sent into the house of Shores wiife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled her of all that euer she had, aboue the value of two or three thousand marke, & sent her bodie to prison: And when he had a while laid vnto her (for the manner sake) that she went about to bewitch him, and that there was of counsell with the Lord Chamberlaine to destroy him: in conclusion, when that no colour could fasten vpon these matters, then he laid heinously to her charge, that thynge that herselfe coulde not denie, that all the while wiff was true, and that notwithstanding euery man laughed at, to heare it then so suddenly, so highly taken, that she was naught of her bodie.

And so, this cause (as a good continent prince, cleane and faultlesse of himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious world for; & amendment of mens manners) he caused the Bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the crosse in procession vpon a sundale with a taper in her hand: In which she went in countenance and pace becomme to womanlie, and albeit there were out of all arais sawe her little onely, yet went she so faire and lowly, namelie while the wondering of the people cast a comely rud in her cheekes (of which she herselfe had most misse); that hir great shame wanne hir much praise, among those that were more amorous of hir body, than curious of hir soule. And many good folke also that hated hir liuing, and glad were to see sin corrected: yet pitied the more hir penance, than relished therein, when they considered that the prelate procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

This woman was borne in London, two thysipfully friended, honestly brought vp, and verie well married, sauing somewhat too soone, her husbande an honest citizen, young and godly, and of good substance: But for as much as they were compleere they were well ripe, she not very feruently loued, for whom she neuer longed, which was happily the thing that the more easily made hir incline vnto the kings appetite, when he requyred her. Wherby the respect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparell, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth, was able some to pierce a list tender hart.

But when the king had abused her, anone hir husband (as he was an honest man, and one that coulde his god, not presuming to touch a kings Concubine) left hir vp to him altogether.

When the king died the Lord Chamberlaine took her, which in the kings daies, albeit he was loze enamoured vpon hir, yet he forbore her, either for reverence, or for a certaine fitendly faithfulness: proper the was and faire, nothing in her bodie that you woulde haue changed, but if you woulde haue wished her somewhat higher.

Thus saie they that knewe hir in her youth, albeit some that now see hir (for yet shee liueth) daeme hir neuer to haue bene well visaged, whose iudgement seemeth me somewhat like; as though men should gesse the beautie of one long before departed, by her scalpe taken out of the charnell house: for now is shee old, leane, tolthered, and dyed by, nothing left but riueld skin & hard bone. And yet being euen such: who so well aduise hir visage, might gesse and denie, which parts how filled would make it a faire face; yet belist not men so much in her beautie as in her pleasant behauior. For a proper wit had she, & could both read well and wryte, merry in companie, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure, and not without sport.

The king would say that he had three Concubines, which in three diuers properties diuerlye excelled. One the merriest, another the wildest, the third the holiest harlot in his realme, as one whome no man coulde get out of the Church lightly to any place, but it were to his bed. The other two were somewhat greater personages, & notwithstanding of their humilitie content to be nameles, and so for bare the praise of those properties. But the merriest was this Shores wiife, in whom the king therefore took speciall pleasure. For manie hee had, but her beloued, whose sake; to saue the troth (for sin it were to telle the diuell) she neuer abused to any mans hurt, but to manie a mans comfort and relesse, where the king took displeasure, shee would mitigate and appeale his mind: where men were out of fauour, shee would bring them in his grace. For manie that had highly offended shee obtayned pardon: & great forfeitures they gat men remission: And finally, in manie weighty suites the Lord many men in great dead, either for none or verie small rewarde, and those rather gale then rich: either for that shee was contente with the dæd it selfe well done, or for that shee belist to bee sued vnto, and to theiue what shee was able to dooe with the king, or for that wanton women and wealthie bee not alwayes content.

I doubt not some shall thinke this woman too lighte a thing to bee wrytten of, and set among the remembraunces of great matters: which they shall speciallie thinke, that happilie shall esteeme hir onely by that they now see her. But mee seemeth the chaunce so much the more woorthie to bee remembred, in howe much shee is now in the more beggerlike condition, vnkinted and come out of acquaintance, after good substance, after as greates fauour with the Prince, after as greates suite and seeking to with all those that those daies had businesse to speere, as manie other men were in their times, which be now.

no lve famous onely by the infamie of their ill dedes. Her doings were not much lesse, albeit they be much lesse remembred because they were not so full. For men die if they have an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who so doth vs a good turne, we write it in dust, which is not too fast pased by her: for at this day the beggett of many at this day liuing, that at this day had begged if she had not bene.

Howe was it so deuised by the Protector and his counsaile, that the selfe daie in which the Lorde Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe same houre, was there (not without his assent) beheaded at Pontfraite, the foremenembred Lodes and knights that were taken from the king at Northampton and from Stratforde. Which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe knight, whole seruice the Protector specially used in that counsell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had been long secret with him, having experience of the world, and a shrewd wit, thot and raide in speech, rough and boysterous of behauiour, bold in iudgement, as farre from pittie as from all feare of God.

This knight bringing them out of the prison to the scaffold, and shewing to the people about that they were traitors, not suffering them to declare and speake their innocencie, least their wordes might haue inclined men to pittie them, and to hate the Protector and his part: caused them hastily without iudgement, processe, or maner of order, to be beheaded, & without other easily guilt, but onely that they were good men, to true to the king, and too nigh to the queene.

Howe when the lord Chamberlaine and the se other lodes and knights were thus beheaded and rid out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men trusted what the matter went, while the lodes of the realme were about him out of their owne strengthes, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whome to trust, ere euer they should haue space to dispute and digest the matter and make parties, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the crowne, ere men coulde haue time to deuise any way to resist.

But nowe was all the studie by what meane this matter being of it selfe so heynous, might be first spoken to the people, in such wise that it might be well taken.

To this Counsell they toke diuers, such as they thought meetely to be trusted, likely to be indued to that part, and able to stand them in steede either by power or policie.

Among whome they made of Counsaile Edmond Shaa knight then mayor of London, which vpon trust of his owne aduancement, whereof he was of a proud hart highly desirous, should frame the city to their appetite. Of Spirituall men they toke such as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience.

Among these had they John Shaa Clearche, brother to the mayor, and Sir Richard Ratcliffe, provinciall of the Augustine Friers, both doctores of Divinitie, both great preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. For they were before greatly esteemed among the people: but after that neuer. At the first the one had a sermon in praise of the protector before the coronation, the other after, both so full of tedious flattery, that no mans eares could abide them.

Pinke in his sermon so lost his voice, that hee was faine to lerne off and come doونه in the midst. Doctor Shaa by his sermon lost his honestie, and some after his life, for verie shame of the world, into which he durst neuer alter come abroad. But the frier forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt and many thinke, that Pinke was not of counsaile of the matter before the coronation, but after the common maner, fell to flattery after: namely sith his sermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at Saint Sparie Hospitall at the Easter after. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaa was of counsaile in the beginning, so farre forth, that they determined that he should first breake the matter in a sermon at Pauls Crosse, in which hee should by the authoritie of his preaching, incline the people to the protectors ghosly purpose.

But nowe was all the labour and studie, in the deuise of some convenient pretext, for which the people should be content to depose the Prince, and accept the protector for king. In which diuers things they deuised. But the chiefe thing and the weight of all that inuention rested in this, that they should alledge Bassardie, either in king Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both. So that he should seeme disabled to inherite the crowne, by the Duke of York, and the Prince by him.

To lay Bassardie in king Edward sounded openly to the rebuke of the protectors owne mother, which was mother to them both: for in that point coulde be none other colour but to pretend that his owne mother was an aduonresse, which notwithstanding, to further this purpose he litted not: but nayther lesse, he woulde that point should be lesse and more favourable handle, not euert subtle plaine and directlie, but that the matter should be touched aloope craftilie, as though men spured in that point to speake all the troth, for feare of his displeasure.

But the other point concerning the Bassardie that they deuised to surmise in king Edwards children, that woulde he should be openly declared, and infused to the uttermost. The colour and pretext whereof, cannot be well perceiued, but if we first repate you some things long before done about king Edwards marriage.

After that King Edward the 4 had deposed King Henry the first, and was in peaceable possession of the realme, determining himselfe to marry, as it was requisite both for himselfe and for the realme, he sent ouer in ambassade the earle of Warwicke, with other noble men in his companie vnto Spaine, to intreate and conclude a marriage betwene King Edward and the kings daughter of Spaine. In which thing the Earle of Warwicke found the parties so towarde and willing, that he speedily according to his instructions without anie difficultie, brought the matter to very good conclusion.

How

Dame Elizabeth.

So we happened it, that in the meane season there came to make suite by petition to the king Dame Elizabeth Grey, which was after his Duene, at that time a widow, hozne of noble blood, specialtie by her mother, which was Duchesse of Bedford ere she married the Lord Woodville her father. Whobest this Dame Elizabeth her selfe, beeing in seruice with Duene Margaret wife unto king Henry the first, was married onto one Iohn Grey an esquire, whom king Henry made knight, vpon the field that he had on Barnet heath by. Albons against king Edward. And little while enioied he that knightshood, for he was at the same field slaine.

After which done, and the earle of Marlowke being in his ambassade about the afore remembred marriage, this poore Ladie made humble suite vnto the king, that shee might bee restored vnto such small landes as her late husband had giuen her in iointure. Whome when the king behelde, and hearde her speake, as she was both faire and of a goodlie fauor, moderate of stature, well made, and verie wise: he not onclie pittied her, but also wared enamoured of her: and taking her for secrettie aside, beganne to enter in talking more familiarlie. Whose appetite when shee perceiued, shee vertuously denied him. But that did the so wiselie, and with so good manner, and wordes so well set, that he rather kindled his desire than quenched it.

And finallie, after manie a meeting, much toying, and many great promises, she well espyed the kings affection toward her so greatly increased, that she durst somewhat the more boldlie saie her mind, as to him whose heart she perceived more seruientlie set, than to fall off for a word.

And in conclusion, shee shewed him playne, that as shee wisde her selfe too simple to bee his wife, so thought shee her selfe too good to bee his Concubine. The king much maruelling at her constancie, as he that had not bene wont else where to bee so stiffelie sayde naie, so much esteemed her continencie, and chastitie, that hee sette her vertue in steade of possession and riches, and thus taking counsaile of his desire, determined in all possible haste to marrie her.

And after hee thus appointed, and had betwene them twaine ensured her: then asked hee counsaile of his other friends, and that in such manner, as they might then perceiue, it booted not greatlie to saie naie. Notwithstanding the Dutches of Burke his mother was so sore moued therewith, that she dissuaded the marriage as much as she possibly might, alledging that it was his honour, profit, and suretie also, to marrie in a noble pogenie out of his Realme, whereupon depended great strength to his Estate, by the assistance and great possibilitie of increase of his possession. And that hee coulde not wel otherwise do, standing that the earle of Marlowke had so far moued already, which were not likely to take it wel, if all his dotage were in such wise frustrated and his appointments deluded. And the saide also, that it was not princelie to marrie his owne subiect, no great occasion leading therunto, no possessions, or other commodity depending thereupon, but only as it were a rich man that woulde marrie his maide, onlie for a little wanton dotage vpon his person. In which marriage many mo commend the maidens fortune than the matters

wisdomme. And yet therein shee saide there was moze honestie than honour in this marriage: for as much as there is betwene no merchant and his owne maide so great difference, as betwene the king and this widow. In whose person, albeit there was nothing to be misliked, yet was there (the saide) nothing so excellent but that it mought be found in diuers other that were moze metelie (quoth she) for your estate, and maidens also, whereas the onclie wisdomme of Elizabeth Grey, though she were in all other thinges conuenient for you, shoulde yet suffice, as me seemeth, to restraine you from her marriage, sith it is an vnstitting thing, and a verie blemish and high disparagement to the sacred maiestie of a prince, that ought as nigh to appoynt priest-hood in cleanness as he doth in dignitie, to be defouled with bigamie in his first marriage.

The king then his mother had saide, made her aunswere, part in earnest, part in p'aie mertrie, as hee that wisde himselfe out of her rule. And albeit, hee woulde gladlie that shee shoulde take it wel, yet was at a point in his own minde, tooke shee it wel or otherwise. Whobest somewhat to satisfie her, he saide, that albeit marriage being a spirituall thing, ought rather to be made for the respect of God, where his grace enclineth the parties to loue together, as he trusted it was in his, than for the regard of any temporell advantage: yet notwithstanding, him seemed that this marriage cuen toochelic considered, was not vnprofitable. For he reckoned the amitie of no earthlie nation so necessarie for him, as the friendship of his owne, which he thought likelie to beare him so much the moze heartie fauour, in that hee was disdaind not to marrie with one of his owne land. And yet if outwarde alliance were thought so requisite, he woulde finde the meanes to enter therunto, much better by other of his kin, where all the parties coulde be contented, than to marrie himselfe whome hee shoulde happilie neuer loue, and for the possibilitie of more possessions, leefe the fruite and pleasure of this that he had already. For small pleasure taketh a man in all that euer he hath beside, if he be vsured against his appetite. And I doubt not (quoth he) but there be as ye say other, that be in euerie point comparable with him: and therefore I let not them that like them to wed them: For moze is reason, that it mislike any man, that I marrie where it liketh mee. And I am sure that my Cousin of Marlowke neyther longeth mee so little, to grudge at that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I shoulde in chosse of a wife, rather bee ruled by his ele, than by mine owne: as though I were a ward that were bound to marrie by the appointment of a guardian. I woulde not be a king with that condition, to forebeare mine owne libertie in chosse of mine owne marriage.

As for possibilitie of more inheritance by new assistance in strange lands, is oft the occasion of more trouble than profite: and we haue already title by that meanes, to so much as sufficeth to get and keepe well in one mans dates. What she is a widow and hath already children, by gods blessed lady I am a bachelor and haue some too, and so each of vs hath a proofe that neither of vs is like to be barraine. And therefore (madam) I pray you be content, I trust in God she shall bring forth a young prince that shall please you. And as for the Bigamie, let the Bishop hardlie laie it in his tale when I come to take orders: for

The kings mother.

I vnderstand it is forbidden a Priest, but I neuer will it yet, that it was forbidden a Prince.

The dutches with these wordes nothing appraied, and seeing the king to let the person, that she could not pull him backe, so highlie she disdained it, that vnder pretext of her dutie to godward, she deuilled to disturb this marriage, and rather to helpe that he should marrie one dame Elizabeth Lucie, whom the king had also not long before gotten with childe. Wherefore the kings mother openlie obieced against his marriage, as it were in discharge of her conscience, that the king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucie, and her husband before God. My reason of which wordes, such obstacle was made in the matter, that either the bishops durst not, or the king would not proceede to the solemnization of this wedding, till these faime were clearely purged, and the troth well and openlie testified. Whereupon dame Elizabeth Lucie was sent for.

And albeit that she was by the kings mother and manie other put in god comfort, to assure that she was ensured vnto the king: yet when she was solemnly sworne to saie the troth, she confessed that they were neuer ensured, Whosoeuer she saide his grace spake so louing wordes vnto her, that she verily hoped he would haue married her. And that if it had not been for such kind wordes, she would neuer haue shewed such kindnes to him, to let him so kindly get her with childe.

This examination solemnelie taken, when it was clearely perceived that there was none impediment: the k. with great feast and honorable solemnity, married dame Elizabeth Grey, and her crowned queene that was his enemies wife, and manie time had praised full heartily for his losse, in which God loued her better than to grant her her bone.

But when the earle of Warwicke vnderstood of this marriage, he toke it so highly that his ambassage was deluded, that for verie anger and disaime, he at his returning assembled a great poissance against the king, and came to saile vpon him: he could be able to resist, that he was faine to vould the realme, and fle into Holland for succor, where he remained for the space of two yers, leauing his neie wife in Westminster in Sanctuary, where she was belivered of Edward the Prince, of whom we before haue spoken. In which meane time the earle of Warwicke toke out of prison, & set vp againe H. Henry the first, which was before by E. Edward deposed, and that much what by the power of the earle of Warwicke which was a wise man, and a couragious warriour, and of such strength, that for his lardes, his alliaunce, and fauor with all people, that he made king, and put downe kings almost at his pleasure, and not impossible to haue attained it himselfe, if hee had not reckoned it a greater thing to make a king than to be a king. But nothing lasteth alway: for in conclusion E. Edward returned, and with much lesse number than he had at Barnet on the Cofferday field, slew the earle of Warwicke, with many other great estates of that partie, and so stable attained the crowne againe, that he peaceably enjoyed it untill his dying daie: and in such plight left it, that it could not be lost, but by the discord of his very friends, or falsehoode of his fained friends. I haue rehearsed this businesse about this marriage some what the more at length, because because it might thereby the better appeare vpon how slipper a ground the protector builded his coloy, by which he pretended king Edwards childe to be bastards: But that inuention simple as it was, it liked them to whom it sufficed to haue somewhat to saie, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger proofe than the mislikes left to make.

Now then (as I began to shew you) it was by the protector and his counsell conuincid, that this Doctor Shaa should in a Sermon at Pauls crosse signifye to the people, that neither king Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, were lawfullie begotten, nor were not the verie children of the duke of Yorke, but begotten unlawfullie by other persons, by aduourtie of the dutches the mother. And that also dame Elizabeth Lucy was verilie the wife of king Edward, and so the prince and all his children bastards, that were begotten vpon the Quene. According to this deuise Doctor Shaa the Monday after, at Pauls Crosse in a great audience (as a whole assembled greates number to his preaching) he toke for his theme Spuria uisulamin a non agent radices aliat. That is to saie: Bastard slips shall neuer take deepe roote.

Thereupon when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secret his inuention in right generation after the lawes of matrimoine, then declared he that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parentes were for the more part unhappie which were gotten in base, and speciallie in aduourtie, of which though some by the ignorance of the world and the truth hid from knowledge inherited for the reason other mens lands, yet God always is prouident, that it continueth not in their blood long, but the truth coming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the Bastard slippe pulled vp ere it can bee rooted deepe. And when he had laide for the proofe and confirmation of this sentence certaine exampls taken out of the olde Testament, and other auncient Histories, then beganne he to descend into the praise of the E. H. R. Richard late Duke of Yorke, calling him father to the lord protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the crowne. to whom it was after the death of king Henry the first entailed by authoritie of Parliament. Then shewed hee that his verie right heire of his whole lawfullie begotten was onlie the Lord protector: for he declared then, that king Edward was neuer lawfullie married vnto the Quene, but was before God husband vnto dame Elizabeth Lucie, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither king Edward himselfe, nor the duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the house hold, were reckoned verie surely for the children of the noble Duke, as those that by their famous more resembled other knowne men than him. From whose vertuous conditions he saide also that king Edward was far off. But the Lord protector he said, the verie noble prince, the speciall paterne of knightly prowes, as well in al princely behauior, as in the lineaments and fauor of his visage, represented the very face of the noble duke his father. This is quoth he, the fathers stone figure, this is his stone countenance, the very print of his visage, the very sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likeness of that noble duke.

Now was it before decided, that in the speaking of these wordes, the protector

teador should haue come in among the people to the Sermon wards, to the end that those meeting with his presence, might haue bene taken among the hearers, as though the holie Ghost had put them in the preachers mouth, and should haue moued the people even the more to erie, king Richard, king Richard, that it might haue bene after sayde, that hee was speciallie chosen by God, and in manner by miracle. But this deuile quailed, either by the Protector's negligence, or the Preachers ouermuch diligence. For while the Protector founde by the waie tarrying, least hee should present those wordes, and the Doctor fearing that hee should come ere his Sermon coulde come to these wordes, hastied his matter thereto, who was come to them, and pacie them, and entred into other matters ere the Protector came. Whome when hee behelde comming, hee todaynelle left the matter with which hee was in hand, and without anie deduction the reunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, beganne to repeat those wordes agayne: This is the verie Noble Prince, the speciall paterne of Knighthlie valours, which as wel in all princely behaviour, as in the lincamentes and fauour of his visage, representeth the verie face of the noble duke of Yorke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie printe of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenes of the noble duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he liueth. While these wordes were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, went through the people into the place where the doctors commonly stand in the vpper choir, where hee stode to hearken the Sermon. But the people were so far from crying king Richards, that they stood as they had bene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull Sermon.

Preacher.

After which once ended, the Preacher gat him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept him out of sight like an Wolfe. And when hee once asked one that had bene his old friend, what the people talked of him, all yett that his owne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yett when the other answered him, that there was in euery mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so stroke him to the hart, that with in few daies after hee withered and consumed awaie.

The 21. of June.

Then on the Tuesday following this sermon, there came into the Wilde hall in London the duke of Buckingham, accompanied with dukes, lords and knights, more than happilie knewe the message that they brought. And there in the East ende of the hall, where the Chaire kepteth the Hastings, the malor, & all the Aldermen being assembled about him, all the commons of the citie gathered before them: after silence commaunded vpon great paine in the protector's name, the duke stood vp, and (as hee was not ther vnkerned, and of nature maruailously wel spoken) he said vnto the people with a cleare and a loud voice in this manner of wile.

The Duke of Buckingham's Oration.

Friends, for the zeale and heartie fauour that hee beare you, wee bee come to breake vnto you, of a matter right great and ineightrie, and no lesse weightie than pleading to God, and profitable to all the Realme: no; to no part of the realme more profitable, than to you the Citizens of this noble Citie. For whi, that thing that wee tooke well ye haue long time lacked, and sore longed for, that ye would haue given great good for, that ye would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing wee be come hither to bring you without your labour, paine, cost, adventure, or leoparde. That thing is that: Certes the suretie of your owne bodies, the quiet of your Wives and your Daughters, the safegarde of your gods: of all which thinges in time past ye stood cuer more in doubt. For who was there of you all, that would reckon himselfe lord of his owne goods among so many greins and traps as were set thefore, among so much pilling and polling, among so manie taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, and of tentimes no need: or if anie were, it rather grew of riot, and vnreasonable wast, than anie necessarie or honorable charge? So that there was dalleie pilled from good men and honest great substance of goods to be lashed out among suchifists, so farre forth that straitnes sufficed not, nor anie vnsall manner of knowle Taxes: but vnder an easie name of beneuolence and good will, the Commissioners so much of euery man tooke, as no man could with his god will haue giuen: as though that name of beneuolence, had signified that euery man should pay not what himselfe of his owne god will list to grant, but what the king of his good will list to take. Which neuer asked little, but euery thing was hauled about the measure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ranlams, small trespasses into mispission, mispission into treason. Whereof I thinke no man lootheth that we should remember you of examples by name, as though Burder were forgotten, that was for a word spoken in haste cruelly beheaded, by the misconstruing of the lawes of this realme for the princes pleasure; with no lesse honour to Marcam then chiefe Justice, that left his office rather than he would assent to that indgement, than to the dishonesty of those that either for feare or flattery gaue that iudgement. What Cooke your owne woorthifull neighbor, alderman and malor of this noble citie, who is of you either so negligent that he knoweth not, or so forgetfull that hee remembreth not, or so hard harted that he pitteth not that woorthifull mans losse; what speake we of losse? his better spoile and vnderferued destruction, onclie for that it happened those to fauor him whome the prince fauoured not. Wee need not I suppose to rehearse of these anie mo by name, sith there bee (I doubt not) manie here present, that either in themselves, or in their nigh friends haue knowle as well their gods as their persons, greatlie indangered, either by fained quarrels, or small matters agreed with heynous names. And also there was no crime so greates, of which there coulde lacke a pretext. For sith the king presenting the time of his inheritance attayned the Crowne by battell: it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason, to haue bene of kindred or alliance, nere familiaritie, or longer acquaintance with anie of those that were at anie time the Enemies, which was at one time & other, more than halfe the realm. Thus were neither your gods in safety, yett they brought your bodies in jeopardy, beside the common adventure of open war, which albeit that it is neuer the will & occasion of much mischief, yett it is neuer so mischifuous as where a few people fall at distance among themselves, now in none earthly nation, so deadly & so pestilent, as when it hapneth among vs: & among vs neuer so long continued dissention, nor so manie battailles in that season, nor so cruel and so deablie foughten, as was in that kungs daies that dead is, God forgive it his soule. In whose time, and by whose occasion, what about the getting of the realme, keeping it, feeling, and winning againe, it hath cost more English blood, than hath twice the winning of France. In which inward warre among our selues, hath bene so great effusion of the ancient noble blood of this realme, that scarcely the halfe remaineth, to the great enskibling of this noble land, beside many a good to one ransacked and spoiled by them, that have bene going to the helde or coming from thence: And peace long after not much surer then warre. So that no time was there, in which rich men for their money, and great men for their lawes, or some other for some feare, or some displeasure were not out of perill. For whome trusted he that mistruised his owne brother? whome spared he that killed his owne brother? or who coulde perswade lone him, if his owne brother coulde not? What manner of folke he most fauoured we shall for his honor spare to speake of, howbeit, this tooke you well all, that who so was best, bare alwaie least rule, and moze lute was in his daies unto Shores wife, a vile and an abhominable strumpet, than to all the lordes in Englande, except unto those that made her their protecto: which simple woman was well named and honest, till the king for his wanton lust and sinfull affection bereft her from her husbande, a right honest substantiall young man among you. And in that point, which in god faith I am soie to speake of, sauing that it is in vaine to kepe in counsil that thing that all men knowe, the kings greedy appetite was insatiable, and euery where ouer all the realme intolerable: for no woman was there any where, young or olde, rich or poore, whom he set his eye vpon, in whom he any thing liked, either person or fauor, speech, pace, or countenance, but without any feare of God, or respect of his honour, murmur or grudge of the world, he would importunely pursue his appetite, and haue her, to the great destruction of many a good woman, and great dolor to their husbands and their other friends, which being honest people of themselves, so much regard the cleannesse of their house, the chastity of their wiues and their chylren, that they were leauer to lese all that they haue beside, than to haue such a villany done them. And all were it that with this and other impossible dealings, the realme was in euerie part annoted: yet specially pe here the citizens of this noble city, as wel for that amongst you is most plenty of all such thinges as minister matter to such inuories, as for that you were nearest at hand, with that nere beereabout was commonly his most abiding. And yet be ye the people whom he had as singular cause well and kindly to intreat, as any part of his realme, not only for that the prince by this noble city, as his especiall chamber, & the speciall well renowned city of his realm, much honorable fame receiue among all other nations: but also for that ye, not without your great cost, and sundry perils and teopardies in all his wars, bare euen your speciall fauor to his part, which your kinde mindes borne unto the house of York, with be hath nothing twofoldly acquired, there is of that house that none by Gods grace better shall, which thing to thewe you, is the word summe and effect of this our present errand. It shall not, I tooke well, need that

I hearse to you againe that ye haue already heard, of him that can better tell it, & of whom I am sure ye will better beleue it. and reason is that it so be. I am not so proud to looke therefore, that ye should reckon my wordes of as great authoritie as the preachers of the word of God, namely, a man so cunning and so wise, that no man better wotteth what he should saie, and therto so good and vertuous, that he would not saie the thing which he wold he should not saie, in the pulpet, namely, into the which no honest man cometh to lye, which honorable preacher ye well remember substantiallly declared vnto you at Pauls Crosse, on Sunday last passed, the right and title, that the most excellent Prince Richard Duke of Gloucester, now protecto: of this realme hath vnto the crowne and kingdome of the same. For as the worshipfull man groundly made open vnto you, the chylren of king Edward the 4. were neuer lawfully begotten, for as much as the king (leaving his very wife Dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfully married vnto the Quene their mother, whose blood, sauing that he let his voluptuous pleasure be for his honor, was full vnmeetly be matched with his, and the mingling of whose bloods together, hath bene the effusion of great part of the noble blood of this realme. Whereby it may well seme the marriage not well made, of which there is so much mischiefel growne: for lacke of which lawfull accomplishing, and also of other thinges which the false worshipfull doctor rather signified than folliely explained, and which thinges shall not be spoken for mee, as the thing wherein euery man so deareth to say that he knoweth in avoiding displeasure of my noble Loyde protecto:, bearing, as nature requireth, a filiall reuerence to the Dutchesse his mother, for these causes I saie before remembred, that is to wit, for lacke of other issue lawfully coming of the late noble prince Richard Duke of Yorke, to whose roiall blood the crowne of England and of France, is by the high authoritie of parliament entailed, the right and title of the same, is by the iust course of inheritance according to the common lawes of this land, deuolue and comen vnto the most excellent Prince the Lord protecto:, as to the verie lawfully begotten sonne of the foreremembred noble Duke of Yorke. Which thing well considered, and the great knightly prouesse pondered, with manifold vertues which in his noble person singularly abound, the nobles and commons also of this realme, and specially of the north part, not willing anie bastard blood to haue the rule of the land, nor the abusions before in the same bred anie longer to continue, haue condescended and fully determined to make humble petition to the most puissant prince the lord protecto:, that it may like his grace at our humble request, to take vpon him the guiding and governance of this realm, to the wealth and encrease of the same, according to his very right and iust title. Which thing I wrote it well, he will be loath to take vpon him, as he whose wisdom well perceiveth the labour and studie both of minde and bodie, that shall come therewith, to whom neuer so will occupie the roime, as I dare saie he will, if he take it. Which roime I warne you well is no childes office: And that the great wise man well perceived when he said: Pa regno cuius rex puer est: Woe is that realme that hath a childe to their king. Wherefore so much the moze cause haue we to thanke

God.

God, that this noble personage which is so righteously intituled thereunto, is of so sad age, and thereunto so great wisdome loyned with so great experience, which albeit he will be loath (as I haue said) to take it vpon him, yet shal he to our petition in that behalfe the more graciouly incline, if yee the worshipfull citizens of this chiefe city of this realme, ioine with vs the nobles in our said request. Which for your owne weale we doubt not but ye will: and naye the lesse I heartily praiſe you so to do, whereby you shall do great profit to all this realme beside, in choosing the m to god a king, and vnto your selfe speciall commoditie, to whom his spaciety shall euer after beare so much the more tender fauor, in how much he shall perceiue you the more proue and beneuolently minded toward his election. Wherein deare friends what minde you haue, we require you plainly to shew vs.

When the Duke had said, and looked that the people whom he hoped that the Spaior had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cried King Richard, King Richard, all was hush and mute, and not one word answered thereunto: where the Duke was maruelously abashed, & taking the maior nearer to him, with other that were about him privie to that matter, said vnto them softly, what meaneth this, that this people bee so still? Sir (quoth the Spaior) perceale they perceiue you not well. That shall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe.

And by and by somewhat louder he rehearsed them the same matter againe in other order and with other wordes so wel and ornately, and naye the lesse so evidently and plaine, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comely, and so convenient, that euerie man much marvelled that heard him, and thought that they neuer had in their liues heard so euill a tale so well tolde.

But were it for wonder or feare, or that each looke that other should speake first; not one word was there answered of all the people that stood before; but all was as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning amongst them, by which they might seeme to commune what was best to doe. When the Spaior saw this, he with other partners of that Councell belyue about the Duke, and said that the people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken vnto, but by the Recorder, which is the mouth of the citie, and happily to him they will answer. Whith that the Recorder called Fitz William, a sad man and an honest, which was so new come into that office, that he neuer had spoken to the people before, & loath was with that matter to begin; notwithstanding, therunto commanded by the Spaior, made hearefall to the Commons of that the Duke had twice rehearsed to them himselfe. But the Recorder so tempered his tale, that he shewed euerie thing as the Dukes wordes, and no part of his owne. But all this noting, no change made in the people, which alway after one, stood as they had bene men amazed. Whereupon the Duke rowned vnto the Spaior and said: this is a maruelous obstinate silence, and the rewhy he turned vnto the people againe with these wordes: Deare friends, we come to moue you to that thing which peradventure we not so greatly needed, but that the Lords of this realme, and the Commons of other parties might haue sufficed: saying that we such loue beare you, and so much set by you, that we would not not gladlie doe without you, that thing in which to be partners is your weale and honor, which as it seemeth, either you see not, or wey not. Therefore we require you give vs answer one or other whether yee be minded as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue this Noble Prince nowe Protector, to be your King or not.

At these wordes the people began to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voice was neither lowde nor distinct, but as it were the sounde of a swarme of Bees, till at the last in the weather ende of the Hall, a bolyment of the Dukes seruants and halshields, and other longing to the Protector, with some prentises and laddes that thrust into the Hall among the people, began suddenly at mens backs to crye out as lowde as their throates would giue, King Richard, King Richard, and thye to by their caps in token of ioy. And thep that stood before cast backe their heads maruelling therat, but nothing they saide.

And when the Duke and the Spaior saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly crye, and a topfull to beare, euerie man with one voice, no man saying nay. Wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) since that we perceiue it is all your whole minde to haue this Noble man for your king, wherof we shall make to his grace so effectually report, that we doubt not but it shall redound vnto your great weale and commoditie: we require yee that ye to morrow go with vs, and we wish you vnto his noble grace, to make our humble request vnto him in manner before remembred. And therewith the Lordes came downe, and the companie dissolved and departed, the more part all sad, some with glad semblance that were not verie merry, and some of those that came after with the Duke nor able to dissemble their sorrowe, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolour of their heart burst out of their eyes.

Then on the morrow after, the Spaior with all the Aldermen and chiefe commons of the Citie in their best manner apparelled, assembling themselves together, resorted vnto Baynardes Castle, where the Protector late. To which place they came also according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers Noble men with him, beside manye knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke sent word vnto the Lord Protector of the being the roof of a great and honorable companie, to moue a great matter vnto his grace.

Whereupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if he first knewe some part of their errand, as though he doubted, and partly distrustful the coming of a number vnto him so suddenly, without any warning or knowledge whether they came for good or harme. When the Duke had shewed this vnto the Spaior and other, that they might thereby see howe little the Protector looked for this matter, they sent vnto him by the messenger such louing message againe, and therewith so humbly besought him to be careful, that they might resort to his presence, to propose their intent, of which they would vnto none other person part disclose, that at the last he came forth of his Chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but stood about in a Gallerie

ouer them, where they might see him, and speake to him, as though he would not yet come too nere them, till hee told what they meant. And thereupon the duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to propose vnto his grace the intente of their comming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be bold to moue him of that matter. In which, albeit they meant as much honour to his grace, as wealth to all the realme beside, yet were they not sure how his grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. When the protector (as hee was verie gentle of himselfe, and also longed soze to wit what they meant) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, berislie trusting for the good mind that hee bare them all, none of them anie thing would intende vnto him warde, wherewith he ought to be grieved.

When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waxed hee bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them thereunto, as ye before haue heard, & finally to beseech his grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodnes and zeale vnto the realme neuer with his etc. of pille, to behold the long continued distresse and decay of the same, and to set his grations hands to redresse an amendment thereof, by taking vpon him the crowne and gouernance of this realme, according to his right and title lawfullie descended vnto him, and to the laude of God, profite of the land, and vnto his grace so much the more honor, and lesse pain, in that that neuer prince reigned vpon any people, that were so glad to liue vnder his obediense, as the people of this realme vnder his.

When the protector had hearde the proposition, he looked verie strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were that he partly knewe the things by them alledged to be true, yet such entire loue hee bare vnto king Edward and his children, that so much more hee regarded his honor in other realmes about, than the Crowne of anie one, of which hee was neuer desirous, that hee coulde not finde in his heart in this point to encline to their desire. For in all other nations where the truth were not well knowne, it shoulde peradventure be thought, that it were his owne ambitious mind and drille, to depose the Prince, and take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie hee woulde not haue his honour stained for anie Crowne, in which he had euer perceived much more labour and payne than pleasure to him that woulde so be it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it: notwithstanding hee not onlie pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and heartie fauor they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the prince, vnder whom hee was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as shoulde like the king to be him, he woulde do his uttermost diligence to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little while of his protectorship (the praise giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before occasion of the contrary, and of newe intended to be, were now partly by god policy, partly more by gods speciall providence, than mans passion repressed.

Upon

Upon this answer giuen, the duke by the protectors licence, a little rownded, as well with other noble men about him, as with the Mayor and Recorder of London. And after that vpon like pardon desired and obtained, he shewed aloude vnto the protector, that for a final conclusion, by the realme it was appoynted King Edwards line shoulde not anie longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, that it was now no suretie to recede, as for that they thought it for the weale vniuersall to take that waie, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore if it would like his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they woulde humbly beseech him thereunto. If he woulde giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, which they would be loath to heare, then must they needs seeke, and shoulde not faile to find some other noble man that woulde.

These wordes much moued the protector, which else as euery man might wit, woulde neuer of likelihood haue inclined thereunto. But when he sawe there was none other waie, but that either he must take it, or else be and his both gone from it, he said vnto the lords and commons: Sith we perceiue well that all the realme is so set, whereof we be very soze that they will not suffer in any wise king Edwards line to gouerne them, whome no man earthly can gouerne against their wills, and we well also perceiue, that no man is there, to whome the Crowne can by iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as verie right here lawfullie begotten of the bodie of our most deare father Richard late 2d. of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the nobles & commons of this realme, which we of all titles possible take for the most effectual: we be content and agree fauorably to encline to your petition and request, and according to the same, here we take vpon vs the Royall Estate, preeminence and kingdom of the two noble realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward by vs and our heires to rule, gouerne, & defende: the other by gods grace, and your god helpe, to get againe and subdue, & establish for euer in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the advancement wherof we neuer aske of God longer to liue than we intend to procure.

With this there was a great shout, crying, King Richarde, King Richarde. And then the Lordes went vp to the king (for so was hee from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuerslie of the matter, euery man as his fantasie gaue him. But much they talked and marvelled of the manner of this dealing, that the matter was on both partes made so strange, as though neither had euer communed with other thereof before, when that the miselues wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but hee perceiued well enough, that all the matter was made betwixt them. Whereto some criede that againe, and saide all must be done in god order: and men must sometime for the manners sake, not be a knowne what they know: for at the consecration of a bishop, euery man wotteth well by the paying for, his bulls, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else: and yet must hee twise asked whether he will be bishop or no, and he must twise say nay, and at the thirde time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a stage plaie the people know right wel, that he that plaieth the Sowdaine, is perforce a soldier, yet yet if one should know so little god, to shew out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he standeth in his maiestie, one of his tommetoz might hap to breake his head, and too; the, for marring of the play: And so they said, that these matters be kings games, as it were stage plates, and for the more part, played vpon scaffolds: in which page men be the lookers on. And they that wise be, will meddle no further; for they that sometime step by, and play with them, when they can not playe their partes, they disorder the play, and do the miselues no good.

The next daie, the protectoz with a great traine, went to Westminster hall, and there when he had placed himselfe in the court of the kings bench, declared to the audience, that he would take vpon him the crown in that place there, where the king himselfe sitteth and ministrereth the lawe, because he considered, that it was the chiefest duty of a king to minister the lawes. Then with as pleasant an oration as he could, he went about to win vnto him, the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and in conclusion, all kind of men, but especially the lawyers of this realme. And finally, to the intent that no man should hate him for feare, and that his deceitfull clemencie might get him the goodwill of the people, when he had declared the commodities of discord, and the commodities of concord and unitie, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his minde all enmittees, and that he there did openly pardon all offences committed against him. And to the intent that he might shew a pious thereof, he commanded that one Fogge, whom he had long deadly hated, should be brought then before him, who being brought out of the landuarie (for thither had he fled for feare of him) in the sight of the people, he took him by the hand: which thing the common people looked at, and passed, but wise men took it for a banitic. In his returne homeward, whom sooner he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe guiltie, is in a manner delectad to a feruile flatterie.

King Richard, to be sure of all enemies, had sent for out of the north five thousand men to bee at his coronation, vnder the leading of Robert of Ridisdale, these being but meanelly apparrelled, and woofse harnessed, mustered in Finsberie field.

On the fourth of Iuly, hee came to the Tower by water with his wife, and on the fift day he created T. lord Howard duke of Norfolk, sir T. his sonne earle of Surrey, William lord Berkeley earle of Nottingham, Francis lord Lonsell, vicount Lovel and the kings chamberlaine: the lord Stanley was deliuered out of ward, and made steward of the kings shoulde. Also the archbishop of Yorke was de-liuered, but Morton Bishop of Ely was committed to the Duke of Buckingham to be kept in warde, who sent him to his mannor of Brecknocke in Wales, there to be kept. The same night the king made knights of the Bath to the number of seuentee.

On the sixt of Iuly he rode through the Citie of London toward Westminster with great pompe: and on the morrow being the seuenth, he with his wife queene Anne were crowned.

Then he had begunne his raigne in Iuly, after this mockish election, then was he crowned the sixt, or rather the seuenth day of the same moneth. And that solemnitie was furnished for the most part, with the selfe same prouision that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew.

After this were taken for rebels against the king Robert Ruffe sergeant of London, William Daue pardonor of Hounslow, John Smith groomer of king Edwards stirro, and Stephen Ireland wardrober in the Tower, with many other, that they should haue sent writings into the parts of Britaine to the earles of Richmond and of Penbrooke, and the other lords: and how they were purposed to haue set fire on diuers partes of London, which fire, whilest men had bene standing, they would haue stolen out of the Tower, the prince Edward, and his brother the duke of Yorke, Sec. Robert Ruffe, William Daue, John Smith, and Stephen Ireland, were at Westminster iudged to death, and from thence drawne to the Tower hill, and there beheaded, and their heads were set on London bridge.

How fell there mischieses thicke. And as the thing euill gotten is neuer wel kept, though all the time of his raigne neuer ceased there cruell death and laughter, till his owne destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and the most righteous, that is to wit, his owne, so began hee with the most piteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murder of his innocent nephewes, the yong king and his tender brother, whose death and small infortune hath naytheles commen so far in question, that some remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies destroyed or no. Not for that onely that Perkin Werbecke by many folkes malice, and moe folkes folly, so long space abusing the world, was as well with princes as the poore people, reputed and taken for the yonger of these two, but for that also that all things were in late daies so covertly demeaned, one thing pretended, and another meant, that there was nothing so plaine and openly proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and covert dealing, men had it euer inwardly suspeced, as many wel counterfeited iewels make the true mistrusted. Howbeit concerning the opinion, with the occasions mouing of the r partie, we shal haue place more at large to intreat, if we hereafter happen to write the time of the late noble prince of famous memorie H. Henry the 7. or percase that his histoie of Perkin in any compendious procelle by it selfe. But in the meane time for this present matter, I shall rehearse you the dolorous end of those babes, not after euery tale that I haue heard, but by such men, and by such meanes, as me thinketh it were hard but it should be true.

he rode to fulfill the thing which he before had intended. And forasmuch as his minde gaue him, that his nephewes liking, men woulde not reckon that hee coulde haue right to the Realme, he thought therefore without delay to ride them, as though the killing of his kinsmen coulde amend his cause, and make him a kinde king. Whereupon he sent one John Greene, whom hee specially trusted, vnto sir Robert Brakenbury Constable of the towne, with a letter and credence also, that the same sir Robert should in any wise put the two children to death. This John Greene did his errand vnto Brakenbury, kneeling before our Ladie in the Tower, who plainlic answered, that hee woulde neuer put them to death to by the request: with which answer John Greene returning, recounted the same to king Richard at Marlowe yet in his wake. Wherewith he tooke such displeasure and thought, that the same night he said vnto a secret page of his: Ah whome shall a man trust? Those that I haue brought vp my selfe, those that I had trusted would most surelie serue me, euen those false me, and at my commandement will do nothing for mee. Sir (quoth his page) there lieth one on your pallet without, that I dare well saie, to do you grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse, meaning this by Sir James Tyrell, which was a man of right goodlie personage, and for nature giffes two; whie to haue serued a much better prince, if hee had well serued C. D. and by grace obtained as much traeth and good will as hee had strength and wit. The man had an high heart, and fore longed vpwarde, not rising yet so fast as he had hoped, being hindered & kept vnder by the means of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, which longing for no more partners of the princes fauor, & namely not for him, whose pride they wile would bear no pare, kept him by secret gifts out of al secret trust, which thing this page well had marked and knowne: wherefore this occasion offered, of verie speciall friendship he tooke his time to put him forward, and by such wise to do him good, that all the enemies he had, except the duell, could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For vpon this pages wordes king Richard arose (for this communication had hee sitting at the draught, a conuenient Carpet for such a counsell) and came out into a pallet chamber, on which hee found in bed Sir James and Sir Thomas Tiels, of person like, and brethren of blode, but nothing of kinne in conditions. Then saide the king merrilie to them, what stes, bee pee in bed so lone? And calling by Sir James, brake to him secretly his mind in this mischeuous matter: in which hee found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morrow hee sent him to Brakenbury with a letter, by which hee was commanded to deliuer Sir James all the keyes of the tower by one night, to the end hee might there accomplish the kinges pleasure, in such things as he had giuen him commandement. After which letter deliuered, and the keyes receiued, Sir James appointed the night next ensuing to bestroie them, deuiling before and preparing the means. The Prince as lone as the protector left the name, and toke himselfe as king, had it shewed vnto him, that hee shoulde not raigne, but his vnckle shoulde haue the Crowne. At which wordes the prince rose abashed, began to sigh and said: Alas, I would my vnckle would let me haue my life yet, though I leefe my kingdome. Then hee that told him the tale, bled him with good wordes, and put him in the best com- fort hee could. But forthwith was the prince and his brother both shut vp, and all other removed from them, onlie one called Black Will, or William Slaughter except, set to serue them and see them sure. After which time the prince neuer tied his points, nor ought thought of himselfe, but with that young babe his brother, lingered with thought and heauines, till this traitorous death deliuered them of that wretchednes: for sir James Tyrell deuised that they shoulde be murdered in their beddes. To the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forrest, one of the foure that kept them, a fellowe fleshed in murder before time. To him he ioined one John Dighton his owne house-keeper, a bigge, broad, square, strong knaue.

Then all the other being remooued from them, this Miles Forrest, and John Dighton, about midnight (the saile children lying in their beds) came into the Chamber, and sodainlie lapped them by among the clothes, so to bestrapped them and intangled them, keeping down by force the featherbed and pillows hard vnto their mouths, that within a while, smothered and stifled, their breath failing, they gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the soles of heauen, leaving to the tormentors their bodies dead in the bed. Whiche after that the wretches perceiued, first by the struggling with the paines of death, and after long lying still, to be thoroughlie dead, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the bed, and fetched sir James to see them, which vpon the sight of them, caused those murderers to burie them at the staire foot, matelie depe in the ground, under a great heape of stones.

Then rode sir James in great haste to his Richard, and shewed him all the manner of the murder, who gaue him great thanks, and (as some say) there made him knight. But hee allowed not as I haue heard, the burying in so vile a corner, saying, that hee would haue them buried in a better place, because they were a kinges sonnes. To the honorable courage of a king. Whereupon the said, that a priest of St. Robert Brakenbury toke vp the bodies againe, and secretly entered them in such place, as by the occasion of his death, which one lie knew it, could neuer since come to light. Where troth it is, and well known, that at such time as Sir James Tyrell was in the Tower for treason committed against the most famous prince king Henrie the seventh, both Dighton and hee were examined, and confessed the murder in manner aboue written, but whether the bodies were remooued, they coulde nothing tell. And thus, as I haue learned of them that much knew, and little cause had to lie, were these two noble princes, these innocent tender children, boine of most redol blood, brought vp in great wealth, likeli long to liue, raigne, and rule in the realm, by traitorous tyranny taken, deppriued of their estate, shortly shut vp in prison, and prailie slain and murdered, their bodies cast God wot where, by the cruel ambition of their unnatural vnckle and his dispiteous tormentors. Which things on euery part well pondered, God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neyther in what vnfortunate and yet this worldelike woe, or what mischief wrought the proude enterprize of an bie heart, or finally, what wretched ende ensueth such dispiteous cruelty. minister, ministers, Miles Forrest at Saint Marins patermale rotted a waile: Dighton indoe yet walketh on allue in god possibilitie to be hanged ere he die: but sir James Tyrell died at the Tower hill beheaded for treason: King Richard himselfe, as ye shall hereafter heare, flaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enemies handes, carried on horsebacke dead, his haire in despyght to nye and tugged like a Curie Dogge: and the mischief that he toke was withyn lesse than thye paces of the mischief that he did, and yet all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his chamberlaine, that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer had quiet in his mind. He neuer thought himselfe sure where he went abroad, his eie whirled about, his body pitifully fenced, his hand ever vpon his dagger, his countenance & manner like one alwaies ready to strike againe; he toke ill rest a nights, lay long waking and musing, soze wearied with Care & Watch, rather slumbrd than slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, so dauncie sometime start vp, leapt out of his bed, and ran about the chamber, so was his restless heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impression and doomy remembrance of his abhominable deed.

Now had he outward no long time in rest: for hereupon, some after began the conspiracy, or rather, god confederation betwene the Duke of Buckingham and many other gentlemen against him.

The occasion whereupon the king and the duke fell out, is of diuers folke diuers wise pretended.

This Duke (as I haue for certaine bene enformed) as soone as the Duke of Gloucester, vpon the death of King Edward came to Yorke, and there had solemne funerall seruice for King Edward, sent thither in the most secret wise he could, one Persall his trustie seruant, who came to John Ward, a chamberer of like secret trust with the duke of Gloucester, desiring, that in the most close and coeuet maner, he might be admitted to the presence and speech of his master. And the duke of Gloucester aduertised of his desire, caused him in the dead of the night, after all other folks asloved, to be brought vnto him in his secret chamber, where Persall after his masters recommendation, thewed him, that he had secretly sent to thew him in his new world, he would take such part as he would, and waite vpon him with a thousand good fellows, if neede were. The speller sent backe with thanks, and some secreete instruction of the proteccors mind: yet met him againe with farther from the duke his master, within selue dayes after at Nottingham: whither the Proteccor from Yorke, with many gentlemen of the north country, to the number of six hundred bowes, was come on his way to London ward, and after secret meeting and communication had, estone departed. Whereupon at Portsmouth, the duke met with the Proteccor himselfe with 200. horses, and from thence still continued with him partner of all his deuils, till that after his Coronation they departed, as it seemed very great friends at Gloucester: from whence, as some as the duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And surely the occasion of their hartiance is of diuers men diuersly reported. Some haue said (I heard saie) that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other thinges, required of the proteccor the Duke of Hertfordes lands, to the which he pretended himselfe iust inheritor. And for as much as the title which hee claimed by inheritance, was somewhat entleraced with the title to the crowne, by the line of King Henry before deputed, the proteccor conceived such indignation, that he refused the dukes request with many spitefull and minatory words, which so wounded his hart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could endure to looke aright on King Richard, but ever feared his owne life, so far forth, that when the proteccor rode through London toward his coronation, he fained himselfe sick, because he would not ride with him. And the other taking it in euil part, sent him word to rise, & come ride, or he would make him be carried: whereupon he rode on with euil will, and that notwithstanding on the morrow, rose from the feast, faining himselfe sick, and King Richard said it was done in hatred and despyght of him. And they sayd, that after continuallie each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, that the Duke verilie looked to haue bene murdered at Gloucester. From which matter, he in false maner departed. But surely some right secret at that day denie this: and manie right wise men thinke it unlikelye (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and that neede in that greene world the Proteccor had of the Duke, and in what perill the duke stood, if he fell once in suspicion of the tyrant) that eyther the Proteccor would be gine the duke occasion of displeasure, or the duke the proteccor occasion of mistrust. And verily men think that if King Richard had anie such opinion conceived, hee would neuer haue suffered him to escape his hands. Very troth it is, the duke was an high minded man, and euill could beare the Glozie of another, so that I haue heard of some that saie they saue it, that the duke at such time as the Crowne was first set vpon the proteccors head, his eie could not abide the sight thereof, but wypped his head another waie. But men say, that he was of troth not well at ease, and that both to King Richard well known, and not ill taken, no; any demand of the dukes vncourteously refused, but hee both with great giftes and high behests, in most louing and trustie maner, departed at Gloucester. But some after his comming home to Buckenochie, hauing there in custodie by the commouement of King Richard doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, who (as ye before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, wearied with him familiar: whose wisdom abused his pride to his owne deliuranc and the dukes destruction. The bishop was a man of great naturall wit, verie well learned, and honorable in behauiour, lacking no wise waies to winne fauor. Hee had bene fast vpon the part of B. Henry, while that part was in wealth, and nay, thelesse left it not, no; for sake it in too, but sed the realm with the quene and the prince, while King Edward had the king in prison, neuer came home, but to the field: After which loss, and that part bitterly subdued, the other, for his fast faith and wisdom, not onlie was content to receiue him, but also would fitt to come, and had him from thence forth both in secret trust, and verie speciall fauour, which hee nothing deceyued. For he beeing (as ye haue heard) after king Edwards death first taken by the tyrant, for his treachery to the king, found the means to set this Duke in his toppes, joined gentlemen together in aide of king Henrie, deniſing first the marriage betwene him and king Edwards daughter, by which his faith, hee declared the good service to both his masters at once, with infinite benefite to the Realme, by the Contention of these two bloods in one, whose severall titles had long unquieted the lande, hee fled the realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, til the noble prince king Henry the 7. gat him home againe, made him Archbisshop of Canterburie and Chancelor of England, wherunto the Pope joined the honoz of Cardinall. Thus King manie daies in as much honour as one man might well wish, ended them so goodlie, that his death with Gods mercie well changed his life.

This man the refuse, as I was about to tell you, by the long and often alternate proſe, as well of prosperitie as aduers fortune, had gotten by great experience the vertie mother and mistresse of wisdom, a deepe insight in polittike worldlie drifts. Wherby, perceiving now this duke glad to communicate with him, fedde him with faire wordes, and manie pleasant praises. And perceiving by the proceſſe of their communication, the Dukes pride, now and then balke out a little head of enuie, toward the glorie of the king, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out if the matter were well handled: hee craftilie sought the waies to picke him forward, taking alwaies the occasion of his coming, and so keeping himſelfe so close within his boundes, that hee rather seemed to followe him, than to leade him. For, when the Duke first beganne to praise and boaste the king, and shewe howe much profite the realme should take by his raignt: My Lord Morton answered: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lie, for if I would sweare the contrarie, your Lordship would not I thinke beleue, but that if the world would haue gone as I would haue wished, king Henries son had had the crown, & not king Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, & king Edward to raigne, I was neuer so mad that I would with a dead man strive against the quicke. So was I to Edward a faithfull chaplaine, and glad would haue bin that his child had succeeded him. Wholbrif, if the secret iudgement of God haue other wise provided, I purpose not to spurre against a picke, nor labor to let by that god polleth downe. And as for the late Protector and now king. And even there hee left, saying, that hee had already meddled too much with the world, and would from that daie meddle with his booke and his beades, and no further. Then longed the duke sore to heare what he would haue said, because hee ended with the king, and there so sodainelie stopped, and exhorted him so familiarlie between them twaine, to bee bold to say what sooner he thought, whereof hee faithfullie promised, the re should neuer come hurt, and peradventure more good than he would weene, and that himſelfe intended to bise his faithfull secreete advise and counsel, which hee said was the onelie cause for which hee procured of the king to haue him in his custody, where hee might reckon himſelfe at home, and else had hee bene put in the hands of them with whom he should not haue founde the like favour. The Bishop right humble thanked him, and saide: In god faith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault, forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the partie meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And euer I thinke on Aelopes tale, that when the Lion had proclaymed, that on payne of death, the re should none horned beaſt abide in that wood: one that had in his forehead a bunch of fleshy, fled awaie a great pace. The fore that saw him run so fast, asked him whether hee made all that haste: And hee answered, in sayth I neither wot, nor recke, so I were once hence, because of this proclaymation made of horned beaſts. What saie? quoth the fore, thou maiest abide well y-nough, the Lion meant not by thee, for it is none hoine that is in thine heade. So marrie (quoth he) that wot I well enough: but what and he call it an horn, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrilie at the tale, and saide, My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Beare shall picke any matter at anie thing here spoken, for it shall neuer come to their eares. In god faith Sir, saide the Bishop, if it did, the thing that I was about to saie, taken as well (as aforesaid God I meant) it could deserue but thanks: and yet taken as I waene it would, might happen to turne me to little good, and you to lesser. Then longed the duke yet much more to wit what it was: whereupon the bishop saide, In god faith my Lord, as for the late protector, sith hee is now king in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title, but for the weale of this realme, whereof his grace hath now the gouernance, and whereof I am my selfe one poore member, I was about to wish, that to those god abilitie wherof hee hath already right manie, little needing my prayse, it might yet haue pleased God for the better soze, to haue giuen him some of such other excellent vertues meete for the rule of a realme, as our Lord hath planted in the person of your grace: and there left againe.

The Duke somewhat maruelling at his sodaine pauses, saide: My Lord, I note your often breatching and sodaine stopping in your communication, so that to my intelligence, your words neither come to anie direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, wherby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now toward the king, or what affection you beare toward me. For the comparison of god qualities ascribed to vs both, maketh mee not a little to muse, thinking that you haue some other priuy imagination imprinted in your hart which you bee abashed to disclose, and especiallie to mee, which on my honour do assure you to be as secret in this case as the deafe and dumbe person to the finger, or the tree to the hunter. The Bishop being somewhat bold, considering the Dukes promise, but most of all animated, because hee knew the duke desirous to be magnific, & also hee perceived the inward hatred which hee bare toward king Richard, hee opened his stomache to the bottom, and saide: My singular good Lord, sith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custody, I may rather call it a libertie, than a straight imprisonment, in auoiding of tolenes & mother of all vices, in reading bookes & ancient pamphlets I haue found this sentence written, That no man is borne free and at libertie of himſelfe onely: for one part of dutie hee oweth to his parents, and the other part to his friends and kindred: but the native countrie, in the which hee first tasted this pleasant and flattering world, demandeth a debt not to be forgotten. Which saying causeth me to consider in that case this Realme my native country now standeth, and in that estate and assurance before this time it hath continued: what governe we now have, and what ruler we might have: for I plainlie perceiue (the realme being in this case) must needs decaye, and be brought to confusion: but one hope I haue, that is, when I consider your noble personage, your iustice and indifferencie, your seruient zeale and ardent loue toward your naturall country, and in like maner the loue of your country toward you, the great learning, pregnant witte, and eloquence, which so much doth abound in your person, I must needs thinke this realme fortunate which hath such a prince in it, meete and apt to be gouernour. But on the other side, when I call to memorie the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called king, so violated by tyrannye, so altered by usurped authoritie, so clouded by blind ambition, I must needs say, that hee is neither meete to be king of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme meet to be gouerned by such a tyrant. Was not his first enterprise to obtaine the crowne begun by the murder of diuers noble personages? Did he not secondarily proceede against his owne naturall mother, declaring hir openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and dissolute liuing: declaring furthermore his two brethren and two nephewes to be bastards, and to be borne in adulterie: yet not contented, after he had obtained the garland, he caused the two poore innocents his nephewes committed to him, to be shamefullie murdered, the blood of which little babes daylie crye to God from the earth for vengeance: what sacrifice shall be in this realme to aunte person, either for life or goods vnder such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blode, and then the lesse, the losse of other? But now to conclude what I meane toward your noble person, I say and affirme, if you loue God, your image, or your native country, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne of this realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countrey men from the bondage of such a tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take vpon you the crowne of this realme, then I assure you by the faith that you owe to God, to denie some way how this realme may be brought to some conuenient regiment, vnder some good gouernour. When the bishop had ended his saying, the duke sighe, and spake not of a greate while, so that night they communed no more. The next day the Duke sent for the bishop to whom he saide, my Lord of Ely, I must needs in hart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you be a sure friend, a trusty counsellor, and a very louer of your country. And sith at our last communication, you haue disclosed the secrettes of your heart, touching the new usurper of the crowne, and also haue a little touched the aduancement of the two noble families of Yorke and Lancaster, I shal likewise declare vnto you my private intents and secret cogitations: and to beginne, when king Edward was deceased, I then beganne to studie, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme shoulde be gouerned. I persuaded with my selfe to take parte with the Duke of Gloucester, whome I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without insurie,

and so by my memmes hee was made Protector both of the king and Realme, which authoritie being once gotten, hee neuer ceased piallilie to require mee and other Lordes, as well spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeres, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient king: which thing, when he saue me some what sicke at, he then brought in Instruments, authenticke Doctors, proctors & notaries of the law, with depositions of diuers witnesses, testifying I, Edwards Child, to be bastardous: which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be fained. When the said depositions were before vs read and diligently heard, hee stood up bare headed saying: Well my Lordes, euen as I and you woulde, that my Nephewes shoulde haue no wrong: so I praye you do me nothing but right, for these witnessses and sayings of famous Doctors be true: for I am onelie the vnbaptized heire to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, abindged to be the very heire to the crown of this realme by authority of parliament. Which thinges so by learned men for herity to vs declared, caused me and offer to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and soueraign lord: so againe by my aid he of a protector was made a king: but when he was once crowned king, and in full possession of the realm, he cast away his old conditions. For when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the earle of Herefords lands, which his brother king Edw. wrongfully detained from me, and also required to haue the office of the high Constabill of Englande, as diuers of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long descent continued: in this my first suit, he did not only first delay me, and after ward deny me, but gaue me such unkind words, as though I had neuer furthered him, all which I suffered patiently: but when I was informed of the death of the two yong innocents, the Lord my hart inwardlie grudged, in so much that I abhorred the sight of him. I toke my leaue of the court, & returned to Wrecknock to you, but in the iourney as I returned I had diuers imaginations how to depleie this vnnaturall vncle. First I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the crowne, now was the way made plain, and occasion giuen. For I saw he was disdained of the Lordes temporall, and accursed of the Lordes spirituall. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betwene Worcester & Wyndesore, I encountered with the lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, which is the very daughter and sole heire to John duke of Somerset my grandfather's elder brother: so that she and her sonne the earle of Richmond, be both betwene me and the gate, to enter into the maiestie of all, and getting of the crowne: and when we had a little communed concerning her son, and were departed, I then began to dispute with my selfe, whether I were best to take vpon me, by the election of the nobility & communalty, or to take it by power. Thus standing in the waivering ambiguitie, I considered first, the office, dutie, and paine of a king, which surely I thinke that no mortall man can fully and truly obserue, except he be elected by God as king David was: but further I remembred, that if I once toke on me the gouernance of the realm, the daughters of king Edward and their allies, being both for his sake much beloued, & also for the great insur-

done to them much pittied, would neuer cease to barke at the one side of mee. Semblably my cousin the Earle of Richmond his aydes and kinnsfolke, will surely attempt either to bite or pierce me on the other side, so that my life and Rule shoulde euer hang in quiet in doubt of death or deposition. And if the sayde two Images of Yorke and Lancaster shoulde toyne in one against me, then were I surely matched. Wherefore I haue closely determined bitterly to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the crown: for as I told you, the countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new named king, meeting me in the high waie, praised mee first for kindred sake, secondly for the loue I bare to my grandfather duke Humfrey, which was two: a brother to her father, to moue the king to be good to her son Henry earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into Englande, and if it were his pleasure so to do, he promised that the earle her son shoulde marry one of king Edwardes daughters at the appoyntment of the king, without any thing demanded for the saide espousalles, but onlie the kings sauior, which request I haue ouerpassed and departed, but after in my lodging I called to memorie more of that matter I am bent, that the earle of Richmond heire of the house of Lancaster, shall take to wife Ladie Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster maie be vnite in one: when the duke had said, the Bishop Morton, which fauored euer the house of Lancaster was woonerous sofall, for all his imagination tended to this effect, and least the Dukes courage shoulde swage, or his mind alter, hee sayde to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, sith by Gods p:ouision, and your incomparable wisdom, this noble coniunction is first moued, it is necessarie to consider what persons we shall first make priuy of this politike conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will beginne with my ladie of Richmond the earles mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: sith you will beginne that waie (sayde the Byschoppe) I haue an old friende with the Countesse, called Reynolde Bray, for whome I shall send ift bee your pleasure: so the Byschop wrote for him to come to Wicheborne: who straight came backe with the messenger, where the duke and the bishop declared what they had deuised for the preferment of the earle of Richmond son to his Ladie and mistress: willing her first to compasse howe to obtaine the good will of Quene Elizabeth, and also of her eldest daughter, and after secretly to sende to his son in Britaine, to declare what high honor was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marrie the Lady Elizabeth as soon as hee was king of the realme. Reinold Bray with a glad hart returned to the countesse his Lady. When Bray was gone, the Byschop tolde the Duke, that if hee were in his Isle of Ely, he could make many friendes to further their enterpryse. The duke knew this to be true, but yet loath to lose the companie of such a counsellor, gaue the bishop faire words, saying, he shoulde shortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the bishop ere the dukes company were assembled, secretly disguised, in a night departed, and came to Ely, where he found money and friendes, and so sayled into Flaunders, where hee did the Earle of Richmond good seruice. When Reinold Bray had declared his message to the countesse, countesse, no maruell if she were glad, wherefore she deuised a meanes how to breake this matter to Quene Elizabeth then being in Sanctuary at Westminster, and hauing in her family a certaine Welchman called Lewes learned in physicks, now hauing opportunitie to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come that her son shoulde be ioined in marriage with lady Elizabeth daughter and heire to King Edward: and that king Richard shoulde out of all honour and estate be delected: and required him to go to Quene Elizabeth, not as a messenger, but as one that came friendly to visite her, and as time and place shoulde serue, to make her priue of this deualce. This physician with good diligence repaired to the Quene, and when he saw time convenient, he said vnto her: Adam, although my imagination be very simple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am so bolde to utter vnto you a secret conceit that I haue compassed in my bzaire. When I remember the great losse that you haue sustained by the death of your louing husband, and the great sorowe that you haue suffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no lesse do than dailie studie how to bring your hart to comfort, and also to reuenge the quarrell of you & your children on that cruell tyrant King Richard. And first consider what battel and what mischief hath risen by the dissention betwene the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster, which two families if they maie bee ioined in one, I doubt not but that your line shall be againe restored to your great joy and comfort. You know Adam, that of the house of Lancaster the earle of Richmond is next of blood, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heires: If wee could inuent the meane how to couple your eldest daughter with the earle of Richmond in matrimonie, no doubt but the usurper shoulde be shortly deposed, and your heire againe to her right restored. When the Quene had heard this friendly motion, she instantly besought him that as he had bene the first inuenter of so good an enterpryse, that now he would not be sliffe to follow the same, requiring him further, that he would relate to the countesse of Richmond mother to the earle Henry, and to declare to her on the quenes behalfe, that all the friends of king Edward her husband shoulde assist and take part with the earle of Richmond his son, so that he would take an oth, that after the kingdome obtained, to espouse the lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. Master Lewes so spech his busines, that he made a finall end of this busines betwene the two mothers: so the lady Margaret countesse of Richmond brought to a good hope of the preferment of her son, made Reinold Bray chiefe solicitor of this conspiracy, giuing him in charge secretly to inueigle such persons of nobility to ioine with her, and take her part, as he knew to be faithfully.

This Reinold Bray within seten daies brought to his lute, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheine, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ram Esquires, and others. In the meane season the countesse of Richmond sent Christopher Wiske into Britaine to the earle of Richmond, to declare to him all agreements betwene her and the Quene agreed: but the remembering that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the first inuencers of this enterpryse, sent Hugh Conway esquire into Britaine with a great sum of money to his son, giuing him in charge charge to declare to the earle the great loue that the most part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, willing him not to neglect so good an occasion offered, but with all speed to settle his mind how to returne into England, giuing him counsell to take land in Wales. When the earle had receiued this fopfull message, he brake to the duke of Britaine al his secrets, aduertising him that he was entred into a sure and stedfast hope to obtain the crowne of England, desiring him of helpe toward the atchieuing of his enterprise, which the duke promised, and after perswaded. Whereupon the earle sent into England Hugh Conway, and Thomas Ram, to declare his comming shortly into England. In the meane season the chiefe of the conspiracy in England began many enterprises, which being neuer so praiuely handled, yet knowledge thereof came to king Richard, & because he knew the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aide of this commination, he thought it most necessarie to pluck him from that part, whereupon he adressed his loving letters to the Duke, to exhort the Duke to come to the Court: but the Duke required the king to pardon him, excusing himselfe that he was not well. King Richard not content with this excuse, directed to the duke other letters with checking words, commanding him without delay to repaire to his presence. The Duke made to the messenger a determinate answer, that he would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared war against him, and by this means, Thomas marques Dorset came out of Sanduarie, gathered a great band of men in Powke shire, sir Edward Courtenay and Peter his brother bishop of Excester raised another army in Devonshire and Cornwall. In Kent sir Richard Guilford and other Gentlemen raised a companie.

But king Richard in the meane time had gotten together a great strength, with whome he removed from London toward Salisburie, to the intent hee might set on the Dukes armie, the king was scarce two daies journey from Salisburie, when the duke of Buckingham accompanied with a great power of wilde Welchmen, which in the ende forsooke him. The Duke with his power marched through the foreste of Deane, intending to haue passed the river of Seuerne at Gloucester, and there to haue ioynded in armie with the Courtenies, and other Welchmen men, which if he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great leoparde. But before he could attaine to Seuerne side, by force of continuall raine the river rose so high, that it ouerflowed all the countrey adioining, which rage of water lasted ten daies: by which inundacie the passages were so closed, that neither the Duke could come ouer Seuerne to his complices, nor they to him: during which time the Welchmen lingering idle and without money of victuall, suddenly scaled and departed. The Duke thus left almost alone, was of necessity compelled to flie, and conueied himselfe into the house of Humfrey Banister his seruant beside Shyzwbury, whom he had tenderly brought up, which when it was known to his adherents, euerie man wished for himselfe and died. And some of them sayled into Britaine, among the which were Peter Courtenay Bishop of Excester, and sir Edward Courtenay his brother, Thomas marques Dorset, John lord Welles, sir John Bourchier, sir Edmond Woodville brother to queene Elizabeth, sir Robert Willoughby, banister that betrayed his master, miserably plagued, let the like traitors to their masters looke to, the like, or worse, to them and their, without speeche repentance.

The duke after he had confessed all the whole conspiracie vpon the second of Nouember without arraignment or iudgement, was at Salisburie beheaded. At the same time that the duke of Buckingham was by in the west countrey, there were manie by in Kent, to wit, sir George Browne, sir John Gifford and his sonne, Foge, Scot, and Hants, after Clifforde, Bonting yeoman of the crowne, with manie other, to the number of sixe thousand: these made a fray at Ghaulesend in the saire, where Bonting slewe master Mowbray, with diuers other, but when they heard that the duke of Buckingham was dead they were faine to flie to saue themselves.

Which these things were thus handled in England, Henry Carle of Richmond prepared an army of sixe thousand Britons, and fortie well furnished ships. When all thinges were prepared, and the daie of setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue of October, the whole armie hopled by sailles and toke the sea, but toward night the winde turned, and so henge a tempest arose, that the shippes were dispersed asunder: some driuen into Normandie, some againe into Britaine. In the morning after when the tempest was abswaged, the earle approached to the south part of England, at the mouth of theauen of Poles in Dorset, where he might see all the banks full of men of war, appointed to defend his arrival, wherefore he gaue charge that no man should land, untill such time as the whole manie were assembled, but after that he perceived none of his ships to appeare, he hoisted up anchor and away, where he arrived safe in Normandy, and returned by land into Britaine, where he was some aduertised that the duke of Buckingham had lost his head, and that the marques Dorset, and a great number of noble men in England had a little before inquired for him there.

In the meane season king Richard apprehended in diuers partes of this realme certaine Gentlemen of the Carle of Richmonds faction, amongst whome sir George Browne, sir Roger Clifford, and seure other were put to death at London the thirde of December, sir Thomas Seneclgar, which had married sir Giles Daubney, sir Thomas Arundell, sir John Cheinie and his two brethren, sir William Barkeley, sir William Brandon and Thomas his brother, sir Richard Edgecombe, and John Halwell, Edward Pownings, &c. proclamation was made, and a thousand pound promised to who so could bring out the duke of Buckingham, whereupon Humfrey Banister betrayed his guest and master to John Mitton then sheriffe of Shropshire, which with a strong power apprehended the Duke in a little groue adioining to the manors of Humfrey Banister, and in great haste conueied him to the cite of Salisburie, where king Richard then kept his household. This Banister after he had betrayed his master, his sonne and heire waxed mad, and died in a boares stie, his eldest daughter was suddenly stricken with a folie leperie, his second son maruellously deformed of his limbs and made lame, his younger son in a small puddle was drowned, and he himselfe being of extreame age arraigned and found guiltie of a murder, and by his cleargie saved. And as for his thousand pound, sir Richard gaue him not one farthing, saying, that he which would be untrue to so good a master, would be false to all other.

The 30. of December was a great fire at Leaden hall in London, where through was burnt much housing, and all the stocks for guns and other like provision belonging to the city.

An. reg. 2.

After this king Richard called a Parliament, in the which he attainted the earle of Richmond, and all other persons, which were fled out of the realme for feare, or any other cause as enemies to him, and to the naturall country, and all their lands and goods was confiscate to the kings use, and yet notwithstanding he laid on the people a great tare.

In this troublesome season, nothing was more maruelled at than that the Lord Stanley had not bene taken, considering the working of the Ladie Margaret his wife mother to the earle of Richmond: but for as much as the enterprise of a woman was of him reputed of no regarde or estimation, and that the Lord Stanley her husband had purged himselfe to bee innocent of all attempts by her committed, it was giuen him in charge to keepe her in some secret place at home, without hauing any seruant or companie, so that from thenceforth she should neuer send letter to her son, or to any of his friends, by the which the king might be molested, which commandment was a while put in execution.

Record Tower.

This yere king Richard began the high tower at Westminster, which remaineth yet unfinished. Also he caused the bodie of king Henry the first to be remoued from Chertsey abbey in Surrey, and to be buried at Windsor on the twelfth of August.

In these daies were chiefe rulers about the king, the Lord Louel, and two Gentlemen being named sir Richard Ratcliffe, and sir William Catesby, of the which persons was made a seditious rime, & fastned vpon the crosse in cheape, and other places of the Citie, whereof the sentence was as followeth:

The Cat, the Rat, and Louel our dogge:

Rulen all England, vnder an hogge.

Which was to meane these three persons, ruled this land vnder the king, which bare a white Boare for his cognisance. For the deuilers of this rime much searsh was made and sundry accused to their great charges. But finally two Gentlemen, Turbunille, and Collingborne, were for that and other things laid to their charge, arrested and cast in prison, for whom shortly was holden at the Guildhall an open determiner, where the two Gentlemen were arraigned, and that one of them called William Collingborne Esquire, confesse of that crime and other, for the which he was beate vnto the Tower hill, and there full cruelly put to death, as first hanged, and straight cut downe and ripped, and his bowels cast into the fire, the which torment was so speedily done, that when the butcher pulled out his heart, he spake and saide Zelus Zelus. This man was greatly moaned of the people, for his goodly personage and fauour of visage, he had bene sometime, to wit the 15. of Edward the fourth, herisse of Wiltschire, and in the 17. herisse of Somersetshire, and Dorsetshire.

cause that their realmes are fortified with a double power, that is to say, with their owne strength, and the aide of their friends, practised a league with the king of Scots, which not long before had made diuers incursions and roades into the realme of England, and therefore sued to haue a truce or peace concluded. Wherefore commissioners were appointed, which met at Nottingham, and there in the end concluded for these yeres on certain articles, 15. in number. This peace thus concluded, king Richard now doubting his owne people, was continually vexed with feare of the returne of the earle of Richmond and his complices: wherefore, nothing was for his purpose more, than once againe with plice and paiser, to attempt the duke of Britaine, in whose territory the earle then abode, to deliuer him into his hands: wherefore incontinent he sent certaine ambassadors to the Duke of Britaine, which toke vpon them that king Richard should verely paie and answer the duke of Britaine of all the reuenues, rents and profits of the lands and possessions, as well belonging to the earle of Richmond, as to any other noble or gentleman which then were in the earles companie, if he after that time would keepe them in continuall prison and restraine them from libertie. The Duke furnished with these and other instructions, arriued in Britaine, but could not speake with the duke, by reason that he being weakened by a long and daile infirmittie, began to waue idle of his remembrance, for which cause Peter Landoye his chiefe treasurer, ruled all things at his pleasure, vnto whom the English ambassadors moued to him the message, offering to him the same rewards and landes that they should haue offered the Duke. This Peter faithfully promised to accomplish king Richards request, so that he kept promise with him: but fortune was so fauourable to the publike weale of England, that this deably compact toke none effect, for Iohn Morton bishop of Ely flourishing then in flouers, was of all this craftie deuile certified: wherefore he sent Christopher Wiswike, to declare to the Earle of Richmond all the deceit, giuing him charge in all haste possible with his companie to retire out of Britaine into France. When these newes came to the earle, he incontinent sent to Charles the French king, requiring that he and his might safely passe into France, which desire was granted, & the earle with the rest dispatched as puaile as might be into France, no man suspecting their departure. After this, the Earle toke his journey to Charles the French king, to whom after great thanks giuen, he disclosed the occasion of his accesse to his person. After that he required of him helpe and succor, to the intent he might returne to the nobilitie of his realme, of whom he was generally called to take vpon him the crowne: king Charles promised him aide, and bad him bee of good comfort, for he assured him that he would gladly thetne to him his bountifull liberalitie. Whiles the earle of Richmond was attended on the French Court, Iohn Vere Earle of Oxford so perswaded James Blunt Captaine of Harnes Castle, and sir Iohn Forteskewe porter of the towne of Caleis, that he himselfe was not onely set at libertie, but they also leauing their fruitfull offices condescended to go with him into France to the Earle of Richmond.

and othes the Earle and his confederates had made and swoyne, and howbey the Carles meanes, all the Englishmen were passed out of Brytaine into France. Wherefore being in maner desperate, imagining how to infringe the Carles purpose by another meane, so that by the marriage of ladie Elizabeth his niece, he should pretende no claime to the crowne, there came to his minde a thing not only detestable, but much more cruell to be put in execution, for he closely determined to reconcile to his fauour his brothers wife Quene Elizabeth, and so by that meanes the Earle of Richmond, of the affinitye of his Niece should be bitterly defrauded, and if no ingenious remedie could be otherwise inuented, if it should happen Quene Anne his wife to depart out of this world, then he himselfe would rather take to wife his cousin and niece the ladie Elizabeth, than for lacke of that affinitye the whole realme should run to ruine. Wherefore he sent to the Quene being in Sanctuary, diuers and often messengers which should excuse him of all things before against her attempted, and after should so largely promise promotions, not onely to her but to her son Thomas Marquesse Dorset, that they should bring her (if it were possible) into some wan hope. The messengers so perswaded the quene, that she began somewhat to relent, in so much that she faithfully promised to yield her selfe to the kings will at pleasure. And so she first deliuered vnto king Richards hands her five daughters: Afterward she sent letters to the Marquesse her sonne being then at Paris with the Earle of Richmond, willing him in a nicke wise to repaire into England, where for him were provided great honours, ascertaining him that all offences on both parties were forgiven and forgotten: After that king Richard had thus pleased the mutable minde of Quene Elizabeth, he caused all her daughters to be conueyed into his Palace with solemaun receiving. Now nothing was contrary to his purpose, but that his mansion was not void of a wife: and first he abstained both from the bed and companie of his wife: after he complained to manie of the infortunate barrennesse of his wife. After this, he procured a common rumour to be published among the common people, that the Quene was dead. When the Q. heard tell that so horrible a rumour of her death was sprung amongst the commonaltie, she sore suspected the woode to be almost at an end with her, and not long after, to witte, the 16. of March, in the lent season, howsoeuer it fortuned, the quene departed out of this life, and was with due solemnitie buried at Westminster.

The king thus losed out of the bondes of Matrimonte, began to cast a fauour to lady Elizabeth his niece, making much suite to haue her ioined with him in lawfull Matrimonte: but because all men, and the maiden her selfe most of all detested this unlawfull copulation, he determined to deferre the matter till he were in a more quiet case, for all this season he was oppressed with weightie affaires on euerie side, considering that daily part of the Nobilitie fled into France, other piouslie fauoured the earle of Richmond, amongst the noble men whom he most suspected, these were the principall, Thomas lord Stanley, Sir William Stanley his brother, Gilbert Talbot, and six hundred other, of whose purpose, though king Richard were ignorant, yet he gaue no credence to anse one of them, and least of all to the Lord Stanley, because he was ioined in matrimonte with the Ladie Margaret mother to the Earle of Richmond, for when the Lord Stanley would haue departed into his countrey, the king in no wise would suffer him to depart, before hee had left as in hostage in the court George Stanley Lord Strange, his first begotten sonne and heire.

While king Richard was thus troubled, sodainly he heard newes that the Castle of Hames was deliuered into the hands of the Earle of Richmond, by the meanes of the Earle of Orford, and that not onely he, but also James Blunt, captaine of the castle, were fled into France to aide the Earle of Richmond.

Henry Earle of Richmond obtaining of king Charles a small crue of men, and borroweing certaine summs of money of him, and of diuers other his private friends, he departed from the French Court, and came to the Citie of Roane. While he tarried there, making provision at Harefleete, in the mouth of the Riuer of Seyne, for all things necessarie for his Raue, tydings were brought to him, that king Richard being without children, and a widower, intended hostile to marrie with Ladie Elizabeth, his brothers daughter, which newes he toke of no small moment, for this thing onely toke awaie from all his companions their hope to obtaine an happy enterprize, by reason whereof, he iudged that all his friends in England would thinke from him, yet notwithstanding, earle Henrie of Richmond, because he would no longer linger & wearie his friends, liuing betwene hope and feare, determined in all haste conuenient to set forward, and carried to his shippes armour, weapons, battell, and all other ordinaunces expedient for warre, which being done, enely accompanied with two thousand men, and a small number of shippes, luyed by his Anchors, and in the kalendes of August, he sailed from Harefleete with so prosperous a winde, that the seventh day after he arriued in Wales in the evening, at a Port called Milford Hauen, and incontinent toke land, and came to a place called Dale, and at the sunne rising remoued to Hereforde west, where he was receiued of the people with great joy.

From thence, he remoued to Cardigan twentie mile from Hereford west, whither came to the Earle Richard Griffith with all his men and powder. After him the same date came John Morgan with his men. Then the Earle advanced forward, making no abode in aie place, and sodainly he was ascertained that Sir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas, were in harnesse before him, ready to encounter with his armie, and to stop their passage. Wherefore he first determined to set upon them, and either to destroye or take them into his fauour, and after with all his power to giue battaile to king Richard. But to the intent his friends should knowe with what dexterity he attempted his enterprize forward, he sent messengers with letters and instructions to the Lady Margaret his mother, to the Lord Stanley and his brother, to Talbot and to others, declaring to them, that he holpe with the aide of his friends, intended to passe ouer the Riuer of Seuerne at Shrewsbury, and so to passe directly to the Citie of London, requiriting them as his speciall trust was in the hope of their fidelitie, discreetly, that they would meet him by the way with all diligent preparation. When the messengers were departed, he marched forward towards Shrewsbury, and in his passage there met and saluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodly band of Welshmen, which submitted himselfe wholly to his order and commandement. In the meane time the messengers laden with rewards returned to him the same day that he entered into Shrewsburie, and made relation to him that his friends were ready in all points to do all things for him which they might doe. The earle Henrie continued his tourney and came to a little towne called Ketwout, and pitched his campe on a little hill adjoining, refreshing himselfe there that night. In the evening of the same daie came to him Sir Gilbert Talbot, with the whole power of the young Earle of Shrewsburie, then being in ward, which were accounted two thousand men: and thus his power increasing he arrived at the towne of Stafforde, and there paused. To whom came Sir William Stanley, accompanied with a few persons. After that the Earle departed from thence to Litchelde, and lay without the walls in campe all that night. The next morning he entered the towne and was like a Prince received. A daie or two before, the Lord Stanley having in his band almost five thousand men, lodged in the same towne, but hearing that the earle of Richmond was marching thitherward, gave to him place, dislodging him and his, and repaired to a towne called Abestone, there abiding the coming of the Earle: and this he did to avoid all suspicion, being afraid least if he should be seen openly to be a favourer or aid to the Earle his sonne in law before the daie of battaile, that King Richard which yet did not utterly put in him mistrust, would put to some cruel death his sonne and heire apparent, George Lord Strange, whom King Richard had in hostage. King Richard at this season keeping his house in the Castle of Nottingham, was informed that the Earle of Richmond with such banished men as were fled out of England to him, were arrived in Wales, and that all things necessarie to his enterprise were unpurveyed and verie lacking, nothing mete to withstand the power of such as the king had appointed to resist him, yet notwithstanding hee sent to John Duke of Norfolk, Henrie Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Surrey, and to other of his trustie friends, willing them to muster and bring all their servants and tenants, and to elect the most courageous and active persons of the whole number, and with them to repaire to his presence with all speed. Also he wrote to Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him with his power to come to his army, and to bring with him his fellows in armes Thomas Bouchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, and divers other knights and esquires, in whom he had no small suspicion. While he was thus ordering his affaires, tidings came that the Earle of Richmond was passed Severne, and come to Shrewsbury without any detriment or inconvenience. At which newes hee was soe moved, and cried out on them that contrary to their othe had deceived him. And in all haste sent out to victual what waite his enemies kept and passed, it was declared to the king, that the Earle was incamped at the towne of Litchelde. Whereof, when hee had perfect knowledge, hee having continuall repaire of his subjects to him, hee immediately

mently made his battailes to set forward towards the waile, where his enemies as was to him reported, intended to passe, and keeping his arrais, hee with great pompe entered the towne of Litchelde after the sunne set. The earle of Richmond raised his campe from Litchelde to Lamworth, and in the mid-waile passing, there saluted him Sir Walter Hungerford, & Sir Thomas Bouchier knights, and divers others, which submitted themselves to his pleasure. Divers other noble personages likewise resorted to him with all their power. There hapned in this progression to the earle of Richmond a strange chance, for he was not a little afraid, because hee could not bee assured of his father in law Lord Stanley, which as yet inclined to neither partie, wherefore the earle, accompanied with twenty light horsemen, lingering in his tourney behinde his host, in the meane while the whole armie came before the towne of Lamworth, and when hee for darkenesse could not perceive the steps of them that passed on before, and had wandered hither and thither seeking after his companie, hee abode in a little village, about three myles from his army, where hee tarried all night. The next morning in the dawning, hee returned, and by good fortune came to his army, excusing himselfe, not to have gone out of his waite by ignorance, but of purpose: this excuse made, hee privately departed againe to the towne of Abestone, where the Lord Stanley and Sir William his brother with their bands, were abiding: then the Earle came to his father in law, in a little close, where hee saluted him and Sir William his brother, and after consulted how to give battaile to King Richard, if hee would abide, whome they knew not to be farre off with an huge armie. In the evening of the same daie, Sir John Savage, Sir Brian Sanford, Sir Simon Digby, and many other, leaving King Richard, turned and came to the earle of Richmond with an elect companie of men. In the meane season, King Richard marched to a place called Redmore mete for two battels to encounter, by a village called Bosworth, not far from Litchelde, and there hee pitched his field, refreshed his armie, and took his rest. The next daie after, King Richard being furnished with men, and all abillments of warre, bringing all his men out of their campe into the plaine, ordered his foreward in a marvellous length, in which hee appointed both horsemen and footemen, and in the forefront hee placed the Archers.

Where this battell was captaine John duke of Norfolk, with whom was Thomas earle of Surrey his son. After this long vanguard followed King Richard with a strong company of approued men of war, having horsemen for wings on both sides of his battell.

After that the earle of Richmond was returned from the communication with his friends, hee with all diligence pitched his field just by the campe of his enemies, and there hee lodged that night. In the morning betime, hee caused his men to put on their armour, and apparel themselves to fight, and gave Battaille, and sent to the Lord Stanley, requiring him with his men to approach neere to his Armie, and to helpe to sette the shoulder on arrais: hee answered, the Earle should sette his owne men in good order, while hee should come to him in time convenient. The Earle made his foreward some what single and slender, according to the small number of his people. In the front he placed the archers, of whom he made Captaine John Earle of Oxford. To the right wing of the battaile he appointed Sir Gilbert Talbot to be the leader. To the left wing he assigned Sir Io. Savedge, and hee with the aide of the Lord Stanley, accompanied with the Earle of Penbrooke, having a good companie of horse-men, and a small number of foot-men, for all his whole number exceeded not five thousand men, beside the power of the Scanlerys, whereof three thousand were in the fildes under Sir William Stanley: The kings number was double so much, or more. When both these armies were thus ordered, and all men ready to set forward, king Richard called his chieftaines together, perswading them to be valiaunt, &c. But his people were to him unfaithfull in his end, as he was to his nephewes untrue and unnaturall in his beginning. When the Earle of Richmond knew that the king was so nere embattailed, he rode about his armie giving comfortable words to all men, after the which he made to them a pithie Exhortation perswading them to have the victorie, so that they were to fight in a iust quarrell, he had scantily finished his saying, but the one armie espied the other, betwixne both armies there was a great marraish which the erle left on his right hand, and so doing he had the sun at his backe, and in the face of his enemies. When the king saw the earles companie was passed the marraish, hee commanded with all haste to set upon them, the terrible shotte on both sides passed, the armies toynded and came to hand strokes, at which encounter the lord Stanley toynded with the erle.

The earle of Oxford in the meane season fearing least while his companie was fighting, they should bee compassed of the enemies, gaue commandement that no man should goe about tenne fote from the standard, which commandement once knowne, they knitte themselves together and ceased a little from fighting: the enemies sodainly abashed at the matter and mistrusting some fraude, began also to pause. The Earle of Oxford bying all his band together on the one part, set on his enemies freshly: againe the adversaries perceiving that, placed their men slender and thinne before, and thicke and broad behind, beginning againe the battaile. While the two forewardes thus mortallie fought, king Richard was admonished that the Earle of Richmond accompanied with a small number of men of armes was not farre off, and as he approached to him, hee perfectly knewe his personage, and being inflamed with yre, he put his spurs to his horse and rode out of the side of the range of his battaile, leading the vauntgarde fighting, and with speare in weest ranne toward him. The Earle perceived well the king furiously coming toward him, and because the whole hope of his wealth and purpose was to be determined by battaile, he gladly proffered to encounter with him bodie to bodie and man to man: King Richard set on to charpelle at the first hunt that he overthre to the earles standard, and selwe Sir William Brandon his standardbearer, and matched hand to hand with Sir John Cheiney, a man of great force and strength, which would have resisted him, and the saide John was by him manfully overthrowne, and so he making open passage by dint of sword as he went forwarde, the Earle of Richmond withstood his violence and kept him at the swordes point longer then his companions thought, which being almost in despaire of victorie were sodainly recomforted by Sir W. Stanley, which came to succour with 3000. tall men, at which berie instant, king Richards men were driven backe and fledde, and he himselfe manfully fighting in the middle of his enemies was slaine. In the meane season the Earle of Oxford, with the aide of the Lord Stanley after no long fight discomfited the forewarde of king Richard, whereof a great number were slaine in the chase, but the greatest number that came to the field never gaue stroke. In this battaile died on king Richards part, about the number of 4000. men, and on the other side but ten persons, as Sir Gilbert Talbot then wrote from the campe, and of the nobilitie were slaine John Duke of Norfolk, Walter Lorde Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir William Coniers, Sir Richard Claringdon, and Robert Brakenburie, lieutenant of the Tower, and not manie Gentlemen more: Sir William Catesby learned in the lawes of the Realme, and one of the chiefe Counsellors to the late king, with divers other were two daies after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst them that ran a waile were Sir Francis Mount Loel, and Humfrey Stafford with Thomas Stafford his brother, which toke Sanctuary in St. Johns at Gloucester. On the Earle of Richmonds part that was slaine, the principall was Sir William Brandon his standardbearer. This battaile was fought at Bosworth in Leicestershire, the 22. of August, in the yere of our Lorde, 1485. the whole conflict indured little about two houres. When the earle had thus obtained the victorie, he rendered thanks to God, and asser to his souldiers for their fidelity: then the people cried king Henry, king Henry. When the lord Stanley sawe the good will of the people, he toke the Crowne of king Richard, which was found amongst the spoile in the fild, and set it on the earles head, as though he had bene elected king by the voice of the people.

King Henry at this time made knights, as followeth: Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Mortimer, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Robert Points, Sir Humfrey Stanley, Sir John Turbanille, Sir W. Willoughby, Sir Hugh Pershall, Sir R. Hegecombe, Sir John Bikenyle, Sir de Baron de Carow.

After this, the whole campe removed to the towne of Leicester, where hee rested two daies. In the meane season, the dead corpes of king Richard was as shamefully carried to the towne of Leicester, as hee gorgeously the day before with pompe departed out of the same towne: for his bodie was naked to the skinne, not so much as one clout about him, and was trussed behinde a Pursuant of armes, like a hogge or calfe, the head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and the legs on the other side, and all sprinkled with myre and blood, was brought to the Grey Friars Church within the Towne, and there homely buried, when he had reigned two yeres, two monthes and one day.

He founded a colledge at Wykeham beyond Wyke, and another at London, I. Rouff, don beside the Tower, in a chappell called our Ladys of Barking: he also endoowed the Quenes Colledge at Cambridge with five hundred markes of yerele rent. He bequested the great field of Wichebourne, betwene Wimbleshoe and Wiltshire, which king Edward the fourth had incorporated before to the forrest, &c.

Henry Earle of Richmond.

An. reg. 1.

Henry the seventh, borne in Penbroke Castle, began his raigne the 22. of August, in the yere of our Lord God, 1485. He was a Prince of marvellous wisdom, politic, iustice, temperance, and grauitie, and notwithstanding manie and great occasions of trouble and warre, he kept his realme in right good order, for the which he was greatly reuerenced of foraine princes.

Parson of S. Edmunde

On the forenamed 22. of August, was a great fire in Bread-streets of London, in the which fire, was bent the Parson of Saint Edmundes, and one other man in the Parsonage there.

King Henry, before his departure from Leicester, sent sir Robert Willoughby knight to the Baron of Sherrbottun in the countie of Worke, for: Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwike, son and heire to George Duke of Clarence, then being of the age of 15. yeres, and sent him vp to the Tower of London, where he was put under sure custodie.

In the meane season the king remoued towards London, and when he had approached the citie, on the 27. of August, the Maior, Magistrates, and companies, all clothe in blolel, met him at Shoreditch, and with great pompe conuicted him through the citie to S. Pauls church, where he offered his three standards, one of S. George, the second a red Dragon, the third a dun Cow, after his praiers said and Te Deum sung, he departed to the bishops palace where he continued a few son.

The sweating began the 21. of September, and continued till the ende of October: of the which sickness a wonderfull number died, and in London besides other, died Thomas Hill maior, in whose place was chosen William Stocker, who likewise deceased about seven daies after: in which space departed the foure Aldermen, Thomas Ilam, Richard Rawson, Thomas Norland, and John Stocker, and then was chosen maior John Warde, who continued till the feast of Simon and Jude.

On the euen of Saint Simon and Jude, king Henry came from Kenyngton unto Lambeth, and there dined with Thomas Bourchier Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Cardinal of Cinac in Thermis. And after dinner with a godly companie of the estates of this realme both spirituall & temporall, from thence went by land toward London, his nobles riding after the guise of frisks upon small hackneies, two and two upon a horse, and at London bridge end, the the Maior of London with his brethren and the craftes, met and received the king, and the king proceeded to Chace-church corner, and so to the Tower. On the morrowe being the feast daie of Simon and Jude, king Henrie created Thomas lord Stanley Earle of Darby, Edward Courtney Earle of Devonshire, and Iasper earle of Penbroke was created Duke of Bedford, all at one time in the tower of London. Banerets made at this creation, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Cheinie, Sir William Stonar, Sir W. Truembcke, Sir John Mortimer, Sir Richard Crosby, Sir John Fortescue, Sir Edward Bedingfield, Sir Thomas Cokesley, Sir James Baskenuile, Sir Humfrey Stanley, Sir Richard de la Bere.

On the 30. of October king Henry was crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Thomas Bourchier archbishop of Canterbury, and obtained a number of chosen archers, being strong and hardie persons, to giue bailie attendance on his person, whome he named yeoman of the Ward.

The 7. of Nouember began a parliament at Westminster, for the establishing of all things, in the which he caused to be proclaimed, that all men were pardoned of all offenses, and should be restored to their lands and goods, which would submit themselves to his clemencie. After this he began to remember his especiall friends, of whom some he advanced to honour and dignitie, and some he enriched with possessions and goods: and to begin, the lord Chandew of Wyntaine, he made earle of Bath: Sir Giles Daubeney was made lord Daubeney: Sir Robert Willoughby lord Brooke: and Edward Stafford eldest sonne to Henry late duke of Buckingham, he restored to his dignitie & possessions: Sir T. Molineux knight, baneret, he made Constable of Beaumarke, where shortly after he ended his life. The parliament being dissolved, the king redeemed the marques Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier, whom he had left as pledges at Paris, for money there before borrowed: and sent also into flanders for John Morton bishop of Ely.

The eighteenth day of January king Henry married the labie Elizabeth eldest daughter to Edward the fourth, by which meanes the two families of York and Lancaster, which had long bene at great diuision, were united and made one.

King Henrie sent the Lord Treasurer with master Bray and other, unto the lord Maior of London, requesting him and the citizens of a prest of 6000. markes, therefore the Maior with his brethren and commons granted a prest of two thousand pound, which was lent of the companies, and not of the wardes, which prest was repaid againe in the yere next following, euery pennie.

Wheate was solde for thre shillings the bushell, and bay salt at the like price.

In the month of September Quene Elizabeth was deliuered of her first sonne named Arthur, at Winchester.

This yere deceased Thomas Bourchier archbishop of Canterbury, and was buried at Canterbury: John Morton Bishop of Ely, a man of excellent wit, learning, and vertue, was translated, and succeeded him in the archbishopricke of Canterbury, and John Alcock succeeded in the bishopricke of Ely.

Mr Richard Simon, a wily priest, came to Gerald earle of Windsor, and deputy of Ireland, and presented to him a lad his scholar named Lambert, whom he saied to be the sonne of George duke of Clarence lately escaped the tower of London. And the childe had learned of the priest such princely behaviour, that he lightly moved the earle, and many nobles of Ireland, tendering the blood to pay of Richard Plantagenet and George his son, as also maligning the advancement of the house of Lancaster in Henry the seventh, either to thinke or make the world weene, they thought verily this childe to be Edward earle of Warwick, the duke of Clarence lawfull son. And although is Henry more than halfe married their sport, in shewing the right earle thorough all the streets of London: yet the Lady Margaret dutchesse of Burgoyne sister to Edward the fourth, John de la Pole her nephew, the Lord Louel, sir Thomas Broughton knight, and other captaines of this conspiracie, devised to abuse the colour of this young earles name, for preferring their purpose: which, if it came to god, they agreed to depose Lambert, and to erect the verie earle in his stead, now prisoner in the tower: for whose quarrell, had they pretended to fight, they deemed it likely, he should have been made away: wherefore it was blazed in Ireland, that the king, to mocke his subiectes, had schooled a boy to take upon him the earle of Warwickes name, and had shewen him about in London, to blinde the eyes of simple folke, and to deface the lawfull inheritors of the Duke of Clarence their countreiman and protector: during his life, to whose lineage they also devised a title of the crowne.

In all the haste they assembled at Duellin, and there in Christs church they crowned this idoll, honoring him with titles Imperiall, seasing and triumphing, rearing mightie shoutes and cries, carrying him thence to the kings castle upon tall mens shoulders, that he might be seene and noted, as he was surely an honourable boy to looke upon.

E. Hall.

In this meane time, the earle of Lincoln, and the lord Louel, had gotten by the aid of Margaret about 2000. Almshouses, with Martin Swart a German, and in martiall acts verie expert, to be their captaine, and so sailing into Ireland, and at the citie of Duellin caused young Lambert to be proclaimed king of England, & so with a great multitude of Irishmen, of whom Thomas Ge-rardine was captaine, they layed in to England with the new king, and landed at Fowberry within a dayes of Lancaster, trusting there to be aided with money by sir Thomas Broughton, one of the chiefest of this conspiracie.

King Henry not sleeping in his matters, when he had gathered his host together, over the which the duke of Bedford, and the earle of Arford were chiefe captaines, he went to Coventrie, where he being certified, that the earle of Lincoln was landed at Lancaster with his new king, he remoured to Spot-tingham, to whom shortly after came George Talbot earle of Shrewsbury, the lord Strange, sir John Cheiney, with many other.

Stoke field.

In this space the earle of Lincoln being entered into Wiltshire, directed his way to Newburie upon Trent, and at a little village called Stoke, three or foure miles from Newburie, high to the king and his armie planted his campe.

E. Hall.

The next daie following, the king divided his number into three battalies, and after approached nigh the towne of Stoke, where both the armies layed and fought eagerly on both parts: but at the length the kings foreward set by-on the aduersaries with such a violence, that they slew many, and put the rest to flight. For there their chiefe captaines, the earle of Lincoln, and the lord Louel, sir Thomas Broughton, Martin Swart, and the lord Gerardine, (or after Campion, Morice Fitz Thomas) captaine of the Irishmen, were slaine, and other above foure thousand. This battell was fought on the 16 of June: Lambert and the priest were both taken, to the no small griefe of Margaret Dutchesse of Burgoyne.

Lambert, after that he had bene a turne-broch for a space in the kings kitchen, was at length made one of the kings falconers.

Now when the king had got the upper hande of his enemies (as y<sup>e</sup> have heard) he remoured to Lincoln, and there tarried three daies, causing solemne processions to be made, in rending thanks to God for his fortunate victory. Then caused he execution to be don on such as were taken in the field, either at the battell, or in the chase. And shortly after he went into Wiltshire, and there coasted the countrey, searching out such as had aided his enemies, whome hee punished, some by long imprisonment, some by large fines, and some by death.

An. reg. 3.

About the midst of August the king came to Newcastell upon Tyne, and from thence sent ambassadors into Scotland, Richard Fox bishop of Winchester, ser, and Richard Edgcomb knight, controller of his house, to conclude some peace, or truce with king James of Scotland. The English ambassadors were honorably received, and entertained of the king, who gladly would have concluded a perpetuall peace, but his people would not agree thereto: but in the end concluded upon a truce for seven yeeres.

Truce with the Scots.

King Henrie, after the ambassadors were returned out of Scotland, came backe from Newcastell toward Wiltshire, and so to London: and in the waie being at Leicester, there came to him ambassadors from Charles the French king, which declared both the recouerie of certayne townes out of the hands of Maximilian II. of Romans, which he had wrongfully detained from the crown of France before that time: and also that their master king Charles had now boats in hand against Francis duke of Brittain, because that he succoured and maintained the duke of Breilance and others that were rebels against him.
Wherefore his request was that for the olde familiaritie which had bene be-twene them, he would now either assist and helpe him, or else stand as neuter betwixt them, neither helping or hurting the one or the other. The king answered the ambassadors, that he would neither spare paine nor cost to set some reasonable stay betwixt them. And as the ambassadors were returned home, the king sent his Chaplaine Christopher Vriswicke over into France to king Charles, as well to helpe, that he was glad of the victory which he had against Maximilian, as to declare what a tempestuous forme of civil rebellion himselfe had escaped, and overcome here in England. But the chiefe point of Vriswikes errand consisted in this, that he should intimate to the French king,

holme his maister king Henry offered himselfe as a mediator betwixt him and the Duke of Wyntaine, to make them friends, and if he perscued the French king to giue eare thereunto, then he should go into Wyntaine to moue the duke there to bee contented, that some reasonable order might bee taken betwixt them.

Whylest Viswike was travelling in this matter, king Henry for the accomplishing of the coronation of his wife Quene Elizabeth, returned toward London, and on the saturday next before the feast of All Saints he began his iournie with the Quene from Warwicke, and in his toale at St. Albons kept the feast of All Saints: and on the next morrow removed to Barnet, where he rested: & on the next morrow as he was comming toward London, in Harneysey parke hee was met by the Spalor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and principal commoners of the city of London, all on horsebacke, and in one liacrie to attende upon him, where hee dubbed Sir Wil. Horne Spalor of London knight. And betwixt Aldermen and London, hee dubbed Sir John Perciuall alderman knight. Against the kings comming into London, the streets were grauelled, and the crosses in their liueries stood on both sides from Bishopsgate vnto Pauls church. The quene with the kings mother, and manie ladies stood in a house without Bishopsgate nere to the Spittle, and sawe the king with his traine come toward the city: who rode through the citie to Pauls church, whereinto hee was receyued: Te Deum song for iole of his vidoye, and then lodged in the Bishops palace. On the morrow he went in procession, and hearde a sermon at Pauls crosse. On the next sundaye, the Quene with her Ladies and other Estates, came from Grænewich to the towber of London, where she was receyued by the king: and on the 25. of November she was crowned at Westminster with great solemnity. And shortly after king Henry beluered lord T. marquis Dorset out of the towber, receiving him againe to his former fauor, because his truth had bene throughly tried.

Christopher Viswike hauing passed from the French king to the Duke of Wyntaine, and backe againe to the French king, returned into England, and shewed vnto king Henry what he had done betwixt them.

Immediatlie after came the Lord Barnard Deaubeney a Scot borne, which in the French kinges behalfe requited king Henry to make some manner of end of those Wyntish wars, whatsoeuer it were. King Henry therefore sent ouer into France Iohn Abbot of Abingdon, Sir Richard Edgecombe knight, and the sayde Christopher Viswike, with commission to buye some agreement betwixt the Frenchmen and the Wyntons. These went first to the French king, and after to the Duke of Wyntaine, with whome they coulde doe no good, and so signified to the king the ir matter. Now in the meane time Edward lord Wooduile uncle to the Quene, iured to king Henry that he might haue a power of men appointed to him, with the which he woulde scale prouillie ouer with out licence or passport, so that every man should thinke that hee were beside the realme, without knowledge of the k. & although this request was outwardly denied, yet the L. Wooduile withdrew himselfe into the Isle of Wight, where as he was made ruler, he there gathered a crew of tall & hardy performages, to the the number of 400. & arrived in Wyntaine, where he iointed himself with the Wyntons against the Frenchmen. The French k. aduertised hereof, was not well pleased towards the k. of England, till k. H. by messengers recruited himself to be guiltles: & then he was pacified. And so the English ambassadors came to the league & amity betwixt 2. k. for 12. moneths, returned into England.

The king of England forthwith called his high court of Parliament, in the which it was not onely determined, that the duke of Wyntaine shoulde be aided with power of men, but also there were diuers sums of money granted to the furnishing forth of the same.

About the 27. day of July the duke of Wyntaines army gaue battell to the French host nere to a towne called St. Albain, hauing apparelled 1700. of the Wyntons in coates with redde crosses after the English fashyon, although they had but 400. English men with the lord Wooduile. The vidoye in this battell fell to the French, so that almost all the English men were slaine with the lord Wooduile, besides 6000. Wyntons. The Duke of Exceance, and the Prince of Orange were taken prisoners, which were there on the Wyntons part. The French men lost 1200. men, with their balliant Captaine an Italian, named James Galiot. The newes hereof being heard in England, caused king Henry to make haste in sending forth his army, and therefore was the lord Brooke with Sir John Cheynie, Sir John Midleton, Sir Raffe Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Laton, and Sir Edmond Cornewall, sent ouer into Britaine with all conuenient spæde, hauing with them 8000. men well appointed, and furnished in warlike sort to aide the duke of Wyntaine. These arrived in Wyntaine, and marched forward til they came nere to their enimies, where they pitched their field. But while this war was thus set forward, Francis duke of Wyntaine departed this life, and then the rulers of that contry falling at dissention amongst themselves, tended not the defence of their country, so that the Englishmen perceiving themselves to be danger, and being in the middell of winter, they returned into Englande within five monethes after their first setting forth, so that finally the French king gat the upper hande of the Wyntons, and did toyne that Dutchie to his Realme of France.

De haue heard holme there was in the last Parliament money granted for the furnishing forth of the armie into Wyntaine, to witte, that euery man shoulde bee taxed to paie the tenth penie of all landes and goods: which money the most of them that dwelled in the Bishopricke of Durhame, and in the parts of Norththrice refused bitterlie to paie, for that they thought themselves overcharged with the same. Wherefore such as were appoynted collectors, complained to Henry earle of Northumberland chiefe ruler of the north parts. The earle forthwith signified to the king all that matter, and the king not willing to pardon one penny, commanded the earle to disresse, or ether wise to leup the money, as he should thinke meetest. The rude people hearing of this answer from the king, by and by with great violence set vpon the earle, by the erecting of one named Iohn a Chamber, whome the earle with faire wordes sought to appease: but they alleaguing all the fault to bee in him, as chiefe Author of that farre, furiously due him, and certaine of his household seruantes in a place called Cock lodge by Thurstle, eightene miles from Poike, on the 28. of Aprill. Then the northen men got them to armes, assembling together, chose them a capitaine called sir John Egremont knight: and passing by the countrey, they published that they would bid the king battell, onlie in defence of their liberties. The king sent forth Thomas earle of Surrey, whom not long before he had deliuered out of the Tower, with a crewe of men, to chasten those rebels of the North, who thirminshed with a company of them, whome they did consist, and toke sir I. a Chamber, the first beginner of this rebellion. Then the northen men came to the citie of Poike, where they remained 3. or 4. daies, vnto the time they heard of the comming of the king, and then they fled out of Poike, som one waie, som another: but diuers of them were taken and brought to the king, who caused them that were captaynes to be hanged and quartered. John a Chamber was hanged at Poike, vpon a gibbet set vpon a foure square paire of gallowes, and the other his complices were hanged on the gallowes round about him: but sir John Egremont fled into Flanders to Margaret duchesse of Burgundy. After this the king returned to London, leaving the earle of Surrey to rule the countrey of the north, and appointed sir Rich. Tunstall to gather the subsidy to him due of the people.

James the thirde king of Scots was slain by his rebellious subiects, after they had vanquished him in battell.

About the same time, Adrian an Italian was sent Ambassadoe from Pope Innocent the eight, into Scotland, there to haue taken by the variance betwixt the king and his people: But being arriued in England, he was informed that king James was slain, and therefore remained here certaine moneths, and for that he was a man of excellent learning and humanitie, and commended by John Morton Archbishop of Canturburie, the king made him first Bishop of Hereford, and shortly after, that being resigned, he was made bishop of Bath and Wells.

This yere came ambassadoes from the French king, the Lozdes Francis of Luttenburge, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gagwine, to haue concluded a peace with king Henry, and that the French king might dispose of the young outches of Bytaine, as hee should thinke best: but thereto would not king Henry consent: notwithstanding at length it was agréde, that a forme of league should be drawn with conditions, whereupon the French ambassadoes being dismissed, Th. earle of Dymonde, and Thomas Goldston prior of Chills church in Canturbury were appoynted to follow into France for conclusion of the same league, but they returned without agréeing vpon any league at all.

Parliament at London.

King Henry determining no more with peaceable messages, but with open war to determine all controversies betwixt him and the French king, called a parliament, and therein declared that he was iustly prouoked to make war against the French men, and therefore desired them of their beneuolence of monie, and men toward the maintenance thereof. Certaine men allowed the cause to be iust, & promised his helping hand. The king commended them for their willing and faithfull hearts, And to the intent hee might spare the poorer lost, he thought good first to erase monie of the richest lost, by waie of beneuolence, which kind of leuying monie was first practised by king Edward the 4. king H. following his example, published that by their open gifts he would measure their beneuolent hearts: so that he who gaue most should be iudged to be his most louing friend; and he that gaue little to be esteemed according to his gift. By this meanes king Henry got innumerable great sums of money, with some grudge of the people, for the extremitie shewed by the commissioners in diuers places.

The citizens of London gaue toward this tournie 9682. pound, 17. s. and foure pence. Toward the which sum, manie Aldermen gaue 200. l. the peere, and some of the Commons 100. pounde: the rest was supplied by the poorer lost.

John Twicheat Lord Audley Treasurer of Englande deceased on the 26. of September, he left (sue James Audley married to Margaret, daughter to sir Ric. Darell knight. Which James Audley was beheaded on the twentieth eight of June, Anno 1497.

Henry the kings second sonne was bozne at Crénenwich in Kent on the 22. of June.

Maximilian king of Romans intending to be returned on the Frenchmen, for the manie iniuries done to him, because he was not rich enough to maintaine the warre of himselfe, he sent his ambassadoe James Contibald, a man of great wisedome, to require the king of England to take his part against the French king, making diuers great offers on his owne behalfe, if it would please him so to do.

K. Henry no lesse desirous than Maximilian to put the French king to trouble, and chieflie to aid the Brittons in the extremitie of their business, gladly consented to Maximilian, and promised to prepare an armie with all speed, and to passe the seas to invade the French territories.

The 6. of Aprill the nobles of the realme, Hugh Clopton Mayor of London, his brethren the Aldermen, Sheriftes, and Companies of the Citie in their lieries, assembled in the Cathedral Church of S. Paul, where Doctor Morton Archbishop of Canturburie, Chancellor of England, made to them an oration, declaring how the king of Spaine had won the greates and rich Citie and countrey of Granada from the Moyses: for tole whereof, Te Deum was sung with great solemnitie.

In the moneth of Maye following, was holden a great and valliant iustling within the Kinges Spannoe of Shyne, now called Richmond, in Southwiche, the which endured by the space of a moneth, sometime within the sayde place, and sometime without, vpon the Gréne without the Gate of the said Spannoe. In the which space, a Combate was holden and done betwixt Syr James Parker knight, and Hugh Vaughan Gentleman of War, vpon controuersie for the Armes that Garar gaue to the sayde Hugh Vaughan: but hee was there allowed by the king to beare them, and Syr James Parker was slayne at the first course. The cause of his death was thought to be long of a false helmet, which by force of a Cronacle sayled, & so he was stricken into the mouth, that his tongue was boyned into the hinder part of the head, and so he died incontinently.

In this season, Charles the French king received the lady Anne of Brittain, and with great solemnitie wedded her, having with her in dotage the dutche of Britaine. Thus was Maximilian in a great chafe toward the French king: wherefore he sent unto king Henrie, desiring him with all speede to passe the seas with his armie, that they might pursue the warre against their adversaries with fire, sword, and blood. King Henry hearing this, and having no mistrust in the promise of Maximilian, with all speede leuied an army, and rigged his name: and when all things were ready, he sent his Almoner Christopher Vriwike, and Sir John Rifeley knight, unto Maximilian, to certifie him that the king was in a readinesse, and would arrive at Calais, as soon as he should be advertised, that Maximilian and his men were ready to joine with him.

These ambassadors coming into Flanders, perceived that Maximilian was neither purvided of men, money, armour, or any other thing necessary for the setting forth of war, save onely that his will was good, but his power was small.

King Henrie being advertised hereof, was sore disquieted in his minde: but taking counsaile, at length hee determined not to staie his pretended journey, and therefore he so increased his number before he toke shippe, that hee with his owne power might bee able to match with his adversaries.

King Henry
sailed into France.

Then on the 9. of September, king Henry departed from Exentwich toward the sea-side, and on the first of October toke shipping at Sandwich, and the same daie landed at Calais with a great armie. The 15. of October he departed toward Boloigne, the first night he lay at Sandingfield, the next night at Hoxgillon, where he met with the Earle of Arfoide chiefe Captaine of the fore-warde, then come from the beating downe of the Towne of Arde: with the earle of Arfoide came the earle of Shrobsburie, the earle of Devonshire, the earle of Suffolke, the earle of Essex, the lord Grey Codner, the L. Strange, the lord Powelle, the lord Hastings, the lord Audley, the lord Laumer, the baron of Dndley, and divers knights and esquires: these laie that night at Hoxgillon, the next night both the wardes lay at Willinell, and the next night they came before Boloigne, and there laie at siege till the eight of November, at the which time the lord Cordos chiefe Captaine under the French king, in his masters name required peace, which king Henry granted upon conditions. This peace greatly displeased the English men, because they were ready pressed to haue set on their enemies, and brought into great hope to haue bene enriched by the spoile to haue fallen to their lots of their enemies goods, besides the glorious fame of renowned victorie: and namelie for that diuers of the Captaines, to set themselves and their handes the more gorgeouslie forward, had borrowed large summes of money, and for the repayment had mortgaged their landes, &c. The king returned to Calais: there were not manie of the English armie left at this siege of Boloigne, and few men of name more then that ballant captaine Sir John Sauage knight.

King Henry arrived at Dover on the seventeenth of December, from whence he rode to Westminster, where he kept his Christmasse with great solemnitie.

John sprang there by a newe found son to king Edward the fourth in this manner. The Dutchesse of Burgoigne espousing a certaine young man, of his sage beautifull, of countenance demure, of wit subtil, called Perken Werbecke, this young man trauiailing manie Countreies, could speake English, Perken Werbecke and diuers other languages: the Dutchesse glad to haue got to meete an instrument for her purpose, as one not unlike to be taken, and reported for the Duke of Yorke, sonne to her brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certaine space with her priuile, and him with such diligence instructed, both of the secrets, and common affaires of the Realme of England, and of the linage, descent, and order of the house of Yorke, that like a good scholar, he could tell all that was taught him without any staggering or staie in his wordes: and besides that he kept such a princely countenance, that all men in maner did firmly beleue, that he was extracted of that noble familie of the Duke of Yorke: when the Dutchesse sawe her time, she sent this Perken first into Doringale, and so into Ireland, where shortly after his arrivall, he entred so faire in credite with the people, that his wordes were taken to be true.

The French king advertised hereof, sent into Ireland for Perken, who with all diligence sailed into France, and coming to the kings presence, was of him royally receiued, and had a gard assigned, whereof was gouernor the lord Congreshall, and to him being at Paris, resorted Sir George Nevill baron, Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Robinson, and a hundred English men: but after that the peace was confirmed betwixt the two kings of England and of France, the French king dismissed Perken.

And so Perken returned to the ladie Margaret, who assigned him a garde, and called him the white Rose of England, the nobility of Flanders did to him all reuerence.

In England the hute of him sore disquieted the people, inasmuch that not onlie of the meaner sort, but also of the Nobles beleued all that was of him reported, and manie passed ouer to him: and some of the Noble men conspired together, purposing to ayde the foresaide Perken. Wherefore they sent messengers to the Ladie Margaret, to knowe when Richard Duke of Yorke might come into England, to the intente they might bee in a readinesse to assist him, at his arrivall. Sir Robert Clifford knight, and William Barley were sent into Flanders, which discovered to the Dutchesse all the secret intent of the friends of the newe founde Duke. The Dutchesse glablie receiued this message, and brought the messenger to the sight of Perken: who so well counterfeited the gesture, and manner of Richard Duke of Yorke, that Sir Robert Clifford beleued that he was the second sonne of king Edward, and thereof wrote into England to his complices.

Werbeke.

The king perceiuing that this fable was not vanquished, sent certaine knights with competent bandes of souldiours to keepe the sea coastes: he also sent into the Lowe countries certaine persons to learne the trueth of this forged Dukes progenie: where some of them comming to Dozney got knowledge that he was borne in that citie of base linage, and named Perken Werbeke. The king being aduertised hereof, sent sir Edward Poynings knight, and sir W. Warham doctor of the lawes vnto Philip archduke of Burgoyne, to signifye to him that the yong man being with the lady Margaret, had falsely surped the name of Richard Duke of Yorke, long before murdered. The ambassadores hauing done their message, were answered, that to haue the king of Englands loue, the archduke would neither aid or assist Perken, nor his complices, in any cause or quarrell.

After the returne of the ambassadores, the king sent certaine espials into flanders, which should faine the selues to haue fled to the duke of Yorke, and thereby to search out the whole intent of the conspiracie.

Other were sent to intise sir Robert Clifford and William Barley to returne into Englande, promising to them pardon of all their offences, and high rewards, for obeying the kings request. They that were sent did so earnestly applye their busines, that they brought to passe all thinges at their owne desires, for they learned who were the chiefe conspiratours, and perswaded sir Robert Clifford to giue ouer that enterpryse. When the king had knowledge of the chiefe Captaynes of the conspiracie, hee caused them to be apprehended. The chiefe were, Iohn Ratcliffe, Lorde Fitzwaller, Sir Simon Mountforde, Sir Thomas Twares knights, William Dawbeney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Chreslenor, and Thomas Aftewode: Simon Mountforde, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney were beheaded, the other had their pardons, the Lorde Fitzwaller was conueied to Calais and layde in hoale, and after lost his head.

King Henry taking displeasure with the king of Romaines, for that he had not kept touch with him against the french king, and partly displeased with the Flemmings, but speciallie with the Ladie Margaret, for keeping and setting forward Perken Werbeke, not onlie banished the Flemmings wares and merchandize out of his dominions, but also restrained all English merchants from their repaire and traffike, into any of the lands and territories of the king of Romaines, or of the archduke Philip son to the king of Romaines, causing the pparte to be kept at Calais, of all English merchandizes and commodities: wherefore the said king and his son banished out of their lands and signories, all English clothes, pearne, tynne, leade, and other commodities of this Realme.

Henry the kings second son was created duke of Yorke, on Alsholme Counten, at which time were made knights the duke of Yorke, the Lorde Harington, Lorde Clifton, Lorde Dacre of the South, Lorde Waren, Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir I. Arundell, Sir Walter Griffith, Sir Geruyes Clifton, Sir Robert Hartcourt, Sir Edward Traforde, Sir Henry Merney, Sir Robert Newbrough, Sir Ralph Ryder, Sir I. Sparke, Sir Humfrey Fullorde, Sir Robert Linton,

Sir

Sir Pierce Edgecombe, Sir Robert Clerc, Sir Thomas Farfax, Sir Richard Knightley, Sir I. Cheke.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, where on the twelue day hee made Ralph Aultry Mayor of London, and William Marston late Mayor, knights.

The morrowe after the Epiphantie, King Henry went to the Towert of London, and there remained till such time, as Sir Robert Clifford was presented, which was done so; a policie, that if Sir Robert accused anye of the nobilitie, they mought be called thither, without suspicion of anye enill, and there attached, and laid fast: now at the comming of Sir Robert Clifford to the kinges presence, he besought him of pardon, and obtained it, and the with opened the manner of the conspiracie, and who were the ayders, fautors, and chiefe beginners of it. Amongst whome he accused sir William Stanley, whome the king had made his chiefe Chamberlaine, and one of his priuate Councell: but now the king caused him to be restrained from his libertie in his owne Chamber, within the Square Tower, and there appointed him by his priuate Councell to be examined, where he himselfe agreed to all thinges layde to his charge, if hee were therein faultie & culpable. The report is, that this was his offence, when communication was had betwene him and the formentioned Sir Robert Clifford, as concerning Perken, Sir William Stanley saide, that if hee certainelie knewe that the yong man was the vndoubted sonne and heire of king Edward the fourth, hee woulde neuer fight nor beare armour against him, wherefore he was charged that he bare no heartie good will toward king Henry. The king hauing thus an hole in his coat, doubted first what he should do with him, for loath he was to lose the fauor of his brother the earle of Darby: but arraigned he was at Westminster and aduinged to die, according to which sentence, he was brought to the Towert hill on the sixteenth daie of February, and there beheaded. This Sir William Stanley was the chiefe and principall helper of King Henry to the Crowne at Bolsworth fieldes, against King Richard: Hee was a man of great power in his Countrey, and also of greates wealth, in so much, as the common fame ran, there was in his castle of Holste, found in ready coine and plate, to the value of foure thousand markes or more, and his land and ses extended to thre thousand pounds by yeare.

The 22. of February were arraigned in Guildhall at London foure persons, to witte, Thomas Bagnall, Iohn Scot, Iohn Heche, and Iohn Kenington, the which were Sanctuary men of Saint Martin le grand in London, and lately before taken thence, for forging seditious libels, to the slander of the king, and some of his Councell: for the which thre of them were aduinged to die, and the fourth named Bagnall, pleaded to be released to Sanctuary: by reason whereof he was replined to the Towert till the next terme, and on the 26. of February, the other thre with a Flemming, and Robert Bikle a peoman of the Crowne, were all thre executed at Tyborne.

Giles Lorde Dawbeney was made the kings chiefe Chamberlaine. The king sent into Irelande, Sir Henry Deane, late abbot of Lanthontie, whome whome he made Chancelor of that Ile, and Sir Edward Poinings knight, with an armie of men, whereof when the fauours of Perken heard, they straight fled to the woods and marshes. Sir Edward Poinings with his whole armie marched against the wild Irish, because the other being culpable were fled to them for succour: but when hee sawe himselfe and his power, not able to followe his enemies in the woods, marshes and mountaines, he was constrained to recule backe, soe obliquely agaynst Gerald Earle of Exyloure, being then the Kinges Deputie, whome hee suspected to bee the cause that hee hadde no succours sent him, and therefore sodaynelie hee caused the Earle to bee apprehended, and as a Prisoner brought him into Englande, which Earle so cleared himselfe of all thinges sayde to his charge, that he was dismissed and sent into Ireland agayne, there to bee deputie and Lieutenant as before.

King Henrie beinge nowe in some better successe of his Estate, tooke his progresse into Lancashire about the five and twentieth of June, there to bee merrie with his spouster the Countesse of Darbie, which then lye at Lancaster.

Sir W. Caple

Sir William Caple Alderman of London, was called in question, and condemned to the king, in twentie seven hundred, and fortie three pennes sterling, for the breach of certayne statutes made before times: for the which he made his end with the king for 16. hundred and 15. pounds, five shillings, eight pence, which he paid.

Perken Werbeke
here arrived in Kent.

Perken Werbeke being in Flanders, and hoping at length to obtayne the Crowne of England, gathered a power of all nations, some banqueroutes, some thieves, and such as desired to live by rapine, and being thus furnished, he tooke such shippes as his friends had provided for him, and then departing from Flanders, arrived at Deale in Kent, on the third of Julie: he put som of his men to lande, to signifie his arrivall with such a power, that the vidoy must needs incline to his part. The Gentilmen understanding that Perken had none with him to account of, but straungers borne, and bale people, like faithfull laboies determined to fall upon those that were thus nowe come to Lande, and also to trye if they might allure the whole number out of their shippes, so to give them Battayle. But Perken would not sette one foot out of his Shippe, till he sawe all thinges sure: yet he permitted some of his souldiours to go on lande, which beinge trained forth a prettie waile from their shippes, and seeing they coulde have no comfort of the Countrey, they withdrew againe to their shippes: at which withdrawing, the Galloes of Sandwich, with certayne commons of the Countrey bickered with the residue that were upon lande, and tooke allue of them 169. persons, among the which were five Captaines, Mountfort, Corbet, White Belt, Quincyn, and Greame. And on the twelfth of Julie Sir John Pechy Sheriffe of Kent, brought unto London Widge those 169. persons, where the Sheriffes of London, Nicholas Alwine and John Warner received and committed them, rased in robes like horses in a cart, unto the tower of London, and to Newgate, and whollie after to the number of 150. were hanged about the sea coasts in Kent, Essex,

Suffes,

Suffes, and Southfolke: the residue were executed at Exborne and at Wapping in the Whose besides London: and Perken fled into Flanders.

In this season deceased Cicilie Countesse of Poike, mother to King Edward the fourth, in her castle of Warhamstead, and was buried at Fordinghay by her husband.

King Henry being in his progresse north, sent Sir Richard Gullford to command the fidelitie and manhood of the Gentilmen, and also to render to them most partie thanks for the same: he also caused order to be taken for the erecting of bikenings or beacons, and watching of them.

Perken Werbeke sailed into Ireland, trusting there to augment his number: but perceiuing that the hope of vidoye consisted not in naked people without furniture or armor, he toke the sea againe at Cose, and sailed into Scotland, where comming to the presence of King James, hee forged such a painted processe, that the king of Scots began to haue Perken in great honor, and caused him to be called Duke of Poike, and to persuade the world that he was to inuade, he caused the lady Katherine daughter to Alexander Earle of Huntley, his nigh kinsman to be espoused to him.

And shortly after in companie of this Perken, he entered into Englande with a puissant armie, and caused proclamation to be made to spare all those that would submit themselves unto Richard Duke of Poike, and here-with they began to war in most cruell maner, with slaughter of men, burning of townes, and committing detestable enormities, so that all the Countrey of Southumberland, was by them in maner wasted and destroyed. At length when the souldiers were laden with pray, perceiuing that no succour came out of England unto the new Duke, they withdrew backe into Scotlande, enriched with prayes and booties.

When King Henrie was truely certified that the Scottish King was returned home, he caused all the preparations made at that time to goe against him: but yet meaning to be reuenged of the wrongs done to him by King James and his people, hee first called a Parliament, and in that assemblie declared the cause of the instant warre, and how necessarie it should be for to haue the warre pursued against those enemies that had begunne it: to which motion all the Nobilitie wholie agreed, and a subsidie was granted.

King Henry prepared a mightie armie to inuade Scotland, and ordeined for chiefeaine, the lord Dawbeney: but as this armie was forward towarde Scotlande, the same was stayed and called backe againe, by reason of a new commotion begun by the Cornishmen, for the payment of the subsidie granted at the last Parliament. Of these people the heade were called Thomas Flamoke, a Gentleman learned in the lawe, and Michael Ioseph a blacke smith, or boyse-farrier of Boomin, men of stout stomackes. Reginald Bray, because they were chiefe of the kinges Council. Flamoke and Ioseph exhorted the common people to put on harness, and to followe them in the quarrell, promising not to hurt anie creature, but onelie to see them punished that procured such exactions to be layde on the people, without anie reasonable cause: so these capitaines assembled a great number of people together, then passing their hardines, when all thinges were ready for their journey, set forthward with their armie, and came to Elington, where they slew the possesse of Martin, which was one of the commissioners of the subsidie, and from thence came to Welles, so intending to go to London, where the king then sojourned. When the king was aduertised of these doings, he was somewhat astonished, he reuoked the lord Daubeney which was going against the Scots, and increased his army. The nobles came to London with as manie men of war as they could put in a readines, to aide the king against his rebelles, if none should be. In the mean time James Twicheat L. Audley, being confederat with the rebels of Cornwall, joined with them, being come to Welles, and took upon him, as their chiefe Captaine and leader: from Welles they went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, & so into Kent, where they hoped to haue had great aid, but they were deceiued: for the earle of Kent, George L. Burgesweny, John Brooke, L. Cobham, sir Edward Poinings, sir Ric. Guilford, sir T. Bourchier, John Peche, William Scot, and a great number of people were ready to defend the countrey, which thing maruellouslie dismayed the Cornish men, so that manie of them fled from their companie. The Capitaines brought their people to black heath, and there ordered their battels, either ready to fight with the king, if he would assaile them, or else to assault the citie of London. The king sent John Earle of Arfordre, Henry Bouchier earle of Essex, Edmonde de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rife ap Thomas, and Sir Humfrey Stanley, noble warriors, with a great companie of Archers, and horsemen, to inuiron the hill on either side, to the intent that all by-ways being stopped, all hope of flight should be taken from them: and incontinentlie, hee himselfe being furnished with a grate armie, sette forthward out of the Citie, encamped himselfe in Saint Georges felde, where he lodged that night, and on the next morning sent the Lord Daubeney with a great company to set upon them earlie in the morning, which first gat the bridge of Warrford strait, while the earles set on them on euery side, the lord Daubeney came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting, on the 22. of Iune, the Cornish men were ouercome: but first they took the Lord Daubeney prisoner, but let him go at libertie, without hurt or detriment. There were slain of the rebels about thre hundred, and taken of them about fiftene hundred. There was giuen to them that took them their goods: amongst them the blacke Smith and other their Capitaynes were put to death. And when this battaile was ended, the king wanted of all his number but thre hundred men, which were slayne.

The Lord Audley was drawn from Pelagate to the Tower-hill in a coat of his own armes, painted upon paper, reuerfed and all to towe, and there was beheaded on the 28. of Iune. Flamoke and Ioseph the black-Smith were drawn, beheaded, beheaded, and quartered at Tybourn, and their heads and quarters set up at London and other places: knights and bannerets made at Black-heath, and at London bridge foot, when the king returned from Black-heath, as I haue set down in my larger chronicle.

In the moneth of July L. Henry sent an army into Scotland, under the guidance of the earle of Surrey, and the lord Neuill, which made sharp war upon the Scots: but by the labor of Peter Helias sent from the king of Spaine, a truce was concluded betwixt the two kings of England and of Scotland, with condition that James King of Scots should conuery Perken Werbecke out of his realme and signories.

About the same time king Henry receiued the ambassadoys that were sent to him from the French king. Also the Lord of Camphere, and other orators of Philip Archduke of Austrich, and Duke of Burgoyne, came to him for the conclusion of amitie, and to haue the English Merchantes to resort againe into their Countrey, which request he granted. And so did the English men resort againe into the Archdukes dominions, and were receiued (saith Hall) into Andwerpe with Generall procession, so glad was that towne of their returne.

Perken Werbeck being willed by the king of Scots to depart out of the Scottish dominions, sailed with his wife and familie into Ireland, where while hee remained hee had knowledge from the Cornishmen, that they were ready to renew the war againe. Whereupon he hauing with him some small ships, and not about an hundred and twentie men, sailed into Cornewall, and there landed at Whitefane Bate on the 7. of September, from whence he went to Bodmynne, where hee gathered to him about thre thousand persons. When Perken made Proclamations in name of King Richard the fourth, as son to king Edward the fourth. And by the aduise of his thre Counselliers, John Heron Spencer, a Banquerout, Richard Skelton Tapler, and John Askeley Scriener, determined first of all to assaile the winning of Excester, and so hastning thither, he laid siege to it: The citizens perceiving themselves to be in danger, let certaine messengers downe by ropes ouer the wall, that might certifie the king: And herewith caused saggots to be brought and laid to the inward part of their gates, and set them all on fire, to the intent to keepe their enemies from entering in, and their Citizens from flying out, and that they in the meane season might make trenches & rampers to defend their enemies in stead of gates. Perken set by Ladders to scale the walles: but the Citizens, with helpe of such as were come forth of the countrey to their aid, so valiantly defended the walles, that they slew about 200. of Perkenes souldiours at that assault. The king hastned forth with his Hoste, and sent the Lord Daubeney with certaine bands of Light horsemen to aduertise all men of his coming.

But in the meane season Edward Courtney earle of Denonshire, and William his sonne, accompanied with sir Edmond Carew, sir T. Trinchard, sir William Courtney, sir Tho. Fulford, sir I. Haliwell, sir I. Crokar, Walter Courtney, Peter Edgecombe, W. Snaure, came into the citie of Excester to helpe the citizens, so that the earle was hurt in the arme with an arrow, and so were many of his men, but selve saine. When Perken sawe he could not winne the cite of Excester, he went from thence to Taunton, and there mustering his men, he perceived them to be diminished, he began to mistrust the remnant: in dede when the people that followed him in hope that no small number of the nobilitie would ioyne with him, sawe no such matter come to passe, they sale awaie from him. When the king heard that Perken was gone to Taunton, he followed after him with all speede, and by the way there came to him Edward Duke of Buckingham, and a great companie of noble men. But as some as Perken was informed that the king was at hand, he with a 60. horsemen fled from Taunton to a sanduary at Wetwoley be the Southamptons. King Henry sent the lord Dawbeney with 500. horsemen after Perken to apprehend him, so that many of his captaynes were taken. Also diuers horsemen rode to Saint Michaels mount, and there toke the lady Gorden wife to Perken, and brought her to the king. At whose beauty and amiable countenance the king much marvelled, and sent her to London to the Queene. The common people submitted themselves to the kings mercie.

After this the king rode to Excester, and there executed diuers Cornishmen: he also caused the sanduary wherein Perken was inclosed, to be insurround with bands of light horsemen, to watch that Perken shoulde not escape, wherefore Perken upon promise of pardon committed himselfe to the king, and then the king returned to London.

The 28. of Nouember, Perken was conceied on horseback through cheape, and Cornhill vnto the Tower of London, & from thence back againe through Candle weke strate to Westminster.

The 2. of December at 9. of the clocke at night, sodainly began a great fier within the kings lodging, then being at his manor of Sythe, which fier continued till midnight, by violence whereof much and a great part of the old buildings of that place was bzent, with hangings, beds, apparell, plate, and manie iewels.

Perken Werbecke endeavouring to feale secretly out of the land, was taken againe by his keepers, and by the kings commandement cast into the tower of London, and after he was shewed in Westminster, and Cheape, stocked on scaffolds to the great wonderment of many people: where he read his confession written with his owne hand.

His yere all the gardens which had bene continued time out of minde without anye gate of London, were destroyed, and of them was made a plaine fiede for archers to shote in. The English merchants were receiued into Antwerpe with generall procession, after they had ben long absent from thence.

This yere was a great drought, by reason whereof, a load of hay which was before time sold at London for five shillings, was this yere sold for ten shillings or twelue shillings more.

This yere one Sebastian Gabato a Genoas sonne, bozne in Bisslow, professed himselfe to be expert in knowledge of the circuit of the world and Ilands of the same, as by his Charts & other reasonable demonstrations he shewed, caused the king to man & victual a ship at Bisslow to search for an Iland, which he knew to be replenished with rich commodities: in the ship diuers merchants of London adventured smal stocks, and in the companie of this ship, sailed also out of Bisslow 3. or 4. small ships fraught with deight and grosse wares, as coarse cloth, caps, laces, points, and such other. Sir Humfrey Gilbert knight, in his booke intituled, A discovery for a new passage to Cathay, toucheth thus: Sebastian Gabato, by his personall experience and trauell, hath set forth and described this passage in his Charts, which are yet to be seene in the Duannes spaciellies piloy gallerie at White hall, who was sent to make this discouerie by H. Henry the 7. and entred the same fret, affirming, that he sailed very far westward, with a quarter of the north, on the north side of Terra de Labrador, the 11. of Iune, vntill he came to the septentrional latitude of 67 ½ degrees, and finding the seas still open, said, that he might and would haue gon to Cathay, if the enimity of the master and mariners had not bene.

The 24. of Februarie, the kings thirde sonne was christened within the Friers church at Greenwiche, by the name of Edward.

A Shoemakers son bozne in Bishops gate strate of London, was hanged at Saint Thomas Waterings on Shrovetuesday, for naming himselfe to bee Edward earle of Marwarke, son to George duke of Clarence: which Edward earle of Marwarke was then (and had bene all the raigne of this king) kept secret prisoner in the tower of London.

The Calcoine wine was sold at London for fortie shillings the tunne, and much left to the shipmen for freight, the plenty was so great. A quarter of wheate foure shillings, and bay salt foure pence the bushell.

Perken Werbecke being in hold, by great promises corrupted his keepers, named Strangwaie, Blewet, Aftwood, and long Roger, servants to sir John Digby lieutenant of the tower (as was affirmed) intended to haue slaine their master, and to haue set Perken and the earle of Marwarke at large: which earle of Marwarke had bene kept in prison within the tower (as we haue heard) from the first yere of this king to this 15. yere, out of all companie of men and sight of beasts, and therefore could not of himselfe seeke his owne destruction, but by the drift of other he was brought to his death, for being made priuie of this enterpryse deuised by Perken and his complices, he assented thereunto: but this deuise being reuealed, Perken and John a Waters, sometime maior of Coyke in Ireland, were arraigned and condemned at Westminster, and on the 23. of Nouember dyed one to Liboyne, where Perken read his former confession, as before he had done in Cheape, taking on his death the same to be true, and so he and John a Water asked the king forgiveness, and toke their deaths patientlie.

Also Edward Plantagenet the forenamed earle of Marwarke, son to George duke of Clarence, brother to Edward the fourth, being about the age of foure and twentie yeres, on the one and twentieth of Nouember was arraigned at Westminster, before the earle of Oxford then high Steward of England, of treason, in minding to haue escaped (as they saide) and he was perswaded

This yere when the R. had finished much of his new building at his manor of Whitehall, & again furnished and repaired that before was perished with fier, in the 13. yere of his raigne, forasmuch as in the time of that hideous fire, many notable and rich feluels, and other things of superabundant value, were perished, by the violence thereof, it pleased him to command it should be called his manor of Richmond, and not other wise. The king also this yere builded anew Batmards castle in London, and repaired his manor of Greenwich.

In the moneth of May the R. kept a rolaist turney and iusts in the tower of London, of his lords, knights, and other.

About this time Edmond de la Pole earle of Suffolke, son to John Duke of Suffolke, and Labie Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, was indicted of murder, for slaying a meane person in his rage and furie (as it was saide) and he was perfwaded to confesse, but was pardoned by the king, yet because he was brought to the bar afore the kings bench, and arraigned (which he took as a great blemish to his honor) shortly after he fled into Flanders, unto the lady Margaret his suut. After twelues (saith Hal) he returned again, and excused himselfe to the king, so that he was thought to be guiltles of any crime. But after this earle, with his brother Richard fled againe into Flanders. Which departure of the Earle soze vbered the king, who doubted of some new trouble to ensue thereof.

In this meane time the lady Katherin of Spaine was sent by her father R. Ferdinand, with a puissant nauy of ships into England, where she arrived in the haven of Plimmouth, the 2. of October.

unto Lambeth, where the with his ladies was lodged, in the archbishops Anne of Canturbury: and upon the Fridaye next following about two of the clock at afternone, the said ladie princes accompanied with many lordes and ladies, in most sumptuous manner apparrelled, came riding from Lambeth into Southwarke, and so to London bridge, where was ordeined a collie pageant of S. Katherine and Saint Virgile, with many virgins; from thence she rode to Grace Church, where was ordeined a second pageant, from thence to the conduit in Cornhill, where was another pageant. The great conduit in cheape ran with Salsorne wine, and was furnished with musick. Against Soperlane end was the fourth pageant. At the standerd in cheape was ordeined the first pageant. At Pauls gate was the 6. pageant: by the which the princeesse rode through Pauls church: past unto the bishop of Londons palace, where she and his people were lodged.

Now within the church of S. Paul, to wit, from the west gate of it unto the uppermost grasse or step at the going in of the quier, was made a pale of tin ber and boards to go upon, from the same west doore unto the foresaid grasse, of the height of 6 foot from the ground, or more; and forerancut the place where the commissaries court is kept within the said church, was ordeined a standing like unto a mountaine, with steps on every side, which was covered ouer with red tussled, and in like wise was all the railles: against which mountaine upon the north side, within the foresaide place of the commissaries court was ordeined a standing for the king, and such other as liked him to haue: & on the south side almost for against the kings standing was ordeined a scaffold, whereupon stood the spaw and his brethren.

Then upon the 14. of Nouember being Sundae, upon the aboue named mountaine, was prince Arthur about the age of 15. yeres, and the lady Katherine about the age of 18. yeres, both clad in white sattine, married by the Archbishop of Canturbury, assisted by 19. bishops and abbots mitred. And the B. the queene, the kings mother, stood in the place aforesaid, where they hearde and beheld the solemnisation, which being finished, the said archbishop and B. shops took their way from the mountaine, upon the same pale covered under foot with blew rep-cloth unto the quier, & so to the high altar, whom followed the spouse and spouses, the lady Cicile sister to the queene bearing his traine, after him followed 100. ladies & gentlewomen, in right costly apparel, then the spaw in a gowne of crimson velvet, and his brethren in scarlet, with the sword borne before the maior, & late in the quier the masse while, the archb. of York late in the beanes place, and offered as chiefe, and after him the D. of Buckingham, &c. Wonderful it was to behold the riches of apparel lincie that daie, with the possant chaines of gold: of which, two were specially noted, to wit, sir T. Brandon knight, master of the kings horse, which that day wore a chain valued at 1400. pound: and the other William de Riuers esquire, master of the B. hauberk, whose chain was valued at a thousand pound: many more were of 200. 300, and so forth, these were not noted for the length, but for the greatnesse of the links. Also the Duke of Buckingham wore a gowne bought of pedle woike, and set upon cloth of tinsie, furred with fables, the which gowne was valued at 1500. l. & sir Nicholas Vause knight, wore a gown of purple velvet, pight with peeces of gold so thicke and masie, that it was valued in golde, besides the silke and fur, a thousand pound: which chaines and garments were valued by goldsmithes of best skill, and them that wrought them. The masse being finished, the princeesse was led by Henry duke of York, and a Legate of Spain, by the foresaide pace into the palace, going before her men of honor, to the number of 160. with gentlemen and other. There came unto the spaw: sir Richard Crofts steward of the princes house, which brought him and his brethren the aldermen into the greates hall, and at a table upon the west side of the hall, caused them to be set to dinner, where honorable were they served with 12. dishes to a messe at the first course, 15. the second course, and 18. dishes the third course. In this hall was a cupbord of fine staves height, being triangular, the which was set with plate valued 1200. l. the which was neuer mooued at that day: & in the utter chamber where the princeesse dined, was a cupbord of gold plate, garnished with stone and pearle, valued about 20000. pound. The Tuesday following, the king and queene being all this season at Rainards castle, came unto Bowles, and heard there masse, and then accompanied with many nobles, went into the palace, and there dined with the princeesse. This daie sir Nicholas Vause wore a collar of Gutes which weighed, as the goldsmithes that made it reported, 800. pounds of nobles: And the same daie at afternone, the said prince was conduced with many lordes and ladies unto Bowles wharffe, where the said estates took their barges, and were rowed to Westminster, upon whome the maior attended, with the Aldermen and fellowship in barges, garnished with banners and other deuises, musick, &c. Thus much for that marriage.

The 5. of January at Pauls crosse was declared the assurance of James B. of Scots, and of the lady Margaret eldest daughter to king Henry of England, in reioicing whereof Te Deum was sung, and bonifera made through the city, and at 12. of the bonifera were set 12. hogsheds of Salsorne wine, to be drunk of all men frelie.

There was apprehended Will. Courtenay son to the earle of Denonshyre, which had married the lady Katherine daughter to B. Ed. the 4. and William de la Pole brother to the earle of Suffolke, sir James Tyrell, sir John Windham, &c. when the earle of Suffolke before died (as ye haue heard) understood what wait was laid for him in Flanders, he wanted about Germany and France, to purchase succor, if by any meanes he might, but in the end, he submitted himselfe under the protection of Philip archduke of Aulrich, which was to his own destruction, as proued after.

When king Henry had settled things to his contentment and pleasure, there suddenly happened to him a lamentable chance, for in the beginning of the month of Aprill, there died that noble and vertuous prince Arthur the kings eldest sonne, under the age of 16. yeres, in his castle of Ludlowe, and with great funerals obsequie was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Worcester.

On the 2. of May were arraigned in Guildhall at London, sir James Tyrell knight, lieutenant of Guines castle, sir John Windham knight, Welborne

The 25. of January began a parliament at Westminster, of the which was chosen speaker for the commons master Edmond Dudley.

A new coine was by parliament appointed, that is to say, groat and halfe groat, which bare but halfe faces: the same time also was coined a groat, which was in value 12. d. but of those were but few coined.

This yere allome, which many yeres before had bene sold for 6 s. an hundred, and lomer, arose to 5. nobles an hundred, and as to 4. markes, &c.

About Christmasse, the more part of the prisoners of the Parthalliey in Southwarke brake out, and manie of them being shortly after taken, were put to execution, specially those which had laine for felony or treason: among the which, two of them being sea rousers were hanged on a tree in the Thames, a little from Whapping in the Weste, and hung there long after.

This yere on S. Through great tempest of winde bring at the south-west, which began the 15. of January, & continued till the 26. of the same, Philip king of Castile and his wife were weather beaten, and lanted at Falmouth in England, as the y were passing on the 16. of January out of Flanders toward Spaine, who were honorably receiued by the earle of Arundel at the kings appointment with 300. horses, all by torch light. This tempest was strange to many men, because the violence thereof had blowne downe the eagle of brasse from the spire of Paules church in London, and in the falling, the same eagle brake and battered the blacke eagle which hung for a signe in Paules churchyard, that time being but low houses, where now is the school of Paules.

Edmond de la Pole earle of Suffolke being sent according to promise made to king Henry) out of the county of Philip king of Castile, through Flanders was brought to Calais on the 16. of March, and so ouer into England & landed at Douer on the 24. of March, conueied by sir Henry Wyat knight, and sir

This yere the king began to be diseased of a certaine infirmittie, which thyle euery yere, but especially in the spring time, sore vcered him.

Also the sweating sickness, which (as ye haue heard) in the first yere of this kings raigne first assailed the people of the realme, now assailed them again, howbeit, by the remedy found at the beginning of it, nothing the like number died thereof, now this second time, as did the first.

This yere in the Lent season, the king deliuered manie prisoners out of sundry prisons, in somuch, that as many as lay in Newgate, and both Counters for 40. shillings and vnder, he redeemed and deliuered: and ouer that he redeemed many that lay for ten pound, and other larger sums as was said.

But true it is, that this yere or rather somewhat soner, sprang much sorrow through the land, for by meane of gracelesse persons, which named themselves the kings Promoters, many forgotten statutes, made hundreds of yeres passed, were nowe quickened, and sharply called vpon, to the great vniquietnesse of many the kings subiects, as well the rich as the other that had competent substance. And albeit that other yeres before passed, since the time of sir William Caple trouble, which was in the 10. yere of this kings raigne, many times were called to sundry reckonings, and were faine to seeke their ends to their charge: yet now, since Emplon and Dudley were set in authoritie, many mo in number were called before them, for many surmised causes, of the which none escaped without paying of fines. And if it were such a matter, as some would abide the trial of the law, then had they false Jurors so fixed vnto them, that they were well assured that they would not passe against their wills, for all was done in the kings name, and yet the most profit came to other mens coffers.

Thomas Savage archbishop of Yorke deceased at his castle of Calwod, his body was buried at yorke, his hart at Spackelfield in Cheshire where he was borne, in a chappel by him founded, which he minded to haue made a collegidge: he was not elected after the ancient custome, but by nomination of the B. and fauor of the Pope Alexander. This Th. was daily employed about temporall matters at the kings pleasure, he used hunting, and bestowed much cost in repairing and new building at his castle of Calwod, and his manors of Scroby, he maintained manie tall peomen in his house, and was neuer in stalled, but after a secret maner at Yorke, and by his deputy at Beuerlake, he was the first that brake the custome of solemn feasting at their installing at Yorke, he

he was 7. yers archbishop: and to him succeeded Christopher Bambridge doctor of both lawes, born near to Apleby in Westmerland, first master of the Roles, then deane of Yorke, and after bishop of Durham.

The 25. of Aprill, a great part of the city of Norwich was burnt. And again in the moneth of June on the euen and day of the ascension of our Lord, another part of the same city of Norwich was fired, and sore perished and nere consumed with fire, that began in a French mans house named Peter Johnson a chirurgion, in the parish of Saint George.

This yere amongst manie other was sir W. Caple againe newly troubled, for things done in time of his being maior of London, wher of the report was, for that false money came to his sight, and hee did not due correction vpon the partie that to him was accused to be the coiner of it: but were this the cause or other, truth it is, that in great trouble he was for it, and finally, for he would fall to no agreement, he was by Derby, Simson, and other of their companie, which as then the whole Jurie of them, were fastlie bounde to the girdles of Emplon and Dudley, that as they would, the verdit alwaies passed, and so was he by them indicted, and after by Dudley at the kings commandement put in prison, and so continued long time, and at length, for somuch as he would not agree to paie to the king 2000. l. was by the forenamed Dudley commanded to the tower, where hee laie till it was nere Whitsonside after, before which time king Henry was deceased, and then was he deliuered. Also Thomas Knefworth late Maior of London, with both his theriffs, after great veneration and imprisonment, being accused that they had misused the charge of their offices, were deliuered for great sums of money, as it was said, 1400. l. Christopher Hawis mercer and alderman of London, had bin so long bered by the said promoters, that it shortned his life by thought taking. Sir Laurence Ailmer late Maior of London, and his two Sheriffes were put to their fine of 1000. pounds to the king: but Sir Laurence after great trouble sustained at the handes of Emplon, was committed to prison, and continued prisoner till the said Emplon was himselfe sent to the Tower. This yere was finished the goodlie Hospitall of the Sauoy nere vnto Charing crosse, which was a notable foundation for the poore, done by king Henry the 7. vnto the which he purchased and gaue Landes for the relieving of 100. poore people. This house was first named Sauoy place, by Peter earle of Sauoy the first builder thereof, brother to Boniface archb. of Canterbury about the 29. yere of king Henry the 3. who made the said Peter earle of Richmond. His house belonged first to the Dukes of Lancaster, and at this time being in the kings handes, was converted to an hospitall, retaining the first name of Sauoy. In Henry builded 3. houses of Franciscan friars, which were called Obseruantes, at Richmond, Greenwiche, and Petwarke, and 3. other of the same family of Franciscan friars, called Coentualles, at Canterburie, Newcastell, and Southamton.

ons, he granted to all men generall pardon, certaine excepted, the which pardons were quickly purchased, so that many were had ere he died: he deceased at Richmond on the 22. of Aprill, when he had reigned 23. yeres, 8. monethes, and on the 9. of Maie he was brought to Paules with many nobles, knights & gentlemen, and 1000. torches, and from thence on the next morrow conueyed to Westminster, and there buried in the new chappell, which he had caused to be builded with the charges of 14000. l. on the 11. of Maie: he left issue, Henry prince of Wales, which succeeded in the kingdome, lady Margaret the queene of Scots, and lady Mary promised to Charles king of Castile.

The altar and sepulture of the same H. Henry the 7. where in his bodie now resteth, in his newe chappell at Westminster, was made and finished in the yere of Christ 1519. by one Peter T. a painter of the cite of Florence, for the which he received 1000. pound sterling, for the whole stoffe and workmanship, at the hands of the kings executors, Richard bishop of Winchester, Richard Fitz James bishop of London, Tho. bishop of Durham, John bishop of Rochester, Thomas D. of Norfolk treasurer of England, Edward Carle of Worcester, the kings chamberlaine, John F. knight chiefe iustice of the kings bench, Robert R. knight chiefe Justice of the common place, &c.

King Henry the eight.

Henrie the eight, borne at Greenewich, second sonne to king Henry the seventh, about the age of eightene yeres beganne his raigne by the decease of his father, on the two and twentieth of Aprill: but was proclaimed on the foure and twentieth, in anno Christi 1509. and the same daie in the after none he was conueyed to the Tower of London, where he lodged for a season. Of personage he was tall and mightie, in wit and memoire excellent, of such mattie and humanity as was comely in such a prince. By the aduise of his grandmother Margaret countesse of Richmond and Derby, diuers graue personages were elected to be of his priuite counsell, whose names were William Warham Archbisshop of Canterbury and Chancelor of England, Richard Foxe bisshop of Winchester, Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey and treasurer of England, George Talborearle of Shrewsbury a lord steward of the kings household, Charles Sommerfet Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Henry Wyat, doctor T. Ruthall, Sir Edward Poinings. These graue counsellors, fearing lest such abundance of riches & wealth as the king to now possessed of, might misse his yong yeres into riotous forgetting of himselfe, got him to be present with them whē they late in counsil, so to acquaint him with matters pertaining to the politike government of the realme, with the which at the first he could not well endure to be much troubled, being rather inclin-to follow such pleasant pastimes as his youthfull yeres did more delight in.

On the same 24. day of Aprill, the lord Henry Stafford brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was arrested and committed to the Tower: and doctor Ruthall was nominated bisshop of Durham.

The five and twentieth of Aprill was proclaimed the kings consent to the generall pardon granted by his father, and that himselfe was contented to forgive all such persons as had bin vexed for any cause, so that it touchd not felony: treason: and ouer that, in the same proclamation was compised, that all beggones and sturpy beggers should auoid the city of London, and resort into such countreies as they were borne in, upon paine appointed. Also proclamation was made, that if any man could proue himselfe to be depriued of his goods wrongfully by the late commissioners of the sequestrations, he should present his plaint to the king, who was ready to satisfie euery one of all iniuries sustained. After which publication many such as had bene constrained, either by right or wrong to pay any thing for sequestrations of lawes or customes by them transgressed, flocked to the court, and there declared their grieues: the counsell heard euery mans complaint, and such as were found to haue payde any thing without plaine proue of iust cause, such order was taken that they had their money again: but the complainants came in so thicke, that the commissioners and other that had dealt in the sequestrations perceiving that it was hard, and almost impossible to satisfie them all, refused to heare any further complaints or suites for restitution, but thought it best to commit those to prison, by whom the complainants pretended themselves to haue been wronged, and the reupon was Sir Richard Empson knight, and Edmund Dudley esquire, by a politike meane brought into the tower, where they were accused of extortion, and so remained the prisoners, the rest by quiet mens minds, that made such suite to haue their money againe restored. And shortly after were made of their promoters (for so they termed themselves) called to a reckoning, and cast into sundry prisons, as Page, Michell, Canby, Henry Toft, Smith, and sundry others, but Baptiste Grimald the most cruell wretch of them all, went to Westminster, and there registered himselfe a sanctuary man.

The third day of June, king Henry in his closet at Greenewich married the lady Katherine his first wife, who had been late the wife of prince Arthur deceased, and was dispensed with by Pope Iulij.

The 6. of June 10. Derby, Jo. Smith, J. Simson, ringleaders of false inquests in London, rode about the cite, with their faces to the hoxe tails, and papers on their heads, and were set on the pillorie in Cornhill, and after brought againe to Newgate, where they died for very shame.

On the 21. of June king Henry came from Greenewich by land, and so rode to the tower of London, with whom came many well apparelled noble men, but especially the duke of Buckingham, who rode in a gowne of Goldsmiths worke, a thing of great riches: the king rested there from Thursday till Saturday, in which season he made 24. knights of the Bath. And upon Saturday the 24. of June, H. Henry with queene Katherine, and their nobilitie rode from the Tower through the cite in most honourable wise, before whom rode the saide knightes of the Bath, the Duke of Buckingham rode next before the king, except the Mayor, and certene Sergeants and Heraultes: the which rode in a long gown wrought of needle worke right costly and rich, and bare a little staff of silver in his hand, in token that he was high steward of that feast of coronation, and the said W. had about his neck a broad and flat close chaîne of a new beufe, not before used, set with pretious rubies, and other stones of great value. On the morrow being Sunday, and Whitsommer day, the king and queene were crowned at Westminster in most solemn manner, by the archbishop of Canterbury and other assisting.

countesse of Derby deceased

The 29. of June, the most vertuous Princesse of her time knowne to the world, Margaret Countesse of Richmond and Derby, mother to king Henry the seventh, died at Westminster, and was there buried, whose notable and charitable dedes all her life time exercised, cannot in a small volume be expressed.

About the same time deceased John Vere earle of Oxford, and was buried in the priory of Colne in Essex.

appointed to wait on the K.

The king ordained fiftie Gentlemen to be speeres, euerie of them to haue an Archer, a Demillance, and a Cistrail, and euerie speere to haue thre great Horses to bee attendant on his person, of the which W. made the earle of Essex was Lieutenant, and Sir John Peche Capitaine, which ordinance continued not long, the charges was so great: for there were none of them, but they and their Horses were appareled and trapped in cloth of golde, silver, and Colours smittes worke.

Dudley arraigned and condemned.

The seventeenth of July Edmond Dudley was arraigned in the Guildhall of London, where he was condemned, and had iudgement to be hanged, hanged and quartered, and committed to the Tower againe, where he lay long after, in somuch, that the same went the Queene had purchased his pardon, but that was not so, as after shall appeare. And like as in this while to the comfort of the kings subiects many things were ordered, as general pardons for all the done offences, treason, felony, and debt by specialties, and a few other excepted: so in like manner, to the disturbance of all the forenamed Promoters, was manie and diuers meanes sought and found to bere and trouble them right willicke, that before had bere manie a true man wrongfullie: by meanes whereof, they were dailie taken in diuers counties of England, and brought to the Tower and other prisons, where they remained long. In the which time manie opprobrious rimcs in despite of them were made, whereof I haue seme some, especiallie one against Sir Richard Emplon, made by Cornish of the kings chappell, at the request of the earle of Kent, forsomuch, as the saide Emplon had deceived him of a part of his lande, and in sinister waies had so informed the king of him, that he was long holden vnder, and put to great hinderance, But (saith mine Authour) what cause forer moued the saide Earle another at that time, let no man thinke, that for any cause hee hath receiued, save onelie, that wisse men make, by the sodaine rising and falling of these men, bee well ware howe they guide them, when they bee put in greate authoritie, and especiallie such as this man was, the which which sodainely rose from pouertie (as being the sonne of a sienne-maker, in Leicester) unto inestimable authoritie and riches. And such other as were of his affinitie, especially Dudley, that at the time of his fall had in possession of lands and fees, with offices, to the pcerely value of 800. pound, and in ready coine 20000. pound, other many more riches, as Jewels, plate, and rich stuffe of household, the which was shortly gathered, for not thirtene yeeres before hee was by laboꝝ of friends brought into the office of vndersecretarie of London, where he continued with fauour of the citisens, by the space of five yeeres or more, after which season he sold his office, and drew him to the kings court, where shortly after he grew in such fauour, that he was chosen speaker of the parliament, in the nineteenth yeere of king Henry the seventh, and sone after the kings president, by reason of which office, he had such authoritie, that the chiefe lords of England were glad to be in his fauour, and were faine to sue to him for many vrgent causes, whereupon the lords and all men, as they durst, had him in disdaine, which was his ouerthrow in the end. Thus much for example may suffice.

On the 29. of July was arraigned in the guildhall of London one Smith for a promotor, and with him were inquired of by inquests, H. Toft, Page, Canby, &c. but for that they laide for themselves, they were seruingmen, and did but as they were commaunded, they were all reprieved to such prisons as they came from, where they remained long after.

In the moneth of October Sir Richard Emplon was conueied into Northamptonshire, and there arraigned, and lastly deemed to be hanged, hanged, and quartered, and then was brought againe to the Tower.

On Whitsommer eue at night, king Henry came priuily into Welscheape of London, being clothed in one of the coates of his guard: and on St. Peters night the king and queene came rofallie riding to the signe of the kings head in Cheape, there beheld the watch of the citie, which watch was set out with diuers goblin shewers, as had bene accustomed.

Whereupon the sherriffes of London were sent for, and commaunded by a speciall writ to see the said execution performed and done. And they upon that went to the tower and received them on the 17. of August, and from thence brought them unto the scaffold on the tower hill, where their heads were stricken off: which being done, the bodie of Empson was buried in the white friers church, and the body of Dudley in the blacke friers church. This Edmond Dudley in the time of his imprisonment in the tower compiled one notable booke, which he intituled, the Tree of common wealth, dedicated unto King Henry the eight, but never came to his hand. A copie whereof faire written (referringe the originall to my selfe) I gave unto the honorable Lord Robert earle of Leicester, about the yere 1562. At whose request and earnest perswasion I then first collected my summary of the Chronicles of England, and dedicated the same, with the continuacion and encrease thereof, from time to time, to my great charges, to his honor, in reward whereof I alwaies received his hartly thanks, with commendations, and not otherwile, what soever hath bene reported by mine adversary T. S.

On the 22. of August past at Richmond the Quene was delivered of a Prince, to the great reioycing of the whole realme, he was named Henry: but deceased on the 23. of February next following at Richmond, and was buried at Westminster.

In the month of Feb. came ambassadores from the K. of Aragon & Castile, to require an aid of 1500. archers to be sent to the same king, hauing at that time war with the Moyses, enemies to the christian faith: the king granted their request, and because the lord Thomas Darcy a knight of the garter made humble suite to the king to be generall of that crue, the king granted his desire: there were appointed to go with him, the lord Anthony Grey, brother to the marques Dorset, Hen. Guilford, Weste, Browne, and William Sidley Esquires of the kings house, sir Rob. Constable, sir Roger Hastings, and sir Ralph Elderton, with diuers other gentlemen to be captaines.

They departed out of Wiltmouth haven with 4. ships royall, and on the first of June arrived at Cales in south Spaine, where they were honourably receiued by a bishop, and other of the kings counsell: but an abstinence of war being taken, the L. Darcy and the rest were required to returne home againe, money was sent to pay the soldiers their wages, for their conduction againe into England, with diuers gifts given to the Lord Darcy and the other gentlemen, and after returned into England.

During the time that the L. Darcy was in Spaine, the lady Margaret daughters of Scaup, daughter to Maximilian emperor, and governeur of flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zealand, and other the low countries, appertaining to Charles the young prince of Castile, sent in the end of May to the K. of England, requirring to haue 1500. archers to aide her against the D. of Gelders, which sore troubled the countries aforesaid: the king granting her request, appointed sir Edw. Poinings knight of the garter, and controller of his house, a balliant captaine, to be lieutenant and leader of the said 1500. archers, which accompanied with his sonne in lawe the Lord Clinton, sir Mathew Browne, sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Wetherall, and Shirley Esquires, with other gentlemen and yeomen to the foresaide number: they took their ships besides S. and with the eighteenth of July, and landed at Armeis on the nineteenth, from whence they were conduced to Barrois, &c. whither the lady Regene came to welcome them, on the seven and twentieth of July they departed to Rossynale, and on the last of July they came to Bulouke, and the next daie the whole army of Almaine, Flemings and other appertaining to the said lady, met with our Englishmen without Bulouke, where they set forth in order, the lady Regent being there present, which took her leave of all the Captaines, and departed to Bulouke. The army to the number of 10000. before the 1500. Englishmen, passed forward, and the 10. of August came before a little Castle, standing on the higher side of the maye, called Wilmoult, belonging to the baron of Gelderland.

The same night Thomas Hart, chiefe gouernour of the English ordinance, made his approach, and in the morning made battery, so that the assault there, upon being giuen, the fortreffe was won, and the captaine with 80. and odd men were slaine, and six taken, of the which 11. were hanged.

John Morton captaine of an hundred English men, and one Guyet an esquire of Burgolgne, crying, S. George, were the first that entred, at which assault there was but one English man slaine.

On the 14. of August, the armie ferried over the riuer of Maye into Gelderland, the next daie they came to a little towne called Apke, the people were fled, but there was a little castle, raised and cast downe: upon the next daie they bent the saide towne of Apke, and all the countrey about it, and came at the last to a towne called Stranule being verie strong, double diked, and walled, within it were 360. good men of war besides the inhabitants. At the first they shewed good countenance of defence, but when they saw their enemies approach nere vnto them with ramplers and trenches, they yielded by composition, so that the souldiers might depart, but 5. towne men rested prisoners, at the will of the Prince of Castile. And so on S. Bartholmeus day, the admirall of flanders, and sir Edward Poinings entred the towne with great triumph.

The 26. of August the army came before Tenclois and sent an Herault called Arthoys to summon the towne: but they within would not heare, and yet they shot guns at him. Sir Edward Poinings, at this siege had ordinance pertaining to K. Henry as followeth, Serpentine the 11. signes: Armes of England, the Antelope, the Greyhound, the Dragon, the Giffon, the Snake, the Spermales, the Aile, the Pye, the Cocatrice, the Blange, the Anticoine, the Panter, the Hart, the Wynde, the Aleusant, the Falcon, the Sparillon, the Cozenes, the Wyke, the Sonneret, the Richmond, the Sparck, the Roymond, the Rose, the Cales, in all 36. pieces. The army remoued vnto the north side of Tenclois, and part went ouer the water, & made trenches to the water, and besieged the towne, but for all they could do without, they within kept one gate open. At length the English captaines perceiving that they lay there in vaine, considering the strength of the towne, and also how the army was not of number sufficient to inuite on the same on each side, wrote to the king, who willed them both all speede to returne, and so they did. Sir Edward Poyninges went to the Court of Burgoyne, where he was receiued right honourably of the young Prince of Castile and of his Aunt the ladie Margaree. John Norton, John Fogge, John Scot, and Thomas Lynde were made knights by the Prince. And the lady Margaree, seeing the souldiers coates to be worne, and some both lying on the ground, gave to euery yeoman a coate of wolven cloth coloured white and graine, red and yealow, the white and graine for the king of Englands luerie, the redde and yealowe for the Duke of Burgoyne's luerie, and these foure colours were medled together, this she did to her great commendation: after that sir Edward Poyninges had bin highly feasted, he returned with his crew into England, and had not lost fully one hundred persons.

Andrew Barton a Scottish man, and pyrate of the sea, seeing that the king of Scots had warre with the Portugales, robbed euery nation, and stopped the kings streames that no merchant almost could passe, and when he took Englishmens goods, he bare them in hand that they were Portugales goods, and thus he robbed at euery hauens mouth. The king displeased herewith, sent sir Edw. Howard lord admirall of England, the lord Thomas Howard son and heire to the earle of Surrey, and John Hopton to the sea, which made ready two ships, and taking sea, by chance of weather were seuered. The lord Howard lying in the Solowes, perceiving that Andrew was making toward Scotland, and to fast the said lord chased him, that he overtook him, so there was a foie battell betwixt them, Andrew ever blew his whistle to encourage his men: but at length the lord Howard and the Englishmen did so valiantly, that by cleane strength they entered the maine decke. The Scots fought sore on the hat ches: but in conclusion Andrew was taken, and so sore wounded, that he died there, the remnant of the Scots were taken with their ship called the Lion. All this while was the lord admirall in chase of the barke of Scotland called Jenny Perwin, which was wont to saile with the Lion in company, and he with other did so much, that he laid them aboard, and though the Scots manfully defended themselves, yet at length the Englishmen entered the barke, slew many, and took all the residue. Thus were these two ships taken and brought to Blackwall, the second of August. The Scots taken prisoners were sent to London, where they were kept as prisoners, in the Archbishop of Dorkes place, now called White hall, and after sent into Scotland.

About this season the French king made sharpe warre against Pope Iulij: therefore the king of England wrote to the French king, that he should leaue off to vex the pope in such wise being his friend and confederate: but when the French king learned little to regard that request, the king sent him word, to deliver to him his inheritance, both of the dutchy of Poimanie and Coten, and the counties of Aniole & Pain, and also of his crowne of France, or else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose: but notwithstanding the French king pursued his wars in Italy: whereupon the king of England toynd in league with Maximilian the Emperour, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, and with diuers other princes, resolved by the aduise of his counsell, to make war on the French king and his countries, and made preparation both by sea and land, fitting forth shippes to the sea for sale, and of his merchants.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Greenwich, with great and plentifull cheer. The 4. of February began the Parliament at Westminster, upon the which date, the king and his lordes spirituall and temporall, with manie of the common house being present in the Parliament chamber, the archbishop of Cantebury then Chancellor of England, made a famous and clearly proposition, grounded on this Text, Iustitia & pax osculata sunt, whereupon hee stood well a large houre and an halfe, declaring howe iustice should be ministered, and peace should be nourished, and by what meanes iustice was put by, & peace turned into war. The which hee appoyued by examples of the olde and new testament in right sufficient wise, to his great commendation, & singular comfort of the hearers. On the next morrow began the conuocation in Pauls church: and on the next date sir Robert Sheffield knight, and sometime recorder of London, was chosen speaker of the Parliament, and on the next morrow being the 8. of February, before the king and lordes hee made his proposition, exculing himselfe, and beseeching the king (as the manner is) to be dismissed of that office, for the which proposition he was well allowed and admitted. On the same day the lordes dubbed sir Henry Guilford and sir Charles Brandon knights. In this parliament was granted two fifteenes of the temporalty, and of the clergy two sixties or tenths. During which parliament, a yeoman of the crowne named Newbolt, due within the palace of Westminster a seruant of Master Willoughby, for the which fact, the king commanded to be set by a paire of gallies in the same place where the said seruant lost his life: and upon the same, the said Newbolt was hanged, and remained on the gallies by the space of two daies.

The king of Arragon hauing warre with the French king, wrote to king Henry of England to send ouer an army into Wales, and so to invade France on that side, for the recovery first of his dutchy of Guien, and hee would appoyne them with ordinance, horsemen, beastes and carriages, with other necessaries appertaining to the same.

The 11. of England and his Councell putting their assistance in this promise of king Ferdinando prepared a noble army al of footmen, and final artillery, appointed L. Th. Grey marquis Dorset to be chiefe commander of the same. Whereupon king Henry daily studying to set forward the war which hee had begun against the French li. caused sir Edmond Howard admirall, with all diligence to make ready diuers godly ships, as the Soueraigne and others, to the number of 18. besides smaller vessels, and the rewith hauing in his company Sir Wynton Brown, Griffith Dun, Edward Cobham, T. Windham, T. Lucy, William Perton, Henry Shirborne, Stephen Bull, George Witwage, John Hopton, William Gunstone, Thomas Draper, Edmonde Cooke, John Burder, and diuers other, he took the sea, and scouring the same about the midst of May he came before Portsmouth. men appointed for the journey to Biscay, as the Lord Howard son and heir to the earle of Surrey, the L. Brook, the L. Willoughby, the L. Ferrers, the L. John, the L. Anthony, the L. Leonard Grey, all three brethren to the marques, sir Griffith ap Rice, sir Maurice Barkley, sir W. Sands, the baron of Warford, sir Richard Cornwall brother to the said baron, W. Husle, Jo Molton, W. Kingstone esquires, sir Henry Willoughby, and divers other, with the number of 10000. soldiers, amongst the which were 500. Almaines, all clad in white, under the leading of a Fleming named Gwinc, came to Southampton, & there mustered their bands. The 16. of May they were shipped in Spanish vessels, and landed in Biscay, where they were bidden welcome, but had no such aide sent to them as was promised, whereby they lost the doing of some great exploits against the French men on the frontiers of Gascoigne: after the army had laine 30. daies in the campe, there came from the king of Arragon messengers to desire the marques and his people to take patience for a while, and they should see that such preparation should be made for the furnishing of their enterprise. In the meane time the English men for the most part, were victualled with garlike, and dranke hote wines, and ate hote fruits, which procured their blood to boile in their bodies, whereby they fell sicke, and died more than 800. persons: in the end many promises being made by the king of Spaine, and none performed, the English men embarked, and landed in England in the moneth of December. The king of Spaine seemed to be sore discontented with their departure, affirming that if they had tarried till the next spring, he would in their companie have invaded France.

About the moneth of August the nauiers of England and France meeting at Britaine bay, fought a cruell battell, in the which the Regent or soueraigne of England, and a carlike of West in France, being grappled together, were burned, and their captains with their men all drowned: the English captaine was sir Thomas Kneuer, who had with him sir John Carew, and 700. men. In the French carlike was sir Pierce Morgan, with nine hundred men, were all bent or drowned.

King Henry hearing of the losse of the Regent, caused a great ship to bee made, such a one, as the like had neuer bene seene in England, and named it, Henry grace de Dieu.

By fire this yere a great part of the kings palace of Westminster, and the chappell in the Tower of London, and many other places in England were bent.

In the moneth of November the king called his high court of parliament, in the which it was concluded, that the king himselfe in person with an army should invade France, whereupon notice thereof being given to such as should attend, they made their purueance with all diligence that might be. In this parliament was granted to the king two sixaines, and foure deniers, and had money, of every denier ten markes, an earle due pound, a lord foure pound, a knight foure markes, and euery man valued at 800. pound in goods to paie foure markes, and so after that rate, till him that was valued at forty shillings paid twelue pence, and euery man that toke forty shillings

In the moneth of March was the kings Paule of ships rotall, and other set forth to the number of 42. beside balengiers, under the conduct of the L. Admirall, accompanied with sir Walter Deuereux, L. Ferrers, sir Wolstan Brown, sir Edw. Ichingham, sir Anthony Poinis, sir John Wallope, sir Thomas Windham, sir Steuen Bull, William Fitz Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney, esquires, and diuers other valiant capitaines.

These made saile into Britaine, and came to Bartham bay, where they lay at anchor for a time, at length mindung to enter the haven of West on the 25. of April, the L. admirall with a pike of the enemy, was throwen overboard, and so drowned, al the other escaped very hardly away, for if they had touched the tide had failed them, and then al had bin lost. The L. Ferrers and the other capitaines so rowfull of this chance, returned into England. King Henry being sorry for the losse of his admirall, called to him T. Howard eldest brother to the late admirall, and son and heir apparant to the earle of Surrey, whom he made admirall, willing him to reuenge his brothers death. The lord Howard humbly thanked his grace of the trust that he put in him, and so immediately went to the sea, and scoured the same, that no French man durst shew himselfe on the coast of England.

On May euen Edmond de la Pole earle of Suffolke was beheaded on the tower hill, his brother Richard de la Pole, called the white Kiole, was afterward laine before the citie of Paule, in anno 1524.

King Henry hauing all his prouisions ready for the warre, and meaning in person to passe the sea, appointed George Talbot earle of Shrewsburie, high steward of his household, to be captaine generall of his foieward, and in his companie were appointed to go Thom. Stanley earle of Darby, lord Docwray pilot of S. Johns, sir Robert Rarchie lord Fitzwater, the lord Hastings, the lord Cobham, sir Rice ap Thomas, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Richard Sacheuell, sir John Digby, sir John Askew, sir Lewes Bagot, sir Thomas Cornwall, and many other knights and esquires, and souldiers to the number of 8000. men, these passed the sea, and came to Caleis about the midd of May. Charles Somerset L. Herbert chamberlaine to the king, in the end of that moneth followed with 6000. men, and so forth.

King Henry hauing sent ouer a great and puissant army into France to besiege the citie of Turuaine, himselfe accompanied with many noble men, and five hundred archers of his garde, all in white gabberdines, toke his shippe at Dover on the last of June in the morning. When the king was shipped and made saile, all his army followed, to the number of foure hundred shippes, and the winde was so, that they were brought the same night into Caleis haven.

On the next morning, being the first of July, Thomas L. Howard, admirall of England, landed at Whitland bay, and entred, spoiled, and bent the towne, and returned to his ships.

The 21. of July, the king passed out of the towne of Calcis in goodly array of battell, and toke the field, notwithstanding that the foreward of the kings great army were before Turwine, yet the king of his owne battell made 3. battels: the lord Lisle marshall of the host, was captain of the foreward, and under him 3000. men: sir Richard Carew with 300. men, was the right hand wing to the foreward, & the lord Darcie with 300. men, wing on the left hand. The scorers and fore-riders of this battell, were the Dorsetshire men on light geldings. The earle of Essex was lieutenant generall of the speares, and sir John Pechy was vice-gouernor of the horsemen. Before the king went 800. Almains all in a plume: after them came the standard with the red dragon, next the banner of our Ladie, & next of the Trinitie, under the which were all the kings household. Then went the banner of the armes of England, borne by sir John Gifford, under which banner was the king himselfe, with diuers noble men, and other, to the number of thre thousand men. The Duke of Buckingham with six hundred men, was on the kings left hand. On the right hand was sir Edward Poynings with other six hundred men, equall with the Almains. The lord of Burgainie with eight hundred men was wing on the right hand: sir William Compton with the retinue of the Bishop of Winchester Fox, and master Thomas Wolley, afterward cardinall, of eight hundred, was in manner of a reerward: Sir Anthony Oughtred and sir John Neill with the kings speares that followed, were foure hundred, and so the whole army was eleuen thousand and thre hundred men. The master of the ordinance set forth the kings artillerie, as faulcons, sings, bombardes, powder, stones, bolwes, arrowes, and such other things necessary for the field, the whole number of the carriages were 13. hundred, the leaders and diuers of the same were ninetene hundred men. The king lay the first night betwixt Calkwell and Freidon: the next night before the Castle of Calneis at Focard: the next night he lay before Arde a good way without the English pale, and when he was a little beyond Dernome, there came a great host of French men, that purposed to haue set upon him: but the king with his host kept their ground, and thre their great ordinance, wherewith the aray of the French men was broken.

The 4. of August, the king in good order of battell came before the citie of Turwine, and planted his siege in warlike wise.

The 11. date of August, Maximilian the Emperour came to king Henrie, who was receiued with great triumph betwene Aitre and the campe. The Emperour and his retinue were in blacke, as mourners for the Emperesse lately deceased.

The Emperour and all his seruants were retained with the king of England in wages by the day, euery person according to his degree, and the Emperour as the kings souldier wore a crosse of S. George with a rose, and so he and all his traine came to the kings campe the 13. of August, and there was receiued with great magnificence.

The

The 23. of August, the towne of Turwine was giuen ouer unto the king of England, with condition, that all men in the towne might safely passe with hoyle and harnesse: and so on the 24. of August there came out of the towne 4000. men of war and mo well appointed, whereof 600. were well hoysed, their standards borne before them.

The 26. of August, the king remoued to Singate, and there it was agreed, that the walles, gates, bulwarkes, and towers of Turwine should be defaced, rased, and cast downe: of which conclusion, the Emperour sent word to S. Omers and to Aitre, which being iolous of that tidings, sent thither ploners, and so they and the English ploners brake downe the walles, gates, and towers, and filled the ditch, and fired the towne, except the cathedrall church and the palace, and all the ordinance was by the king sent to Aitre to bee kept to his vse.

After this it was concluded, that the king in person should laie his siege to the citie of Turney, wherefore he set forward thre goodly battels: the first was conducted by the Earle of Shrewsburie: the second battell led the king himselfe, with whom was the Emperour: the reerward was conducted by the lord Harbert, and so the first night they lay in campe before Aitre.

The 14. of September, the king and his army came to Beattwin, and on the morrowe passed forward, and came to a strait where was a fowde, which with great difficultie they passed: and the next day they passed a bridge called fount Anantew.

The one and twentieth day of September the king remoued his campe toward Turney, and lodged within thre miles of the Citie, the which night came to him the Emperour and the Paligrane: the people about Turney were with their gods fledde to the citie, and yet the citie had no men of warre to defend it, but with multitude of inhabitants the citie was well replenished.

The king came in aray of battell before Turney, planted his ordinance round about the citie, diuers trenches were cast, and rampiers made, so that no Citizens coulde issue out, nor no aide come to them. Whereupon at length, to wit, on the nine and twentieth of September the citie was yielded.

Then the king appointed the lord Lisle, the lord Burgeyny, and the Lord Willoughby to take possession, which with six thousand men entred the Citie, and toke the market place and the wals, and then master Thomas Wolley the kings almoner called before him all the citizens, and sware them to the king of England: the number of which citizens were fourescore thousand.

On the 2. day of October the king entred the citie of Turney, and there ordained sir Edward Poynings, knight of the order of the Garter, to be his lieutenant, with captaines, horsemen, archers, and artillery conuenient: he made his almoner Thomas Wolley bishop of Turney, and then returned to Calcis, and sailed from thence to Douer on the 24. of October: from thence he rode post to Richmond, where the Quene lay.

Scots besieged Norham.

In this meane time, James K. of Scots assembled the whole power of Scotland, wherewith he approached to the borders, and comming to Norham castle, laid siege thereunto, and after he had beaten this castle with his ordinance, by the space of five daies, the same was deliuered vpp into his handes.

And hee (sayeth Paulus Iouius) made the same to be layde scull with the grounde, and from thence marched (walking with fire and sword) to besiege the strong towne of Berwick.

Now had the earle of Surrey, Lieutenant of the north, in absence of king Henry, giuen order to assemble a power of 2000. men, and comming to Alnwick, tarried there till the whole number of his people were come: amongst other, his son the lord admiral with 5000. soldiers and men of war, which had bin at sea, came to his father, wherof he was greatly reioiced. The earle appointed his battels, with wings, and horsemen necessary: first of the foreward was ordained captain the L. Howard admiral, with the L. Clifford, the L. Coniers, the L. Latimer, the L. Scrope, the lord Ogle, the lord Lumley, sir Nicholas Appleyard, master of the ordinance, sir Stephen Bull, sir Henry Sherborne, sir William Sidney, sir Edward Echingham, sir William Bulmere, with the power of the Bishops of Durham, sir William Gascoigne, sir Christopher Warde, sir John Eueringham, sir Th. Metham, sir Walter Griffith, &c. Of the wing on the right hand of the foreward was captain, sir Edmond Howard, knight marshall of the house, and with him Brian Tonstall, Raffe Brearton, John Laurence, Richard Bold Esquires, sir John Bothe, sir Thomas Butler knights, and other. Of the wing on the left hand was captain, sir Marmaduke Constable with his sonnes, sir William Percy, and of Lancashire, a thousand men. Of the reerward was captain the earle of Surrey, the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir Philippe Tilney, sir George Darcie, sir Thomas Berkeley, sir John Rodcliffe, sir Christopher Pickering, Richard Tempest, sir John Stanley, &c. Now the earle of Surrey was informed that king James laye imbatayled vpon a great mountaine, called Flodden, a place of such strength, as was impossible for the Englishmen to come nere them, he sent Rouge Crosse puruant to the king of Scots, to shew him, that where he had contrary to his oth and league, invaded this his brothers realme, and done greates hurt, in casting downe castles, towres, and houses, burning and destroying the same, &c. The said earle would be ready to try the right iudices of the cause with the king in battell, by friday next comming, if by his noble courage would giue him tarrying and abode. Rouge Crosse went and did his message to James king of Scots, as he was appointed: And hereupon king James sent to the earle an herault named Ilay, who deliuered to the earle a letter written by the kings secretarie, as followeth.

James letter to the earle of Surrey.

As to the causes alleadged of our comming into England, again our band and promise (as is alleadged) thereto to be answered: Our brother was bound as far to vs as we were to him. And when we swore last before his ambassador, in presence of our counsel, we expressed specially by oth, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else: we sweare our brother brake first to vs, & with his brake, we haue required diuers times him to amend: and lately lately we warned our brother, as he did not vs or he brake, and this wee take for our quarrel, & with Gods grace shal defend the same, at your assured time, with Gods grace we shall abide.

Right high and mightie Prince, so it is that lately I sent vnto you Rouge Crosse puruant at armes, and by him advertised your grace, that I and other my loueraigne lordes subiects, were come to repell & resist your invasions of this the kings my loueraigne Lordes realme, and for that intent I offered to giue you battell, on this halfe friday next comming: with my message, your grace toke pleasure to heare, as I am informed, and by your herault Ilay, ye made answer, that ye were right iolous of my desire, and would not faile to accomplish the same, and to abide me there, where ye were at the time of my message, so shewed vnto your grace. And albeit it hath pleased you to chaunge your said promise, and put your selfe into a grounde, more like a fortreffe or campe, than vpon any inherient ground for battell to be tried, therefore considering the day appointed is so nigh approaching, I desire you of your grace, that for the accomplishment of your honorable promise, you will dispose your selfe for your part, like as I shall do for mine, to be to morrow with your host in your side of the plain of Millfield, in like wise as I shall do for mine, and that he with the subiects of my loueraigne lord on my side of the plain of the sayd field, to giue you battell betwene twelue of the clock and 3. in the after none, vpon sufficient warning by you to be giuen by eight or nine of the clock in the morning by the said puruant. And like as I and other noble men my company, vnder vs by our writing subscribed with our handes to keepe the same time, to the intent abovesaid: It may like your grace, by your honorable letters subscribed with your hand, to bind your grace for the accomplishment of this our desire, trusting ye will dispatch our said puruant immediately: for the long debate of so honorable a iourny, we thinke should bound to your dishonour. Written in the field in Moller Haugh the 7. day of September, at six of the clock in the after noon. Subscribed, Thomas Surrey, Thomas Howard, Thomas Dacre, Clifford, Henry Scrope, Raffe Scrope, Richard Latimer, William Coniers, John Lumley, R. Ogle, W. Percie, E. Stanley, W. Molineux, Marmaduke Constable, William Gascoigne, W. Griffith, George Darcie, W. Bulmer, Thomas Strange, wais, &c.

Now the time of battell being come, the earle of Surrey diuided his army into three battails: vnto the vanguard wherof, the lord Howard was captain, his brother sir Edmond Howard was ioined as a wing, the earle himselfe led the middle warde, and the reerward was guided by sir Edward Stanley. The lord Dacres with a number of horsemen stood apart by himselfe to succour where nere should appeere to be. The ordinance was placed in the front of these battels, and in places betwene, and in this order they marched forthward.

In the meane time James king of Scottes beholding the behauiour of the Englishmen from the height of the hill, commanded his standards to be raised and spread, and euery man to resort to his place, that they might forthwith encounter with their enemies: And without delay is James putting his horse from him, all other as well Nobles as meane men did the like, that the danger being equall, and all hope of succor taken awaie, they might be the more willing to thewe their manhood: Then was the armie diuided into 5. wardes, to the intent that the battell wherein the king himselfe stood with his standarde, might bee inclosed, as it were, with two winges: their ordnance was lodged in places most conuenient, though by reason they marched downe the hill, their shot did small damage to the Englishmen coming twardes. And heere with Syr Edmonde Howard with his wing was got by on the hill side, with whom the Lord Hume, and the two earles of Lincol and Arglill encountered with such violence, that this Battayle of Scottes with speares on foote beate downe and broke that wing of Englishmen in such wise, that Sir Edmond Howard was in manner left alone, and selled to the earth: but bastard Heron came to his rescue, or else hee had bene slayne. This Bastarde Heron brought with him a strong troupe of horsemen, which hee being of late banished both from Englland and Scotland, had cunninglie trained by in robberies. And on the other side, the Lord Dacres watcing to ayde where neede shoulde happen, came in on the sides of the Scots, and gaue a charge on them with his horsemen, whereby Syr Edmond Howard escaped to the English Channiguard, which was ledde by his brother the Lord Howard, who being now also got aloft on the hill, pressed still forward to renew the battayle and to succour those whome hee saue put to the twoist, whereby they took courage into them and layde about. Here with the Earle of Crawford, and Spountrose came with their battaile of speares, also on foote, and encountering with the sayde Lord Howard, after soze fight on both sides, both the sayde Earles were slayne, besides a great number of other, the whole battayle which they ledde, being put to flight, and chased out of the field. On the left hande, Syr Edward Stanley, and with him Syr William Molineux, Syr Henry Kighile, and other of Lancashire, Cheshire, hauing begunne to encounter with the Scots on that side, forced them to come downe into a more even ground, and brought to that point, with such incessant shot of arrowes, that to anoble that shappe some, the Scottes were constrained to breake their arraie, and to fight one separate from another: which thing when Syr Edward Stanley perceived, forthwith bringing about three bandes which hee had kept in store, he invaded the open sides of his enemies, by a fresh onsette, and put them in funder in such disorder, that they were not able anie longer to abide the violence of the Englishmen, so that taking themselves to flight, and running downe the hill, they escaped to the wood: but the Earles of Arglie and Lenox were slayne in the same place. In the meane time the king, who a little before had toynd with the Earle of Surrey, perceyning that the winges of his Battayles were distressed, and that his enemies beganne to enclose him on each side, heere with rushing forth upon his enemies, a newe battayle beganne to rise, for that battayle being well armed, passed little for the Arrowes of the Englishmen, inasmuch, that perceiving the earles Battayle, they entered well nere so farre within the same, that they were at a poynt to haue ouerthrowen his standardes. The king himselfe on foote, even in the foremost rank, fought fought right balliantly, encouraging his people, as well by example as by persuasions to do the best. Neither did the earle of Surrey faile in the dutie of a worthy Generall: but whilst the battell was thus foughten about the standards, with doubtfull chance of victorie, the Lord Howarde and Sir Edward Stanley, hauing banquished the enemies in either wing, returned to the middleward, and finding them there thus occupied, they sette on, in two severall parts, with great violence, and at the same time the lord Dacres came with his horsemen upon the backs of the Scots, so that they being thus assailed behind and before, and on either side, were constrained to fight in a round compass. King James as he beheld Sir Adam Forman his standarde bearer beaten downe, thought surelie there was no waile for him but death: wherefore to deliuer himselfe from the reproch as was like to follow, he rushed forth into the chiefest pyle of his enemies, and there fighting in most desperate manner, was beaten downe and slain, and a little before him, there died with like courage bluer honorable prelates, as the archbishop of S. Andrews, & two other bishops, besides two abbots, 12. earles, & 17. lordes, besides knights and gentlemen: and about 8000. Scots slain, and almost so manie taken, saith Iovius. All their ordnance and stiffe was taken by the English.

Thus on the 9. of September, king James the seventh of that name, king of Scots was slaine at Bannstone upon Biperd hill, and his armie discomfited by the earle of Surrey lieutenant to Henry the 8. king of England: where was taken prisoner Sir William Scot chancello to the said king, and Sir Iohn Forman his ferleant poster, with diuers other. Also in manner all the Scottish ensignes were taken, and 22. peces of greates ordnance, amongst the which were seauen culuerings, berie faire pecers, whome the king for their likenes one unto another, had named the seauen sisters. There was slaine and taken of our men about 1500. men (saith Hall) during the time of the fight, & in the night following, manie Englishmen lost their horses, and such stiffe as they left in their tents, by the robbers of Tindale, & Tuldale: When the field was done, the earle gaue thanks to God, and made knightes to the number of 35. whose names I overpasse in this place. The body of the king of Scots was not found till the next daie, and then being found and knowne by the lord Dacres, there appeared in the same diuers deadly wounds, his throat cut halfe asunder, his left hand in two places almost cut off, and manie other woundes, as well with arrowes, as other wise: his body was bowelled, rebowelled, and inclosed in lead, and kept at Warwicke, till the kings pleasure were knowne. After that the earle of Surrey had taken order, and set the mouth in god quiet, he returned to the quene, with the dead bodie of the Scottish king, which bodie inclosed in lead (as before is shewed) as I haue bene informed, was carried to Shyne, a monasterie in Surrey, founded by king H. the 5. where it remained for a time, in what order I am not certaine, but since the dissolution of that house, to wit, in the raigne of king Ed. the 6. Henry Grey then duke of Suffolke there keeping house, I haue bene shewed the same body (as was affirmed) so lapped in lead, thowen into an old waste room, amongst old timber, stone, led, and other rubble.

The kings letters to Sir Will. Molineux of Lancashire.

When King Henry was returned into England, from his conquest made in France, of the Cities of Artois, and Turney, he forgate not the good service of those that hadde bene with the Earle of Surrey, at the Battaille of Marston, wherefore he wrote to them his louing letters, with such thanks and favourable words, that euery man thought himself well rewarded. And assured maie you bee, that wee shall in such effeaw all wise remember your sayde service in aile your reasonable perfitures, as you shall haue cause to thinke the same right well employed, to your comfort, and weale hereafter. The Lord Burgaueny being chiefe leauer. These were sent ouer to strengthen the Towne of Calais, and other fortresses within the English Pale, for doubt of aile so dayne attempt to bee made by the Frenchmen.

The French king perceyuing what losses hee had sustayned by the warres agaynst Englande, and doubting least one euill lucke shoulde still followe a nother, determined to make suite for peace, and first agreeing with the pope Leo, desired him to bee a meane for the procuring of some agreemente betwixt him and the king of Englande. Whereupon the popes letters, the French king by an Herault at Armes sent to the king of Englande, requiring of him a safe Conduct for his ambassadores, which shoulde come to intreat for a peace to bee concluded betwixt them and their Realmes. Upon graunt whereof attayned, the French king sent a Comumission with the President of Roane, and others, to entreate of peace. And because they vnderstode that the marriage was broken betwene the prince of Castile and the lady Marie, they desired that the sayde Ladie might bee toynd in marriage with the French king, offering a greatesse Dowrie, and suretie for the same, so much was offered, that the king moued by his Counsaile consented vpon condition, that if the French king dyed, then she shoulde, if it cosde with her pleasure, retorne into Englande with her Dowrie and riches. After that they were accorded vpon the peace, and that the French king shoulde marrie this young ladie, &c. And then was the peace proclaimed on the thirtieth of August, &c.

In the moneth of September the ladie Marie was conueyed to Dover, by the king her Brother, and the Queene: and on the second daie of October, she was was shipped, and such as were appointed to give their attendance on her, as the duke of Norfolk, the Marques Dorset, the bishop of Durham, the earl of Surrey, the Lord de la Ware, the Lord Berners, the Lord Mounteagle, the four brethren of the said Marques, Sir Maurice Barkley, Sir John Pechy, Sir William Sands, Sir Thomas Bullen, Sir John Car, and many other knights, esquires, gentlemen, and Ladies. They set out from Dover with fourtyne great Shippes, and had not sailed past a quarter of their voyage in the sea, but that the winde rose, and severed the Shippes, driving some of them to Calais, some into Flanders, and her Shippe and three other, with great difficulty, was brought to Boloigne, not without great jeopardy at the entering of the Haven, for the spasser ranne the shippe harde on shore, but the Boates were readie, and received the Ladie out of the shippe, and Sir Christopher Garmish stode in the water, and tooke her in his armes, and so bare her to land, where the Duke of Manselme, and a Cardinall, with many other great Estates, received her with great honour. In this voyage King Henries great Shippe with foure tops, called the Labbeke, was broken and lost, a little from Sanguate west toward Calais: there was in her at that time almost five hundred men, soldiers and mariners, whereof more than foure hundred were lost, so there escaped not one hundred of that companie. From Boloigne the Ladie Mary was conveyed unto Abbeile, and there entered the eight of October, and on the next morrowe, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the French king and the said Ladie, with all honour and royaltie: When the feast was ended, the English Lordes returned with great rewardes into England: Before whose departure from Abbeile, the Dolphin of France, Francis duke of Wales, caused sollemne Juries to be proclaimed, to be kept at Paris, in the moneth of November next ensuing: the said Dolphin with his nine aides, to answer all comers, being Gentlemen of name and armes. When this proclamation was proclaimed in England, the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, and his four brethren, the Lord Clinton, Sir Edward Neill, Sir William Sidney, Sir Giles Cagle, Thomas Cheyney and other, got licence of the king to go over to this challenge, and thereupon preparing themselves for the purpose, departed toward France, the 20. of October they landed at Calais, all in great Coates and Hodors, because they would not be known. The twentie five of October Sir Henry Guilford landed at Calais, with two servantes at armes, and twentie poemen of the Crowne and Kings guard, they went to the citie of Paris, with tenne or twelve goodlie Horses to bee at the Jakes, at the Coronation of the Quene: they came all to Paris about the latter ende of October. The Dolphin desired the duke of Suffolke, and the Lord Marques Dorset, to bee two of his immediate aydes, which thereto gladly assented. On the first of November being Sunday, the Quene was Crowned with great sollemnitie, in the Monasterie of Dionos: and on the next daie she was received into Paris, with all honour that might bee desired. On the seaventh of November beganne the Jakes, which continued by the space of three daies, in the which were answered three hundred five men of armes, and every man ranne five courses with shap Spears. lish lords and knights did as well as the best, not onlie in the Jakes, but also at the Torney and Barriers, namelie the duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, and his brother the Lord Edward Grey: when the great triumph was done, the lords of England toke their leave, and came into England before Christmasse.

In the mean time, to wit, in the moneth of November, the D. was delivered of a prince, which lived not long after.

Richard Hun, a merchant sailoz of London, dwelling in the parish of Saint Margaret in Aldgate street, who (for denying to give a mortuary, such as was demanded by the parson for his child being buried) had bin put in the Towlards tower about the end of October last before passed, was now the 5. of Decemb. found hanged with his own girdle of silk, in the said tower, and after he was burned in Smithfield.

This yere died at Rome the archbishop of York and cardinall, called doctor Banbridge, which was the kinges ambassador there, and was poisoned by an Italian, one of his owne household chaplaines, he was there honorablie buried. And king Henry gaue the said Archbishopricke to Thomas Wolsey then Bishop of Lincoln, who shortly after gaue to bee cardinall and Lord Chancellor.

On Newyears euen died the French k. Lewes the 12. after he had bin married to the lady Mary of England the terme of 82. daies. The k. of England being thereof advertised, caused a sollemne obsequie to bee kept for him in St. Pauls church of London, with a costly hearse, at the which obsequie many nobles were present. Then the k. sent a letter to comfort the Quene his sister, requiring to know her pleasure, whether she would continue still in France, or returne into England. And when hee was advertised of her minde, which was to returne into England, the Duke of Suffolke, Sir Richard Wingfield deputie of Calais, and doctor West, with a goodly band of gentlemen, and yemen all in blacke, and comming to Paris, were well entertained of Francis the new French k. to whom they declared the effect of their commission, which was to receive the D. Dowager, according to the commands. The counsell of France by the kings appointment, assigned forth his dowrie, and the duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then was the D. delivered to the duke, who behaved himselfe so towards her, that he obtained his good will, to be his husband. It was thought, that when the k. created him duke of Suffolke, he perceived his sisters good will toward the said duke, and that hee ment then to have bestowed her on him, but that a better offer came in the way, but howsoever it was, now hee was his love, so as by her consent, hee gave to the k. his brother, makelie beseeching him of pardon in his request, which was humbly to desire him of his good will and contentation. The k. after some tute, agreed that the duke should bring her into England unmarried, and at his returne to marry her in England: but for doubt of change, he married her secretly at Paris, as was said.

The 9. of Aprill a new peace was concluded betwixt the k. of England and Francis the new king of France.

After that the Duke of Suffolke had receiued the French Duchene with his Dolye appointed, and all her apparell, reuelis, and household stuffe deliuered, they tooke leaue of the new French king, and so passing through France, came to Caleis on the 25. of Aprill, where they were honorably receiued, from whence on the .1. of Maie, they sailed ouer into England, and the same night landed at Dover, And on the 13. of May, they were solemnely married at Greenwich.

This yere in the moneth of May, were sent out of England, 1200. masons and carpenters, and 300 laborers to the city of Courney, to build a castle there to chastise the city if it chanced to rebel, and thereby to diminish the garison that then late there to the kings great charge.

In the moneth of September 1516. after his returne from progresse in the west, being at his maner of Whing, T. Wolsey comming thither to him, there was brought to him a letter from Rome to aduertise him, that he was cleered cardinal, which he seemed to mislike of, but the K. willed to take it upon him, and from thenceforth called him my K. cardinal.

In the moneth of November, the king assembled a Parliament at Westminster, especiallie for order in apparell. In the end of which parliament, doctor Warham archbishop of Canterbury, and then K. Chancellor, gaue vp into the kings hands his office of chancellor, and deliuered to him the great seale, which seale incontinentlie the K. deliuered vnto the K. cardinal, and so made him chancellor. And here I thinke good to set downe for example to posteritie, some part of the proceedings of this so oft named Thos. Wolsey archbishop, his ascending vnto honozous estate, and soaine falling again from the same, as I haue bene informed by persons of good credite. Truth it is, this Cardinal Wolsey was an honest poore mans son of Ipswich, in the countie of Suffolke, and there borne, and being but a child, verie apt to be learned: therefore by the meanes of his parents, or of his good friends and masters, hee was conueyed to the Vniuersitie of Oxforde, where hee thortlie prospered so in learning, as himselfe reported, as hee was made Bachelor of Art, when hee passed not 15. yeeres of age, and was called most commonly through the Vniuersitie the boy Bachelor. Thus prospering in learning, hee was made fellowe of Spawden colledge, and afterward appointed to be scholemaster of Spawden Schole, at which time, the K. Sparques Doyset had 3. of his sonnes there at Schole, committing vnto him as well their education, as their instruction. It pleased the said K. Sparques against a Christmas season to send as well for the scholemaster, as for his children home to his house for their recreation, in that pleasant and honorabie feast. When being there, the lord their father perceiving the mite be tight well employed in learning for their time, hee hauing a benefice in his gift being at that time void, gaue the same to the scholemaster in rewarde of his diligence, at his departure after Christmas to the Vniuersitie, and hauing the presentation thereof repaired to the Bishopricke for his institution: in which office, being furnished of all his ordinarie instruments, made speed to the benefice to take the of possession, and being there for that intent, one sir Amias Pouler knight dwelling thereabout, tooke an occasion of displeasure against him, upon that ground I know not, but sir by your leave hee was so bold to set the scholemaster by the eate, during his pleasure, which after was neither forgotten nor forgotten: for when the scholemaster mounted the dignity to be chance- lor of England, hee was not obliuious of his old displeasure cruelly ministered vnto him by sp. Pouler: but sent for him, and after many sharp words, enjoined him to attende vntill hee were dismissed, & not to depart out of London without licence obtained, so that he continued the re within the middle temple the space of 5. or 6. yeeres, who lay then in the gatehouse next the street, which hee reedified verie sumptuously, garnishing the same all ouer yout side with the cardinals armes, with his hat, cognisances, and other deuises in so glorious a sort, that hee thought thereby to haue appeased his old displeasure. Now may this bee a good example and president, to men in authoritie (which will sometime weeke their will without witte) to remember in their authoritie, howe authoritie maie decalle. And whome they doe punish of will, more then of iustice, maie after be aduanced to high honoz and dignities in the Common Weales, and they backe as folow: who will then take the meanes to bee reuenged of such wrongs, which they suffered before? Who would haue thought then when sir Amias Pouler punished this poore scholler, the scholemaster that euer hee should haue mounted to so high dignitie, as to bee Chancellor of England, considering his basenes in euerie degree? These be wonderfull workes of God and fortune. Therefore I would wish all men in authoritie and dignitie to know and feare God in all their triumphes and glozie, considering in all their doings, that authorities be not permanent, but maie slide and vanishe, as Vniuersitie pleasures alter and chaunge. When as all liuing things most of verie necessitie paie the due debt of nature, which no earthlie creature canne resist, hee chaunced the sayde Lord Sparques to departe out of this present life, after whose death, this Scholemaster then considering with himselfe, to bee but a simple beneficed man, and to haue left his fellowship in the Colledge (for I vnderstand, if a fellowe of that house be once promoted to a benefice, hee shall by the rules of the same be dismissed of his fellowship) and perceiving himselfe also to be destitute of his singular good Lorde, and also of his fellowship, which was much of his reliefe, thought not long to bee vnprouided of some other helpe, or spallership to defende him from all such troubles, as hee lightlye was bryed with, and in his trauell thereabout, hee fell in acquaintance with one sir John Naphant, a very graue and ancient knight, who had a greatesome in Caleis vnder K. Henry the 7. this knight hee serued, and behaued himselfe so discretely, that hee obtained the especial fauour of his master, insomuch, that hee committed all the charge of his office vnto his Chaplaine, and as I vnderstand, the office was the Treasureship of Caleis, who was in consideration of his greates age discharged of his some, and returned agayne into England, intending to liue more in quiet, and through his instant labor and good fayour, his Chaplaine was promoted to be the kings chaplaine, and then hee had once cast anchor in the port of promotion, howe hee was brought, I shall somewhat declare. Hee hauing there a iust occasion to be in the sight of the king daily, by reason hee attended and said masse before him in his closet, and that being done, he spent the daie forth in idlenesse, but would attende vpon those whom he thought to heare most rule in the counsell, and to be most in fauour with the king, the which at that time was doctor Fox, bishop of Winchester, Secreterie, and lord of the priuie seale: And also sir Tho. Louell knight, a verie sage counsellor, a wittie man, being master of the Wardes, and constable of the towre: these ancient and graue counsellors in procees of time perceiued this chaplaine to haue a verie fine wit, and thought him a meete person to be preferred to wittie affaires: It chanced at a certaine season that the king had an vgent occasion to send an ambassadoe vnto the Emperour Maximilian, who lay at that present in the low countrey of Flaunders, not far from Caleis. The bishop of Winchester and sir Thomas Louell, whome the king most esteemed as chiefe of his Counsell, the king counselling and debating with them vpon this ambassage, saw they had a conuenient occasion to preferre the kings chaplaine, whose wit, eloquence, and learning they highly commended vnto the king: the king giuing care vnto them, & being a prince of an excellent iudgement and modestie, commanded them to bring his chaplaine, whome they so much commended, before his presence, with whom he fell in communication of great matters, and perceiuing his wit to be verie fine, thought him sufficient to be put in trust with this ambassage, commanding him thereupon to prepare himselfe to this iourney. And for his depeche to repaire to his grace and his Counsell, of whom he should receiue his commission and instructions, by meanses whereof he had then a due occasion to repaire from time to time into the kings presence, who perceiued him more and more to be a verie wise man, and of a good intendment. And hauing his depeach, took his leaue of the king at Richmond about none, and so came to London about foure of the clocke, where the barge of Graues-end was ready to launch forth, both with a prosperous tide and winde, without anie abode he entered the barge, and so passed forth with such happie speede, that he arrived at Graues-end within little more than three houres, where he tarried no longer than his post horses were prouiding, and then travelled so speedily, that he came to Dover the next morning; whereas the passengers were ready vnder saile to Caleis, into the which passenger without tarrying he entered, and sailed forth with them, that long before none he arrived at Caleis, and hauing post horses in a readinesse, departed from thence without tarrying: and he made such hastie speede, that he was that night with the Emperour. And he hauing vnderstanding of the coming of the king of England ambassadoe, would in no wise delaie the time, but sent for him incontinent, his affection to king Henry the seventh was such, that he was glad when hee had anie occasion to shewe him pleasure. The ambassadoe disclosed the whole summe of his ambassage vnto the Emperour, of whom he required speedie expedition: the which was granted him by the emperour, so that the next day he was clerely dispatched, with all the kings requests fully accomplished and granted. At which time he made no longer delay, but took post horses that night, and rode toward Caleis, conducted thither with such persons as the emperour had appointed, and at the opening of the gates of Caleis he came thither, where where the passengers were as ready to returne into England, as they were before at his iourney forward, insomuch, that hee arrived at Dover by ten or eleven of the clock before none, and hauing post horses in a readinesse, came to the court at Richmond the same night, where hee taking some rest until the morning, repaired to the king at his first coming from his bed-chamber to his closet to masse, whome when the king saw, he checked him, so that he was not on his iourney: Sir (quoth he) if it mate please your highnes, I haue already bene with the emperour, and dispatched your affaires, I trust to your graces contentation, & with that presented the king his letters of credence from the emperour. The king heeing in a great confuse and wonder of his speedie returne and proceedings, dissembled all his wonder and imagination in that matter, and demanded of him, whether hee encountered not his pursuant the which he sent vnto him, supposing him not to be scandle out of London, with letters concerning a verie necessarie matter neglected in their consultation, the which the king much desired to haue dispatched amongst the other matters of ambassage: Yes so (quoth the chaplaine) I met with him yester daie by the waie, and hauing no vnderstanding by your graces letters of your pleasure, haue notwithstanding bene so bolde vpon mine discretion (perceiving that matter to be verie necessarie in that behalf) to dispatch the same: and so much as I haue exceeded your graces commission, I most humbly requie your graces remission & pardon: the king reioicing inwarde not a little, said: Wee doe not onlie pardon you the reaf, but also giue you our Mercellie thanks, both for the proceeding therein, & also for your good and speedy exploit, commanding him so that time to take his rest, and repaire againe after Dinner, for the further relation of his ambassage. The king then went to masse, and after a conuenient time went to dinner. It is not to be doubted, but that this ambassadoe hath in all this time ben with his great friends the bishop, and sir Tho. Louell, to whom he hath declared the effect of all his speed, nor yet what they receiued thereof.

The ambassadoe when he saw time, repaired before the king and counsell, where he declared the effect of all his affaires so exactly, with such grantie and eloquence, that all the counsell that heard him, commended him, esteeming his expedition to be almost beyond the capacite of man. The king gaue him at that time the deanery of Lincoln, which was at that time one of the worthiest promotions that he gaue vnder degree of a bishoprick: & thus from thence forward he grew more and more into estimation and authority, and after was promoted by the king to be his almoner.

Where male all men note the chunneces of fortune that followeth some, whome she intendeth to promote, and to some her fauour is cleane contrarie, though they trauell neuer so much with all the possible diligence that they canie deuide or imagine, whereof for my parte, I haue tasted the experience. Nowe ye shall vnderstande that all this tale that I haue declared of the good expedition of the kings ambassadoe, was reported by his owne mouth after his fall, lying at that time in the great park of Richmond, vnto George Candlish his gentleman vsher, taking the occasion vpon diuers communications

Dean of Lincoln

C. Wolsey the kings almoner:

cations to tell this journey with all the circumstances, as I haue here before rehearsed.

When death, that fauoureth none estate, had taken king Henry the seventh out of this present life, who for his wisdome was called the second Salomon, what practises and compasses were then vsed about king Henry the eight: and the great prouision made for the funerals of the one, and the costly deuises of the coronation of the other, I omit. After the finishing of these solemnities and costly triumphs, and that our naturall young and lustie courageous prince king Henry the eight, entering into the flower of lustie youth, and taking vpon him the royall scepter and imperiall diademe of this realme, which at that time flourished in all abundance and riches, whereof the king was inestimably furnished, called then the golden woollie, such grace reigned then within this realme.

Howe the almoner hauing a head full of subtil wit, perceiving a plaine waye to walke in toward his journey to promotion, hamled himselfe so politickely, that the founde the meanes to be made one of the kings counsell, and to grow in fauour and good estimation with the king, to whome the king gaue an house at Wyndesore in Fleetstreete, sometime Sir Richard Emplons, where he kept house for his familie, and so daily attended vpon the king, and in his especiall fauour, who had great suite made vnto him, as counsellors in fauour most commonly haue. His sentences and wittie persuasions in the counsell chamber were alwaies so pithie, that the counsell as occasion moved them, continually assigned him to be the expositor to the king in all their proceedings: in whome the king received such a leaning fantasie, and in respect all for that he was most earnest and readie of all the counsell, to aduance the kings will and pleasure, hauing no respect to the cause: the king therefore perceiving him to be a mete instrument for the accomplishment of his deuided pleasures, called him more nere vnto him, and esteemed him so highly, that all the other counsellors were put from the great fauour that they before were in: inasmuch, that the king committed all his will vnto his disposition, which the almoner perceiving, took vpon him therefore to discharge the king of the weightie and trouble some businesse, perswading the king, that he shoulde not neede to spare any time of his pleasure for any businesse that shoulde happen in the counsell: and whereas the other counsellors would diuers times perswade the king to haue sometime recourse into the counsell chamber, there to heare what was done, the almoner would perswade him to the contrary, which delighted him much: and thus the almoner ruled all that before had ruled him: such did his policie and wit bring to passe. What was more in high fauour but master almoner? Who had all the suite but master almoner? And who ruled all vnder the king, but master almoner? Thus hee perswaded in fauour, untill at last in came presents, giftes, and rewardes so plentifully, that I dare saie be lacked nothing that might either please his fantasie, or enrich his cofers: fortune smiled so fauourably vpon him, but to what end she brought him, we shall heare hereafter. Therefore let all men to whom fortune extendeth her grace, not trust to her subtil fauour, and pleasant promises,

This almoner thus proceeding in fortunes blisfullnes, it chanced the wars betwene the realmes of England and France to be open, in so much, as the king being fully perswaded in his most roiall person, to invade his forraime enemies with a puissant army, therefore it was necessarie that this roiall enterprisse shoulde be speedily provided and furnished in euery degree of things apte and conuenient for the same, the expedition whereof, the king thought no mans wit so mete for policie and painfull trauell, as was his almoner, to whome therefore he committed his whole trust therein, and he being nothing scrupulous in any thing that the king would commaund him to doe, although it seemed to other verie difficult, took vpon him the whole charge of all the businesse, and brought all thinges to good passe in a decent order, as all manner of victuals, prouisions, and other necessities conuenient for so noble a voyage and armie.

All things being by him perfected, the king aduanced to his roiall enterprisse, passed the seas, and marched forward in good order of battell, untill he came to the strong towne of Turwine, to the which he laid his siege, and assailed it verie strongly continually with such vehement assaults, that within short space it was yielded vnto his maiestie: vnto the which place, the Emperour Maximilian repaired vnto the king with a great army like a mightie prince, taking of the king his graces wages, which is a rare thing, and but seldeome done, an emperor to fight vnder a kings banner.

Thus after the king had obtained this puissant fort, and taken the possession thereof, and set all things there in due order, for the defence and preservation thereof to his vse, he departed thence, and marched toward the citie of Turney, and there laid his siege in like maner: to the which he gaue so fierce and sharpe assault, that they were constrained of fine force to render the towne vnto his victorious maiestie: at which time, the king gaue the almoner the bishopricke of the same sea towards his paines and diligence sustained in that towne. And when the king had established all things agreeable to his will and pleasure, and furnished the same with noble captaines and men of warre for the safeguard of the towne, he returned againe into England, taking with him diuers noble personages of France being prisoners, as the duke of Longuille, and vicount Clamont, with other, which were taken there in a skirmish. After whose returne, immediately the sea of Lincoln fell boide by the death of doctor Smith late bishop there: the which benefice his grace gaue to his almoner, late bishop of Turney eled, who was not negligent to take possession thereof, and made all the speede he could for his consecration: the solemnization whereof ended, he found the meanes that he gate the possession of all his predecessores goods into his hands. It was not long after that doctor Bambridge archbishop of Yorke died at Home, being there the kings ambassador, vnto the which sea, the king immediately presented his late and new bishop of Lincoln: so that he had thre bishoppicks in his hands in one peece given him: then prepared he for his translation from the sea of Lincoln vnto the sea of Yorke: after which solemnization done, he being then an archbishop Primas Anglie, thought himselfe sufficient to compare with Canterbury, and thereupon erected his crosse in the court, and euery other place, as well within the precinct and iurisdiction of Canterbury, as in any other place. And for as much as Canterbury claimed a superiouritie ouer Poike, as ouer all other bishopps within England, and for that cause claimed as a knowledge of an ancient obedience of Poike, to abate the aduancing of his crosse, in presence of the crosse of Canterbury: notwithstanding, Poike nothing minding to desist from bearing the roof in manner as I said before, caused his crosse to bee aduanced, as well in the presence of Canterbury as elsewhere: wherefore Canterbury being moued therewith, gaue unto Poike a certaine checke for his presumption, by reason whereof, there engendered some grudge betwene Poike and Canterburie. Poike intending to proude some such meanes, that he would be rather superiour in dignitie to Canterbury, than to be either obedient or equall to him: wherefore hee obtained to be made priest cardinall, and Legatus de Latere: unto whom the Pope sent a cardinall hatte with certaine buls for his authoritie in that behalfe: Yet you shall vnderstand, that the Pope sent him this worthy hat of dignitie, as a ietwell of his honour and authoritie, the which was conueied in a berletes budge, who seemed to all men to be but a person of small estimation.

Wherefore Poike being aduertised of the baseness of this messenger, and of the peoples opinion, thought it mete for his honor, that this ietwell should not be conueied by so simple a person, and therefore caused him to be stopped by the way immediately after his arrivall in England, where he was newly furnished in all manner of apparell, with all kinde of costly filkes, which seemed decent for such an high ambassado: and that done, he was encountered upon Black-heath, and there receiued with a great assembly of prelates, and lusty gallant gentlemen, and from thence conduced through London with great triumph. Then was great and spedy preparation made in Westminster Abbey, for the confirmation and acceptance of this high order and dignitie, the which was executed by all the Bishops and Abbots about or nigh London, with their rich miters and copes, and other ornaments, which was done in so solemne a wise, as had not bene seene the like, unlesse it had bene at the coronation of a mighty prince or king. Obtaining this dignitie, he thought himselfe mete to beare authoritie among the temporall power, as among the spirituall iurisdiction: wherefore, remembering as well the taunts sustained of Canterburie, as having a respect to the aduancement of his worthy honour and promotion, found the meanes with the king, that he was made lord Chancelor of England, and Canterburie which was Chancelor dismissed, who had continued in that come since long before the decesse of Hen. the seventh. Poike being in possession of the Chancelorship, and inuied with the promotions of the archbishoppe, and cardinall De Latere, bating power to correct Canterburie, and all other bishopps & spirituall persons, to assemble his conuocation when he would assigne, he toke vpon him the correction of matters in all their iurisdications, and visited all the spirituall houses, hauing in euery diocese all manner of spirituall ministers, as commissaries, scribes, appri-

ritors, and all other officers to furnish his courtes, and presented by preuention vnto him he pleased vnto all benefices throughout all this realme. And to the aduancing further of his legantine iurisdiction, and honour, he had masters of his faculties, masters Ceremoniarum, and such other to the glorifying of his dignitie.

Then had he his two great crosses of silver, the one of his Archbishopprike, the other of his legacie, borne before him whither soeuer hee went or rode, by two of the tallest priestes that he could get within the realme. And to increase his gaires, he had also the bishopprike of Durham, and the Abbey of Saint Albans in Comendam. And after, when doctor Foxe Bishop of Winchester died, he surrendred Durham into the kings handes, and toke to him Winchester. Then had he in his hand (as it were in farme) the bishoppicks of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, so much as the incumbents of them were strangers, and made their abode continually beyonde the seas in their owne countries, or else at Rome, from whence they were sent in legation to this realme vnto the king, and for their reward at their departure, King Henry the seventh gaue those bishoppicks: and they being strangers, thought it more mete for the assurance, to suffer the cardinall to haue their benefices for a convenient summe of money paid them yearly where they remained, than either to be troubled with the charges of the same, or to be pearly burdened with the conueiance of their revenues vnto them: so that all the spirituall promotions and presentations of these bishoppicks were fully in his disposition, to preferre whom he listed. He had also a great number daily attending vpon him, both of noble men and worthy gentlemen, with no small number of the tallest yeomen that he coulde get in all the realme, in somuch, that well was that noble man & gentleman, that coulde prefer a tall yeoman to his seruite. We shall vnderstand that he had in his hall continually three hounds, kept with three severall principall officers, that is to saie, a steward which was alwaies a priest, a treasurer a knight, and a controller an equier: also a coferer being a doctor, three marshals, three yeomen vishers in the hall, besides two gromes, and almoners. Then in the hall kitchen, two clearkes of the kitchen, a cleark the controller, a suriour of the brent, a cleark of the spicerie, the which together kept also a continual messe in the hall. Also in his hall kitchen he had of master cookes two, and of other cookes, labourers, and children of the kitchen, twelue persons: foure yeomen of the scullerie, and foure yeomen of the bluer scullerie: two yeomen of the pastrie, with two other pastlers vnder the yeomen. Then in his pvlke kitchen a master coke, who went daily in beluet or in satin, with a chaine of golde, with two other yeomen and a grome: In the scalding house a yeoman and two gromes: In the pantrie two persons: In the batterie two yeomen, two gromes, and two pages: And in the pelowie likewise: In the seller three yeomen and three pages: In his chaunderie two: In the wasfatie two: In the wardrobe of beds, the master of the wardrobe, and tenne other persons: In the laundrie a yeoman, a grome, thirtie pages, two yeomen purueuers, and one grome: In the bake-house a yeoman and two gromes: In the wood-parke yeoman and a groom: In the barne one: In the Garden a yeoman and two grooms: Porters at the gate, two yeomen and two grooms: A yeoman of his barge, and a master of his horse: A Clarke of the stable, a yeoman of the same: the saddler, the farrier: a yeoman of his chariot: a sumpter man: a yeoman of his stirrop: a muleter: fiftene grooms of his stable, curie of them kept foure geldings: In the almshouse a yeoman and a groom: In his chappell he had a deane, a great dialine, and a man of excellent learning: a subdeane, a repeater of the quire: a Gospeller, a psalter, of singing psalms ten: a master of the children: Seculars of the Chappell, singing men twelue: singing children ten, with one seruauit to waite vpon the children: in the theatrical a yeoman and two Grooms, ouer and besides others retainers that came thither at principall feasts. For the furniture of his chappell, passeth my capacite to declare, the number of costlie ornementes and rich iewels that were to be occupied in the same continuallie: there hath bene scene in procession about the hall, 44. vertie rich Coopes of one late woyme, besides the rich Croffes and candlesticks, and other ornamentals to the furniture of the same. There had two croffe-bearers, and two pillar-bearers in his great chamber: and in his private chamber these persons: first the chiefe chamberlaine, and vice chamberlaine: of gentlemen others, besides one in his private chamber, he had twelue daily waiters: and of gentlemen waiters in his private chamber he had six, and of lodes nine or ten. who had each of them six men allowed them to attende vpon them, except the Earle of Warbie, who had allowed five men: then had hee of gentlemen, of cupbearers, caruers, and skimmers both of the private chamber and of the great chamber, twelue Gentlemen daily waiters there, fortye persons: of yeomen others 6, of grooms in his chamber 8, of yeomen in his chamber five and fortye daily: he had also almshouse men, sometime more in number than other sometime.

There was attending on his boord of doctors and chaplaines, besides them of his chappell, fiftene daily: a cleark of his closet: secretaries two: and two clerks of his signet, and foure counsellors learned in the law. And so much as it was necessarie to haue others officers of the chancery to attende vpon him, that is to saie, the cleark of the cronone, a riding cleark, a cleark of the hamper, and a chafer of the way: then a cleark of the cheeke, as well vpon the Chaplaines, as of the yeomen of his chamber: he had also foure footemen, which were garnished in rich running coats, when fouer he rode in any journey: then had he an herault of armes, and a sergeant of armes, a Whistion, an apothecarie, foure mirthels, a keeper of his tents, an armorer, an instructor of his wards, two yeomen of his wardjobe of his robes, and a keeper of his chamber continually in the court: he had also in his house the seruants of Doct, and a cleark of the greene cloth. All these were daily attending, doleue lying, & by rising, & at meales: he kept in his great chamber a continuall boord for the Chamberers and Gentlemen officers, hauing with them a messe of the young Lordes, and another of Gentlemen: and besides all these, there was neuer an Officer, Gentleman, or woman: this person, but he was allowed in the house some 3 some 2, and all other one at the least, which grew to a great number of persons.

persons. Thus far out of the Check rol, besides other officers, seruants, retainers, and luters that most commonly dined in the hall.

After that hee was thus furnished, hee was sent twice in ambassage to the emperor Charles the first, for diuers urgent causes touching the kings State: it was thought, that to so noble a prince (the cardinal) was most meete to be sent: wherefore, being ready to take vpon him the charge thereof, was furnished in all degrees and purposes, most like a great prince: for first he proceeded so; furnished like a cardinal, his gentlemen being very many in number, were clothed in livery coats of crimson velvet of the best, with chains of gold about the ir neckes, and his yeomen and meane officers in coats of fine scarlet, garded with black velvet a hand broad.

Thus furnished, he was twice sent into Flanders to the emperor, then lying in Bruges, whome he did most highlie entertaine, discharging all his charges and his mens. There was no house within the towne of Bruges, where in any gentleman of the cardinals were lodged, or had recourse, but the others were commanded by the emperors officers, that they, vpon paine of their liues should take no monie for any thing that the cardinals seruants did take of any kind of victuall, no although they were disposed to make any costlie banquetts: commanding furthermore their said hosts, to see that they lacked no such things as they honestly required for their honesty and pleasure. Also the emperors officers every night went through the towne from house to house, where as any English gentlemen did repose or lodged, and serued their liuries for all night, which was done in this manner. First, the officers brought into the house a cass of fine manchet, and of silver two great pots with white wine, and sugar to the weight of a pound; white lightes and yellow lightes of wax; a boll of silver with a goblet to drink in, and every night a stalle toych. This was the order of the liuries every night; and in the morning when the same officers came to fetch away their stalle, then would they account with the hosts for the gentlemen's costes spent in the day before.

Thus the emperor entertained the cardinal and all his traine for the time of his ambassage there. And that done, he returned into England with great triumph.

None of his order in going to Westminster Hall daily in the terme; first ere he came out of his private chamber, he heard service in his closet, and there take his service with his Chaplaine; then going againe to his private Chamber, hee tooke his demande, if his seruantes were in a readines, and had furnished his Chamber of presence, and waiping Chamber, being thereof then advertised, came out of his private Chamber about epght of the clocke, apparelled all in redde, that is to saie, his upper garment cypher of fyne scarlet, or else fyne crimson taffeta, but most commonlie of fyne crimson Saten engrayned, his pillion of fyne scarlet, with a necke sette in the inner side with blacke velvet, and a Tippet of Sables about his necke, holding in his hand an Oronge, whereof the substance within was taken out, and filled wythe agayne with the parte of a Spooonge, wherein was Ginger and other confections against the Pestilent Agres, the which hee most commonlie helde to his nose when he came among anie puelle, or else that hee was pestered with manie suitors: and before him was borne first the Broade Seale of England, and his Cardinals Hatte, by a Lorde, or some Gentleman of woyship, right solemnelle: and as soon as he was once entered into his chamber of presence, his two great Crosses were there attending to bee borne before him: then cryed the Gentlemen Whithers, going before him bare headed, and saide: An before my Lords and masters, on before, make waie for my lords grace. Thus went he borne through the hall with a Scribeant at armes before him, bearing a greete Pace of silver, and two gentlemen carrying two greate pillars of silver, and when hee came at the Hall doore, there was his mule, being trapped all in crimson velvet, with a saddle of the same, and gilt stirrups.

Then was there attending vpon him, when hee was mounted, his two Crosse Bearers, and his Willer bearers in like case, vpon great horses, trapped all in fine Scarlet. Then marched hee forward with a Traine of noble men and Gentlemen, hauing his soterment, foure in number about him, bearing each of them a gilt Sollar in their hands: and thus passed hee forth, untill he came to Westminster Hall doore, and there lighted, and went up after this manner into the Chauncerie, or into the Star Chamber: howbeit, most commonly hee woulde go into the Chauncerie, and stay a while at a Barre made for him beneath the Chancerie on the right hand, & there commune sometime with the Iudges, and sometime with other persons: and that doone, hee woulde repaie into the Chauncerie, and sitting there untill cleuene of the clocke, hearing of suites, and determining of other matters, from thence hee woulde diuers times go into the Star Chamber as occasion serued. There hee neither spared high ne lowe, but indged euerie state according to his merits and desert. Hee vsed also euerie Sundae to reioyce to the Courte, then being for the most parte of all the yee at Greenwich, with his former triumphes, taking his Barge at his owne Staypes, furnished with poemen, flambing vpon the Bayles, and his Gentlemen being withyn about him, and landed agayne at the thre Cranes in the Mintre: and from thence hee rode vpon his Mule, with his Crosse, his Willars, his Hatte and Broad seale carped afore him on Horse-backe through Thamys Streete, untill he came to Billingsgate, and there tooke his Barge again, and so was rowed to Greenwich, where hee was receiued of the lords and chiefe officers of the kings house, as the Treasurer, Controller, and other, and so conueyed into the kings chamber: then the Court was wonderfullie furnished with Noble men and gentlemen: and after dinner among the Lordes, hauing some consultation with the King, or with the Councell, hee woulde depart homeward with the like triumph.

Thus in greate honour, triumphe, and glozie, hee reigned a long season ruling all thinges withyn the Realme appertayning vnto the King. His house was alwaies reioyced to with Noblemen and Gentlemen, feasting and banquetting Ambassadors diuers times, and all other right noble: and when it pleased the king for his recreation, to repaie to the Cardinals house, as he did diuers times in the yee: there wanted no preparations, or furniture: Banquets were set forth with maskes and mummeries, in so gorgeous a sort, and costly maner, that it was an heauen to behold. There wanted no Dames or Damoels, méte or apte to daunce with the maskers, or to garish the place for the time: then was there all kinde of musicke, and harmony, with fine voices both of men and chyldren.

One time the king came sodainly thither in a maske with a dosen maskers all in garments like Shepheardes, made of fine cloth of Golde, and Crimolin Satten paned, and Cappes of the same, with Tysars of god bishomie, their haire and beards, either of fine golde-wire like, or blacke like, hauing strecte toye-bearers, besides their drums, and other persons with visars, all clothed in Satten of the same colour: and before his entering into the Hall, he came by water to the water gate, without anie noise, where were laid diuers chambers and guns charged with shot, and at his landing they were shot off, which made such a rumble in the aire, that it was like thunder: It made all the Noblemen, Gentlemen, Ladies, and Gentlewomen, to muse what it shoulde meane, comming so sodainly, they sitting quiet at a solemne banquet, vnder this sort: First y<sup>e</sup> Hall vnderstande, that the Tables were set in the Chamber of presence (last covered), and the Lorde Cardinal sitting vnder the cloth of Estate, there hauing all his seruice alone: and then was there set a Table with a Noble man, or a Gentleman and a Gentlewoman throughout all the Tables in the Chamber on the one side, which were made and topned as it were but one Table, all which order and deuise was done by the Lorde Sandes then Lorde Chamberlaine to the king, and by sir Henry Guilford Comptroller of the kings Palesies house. Then immediately after the great Chamberlaine, and the saide Comptroller, sent to loken that it shoulde meane, (as though they knewe nothing of the matter,) they looking out of the windowes into the Thamys, returned agayne and shewed him, that it seemed they were Noblemen and Strangers, arrived at his byldge, comming as Ambassadors from some forreine Prince: with that quoth the Cardinall, I desire you, because you can speake French, to take the paines to go into the hall, there to receiue them according to the Estates, and to condux them into this Chamber, where they shall sit vs, and all these Noble Personages, being merrie at our Banquet, desiring them to sit downe with vs, and to take part of our fare. Then went he incognito downe into the Hall, whereas they receiued them with twentie newe Trenches, and conueyed them vpps into the Chamber, with such a noyle of Drummes and Flutes, as seldom had bene hearde the like. At their entering into the Chamber two and two together, they went directlie before the Cardinall where he sate, and saluted him reuerentlie, to whom the Lorde Chamberlaine for them saide: Sir, so as much as they be Strangers, and can not speake English, they haue desired mee to declare vnto you, that they haue vnderstanding of this your triumphant Banquet, where was assembled such a number of excellent Dames, they coulde doe no lesse vnder suppoite of your Grace, but to repaiee thither, to blesse as well their incomparable beautie, as for to accompanie them at Spinninge, dance, and then to daunce with them: and sic, they requite of your Grace licence to accomplish the said cause of their coming. To whom the Cardinall said, he was very well content they should so doe.

Then went the Masters, and first saluted all the Dames, and returned to the most worthyest, and there opened their great cuppe of golde filled with crownes, and other pieces of golde, to whom they set certaine pieces of gold to cast at.

Thus perusing all the Ladies and gentlewomen, to some they losse, and of some they won: and perusing after this maner all the ladies, they returned to the Cardinall with great reuerence, putting downe all their golde so left in their cup, which was aboue two hundred crownes: At all (quoth the Cardinall) and so cast the dice and wain them, whereat was made a great noise and toy. Then quoth the lord cardinall to the lord Chamberlaine, I pray you (quoth he) that you would shew them, that me seemeth there should be a Nobleman amongst them, who is moze mete to occupie this seate and place then I am, to whome I would most gladly surrender the same according to my dutie, if I knewe him. Then spake the lord Chamberlaine to them in French, and they rounding him in the care, the lord Chamberlaine said to my Lord Cardinall: Sir (quoth hee) they confesse that among them there is such a noble personage, whom if your grace can appoint him out from the rest, he is content to disclose himselfe, and to accept your place: with that the cardinall taking good aduilement among them, at the last quoth he, me seemes the gentle man with the blacke beard should be euen hee: and with that he arose out of his chaire, and offered the same to the gentleman in the blacke beard, with his cap in his hand. The person to whom he offered the chaire was Sir Edward Neuill, a comely knight, that much moze resembled the kings person in that make than any other.

The king perceiuing the cardinall so deccitfull, could not forbear laugh- ing, but pulled downe his visor and master Neuill also, and dashed out such a pleasant countenance and there that all the noble estates there assembled perceiuing the king to be there among them, reioyced verie much. The cardinall estiming desired his Highnesse to take the place of Estate: to whom the king answered, that he would go first and thence his apparel, and so departed into my lord Cardinalls chamber, and there newe appareled him: in which time, the dishes of the banquet were cleane taken vpe, and the Tables spread againe with newe cleane perfumed clothes, euerie man and woman sitting still, untill the king with all his makers came among them againe all newe appareled: then the king toke his seate vnder the cloth of Estate, commaunding euerie person to sit still as they did before: In came a newe banquet before the king, and to all the rest throughout all the Tables, wherein were serued two hundred diuers dishes, of costly denises and subtilties. Thus passed they forth the night with banquetting, dauncing, and other triumphes, to the great comfort of the king, and pleasant regarde of the Nobilitie there assembled. Thus passed this Cardinall his time from date to date, date, and vnder to pere, in such great wealth, sole, triumph, and glorie, hauing alwaies on his side the kings speciall fauour, untill fortune enuied his prosperous estate, as is to the world well knowne, and shall be partly touched hereafter.

Ladie Marie king Henries daughter was bozne at Greenewich on the 11. of februarye.

Margaret Quene of Scottes, king Henries eldest siller, who had after the death of her first husband (James king of Scots daue at Bhamstone) married Archibald Douglas earle of Anguise, fled into England, for feare of the duke of Albany, that had taken her two sons, the lay at Warbottle, where she was deliuered of a child called Margaret. But shortly after Archibald Douglas her husband went home againe into Scotland without leaue taking: wherefore the king sent for her to London, where she was royally received and lodged at Baynards Castle, and there she tarried a whole yere ere she returned.

The king for the honoz of his siller Margaret quene of Scots, on the 19. and 20. day of May, prepared and kept sollemne Iusts, wherein the king himselfe, the duke of Suffolke, the Earle of Essex, and Nicholas Carew esquire, answered all comers.

This yere the Cardinall caused all those to be called to accompts, that had dealt with the kings money, and had the occupying thereof in the wars, or otherwise. This audit troubled manie, for some were found in arerages, and some saved themselves by polkie, & surely he so punished persturie with open infamie, causing the offenders to weare papers, and so forth, that in his time it was lesse used then in long time before: he punished also lords, knights, and men of all degrees, for riots, for bearing out wyngs, and for maintenance practised in their countries, whereby the poore men liued quietly, and no man durst bte bolstering, for feare of imprisonment. It was a strange matter to see, a man not trained by in the lawes, to sit in the seate of iudgment, to pronounce the law, being aided at the first by such as according to the ancient custome did sit as associates with him: but he would not sticke to determine lawlike causes, neither rightly decided, nor iudged by order of law: and againe such as were clere cases he would some time prohibite the same to passe, call them into iudgement, frame an order in controuersies, and punish such as came with untrue furnises, afore the iudges themselves, which had receiued such furnises, and not well considered of the controuersies of the parties: he ordained by the kings commission, diuers vnder courts, to heare complaints by bill of poore men, that they might the sooner come by iustice: so that iustice men haue reported, neuer to haue seene this realme in better obedience, and quiet, then it was in the time of his authoritie and rule, ne iustice better ministered, with indifferencie.

The duke of Suffolke departed home into his Countrie, and also the duke of Suffolke followed shortly, for he hauing spent liberally in his tourneies into France, as also in the solemnization of his mariage, and in house keeping wh he was married, borrowed great summes of money of the king, which he

on the French

In the moneth of October, Matthew bishop of Silon or Sitten, a cardinall of the Swisses, came into England from the emperor Maximilian: At the contemplation of which cardinall, the king lent to the emperor a great summe of money: but the greatest matter that moved the king to be so free to Maximilian, was because the same money should bee imployed on men of war against the French king, to whom of late the k. had conceived a grudge. Whereupon was Richard Pace sent first into Germanie with a great sum of money to wage the Swisses, which under the conduct of the emperor Maximilian, invaded the dutchie of Spillaine, but without anie greate gayne returned from thence, leaving Spillaine in the French mens hands at that time. And now for a newe reliefe was this Cardinall sent from Spillaine, at whose instance mony was assigned to be delivered, and certaine Venetwaies undertooke the exchange, which made not payment at the day, although they had received it of the king.

A greave drought in winter, and a great frost.

This yere was a great drought, for there fell no rain to be accounted of, from the beginning of September, till the moneth of May in the next yere, where through in some places, men were faine to dylve their Catell 3. or 4. mile to water.

Also for a time the Thames was frozen, that men with horse and carts might passe betwixt Westminster and Lambeth.

strangers in London much
hgt.

About this season, there grew a great hart-burning, and malicious grudge amongst the Englishmen of the city of London against strangers, and namely the artificers founde themselves soze graved, for that such numbers of strangers were permitted to resort hither with their wares, and to exercise handie craftes, to the great hinderance and impoverishing of the kings liege people: and this malice grew to such a point, that one John Lincolne a Woher, busied himselfe so farre in the matter, that about Palme Sundae of the first of Aprill, this eight yere of the kings raigne, he came to one doctor Henrie Staadish, with these words: Sir I understande that you shall preach at the Spittle on mundaie in Easter weeke, and so it is, that Englishmen, both merchants and other are undone, by strangers, who have more liberty in this land than they, which is against all reason, and also against the common Weale of this Realme: I beseech you therefore to declare this in your Sermon, and in so doing, yee shall deserve greate thanks of my Lorde Mayor, and of all his Welchmen, and here with bee offered unto the sayde Doctor, a Bill, containing the matter more at large: but Doctor Staadish (wile he considering that there might more inconvenience rise thereof, than hee woulde wishe, if hee should deale in such a sort) both refused the Bill, and told Lincolne plainlie, that he ment not to meddle with anie such matter in his sermon. Whereupon the sayde Lincolne went unto one doctor Bell, a Chanon of the foresaide Spittle, that was appointed likewise to preach upon Tuesday in Easter weeke, at the same Spittle, whom he perswaded to reade his sayde bill in the pulpet, which bill in effect contayned the graces that manie founde with strangers

for taking the livings astate from artificers, and the entercourse from merchants, the redresse whereof must come from the commons knit in one: for as the hurt touched all men, so must all set to their helping hands: which letter he read, or the chiefest part thereof, comprehending much seditious matter, and then he began with this sentence, Calum, cali Domino, terram autem dedit filijs hominum, and upon this text he entreated, how this land was giuen to Englishmen, and as birds defend their nestes, so ought Englishmen to cherish and maintaine themselves, & to hurt and grieue allians for respect of their common wealth: and upon this text, Pugna pro patria, he brought in how by Gods law it was lawfull to fight for their countrey: and thus he subtilly moved the people to rebell against strangers: by this sermon manie a light person took courage, and openlie spoke against strangers. And as unhappie would, there had bene divers euill parts plaide of late by strangers, in and about the citie of London, which kindeled the peoples rancor the more furious against them.

The 28. daie of Aprill, divers young men of the Citie picked quarrels to certaine strangers, as they passed by the Straetes, some they did strike, and busketed, and some they threw into the channell: wherefore the Mayor sent some of the Englishmen to prison, as Stephen Sudley Skinner, Stephenson, Bees and other. Then sodainelie rose a secret rumour, and no man could tell how it beganne, that on Maie daie next, the Citie woulde take all the allians, inso much, that divers strangers fledde out of the citie. This rumour came to the knowledge of the kings Counsell, whereupon the Lorde Cardinall sent for the Mayor and other of the counsell of the Citie, giving them to understande what he had heard. The Mayor, as one ignorant of the matter, tolde the Cardinall that he doubted not but so to gouerne the Citie, as peace should be obserued. The Cardinall willed him so to do, and to take god haue that if anie riotous attempt were intended, he should with god policie prevent it. The Mayor comming from the Cardinals house about foure of the clocke in the afternone on Maie daie, sent for his brethren to the Guildhall, yet was it almost seauen of the clocke ere the assemblee was set. Upon conference had of the matter, some thought it necessarie that a substantiall watch should be set of honest Citizens, which might withstand the euill doers, if they went about anie misrule: other were of contrarie opinion, but rather thought it best, that commandement should be giuen to euerie man to shut in his doores, and to keepe his seruants within. Before eight of the clocke the Recorder was sent to the Cardinall, with these opinions, who hearing the same, allowed the latter. And when the Recorder and Sir Thomas More, late vnderheriffe of London, and nothe of the kings counsell came to the Guildhall, halfe an houre before nine of the clocke, and there theyeued the pleasure of the Kings Counsell: whereupon euerie Alderman sent to his ward, that no man shoulde stir after nine of the clocke out of his house, but to keepe his doores shut, and his seruants within till nine of the clocke in the morning. After this commandement giuen, in the evening, as Sir John Mundie Alderman came from his ward, and founde two young men in cheape playing at the bucklers, and a great many of young men looking on them (for the commandment was scarce published) he commanded them to leave off, & for that one of the asked him why, he would have sent him to the counter: but the prentices resisted the alderman, taking the young man from him, and cried prentices & clubs, then out at every doze came clubs and other weapons, so that the alderman was faine to flee. Then more people arose out of every quarter, and forth came servingmen, watermen, courtiers and other, so that by 11. of the clocke there were in cheape, 6. or 700. And out of Pauls churchyard came about 300. so out of all places they gathered, & brake by the church, took out the prisoners that had been thither committed by the spallor, for hurting of strangers. Also they went to Newgate, and took out Studley and Peis, committed thither for the like cause: the spallor and Sheriffs were present, and made proclamation in the kings name, but nothing was obeyed. Here with being gathered in plumps, they ran through St. Nicholas shambles, and at Saint Martins gate, there met with the m<sup>r</sup> Thomas More, and other, desiring them to go to their lodgings: and as they were thus entreating, & had almost perswaded the people to depart, they within St. Martins threw out stones and bats, so that they hurt divers honest persons, so much with sir Thomas More, perswading the rebellious persons to cease: in so much as at length, one Nicholas Dennis a Serleant at armes, being there so hurt, in a furie cried downe with them, and then all the misdeed persons ran to the dozes and windowes of the houses within Saint Martins, and spoiled all that they found. After that they ranne into Coorne-hill, and so forth to an house east from Leaden Hall, called the Cyene gate, where dwelt one Mewtas a Pickard or Frenchman, within whose house dwelled divers Frenchmen, whom they likewise spoiled, and if they had founde Mewtas they would have stricken off his head: some ran to Blanchapleton, and there brake by the strangers houses and spoiled them: they continued thus till thre of the clocke in the morning, at what time they began to withdrawe: but by the way they were taken by the spallor and other, and sent to the Tower, Newgate, and Counters, to the number of 300. The Cardinall was advertised by S<sup>r</sup> Thomas Parre, whom in all haste he sent to Richmond to informe the king, who incontinently sent to the Tower and the state of the city, and was truly informed. S<sup>r</sup> Richard Cholmeley lieutenant of the tower during the time of this busines, shot off certaine pieces of ordnance against the citie, but did no great hurt. About five of the clocke in the morning, the Earles of Shrewsbury, and Surrey, T. Dekwrey L. spallor of S. Johns, George Nevill L. Burgawney, and other came to London, with such powers as they could make, to bid the Innes of Court: but before they came the busines was done as ye have heard. Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of Doctor Bell called to remembrance, and he sent to the Tower. A commission of Oyre and determiner directed to the Duke of Suffolke, and other lordes, for punishment of this insurrection. The 2. of May the commissioners with the L. spallor, Aldermen, and Justices went to the Guild-hall, where many of the offenders were imbold, whereupon they were arraigned, and pleaded not guiltie, had day given till the fourth

The next day 13. were adjudged to be hanged, drawne and quartered, for execution whereof, were set up 10. paire of gallowes in divers places of the citie, as at Aldgate, Blanchapleton, Grace-Street, Leaden-hall, before either counters, at Newgate, S. Martins, at Aldersgate, & at Bishops gate, these gallowes were set on wheeles to be removed from strate to strate, and from doze to doze, thercunto the prisoners were brought, and there executed. On the 7. of May was Lincolne, Shirwin, and two brethren called Bets, and divers other adjudged to die. They were on herdels drawne to the scaffold in Cheape, and first was Lincolne executed, and as the other had the rope about their neckes, there came a commandment from the king to respite the execution, and then were the prisoners sent againe to prison, and the armed men sent out of London. For it is to be noted that thre Quenes, to witte, Katherine Quene of Englands, and by her meanes Marie the French Quene, and Margaret Quene of Scottes, the kings sisters, (the n<sup>o</sup> resident in Englands) long time on their knees before the king had begged their pardon, which by perswasion of the Cardinall Wolsey (without whose Counsell hee would doe nothing) the king granted unto them.

Three quenes obtained pardon to the Londoners.

On the thirteenth of May, the king came to Westminster hall, and with him the Lozde Cardinall, the Dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the earles of Shrewsbury, Essex, Wilshire, and Surrey, with many lordes, and other of the kings counsell, the spallor of London, Aldermen and other chiefe Citizens, were there in their best liveries by nine of the clocke in the morning: Then came in the prisoners, bound in ropes in a ranke one after another in their thirties, and everie one had a halter about his necke, being in number 400. men and 11. women. When they were thus come before the kings presence: the Cardinall laid fore to the spallor and Aldermen their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared how lustily they had deserved death. When all the prisoners together cried to the king for mercie, and therewith the Lozdes besought his grace of pardon, at whose request the king pardoned them all. The generall pardon being pronounced, all the prisoners shouted at once, and cast their halters towards the rofe of the hall. The prisoners dismissed, the gallowes were taken downe, and the Citizens took more heed to their servants.

The 18. of May, Margaret Quene of Scots departed from London towards Scotland, richly appointed and prepared of all things necessary for her estate through the kings gre at liberality. She entered into Scotland the 13. of June and was received at Berwick by Archibald Douglas earle of Angus her half-bro. Cardinall came into England.
Cardinall Wolsey made legat.

About the feast of Lammas began the sweating sickness, of the which many men died suddenly in the beginning thereof, and this plague continued till Michaelmas, many died thereof in the court, as the lord Clinton, the lord Grey of Wilton, and many other knights and gentlemen, by reason of this contagious sickness, Michaelmas terme was adioyned. After this, to wit, in the winter was a greates death of pestilence, almost ouer all Englande in euery towne more or lesse, wherefore the k. kept himselfe with small companie about him, willing to haue no resort to the court for feare of infection.

Trinity terme was begun at Oxford, where it continued but one day, and was againe adioyned to Westminster.

In the moneth of July Laurence Campeius boyn in Soloisne la grace, commonly called cardinal Campeius legat de latere, from pope Leo the 10. to requite and exhort king H. to make war on the Turke.

At the request of the k. of England, and also of the French k. (which sought now to be receiued into friendship with the k. of England) pope Leo constituted cardinal Wolsey his legat in England, ioining him in commission with the foresaid cardinal Campeius,

Where was at the same time other legates sent into other parts of christendome, about the same matter, as into France, Spain, and Germany: but cardinal Campeius bearing that their suit took no place in other parts, left off his suite about it, and returned to Rome.

After long suit made of the French king and his counsel, it was agreed, that the city of Tourney should be deliuered to the French k. he paying 600000. crownes for the city, to be paid in 12. yerres, & 400000. crownes for the castle, the which the k. had builded, (which was not fully perfozmed): and also he should pay 23. thousand pound Tarnels, the which sometime the citizens of Tarnie ought to the king of Englande, for their liberties and franchises. Afore the French king should pay to the Cardinall of England 1000. marke of perrillie pension, in recompence of his Bishopricke of Tournay. It was further agreede, that the poong Dolphin sonne and heire to the French king, should be marrie with the Ladie Marie king Henries Daughter of Englande, if they both should like each other when they came to age. And then Charles Bewforde earle of Worcester, Lord Chamberlaine of England, with the bishop of Ely and other, were sent into France, to make deliuey of the said City of Tournay, which was done on the 10. of February. The captain Sir Richard Leringham was discharged, and the Frenchmen suffered to enter, the Englishmen returned into England fore displeased, for thereby many a tal proman lacked liuing, the which would be not labour after their retorne but fell to robbing, and lewd life.

The 8. of March solemne iusts were holden, the king himselfe and 8. yong gentlemen, taking upon them to answere the D. of Suffolke and 8. other challengers with him.

This

This yeere the Henry held his feast of S. George at Windsor, with as great solemnitie as it had bene the feast of a coronation, where were present all the knights of the order then withyn the realme.

An. reg. 11.

Shortly after certaine gentlemen of the playn chamber, which through the kings lenity inheriting with their lewde, for getting themselves, and the it out towards his grace, in being too familiar with him, not hauing due respect to his estate and degree, were removed, by order taken by the Councell, unto whome the k. had giuen authoritie to vie their discretions in that behalf, and then were foure sad and ancient knights put into the kings playn chamber, whose names were, Sir Richard Wingfield, Sir Richard Ierningham, Sir Richard Weston, and Sir Wil. Kingstone, and besides these diuers officers were changed in other places.

The French k. desirous to continue the friendship lately begunne betwixt him & the k. of England, made means to the cardinal, that they might in some conuenient place come to an enterolow together, that he might haue farther knowledge of King Henry, and the Henry likewise of him. The cardinal the refore breaking with the king of this matter, declaring how honorable, necessary, and conuenient it should be for him to gratifie his friend herein. And thus the k. concluded an earnest desire to see the French k. and thereupon appointed to go ouer to Caleis, and so into the Marches of Guines, to meete with the French king. When were sent unto Guines, Sir Nich. Vaux, Sir Edm. Becknape, Sir Wil. Sands knights of the garter, commissioners to ouersee the making of a palace before the castle gate of Guines: these landed at Caleis on the 16. of March. There were also sent, the kinges master mason, master carpenter, 300. masons, 500. carpenters, 100. joiners, besides many painters, glassers, tailors, smithes, and other artificers, both out of England, and provided in Flanders, in all to the number of more than 2000.

The said palace was begun on the 19. of March, for the which palace the timber was before bought in Holland, and was so long, for the most part, that the same was faine to be bound together and drayne after ships to Caleis, for no ship might receiue it. The other timber and woode was conueied out of England. This palace was framed in diuers places, all the roofes whereof was couered within with canvas curiously painted and also the walls from the second plat downward: it was also glazed with the best and clearest glasse that coulde be gotten, from the ouer plat vnto the second plat of the stone work, and round about were houses of office, as pantry, buttery, cellar, and other. And thus was there builded the goodliest Palace of timber, that euer was wrought in the Westerly parts of the world.

Then was provision made in England and in Flanders for bismall, wine, and all other things necessary for the furniture of feasts and banquetting.

Herewith were letters written to all such lords, ladies, gentlemen and gentlemen, which should giue their attendance on the k. and Quene, which incontinently put themselves in a readines, after the most sumptuous sort. Also it was appointed that the king of England and the French king, in a campe betweene Arde and Guines, with 18. apes, should be in the moneth of June next

And the like proclamation was made in the court of France, by Clarendius king of Armes of England: also in the court of Burgoyne, in Almain, and Italy. About the which was cast a great dike in trench, and a costly house of gallery for the kings and quenes, lords and ladies for to stand in and beholde the tilts and other things there done.

King Henry being informed, that his realme of Irel. was out of order, discharged the earle of Eilbare of his office of deputy, and thereunto was appointed the earle of Surrey Tho. Howard lord admiral: wherefore the said earle in the beginning of Aprill, took leaue of the king, and the duke of Norfolk his father, and passed into Ireland with diuers gentlemen, of such as had been of the garrison of Tournay, and had with him 100. pension of the kings guard, and other to the number of 1000. men, and there he continued two yeres and more, in which space he had many battels and skirmishes with the wilde Irish.

On the next morrow, the emperoz Charles the first returning out of Spaine, arrived with his nauie of ships at Hythe in Kent, where he was saluted by the vice admiral of England, sir W. Fitz William, with five of the kings great ships, which lay for the safegard of passengers betwixt Calcis and Dover, toward evening the Emperoz entered his boat, and comming toward land was met and receiued of the lord Cardinall. Thus landed Charles the Emperoz at Dover, under his cloth of estate of the blacke Eagle all set on rich cloth of gold, in whose company was the quene of Aragon, with diuers noble estates, and faire ladies of his countrey and bloud, which were receiued at the sea side, by the lord Legate Cardinall and other lords and gentlemen. The Emperoz to accompanied at ten of the clocke at night by torch light, was brought to the castle of Dover, where he rested, and there sir Edward Poynings warden of the fine ports, brought to the Emperoz the keyes of the Castle, who refused them, saying, he knew well that he was out of all danger, and as safe, as if he were at home in his owne realme. The same night about two of the clocke after midnight, the king came to Dover by torch light, and as soone as the emperoz heard of his comming, he arose, and mette with the king at the faire head, where either embraced other in armes, and there they talked together a long time, and alway the king had the Emperoz on his right hand, on the morrow which was Whitsondaie, the king and the Emperoz with all the other estates rode vnto Canterbury, the two:de boine by the earle of Darby, ryding before them both, by the kings commandement, and so the princes rode to Canterbury, and to Chyists Church, where they were receiued with generall procession, by the Lorde Cardinall and other. The k. and the Emperoz went both vnder one canapie vnto Thom. Becketts chynce, where they made their prayers and oblations, and then went to the archbishops palace, where the Quene of England the emperors Aunt, met him going into the great chamber, of whom he was royally receiued and welcomed. The Emperoz and the king took a little recreation, and then went to high masse, where they offered, first the Emperoz, and then the king, and so returned to their trauerses set a part, and after went to dinner, at which seruice the Emperours trumpetts sounded and not the kings. On Mondai at nine of the clocke at night, was begun a banquet, which endured till the next morning at thre of the clocke, at the which banquet the Emperoz, the king and the Quene did walsh togither, the Duke of Buckingham giuing the water, the Duke of Suffolke holding the towell, next them did walsh the L. Cardinal, the Quene of France, and the Quene of Aragon. At which banquet the Emperoz kept the estate, the king sitting on the left hand, next him the French Quene, and on the other side late the Quene, the Cardinal, and the Quene of Aragon, which banquet was serued by the Emperors owne seruants. On Tuesday these estates departed out of Canterbury: the Emperoz brought the quene his Aunt to horse backe to Dover ward. Then the Emperoz and the king kept company togither till they came to the Downes, where they parted. The emperoz went to Sandwich, and so to his flacte, which were in number great ships with two tops the piece 44.

toward Calais.

The king went to Dover, where he rested that night: and on the thursdaie toke shipping to Calais, where he landed about 11. of the clocke, where he remained five daies, and with him the Quene and ladies, and many nobles of the realme. The number of persons on the king and quenes side were 4334. and of horses, 1637. besides the persons on the French Quenes and duke of Suffolke her husbands, and of the Cardinals.

On the fourth of June, the king with all his nobles, as well the Quene with her traine of Ladies as other, with the whole number of nobles removed from Calais to Guisnes, into the most noble and royall lodging before sene, for it was a Palace made quadrant, and euerie quadrant was 328. fote long, which was in compasse 1312. fote about, set on stages with great cunning.

The 7. of June, the kings of England and France met at the campe between Guisnes and Arde, with both their swordes drawn and borne before them.

The tenth of June, the king of England dined with the French Quene in the towne of Arde: and the Fr. king dined the same day with the Quene of England, in the new Palace made before the Castle of Guisnes, which house was the most sumptuous and costly of riches that hath bene sene.

And after this, these two kings met euery daie after at campe, with diuers lords, and there lodged and turneyed 14. daies: and the two Quenes met at Guisnes and at Arde diuers times.

The 24. of June these two kings and Quenes with their retinues, met at campe where the toiles were kept, and there they banqueted and daunced with maskings and disguisings, that the like had not bene lightly sene, almost all the night following, and then toke their leaue and departed: and on the 25. of June, the king of England and the Quene, and all the court, removed from Guisnes to the towne of Calais, where they rested.

On the tenth of July, the K. with a goodly companie rode to the towne of Chaulin

Chaulin in Flaunders, and there met with Charles the Emperoz, and on the next morrow, the Emperoz, and the lady Margaret, the emperors Aunt Dutchesse of Savoy, with many other great estates, came with the K. of England to the towne of Calais, whereby all the lords and states of England were displaced of their lodgings: and for solace against their coming, was builded a Banqueting house 800. fote compasse, like a Theatre, after a goodly beuise, builded in such maner, as I thinke was neuer sene, with sixtene principals made of great masses, betwixt euery mass foure and twenty fote, and all the outsidcs closed with boards and canuas, within the which, and round about were raised scafolds of thre stages high, for men and women to stand upon: and in the midst of the same banquetting house was set vp a great pillar of timber made of 8. great masses, bound together with yron bandes for to holde them togither, for it was 134. fote of length, and cost 6. l. 13. s. and 4. d. to set it vp right. The banquetting house was covered ouer with canuas, fastened with ropes & yron as fast as might be deuised. And within the said house was painted the Heauens, with stars, sunne, moone, and cloudes, with diuers other things made about ouer mens heads: and there were great Images of whichars covered with canuas painted, representing men of diuers strange nations, and diuers reasons were written by them of the countries that they were likened to be of, and the armes of those countries hanging by them. Also there was made as it were manie ships vnder saile, and windmills on the hills binding: especially there was on the one side set out all the armes of the kings of England, with the kings peltre: & on the other side, the Emperors armes and descent, and about the high pillar of timber in the midst was framed diuers stages, for organs and other instruments of musicke to be played, with men, and children, as well to play on them, as for to set forth their muscicall voices, & to haue made as it were, an heavenly noise. But when the Emperoz, the K. of England, & the other states should haue sit downe to their banquet, this house, and all things els in great abundance being prepared for, furnishing thereof, it fortuned, that in the morning of the same day, the winde began to rise, and increasing till the euening, it then on a sodaine blew off all the canuas heauen with planets, &c. and blew out more than 1000. torches and other lights of waxe prepared to haue giuen light to the banquet. The seats which were with great riches prepared for the emperoz and the king were dashed and lost. The same night the K. of England with 15. persons more richly appareled in a maske, went to the Emperors lodging, and in the chamber of presence danced and reuelled, and then he departed.

The twelfth of July, the Emperoz, and the lady Margaret supped with the king and quene of England, at the Orchequer, where the same night were 8. companies of maskers, and in euery company were 12. persons, all in gold, silver and velvet richly appareled. The emperoz & king in this meane time, besides their pastimes, caused the charters before time concluded to be read, all the articles of the league tripartite, agreed betwixt the Emperoz and the king of England, and the French K. were at full declared, to the which the French king had condescended: and for the more exemplifying of the same, he sent

The 8. of July the emperor Charles and the ladie Margaret, departed out of Calcis. The king gave to the Emperor a Baie Courſer, trapped with golde ſmithes worke, ſet with ſtones and pearle, in which place the Emperor alighted from his horſe, and mounted upon the ſaid courſer, wherein he toke great delight, and toke him by with the ſpurs luſilie, and ſo departed ſonnelie from Calcis, and rode to Grauelin. The king remayned at Calcis ſome few dayes, and then tooke ſhipping with the Quene and Nobility, and had ſaile winde to Dover, where hee arrived the ſame night with all his companie in ſafetie.

This yere H. kept his Chriſtmas at his manor of Greenwich, with great ſtialty and open court, & on the 10. of February in his own perſon taſted with all commers.

gaint incloſed

About this time the king being moved by ſach of his counſell as had regard to the common wealch of this realme, conſidering howe for the ſpace of ſixtie yeres paſt and moze, the nobles and gentlemen of England, being given to praſing of cattell, and keeping of ſhepe, to the great decaye of huſbandrie and tillage, furniſhing the ground with beaſts, ſheep and deer, ſo incloſing the fields with hedges, pales, and ditches, as might ſtand moſt to their own privat commodity: Wherefore the king cauſing ſuch good ſtatutes as had bene deuiled and eſtabliſhed for reformation in this behalfe, to be reuiſed and called vpon, and alſo directing forth his commiſſion unto Juſtices of peace, and other ſuch magiſtrates, that preſentment ſhould be made of all ſuch incloſures, and decay of huſbandrie as had chanced within the ſpace of 50. yeres beſore that preſent time. The Juſtices and other magiſtrates, according to their commiſſion executed their authority: and ſo commandement was given, that the decayed houſes ſhould be built againe, that the huſbandmen ſhould be placed elſewhere in the ſame, and that incloſed grounds ſhould be laiſe open, & ſore puniſhment appointed againſt them that diſobeyed.

D. of Bucking-
and arreſted.

In this meane time Edward Duke of Buckingham was accuſed of high treaſon, wherefore the king directed his letters to the ſaid duke, being at his manor of Eghornebury in Glouceſterſhire, that incontinently he ſhould come to his preſence, which commandement the duke obeyed, and came to London, where he was ſtraightwaies arreſted by ſir Henry Marney captain of the gard, and conueied to the toſſer of London on the 16. of Aprill: before which time ſir Gilbert Parke the dukes Chancelor was taken, which had confeſſed matter of high treaſon concerning the kings perſon. There was alſo attached one Nic. Hopkins a monke of the order of Carthuſians, being of Henton priory in Sommeſetſhire, & 1. de la Court the dukes confeſſor, and other, theſe were priſoners in the Tower.

Am. reg. 13. After the apprehenſion of the D. Inquiſitions were taken in diuers ſhires of him, ſo that by the knights and gentlemen he was indicted of high treaſon for certaine wordes ſpoken by the ſaide duke at Blechingley in Surrey, to George Nevill

Nevill L. Burgauney, and there with was the ſame lord attached for concealement, and ſo he and wife was the L. Montague, and both conueied to the Tower: and ſir Edward Nevill brother to the ſaide L. of Burgauney was forbidden the kings preſence.

Moreouer, in the Guild hall of London, before ſir John Brige knight then ſpeaker of the ſame Citie, by an inqueſt, the ſaide duke was indicted of diuers points of high treaſon, as by the ſame indictment (which I haue ſeen and read) it appeareth, inferring, that the ſaide duke intending to craill himſelfe, and to ſurpe the Crowne, the roiall power, and dignitie of the realme of England, and to deprive the king thereof, that hee the ſaide duke might take vpon him the ſame againſt his allegiance, had the tenth day of March, in the ſecond yere of the kings raigne, and at diuers times beſore, and after, imagined and com- paſſed the kings death and deſtruction at London, and at Eghornebury in the countie of Glouceſter: and for the accompliſhment of the wicked intent and purpoſe, the 24. of Aprill, in the 4. yere of the kings raigne, he ſent one of his chaplaines called John de la Court vnto the priory of Henton in Sommeſetſhire, which was an houſe of Carthuſian monkes, there to vnderſtande of one Nich. Hopkins, a monke of the ſame houſe (who was bachelier reputed by way of reuelation to haue ſoreknowledge of things to come) what ſhould happen concerning this matter, which he had imagined: which monke, cauſing the ſayd de la Court firſt to ſwear vnto him, not to diſcloſe his wordes to any manner of perſon, but only to the duke his maſter, therewith declared that his ſp. the ſaide duke ſhould haue all, willing him for the accompliſhment of his purpoſe to ſeke to win the fauor of the people. De la Court came back with this anſwere, and told it to the duke at Eghornebury the morrowe after, being 25. of Aprill. And on the 22. of July the ſame fourth yere, the duke ſent the ſame de la Court with letters vnto the ſayde monke, to vnderſtand of him further of ſach matters, and the monke tolde to him agayne for anſwere, that the duke ſhould haue all: and being asked as wel now as beſore, at the firſt time, howe he knew this to be true, he ſaid, by the grace of God, and with this anſwere de la Court now alſo returning declared the ſame vnto the D. on the 24. of July at Eghornebury aſoreſaid. Moreouer, the ſaid duke ſent the ſame de la Court agayne vnto the ſaide monke with his letters the 26. of Aprill, in the 5. yere of the kings raigne, when the king was to take his iourney into France, requiring to vnderſtand what ſhould become of theſe warres, and whether the Scottiſh king ſhould in the kings abſence invade this realme or not. The monke among other things, for anſwere of theſe letters, ſent the duke word that the king ſhould haue no iſſue male. Again the ſaid duke the 20. day of Feb. in the 6. yere of the kings raigne, being at Eghornebury, ſpake theſe wordes vnto Ralph Carle of Chicheſterland: Well, there are two dukes created in Englande, but if ought but god come to the king, the duke of Buckingham ſhould be next in blood to ſucceede to the Crowne. After this the ſaid duke on the 16. day of Aprill, in the ſaid firſt yere of the kings raigne, went in perſon vnto the priory of Henton, and there hadde conference with the ſoreſayde monke Nicholas Hopkins, who tolde him, that he ſhould be king: wherevnto the duke ſaid, that if it chanced

he woulde shew himselfe a iust and right wise prince. The monke also tolde the Duke, that he knew this by relation, and willed him in any wise to procure the loue of the Commons, the better to attayne his purposed intention. The Duke the same time gaue, and promised to giue pærelle vnto the sayde ppylorie five pounde, the twelfth to buy a tunne of wyne: and further promised to giue vnto the sayde ppylorie in ready money twentie pounde, whereof tenne pounde he gaue in hand, towards the conuysing of waier vnto the house by a conduit. And to the sayde monke Nicholas Hopkins, he gaue at that present in rewarde thre pounde, and at one other time fo; the shillings, and at another time a marke, and at another time for shillings and right pence. After this, on the twentieth daie of March, in the tenth yere of the kings raigne, he came to the same ppylorie, and ellsones had conference with the sayd monke, to be more fully informed by him in the matters aboue specified, at what time the monke also told him, that he should be king, and the Duke in talke tolde the monke, that he had done verie well to binde his chaplaine Iohn de la Court, vnder the seale of confession, to keepe secret such matters, fo; if the king should come to the knowledge thereof, it would be his destruction. Likewise, the twentieth daie of October, in the seventh yere of the kings raigne, and at diuers other times, as well before as after, the sayde Duke hadde sent his Chancellor, Robert Gilbert, chaplaine vnto London, there to buye certayn clothes of gold, siluer, and beluets, euery time so much as amounted to the value of thre hundred pounde, to the intent, that the sayde duke might bestow the same, as well vpon knightes, esquires, and gentlemen of the kings house, and premon of his gard, as vpon other the kings subiectes, to win their fauours and friendships to assist him in his euill purpose: which clothes the sayde Gilbert did buye, and brought the same to the sayd duke, vpon the 20. day of January, in the said seventh yere, and diuers other daies and yeres before and after, did distribute, and giue the same to certayn of the kings subiectes, for the purpose before recited. Further more, the sayde Duke the tenth of Iulie, in the tenth yere of the kings raigne, and diuers other daies and times, as well before as after, did constitute more generall and particular offices in his castles, honours, lordships and landes than he was accustomed to haue, to the end they might be assistant to him vnder colour of offices, to bying his euill purpose to passe. Moreover, the same duke sent to the king the tenth daie of May, in the ninth yere of his raigne, for licence to retaine any of the kings subiectes, whom it should please him, dwelling within the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, and Somersetshire: and also, that hee might at his pleasure conueie diuers armours, and habiliments for warre into Wales, to the intent to vie the same against the king, fo; the accomplishment of his naughty purpose, which was to deuoie the king, and to vsurpe the Royall gouernement and power to himselfe: which suite for licence to haue Retainers, and to conueie such armours and habiliments of Warre, the sayde Gilbert the twentieth daie of May, in the said ninth yere, and diuers other daies before and after at London, and East Grenewich did followe, laboring earnestlie, both to the king and counsell, for obtaining of the same. And the twentieth day of Iuly, in the said ninth yere,

the sayde Duke sent the sayde Gilbert vnto Hertford aforesayde, to vnderstand of the aforesayde Monke Nicholas Hopkins what hee hearde of him: and the Monke sent him word, that before Christmas next there should be a change, and that the Duke should haue the rule and gouernement of all Englande. And moreover, the twentieth daie of February, in the eleventh yere of the kings raigne, at Blechinglie in Surrey, the sayde duke sayd vnto the sayd Robert Gilbert his Chancellor, that hee did expect and tarrie for a time more conuenient to achieve his purpose, and that it might easilie be doone, if the nobles of the realme would declare their mindes together: but some of the mistrasted and feared to helpe their mindes together, and that marred all. He said further the same time vnto the sayde Robert Gilbert, that what soeuer was doone by the kings father, was doone by wrong: and still the duke murmured against all that the king then presentlie raygning did. And further he sayde, that hee knewe himselfe to bee so wicked a sinner, that hee wanted Gods fauour, and therefore hee knewe, that what soeuer hee tooke in hand against the king, had the worse successe. And further more, the sayde duke (to alienate the kings subiectes mindes from duefull obedience, towards him and his heires, the twentieth daie of September, in the first yere of his raigne) being then at London, reported to Robert Gilbert, that he hadde a certayne writing, sealed with the kings great seale, comprehending a certayn act of parliament, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Somerset, one of the kings progenitors was made legitimate. And further, that the sayde duke meant to haue deliuered the same writing vnto king Henry the 7. but (said he) I would not that I had so doone for tenne thousand pounde. And furthermore, the same duke the fourth daie of November, in the eleventh yere of the kings raigne, at East Grenewich in the Countie of Kent, sayde vnto one Charles Kneuer esquire, after that the king had reproued the duke for retaining William Bulmer knight into his seruaice, that if he had perceiued that he should haue bene committed to the tower, as he doubted he should haue bene, hee would haue so wrought, that the principall doers therein should not haue had cause of great reioycing, fo; he would haue played the part, which his father intended to haue put in practice against Ric. the 3. at Salisburie, who made earnest suite to haue come to the presence of the same king Ric. which suite if he might haue obtained, hee having a knife secretlie about him, would haue thrust it into the body of king Ric. as he had made semblance to knaue doone before him: and in speaking these words, he maliciously laid his hand vpon his dagger, and said, that if hee were so euill bled, he would do his best to accomplish his pretended purpose, swearing to confirm his word, by the blood of our Lord.

And beside all this the same Duke the 10. of May, in the 12. yere of the kings raigne at London, in a place called the Rose, within the parish of S. Laurence Poultrey in Cantwellstreet ward, demanded of the said Charles Kneuer esquire what was the talke amongst the Londoners, concerning the kings towne be- yond the seas: and the sayde Charles tolde him, that many stood in doubt of the journey, least the Frenchmen meant some deceit towards the king: whereunto

the D. answered, it was to be feared least it would come to passe, according to the wordes of an holie monk, for there is (saith hee) a certaine Charter holie monk, that diuers times hath sent to mee, willing me to sende vnto him my chancelor, and I did send vnto him Iohn de la Court my chaplain, vnto whom he would not declare any thing, till de la Court had sworne vnto him to keepe all things secret, and to tell to no creature liuing what he should heare of him, except it were to mee, and the said monk tolde to de la Court, that neither the king nor his betres should prosper, and that I should inendeor my selfe to purchase the god wills of the commonalty of England, for I (the same duke) and my blood should prosper and haue the rule of the realme of England. Then said Charles Kneuet, the monk may be deceived through illusion of the deuill, and that it was euill to meddle with such matters, well said the D. it cannot hurt me, and so the D. seemed to reioice in the monks wordes. And further, the same time the D. tolde the said Charles, that if the king had miscaried now in his last sickness, he would haue chopped off the heads of the cardinall, of Sir Tho. Louell knight, and of others: and also said, that he had rather die for it, than to be so siled as he had bene. Moreover, the 10. day of September in the said 11. yere of this R. reign, at Wicheingly in the countie of Surrey, walking in the gallery there with George Neuell knight, lord of Burgauey, the D. murmuring against the kings counsellors, and their gouernment, said vnto the said George, that if the R. died, he would haue the rule of the realme in spite of whoeuer said the contrary, & withall said, that if the said L. of Burgauey would say, that the D. had spoken such wordes he would fight with him, & lay his sword vpon his pate, and this he bound with many great othes. These were the points and articles compelsed in the indictment, and laid to his charge, wherof he was by the inquest found guilty.

D. of Buckingham arraigned,

On the 13. of May, the said D. was brought from the towre by water vnto Westminster hall, before the D. of Norfolk high steward of England, to accomplish the high of appeale of the peer 2: peers of the realme, and to discern and iudge the cause of the peer 2: peers. There were also appointed to sit as peers and iudges vpon the D. of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dowset, the earles of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford, Darby, the lords of S. Johns, de la Ware, Fitz Warren, Willoughby, Brooke, Cobham, Herbert and Morley. There was made within the Hall at Westminster a scaffold for these lords, and a presence for the Iudge, raised, and counterlaid about, and barred with begges. When the lords had taken their place, the D. was brought to the bar, and vpon his arraignment pleaded not guilty, and put himselfe vpon his peer 2: peers. When was the indictment read, which the D. denied to be true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alledged reasons to falsifie the indictment, berie pitifully. The kings attorney against the dukes reasons, alledged the examinations, confessions, and proofes of witnesses. The duke desired the witnesses might be brought forth: and then came before him Charles Kneuet, Sir Gilbert Perke his chancelor, Iohn de la Court his confessor, and Nicholas Hopkins the monk of Winton that had fed his humour with vaine speeches: others presumptions & accusations were laid to him by Charles Kneuet, which he would haue couered. But the depositions being read, and the deponents delivered prisoners to the officers of the towre. Finally, he was found guilty by his peer 2: peers, and hauing iudgment to suffer as in case of treason is vsed, was led again to his barge, and so conueyed by water to the Temple staires, where he was set a land, and from thence by land through London to the towre with the are afore him, Sir W. Sands hauing him by the right arme, and Sir Nich. Vaux by the left arme. And on the 17. of May, being the Friday before Whit Sunday, he was deliuered to the shirifs of London, who led him to the scaffold on the towre hill, about 11. of the clocke, and there he was beheaded, in the presence of Sir Th. Louell and all the people. his body with the head was born by the sisters Augustine to their church, and there buried in the Chappell Church for the close. And now followeth the publication at the disgrading of the said Edw. late D. of Buckingham knight and companion of the most noble order of S. George, named the Garter, which was read and published by Garter king at Armes, at the feast of S. George in the quire of Windsoze Colledge, standing on the high pale at the dore, all the other officers of armes about him, there being also present the L. marques Dowset knight of the same order, then being the kings deputy for the feast, the earle of Essex, the earle of Wiltshire, the earle of Kent, Sir Th. Louell, and the L. le Ware, knights of the said order, with other great audience assembled there on the 8. of June, the 13. yere of Henry the 8. the yere of Christ 1521.

D. of Buckingham beheaded.

D. of Buckingham disgraded.

We it knowe vnto all men, that whereas Edward late Duke of Buckingham knight, and companion of the noble order of Saint George, named the Garter, hath latelie done and committed high treason against the king our soueraigne lord, and soueraigne of the said order of the garter, in compassing and imagining the destruction of the most noble person of our said soueraigne lord the king, contrarie to his othe and due allegiance, and for the which high treason the said Edward hath bene indicted, arraigned, conuicted, and alainted, and for the which detestable offence and high treason, the said Edward hath deserued to be disgraded of the said noble order, and expelled out of the said company, and not worthy that his armes, ensignes, and hachmentes should remaine among other the noble ensignes of other noble, vertuous, and approued knights of the said noble order, nor haue the benefits of the said noble order: therefore our said soueraigne lord the king, soueraigne of the said noble order of Saint George named the Garter, by the aduise of the other knightes of the said noble order, for his said offences, and committing of the said high treason, willet and commandeth that the said Edward duke of Buckingham to bee disgraded of the said noble order, and his armes, ensignes, and hachmentes clarelie expelled, and put from among the armes, ensignes, and hachmentes of the other noble knightes of the said order, to the intent, that all other noble men thereby male take ensample hereafter, not to commit any such heinous and detestable treason and offences, as God for his they should:

God saue the King.

It is to bee remembred, that Sommer set Herault was in the rode lost behind the hachmentes of the said duke Edward: and when Garter spake these wordes, woozes, expelled and put from the armes, then the said Somerset violently cast downe into the quire, his creast, his banner, and sword. And when the publication was all done, the officers of armes, spurned the said hachment with their fete, out of the quire into the body of the church, first the sword, & then the banner, and then was the creast spurned out of the said quire through the Church out at the west doore, and so to the bydge, where it was spurned over into the ditch. And thus was the said Edward late duke of Buckingham fully disgraced of the order of Saint George named the Garter.

The duke of Buckingham had begun a great and sumptuous building of his manor of Thorneburie, but left the same unfinished. The foundation of a very spacious base court was there begun, and certaine gates and towers in it cast like. It was of a fowre or five yardes high, and so remained, a token of a noble piece of worke purposed. He made a faire parke hard by the castle, and took much faire ground into it very fruitful of coine, now faire lands for, treading. The inhabitants cursed the Duke those lands so inclosed. There was afore Duke Edwards time a parke at east Wotton, a mile or more off: but Duke Edward at two times enlarged it to the compasse of five miles, not without many curses of the poore tenants.

In this meane while were the Emperour and the French king fallen at variance, so that the warre was renewed betwixt them. For the pacifying whereof Cardinal Wolsey, with the bishops of Ely and Durham were sent over, there went with them the earle of Worcester the lord chamberlaine, the lords S. Iohn, Ferrers and Herbert, the primate of Armacane, sir Th. Bolleigne, sir John Pechy, sir John Husley, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Henry Gildford, and many other knights, esquires, and gentlemen, the se arrived at Calais on the second of August.

The same day came to Calais ambassadors from the emperour: and on the 4. of August came the chancelor of France, and the count de Pallace with 400. horse, by which meanes there met at Calais the lords of England (before named) of Burgoigne, Spaine, Flanders, and France, with the popes nuncio, to make peace betwixt the Emperour and the French king. Cardinal Wolsey would have furthered a league betwixt the emperour, the King of England, the King of France, and the Pope, but the Popes ambassador wanted commission thereto, and therefore were letters sent to Rome, and the French men remained still at Calais till answer came from thence.

The Cardinal Wolsey on the twelfth daie of August rode into Flanders, to speake with the Emperour, which as then laie in Burges: a mile without Burges the Emperour received him, and bid to him as much honor as could be desired: the cheare was great which was made to the English men, and of everie thing there was such plentie, that there was no want of things necessary. The Cardinal, after he had sojourned in Burges by the space of 13. daies, and concluded divers matters with the Emperour, and accomplished his commission, he took leave of the Emperour, and the nine and twentieth day of August returned to Calais, where the ambassadors of France started his coming.

Lij

The first of September the Cardinall Chancelor of England, the Chancelor of France, and the Chancelor of Burgoigne rode from Staple unto their lady church in Calais. The fourth of September the regent of Naples came to Calais, to the great council there: and the 27. of September the Chancelor of Hungarie came to the same council, but in fine nothing was concluded, but only that the shermen of both princes might freely fish in the seas without disturbance, till the second day of February next. Thus, when no conclusion of agreement could be accorded, the cardinall sent to the Emperour the lords of S. Iohns, and sir T. Bolleigne knight, to aduertise him what was done.

During the continuance of the Cardinall at Calais, all writs and patents were there by him sealed, and no sheriffes of shire chosen for lacke of his presence, having there with him the great seale, and full power in things, as if the king had bene there in person. After the returne of the English ambassadors from the Emperour and French king, the cardinall returned into England about the latter end of November, he landed at Calais, and from thence took his journey to Blethingley, where the king welcomed him, and gave him thanks for his great paines.

King Henry wrote a booke against Luther in Germany, and therefore the Pope Leo the tenth, named him Defender of the faith. To the which booke Luther answered verie sharply, nothing sparing his authoritie or maiestie.

Pope Leo died this yere, whereupon Doctor Pace Deane of Pauls was sent to Rome to make friends in the behalfe of Cardinal Wolsey, who was brought into a bad hope, through the kings favour and furtherance, to be elected Pope: but Adrian the first was chosen before doctor Pace could come to Rome, and so that suite was dashed. This Pace was a right worthe man, and one that gave in counsell faithfull advice, learned he was also and endowed with manie excellent good gifts of nature, courteous, pleasant, and delighting in mucke, highlie in the kings favour, and well heard in matters of weight.

This yere was a great death in London and other places of the Realme: manie men of honor and great worship died, and amongst other doctor Fitz James bishop of London, in whose place was elected doctor Tunstall. Also a great death in London and other places, for wheate was sold for twenty shillings the quarter.

The earle of Surrey returned out of Ireland, and came to the court on the 25. of January. Many complaints to the king were made by the merchants of the Frenchmen which spoiled them by sea of their goods, for by reason the seas were open betwixt the emperour and the French king, many ships of war were abroad on both parts, and now and then the English men fell into their hands, and were used as enemies, namely by the French men, whereof the French ambassadors promised restitution, but little was recovered. In the month of Januarie therefore, the king commanded all his ships to be rigged and made ready, which was done with all diligence.

In this meane time grudges and displeasures still grew and increased: the twene the king of England and the french king, till at length, the duke of Albany returned into Scotland, contrarie to that which was covenanted by the league. The french king alledged, that he was not prite to his going thither, and wrote to the king, that the said duke was entred Scotland with out his assent. Hereupon the king sent fir ships to the sea well appointed, the admiral wherof was Christopher Coo, an expert sea man, his commission was to safeguard the merchants, and other the kings subjects that were in danger to be grievously spoiled and robbed on the sea by the frenchmen, Scots, and other rangers.

The 8 of febr. the lord Dacres warden of the marches, fore-aneest Scotland entred into Scotland, with 500. men, by the kings commandeiment, and there proclaimed that the Scots should come into the kings peace by the first of March following, or else to stand at their perils: the D. of Albany being then within five miles with a mighty power of Scots.

The eleuenth of february, the lord Burgaweny was brought from the tower to Westminster, and there in the kings bench confessed his indictment of mispicion.

The 11. Montague was about the same time ressojed to the kings favor.

This yere died the lord Brooke, sir Edward Poyneys knight of the gartar, sir John Pechy, and sir Edward Belknappe, valiant capitaines.

A Scottish roner called Duncan Camell, after long fight was taken on the sea by John Arundell esquire of Cornwall, who presented him to the king, and he committed him to the tower, where he remained a long season.

The 6. of March, the french k. commanded all Englishmens goods being in Bourdeaux to be attached, and put under arrest, and retained not onely the money due to be payde, for the restitution of Tourney, but also witheld the french Quenes dowry. The french ambassado: therefore was called afore the councill, and the cardinall laid fore to his charge, that contrary to his promise at all times made on the french kings behalfe, affirming, that he meant nothing but peace and amitte to be observed in all points with the k. of England, yet now the English merchants had not onely their goods staied at Bourdeaux, but also they and their factors were laide in prison in full breach of all peace and amitie afore time concluded. The ambassado: as well as he coulde excused his master, but in the end he was commanded to kepe his house, and the french hostages that were appointed here to remaine for the money to be paid for the delivry of Tourney, were committed to safe keeping: wherewith also all the frenchmen in London were arrested, committed to prison, and put to their fines: but they were after ten daies set at libertie, upon finding sureties to appeare before the maior, or else afore the councill at a certain day, and to pay the fine upon them assessed, which fine the king pardoned to diuers of the poorer sort.

This yere betwene Casser and Spichardmas was made a generall proscription of all the realme of England by taking of musters and otherwise in every countrey, as may appeare by the charge sent to a chiefe Constable.

Sergeant at the law, and John Tirrell esquire, commissioners assigned for our soveraigne lord the king, to the baillie and chiefe constable of the baillie hundred of Wilt. greeting, where afore this we the said William, Richard, Robert and J. Tirrell, by our late precept to you directed, charged you the high constables of the same hundred, to give monition and charge to all constables of everehamlet parish, and village within the said hundred, personally to appeare afore us the said commissioners on monday next coming, the last day of the moneth of March at Waltham holy crosse, and there to bring with them a certificate in writing of the names of all manner of men above the age of 16. yeres, dwelling within every towne, hamlet and village within the said hundred, and to do further as by the same precept more plainly doth appeare. We now exsiones in the behalfe of the king our soveraigne lord, will and command you, that you duly execute the said precept: and also that ye give knowledge, warning, and commandeiment to all manner of temporall men dwelling, inhabiting, or abiding within any towne, hamlet, parish, or village, within the same baillie hundred, personally to appeare before us the kings said commissioners at Waltham holie crosse afore said, the said monday next coming, furnished and appareled in their best arrap for the warre, that is to say, with bowes, arrowes, bills, harness, or any other weapons, artillery, or harness for the war, which they or any of them have within the townes and hamlets of the said hundred and every of them. And that they also the said last day of this present moneth of March do certifie us in writing at Waltham holy crosse afore said, of all their names, and to whom they belong unto. Also who is lord of every towne or hamlet within the said hundred, and who be stewards. Item, who be parsons of the same townes, and what the benefices be worth by yere. Also who be owners of every parcell of land within any towne, hamlet, parish, or village, within the said hundred, with the verely value of every mans land within the same townes, hamlets, parishes, and villages. And of every stocke and flockes of cattell, or other things that be occupied upon any farme within the said townes, hamlets, and parishes, and who be owners of them. Also what allants or strangers dwell in any towne, hamlet, or parish within the said hundred, and where they were borne, and under whose dominion. Item, what occupation, myserie, or subsistence they be of. Item, the value and substance of every person being of 16. yeres and above, dwelling within your saide hundred, hamlets, and parishes, as well spirituall as temporall. Also what pensions goeth out of any lands there to any religious or spirituall men, and that ye faile not this to doe, as ye tender the kings pleasure, and will anoid the contrarie. At Wentwood, the 27. day of March in the 13. yere of the reign of king Henry the eight.

There were sent to the sea under the conduct of sir William Fitz Williams viceadmirall 28. great ships well manned and furnished for the wars, and 7. other ships were sent toward Scotland, which entred the fouth, and preferred to enter the Scottish ships that lay in the hauens, but the Scots ranne their ships aland, and the English men followed with boates, landes, and set the ships on fire, and at Lythe take certaine prisoners, which they brought into

England:

England: and till the kings great naue kept the narrow seas: for then was neither peace betwixt England and France, nor open warre.

The king understanding that the Emperour would come to Caleis, so to passe into England, as he went toward Spaine, appointed the lord marques Dosset to go ouer to Caleis, there to receiue him, and likewise the lord cardinal was appointed to receiue him at Douer.

The 20. day of May, cardinal Wolsey rode through the city of London toward Douer, there to meete & receiue the emperour, being accompanied with two earles, 36. knights, 100. gentlemen, eight bishops, ten abbots, thirte chaplaines, all in beluet and saddle, and seven hundred yeomen.

The Marques Dosset, with the Bishop of Chester, the lord de la Ware, and diuers other, at Chaerlein receiued the emperour in the name of the king of England on the firs and twentieth daie of May, and with all hono: brought him to Caleis, where he was receiued with procession, and by the lord Barnes lieutenant of the towne, by the Mayor and merchants of the Staple, in the best manner that might be deuised. On the six and twentieth he took ship at Caleis, and landed at Douer, where the Cardinal with a great number of lordes, knights, and gentlemen of England, was ready to receiue him, and with all the hono: that might be, brought him to the castle, where he was lodged.

On the 28. of May, the king came to Douer, and there with great ioy the emperour and he met, and saluted each other. On the thirtieth of May he rode from Douer to Canterbury, and so from thence by ealie iournies they came to Greenwich, where the Queene receiued her nephew with all the ioy that might be. On the first of June, the king and emperour with all their companies marched towards London, where the citie was prepared for their entrie, after the manner as is vsed at a coronation, so that nothing was neglected that might set forth the hono: of the city, whereinto they were receiued by the mayor, aldermen, and commons: the crosse in Cheape was new gilt, and eleven pageants were deuised on stages very faire and excellent to behold. The emperour was lodged at the Blache friers, and all his nobles in the new builded house of Whitehall.

On Whituesday the eight of June the emperour and the king rode to the cathedrall church of S. Paul, and there heard masse, which was song by the cardinal. The emperour rode to diuers places, being feasted by the king, at Windsor they tarried a whole weeke, where on Corpus Christi day the emperour wore his mantle of the garter, and sate in his hall. The same day both the princes receiued the sacrament, and took their corporall othes to keepe and obserue the league concluded betwixt them. On the morrow after they departed from Windsor, and came to Winchester on the 22. of June.

The first of July, the emperours naue came before Hampton, containing 80. galleys ships. Then the Emperour took leave of the king, of whom he had many gifts and summes of money by waie of loan, and so the first of July he took ship, and made saile towards Spaine, where he arrived in safetie the tenth daie after.

During this time, the earle of Surrey lord admirall, bent spoiles in Britaine, and then returned: not long after, he passed ouer to Caleis, entered Picardie, and bent diuers towne and castles. He besieged Hesding, but because winter was neer, he raised his siege, and returned.

The D. of Albany in Scotland began to enter this land with a great army, but hearing that the earle of Shrewsbury was coming he took a truce for six monethes.

In the beginning of this yere, Sultan Soliman Pac, called the great Turke, which was the 8. of the line of Ottoman the first that took upon him to be great capitaine or ruler, and to whome Sultan Solime his father had left the empires of Constantinople, Trapesond, Alexandry, and Babylon, with manie diuers kingdoms & realmes, which Sultan Soliman y<sup>e</sup> y<sup>e</sup>er before had gotten y<sup>e</sup> town of Belgrado, being the keie of Hungary, because he saw all the places in Christendome now at discorde, thought it most for his hono: and profit to make war on the Isle of the Rhodes, and to take the same: which Isle had been kept by the space of 224. yeres, by the brethren or knights of the order of S. Iohn of Ierusalem. Diuers things moued him to take this enterpryse, one was because this Isle stood so, that the religious of the same oftentimes tooke and destroyed his shippes as they came with golde, and other riches from Egypt, Saire, and other east parts to Constantinople, so that by them of that Isle he suffered more hurt than by all Christendome, because the sayde Isle stood in the very entrie toward Constantinople. Another motion was, because his father when he dyed, charged him to assay to take the Rhodes, for to be requenged of the shame that they had done to his grandfather Mahomet the greates Turke, which was with dishonour beaten from the siege of the Rhodes. But the greatest occasion of all was the exhortation of a great Counsellor of the Religion called Andrew Amirall boine in Portugale, which knewe the whole estate, and in what case the Towne stood in. The cause why this Andrew Amirall bare malice to his religion was, because after the death of Brother Fabrica de Iaxento lord master of their religion, hee was not elected to that hono:, but one Philip de Villiers de Lile Adame of France was named to bee lord master, wherefore the sayde Andrew prouoked the Turke to come to the Rhodes.

The great Turke seeing so great an occasion offered, and desiring hono:, and also knowing the fortresse of the Rhodes to lacke munitions, for the brethren of the order were both of such wealth and pryce, and also of such wicked life that they took no heed of their owne and solemne profession, nor for the thing to come, and so their towne unfurnished was some surprised. He said Turke provided for 300. saile, in the which he conueyed all his artillery, and other things necessarie. In the which army were 60000. miners and pioners prepared to dig and undermine, the rest of the army came by land to a place called Fisco, which standeth so directlie against the Rhodes, that a fire made bee to one from the one side to the other: from the which place the Turke sent letters to the aboue named Philip de Villiers lord master of the religion, signifying to him, that he would haue the sayde Isle, for the great damage that they had done to him and his people: and if they would yield to him the said Ile, he promised on his faith, and by Mahomet his first prophet, they should haue no damage nor hurt by him, and that they that would depart should go in safetie, and they that would tarry and serue him, should haue good wages: and if they refused this to doe, he swore that he would subuert the wals of their fortreffe, and destroy them all, and make them slaues, which letter was dated at Constantinople, the first day of June.

The said lord master and his companie were greatly abashed of this letter, but yet like hardie gentlemen they intended to defend them, and made all the preparations that they could doe in so short space, and wrote to all Princes Christian of their distresse. But the Turke knowing the great diuision amongst the christian princes, so that they could send no succour to the Rhodians, sent 200000. Turkes, which arrived in the Ile of the Rhodians on Epiphonie day, which was the festival day of the Rhodians in hono<sup>r</sup> of S. Iohn Baptist, which sudden comming soe abashed the Rhodians, being but 600. knights, & 5000. other men to beare armes: yet of noble courage and trusting in God, they determined to defend themselves against the enemies of God. And on the 28 of July the Turke arrived there in his owne person, which much encouraged his people: he bent his ordinance toward the towne, but did no great harme, wherefore he caused all his pioners to cast earth one banke over another till till they came within a bow shot of the wals: and although that many of the pioners were slaine with ordinance of the towne, they neuer ceased till they had made a banke of earth higher by ten fote than the wall of the towne, and laid there their ordinance, so that no person durst stir on the wals or bulwarke. Thus with mounts of earth was the towne enuironed, and behind the mountaines lay the Balheur and other slaines of the Turke, which were euer ready to take their advantage, and daily they shot into the towne, and beat downe houses and slew the people in the streets, for they upon the mount might easily see into the towne: besides this, the Turke caused so many mines to be made in diuers places, that they within were not able to make countermines for lacke of people, in so much as women were set a worke, to dig and carry by reason whereof a great part of the wals were overthrowen, and if they within had not made countermines, the towne had been gotten within a short space. Also the Turke in the moneth of September gave to the Rhodians 4. great assaults, but the Christians so valiantly defended them, that at every assault they lost ten thousand Turkes and more.

The great Turke seeing the losse of his men at the assaults, sent for Mollah Balhaw, and much blamed him, that he had persuaded him that he might haue taken the towne in 12. daies, or in a moneth at the most; wherefore in his secret he would haue put him to death: but in conclusion the Turke determined clearly to raise his siege, and to depart, and so had done, if that same night Sir Andrew Amirall, and a fewe within the Rhodians had not written letters, and shot them out on quarels into the Turkes army: by which letters the Turke knewe the necessitie of the towne, and febleness of the people, which caused him to change his purpose: but this treason was spied, the traitors taken, and put put to terrible execution. The Turke caused so many mines to be made, that both bulwarke, wals, and towers were overthrowen. And so on S. Andrewes euen he caused a great assault to be given: but yet the Christians so valiantly defended themselves, that they slew 3000. Turkes, and kept them from entering that day: but the citizens of the Rhodians after this assault came to the lord master, and praised him to haue compassion on them, the lord master comforted them with faire wordes: but by chance about the same time the great Turke sent a letter into the Rhodians, willing them to deliuer the towne, and they all should haue their liues and goods, and they that would tarry should remaine quiet. This letter being knowne, the people cried out on the lord master to take the offer, wherefore calling all his counsell, for diuers waies amongst them, they sent to the Turke two of the religion, for the assurance of his promise, who were well entertained, and had writings sealed of all things that they desired. To the which two knights, Aymeck Balshaw Sware, that there were slain at that siege 64000. Turkes, and 40000. head of mortallitie & more. And on Christmas day, the great Turke himselfe entered into the Rhodians, and took possession thereof, and the lord master & all his religion, the first day of January took ship, and sailed to Candy, and so to Rome, and there declared his chance and aduenture. Thus was the towne and the Ile of the Rhodians taken by the great Turke, which was a great succour to all Christian men resisting to the east parts of the world, which chance was much lamented (but to late) throughout all Christendome, and much blame put in princes, because they sent no succour to them of the Ile.

The 20. of February, the lady Alice Hungerford a knights wife, for murdering her husband, was led from the tower of London to Holborne, & there put in a cart with one of her seruants, and so carried to Tiborne, and both hanged: she was buried in the Gray Friers church at London.

Thomas Howard earle of Surrey burned 37. villages in London, disposed the countrey from the east marches to the west, and overthrowe diuers holdes.

Thomas Ruthall Bishop of Durham being deceased, the king gave that bishopricke unto cardinall Wolsey, who resigned the bishopricke of Bath to doo; John Clarke master of the Rolles. And Sir Henry Marney that was vice-chamberlaine, was made lord priuie seale, and shortly after he was created baron Marney at Richmond.

Dodo; Blyth Bishop of Thesler was attached for treason, but he acquitted himselfe.

The 15. of Aprill began a parliament at the Blacke stiers in London, and that day the king came into the Parliament chamber, and there sate in the state roiall, and at his sate on the right side sate the cardinall of Poyle, and the archbishop of Canterbury: and at the table behind stood doo; the archbishop of London, which made to the whole parliament an eloquent oration, declaring the office of a king. First he must be a man of iudgement, according to the saying of the Prophet David, Dens iudicium in regibus, &c. Also he must be a man of great learning, according to the saying of the prophet, Erudimini.

qui indicat terram. According to which saying, he said that God had sent be a prince of great indgement, of great learning, and great experience, which according to his princely duty forgot not to study to set forwards all things, which might be profitable to his people and realme, lest might be laide to his charge the saying of Seneca, Es rex, & non habes tempus esse rex? Art thou a king, and hast no time to be a king? Which is as much to say, as Art thou a king, and dost nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king, and seest the people haue an insufficient laue? Art thou a king, and wilt not prouide remedie for the mischiefe of thy people? These things haue indeed caused the kings highnes to call this high court of parliament, both for remedie of mischiefs which be in the common law, as recoueries, forren bouders, and corrupt trials; and for making and ordering of new statutes, which may be to the high advancing of the common wealth: wherefore he willeth the commons to repaire to the common house, and there to elect them a speaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the lord Chancellor of the same, which should there of make report to the kings most noble grace, which should declare his pleasure when he would haue him presented before his person.

This was the cause of the parliament, he saide, but of these things no one word was spoken in the whole parliament, nor any good ad made, except the grant of a great subsidie. The commons chose for their speaker Sir Thomas Moore knight, and presented him the saturday after in the parliament chamber. Where he according to the usage, disabled himselfe, both in wit learning, and discretion, to speake before the king, and brought in for his purpose, how one Phormio desired Haniball to come to his reading, which thereto assented, and when Haniball was come, hee began to reade Dere militari, that is, of chualtrie: when Haniball perceiued him, he called him arrogant soile, because he would presume to teach him, which was master of chualtrie in the seats of warre: so the speaker saide, If he should speake before the king of learning, and ordering of the common wealth, and such other like, the king being so well learned, and of such prudence and experience, might say to him as Haniball to Phormio: wherefore he desired his grace that the commons might choose another speaker. The Cardinal answered, that the king knewe his wit, learning, and discretion by long experience in his service: wherefore he thought that the commons had chosen him as the most meetest man of all, and so he did admit him. Then Sir Thomas Moore gaue to the king his most humble thanks, and desired of him two petitions: the one, if he should be sent from the commons to the king on message, and misake their intent, that he might with the kings pleasure resort againe to the commons, for the knowledge of their true meaning. The other was, if in communication and reasoning, any man in the common house should speake more largely than of dutie they ought to doe, that all such offences should be pardoned, and that to be entred of record: which two petitions were granted, and thus began the parliament. And even as there was much ado amongst them of the common house, about their agreement to the subsidie then required, so was there as hard hold for a while amongst them of the cleargie in the conuocation house, namely, Richard Foxe bishop of Winchester, and John Fisher bishop of Rochester held soze against it, but most of all Sir Rowland Philips vicar of Crotondon, one of the canons of Pauls a famous and notable preacher in those daies, spake most against that payment. But the cardinal taking him aside, so perswaded the matter with him, that he came no more into the house, willing to absent himselfe, thus he giuing over his hold, the other yielded, and so was granted the halfe of all their reuenues spirituall for one yeere, to be paid in 5 yeeres following. Now on the 29 of Aprill, the cardinal accompanied with diuers lords, as well spirituall as temporall, came into the common house, where he eloquently declared to the commons, how Francis the French king the first called the most Christian king, had oftentimes broken promise with the king of England, and his nephew Charles the Emperour, that the king of his hono; could no longer suffer. For first he declared that the meeting of the said two princes at Calles, the said French king was sworne to keepe all the articles contained in the league, with the which time he hath made war on the emperours dominions, &c. he also hath withhelden his tribute, and other payments which he should pay to the R. of England, for redemption of Turney and Cartwine, &c. Wherefore the king of necessitie was driuen to warre, which in no case could be maintained without great summes of money, and he thought no lesse than 800000 pound, to be raised of the fifth part of euery mans goods and lands, that is to say, foure shillings of euery pound: for he saide that the yeere following, the king and the emperour should make such war in France as had not bene sene.

After that he had declared his matter at length, exhorting the commons to aide their prince in time of necessitie, hee departed out of the common house.

The morrow after, Sir Thomas Moore declared all the cardinals oration against to the commons, and enforced his demand, saying, that of battle men ought not to deny to pay foure shillings of the pound. But for all that it was denied, and proued manifestly, that if the fifth part of substance of the realme were but 800000, and if men should pay to the king the fifth part of their goods in money or plate, it was proued that there was not so much money out of the kings hands in all the realme, for the fifth part of euery mans goods is not in money nor plate: for although due men were well monied, due thousand were not so, the gentlemen of lands hath not the fifth part of the value in coine: the merchant that is rich in silke, wool, tinne, cloth, and such like, hath not the fifth part in money, &c. And then consequentlie, if all the money were brought to the kings hands, then men must barter cloth for victuall, and bread for chese, and so one thing for another. Then consider that after this valuation, the king hath had by the waie of loane two shillings of the pound, which is 400000 pound, and nowe to haue foure shillings of the pound, which amounteth in the whole to 12 hundred thousand pound, which first and last is five shillings of the pound, which is almost the third part of euery mans goods, which in coine cannot be had within the realme: for the proue thereof was alledged, that if there were in England but 15000 parishes, and euery parish

shoulde give 100. markes, that were but fifteen hundred thousand markes, which be ten hundred thousand pound: and how many parishes be in England one with another, able to spare a hundred markes, out of cities and townes: and where it is written, that in England there be forty thousand parish Churches, it was proued that there were not 13000. parishes. Then account, the whole summe cannot mount above ten hundred thousand pound, and the king demandeth 800000. and he after this valuation hath had 400000. pound, therefore it was thought the sum impossible to bee leas'd: and if all the coine were in the kings hand, howe shoulde men liue? Also the king had of the spiritual men the last yeere, foure shillings of the pound, &c. To conclude, after long debating, the Commons granted two shillings of the pound of currie mans goods and lands that were worth twentie pound, or might dispend 20. pounce by yeere, and so byward, and from forty shillings to twentie pounce, twelue pence of the pound, and vnder forty shillings of currie head sixteen pences and byward, foure pence to be payde in two pences. This Parliament the 21. of May was adioyned to Westminster among the blacke hounkes, and ended in the kings Palace at Westminster the 14. of August, at 9 of the clocke in the night.

Viscount Lisle created.

The 27. of Appill, was sir Arthur Plantagenet, a bastard son to king Edward the 4. at Wyke well created Viscount Lisle, in the right of his wife, which was sometime wife to Edm. Dudley beheaded, sir Mauris Barkley lieutenant of Calais was made L. Barkley, sir William Sands, L. Sands, and sir Nich. Vaux, Lord Vaux.

The R. and Q. of Denmark arrived in England.

Christerne R. of Denmarke and his Quene, arriving at the Downes before Dover the 15. of June, came to London on the 21. of June, and were lodged in the Bishop of Bathes place. The 5. of July, they returned againe to Calais.

D. of Suffolke entered France with a power.

In this season the king having put an army of men in readines, caused the same to be transported euer to Calais, & appointed the duke of Suffolke to haue the leading thereof, and to make a iorney into France. The duke according to his commission came to Calais on the 24. of August, and there abiding the army, caused all things to be prepared for the same, as victualles, munition, and such like. There were appointed to attend him in this iourney, the lord Mountacute, and his brother sir Arthur Poole, the lord Sands, the lord Barkley, the lord Powes, and the Baron of Curson, sir Richard Wingfield Chancelor; of the dutchie of Lancaster, sir John Vere, sir Edward Neull, sir William Kinghorne, sir Richard Westone, sir Andrew Windsor, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Anthony Wingfield, sir Edward Gilforde, sir Edward Grenile, sir Edward Chamberlaine, sir Thomas Lucy, sir Edward Digby, sir Adrian Fortescue, sir Richard Cornwall, sir William Courtney, sir William Sidney, sir Henry Owen, and manie other. The whole armie consisted in 600. Bimiliars, two hundred archers on horseback, 3000. archers on fote, and 5000. Billmen. To these also were adioyned 1700. taken out of the garrisons of James, Swines and Calais, so that in all they were 10500. well armed and appointed for the warre, besides 2600. laborers and pioners. These set out of Calais on the the 19. of September: The first enterprise that they attempted was the winning of Bell castle, which they beat downe, and sent the Frenchmen prisoners to Calais.

In this season was the duke of Borbon high constable of France, reuolued from the French king to the seruice of the emperor, and the king of England: for after it was knowne that this Duke hadde his minde alienated from the French king, sir John Russell (that was after earle of Bedford) was sent into France vnto the said Duke, which in disguised apparell ordered himselfe so wisely, that in covert manner hee came to the Duke, and so perswaded him, that hee continued in his former determination, and auoyded the Realme of France. The Duke of Suffolke remooued to Arde, and so into Picardis. At Corbie a Village betwene Turbion and Saint Omers, there came to him the Lord of Flession, and with him of Spantards, Almaines, Cleueners, and other, 3000. footemen, and 500. horsemen. The Duke being thus furnished with newe alde, marched forward, sending out diuers companies of his men to take townes, and fetch booties. The Frenchmen were so afrayd of the Englishmen, that they fled out of their houses, and left the Townes and Villages boyde. The Duke passed forth till he came to the Towne of Bray, in the which were 1600. men of warre, vnder the gouernance of Captayne Adrian.

The 20. of October the duke caused his ordinance to be brought afore it, the which is so well applid in making batterie to the walles of the Towne, that the Towne was made assaultable, and then the Englishmen and other made forward, got the ditches, and after entered vpon the Walles, and so into the towne, and so dauidelle the French men fled, and thus was gotten a Towne of Waie. The 21. of October, the army with their ordinance passed the River, and came to a Towne called Knap, all the inhabitants were fled, but they had left good plentie of wine behind them. The duke sent to them of Knap, requiring to haue the towne deliuered to him, which they granted to doe, because they had no garrison of souldiers to defende them: whither was sent sir Richard Cornwall, with 400. men, which receiued the town, and kept it in good quiet, till the duke came thither.

The 25. of October, the duke remooued to a Village called Lyphome, where the souldiers had greate pillage. The next day they went to Dauenhier, and the 27. they came before the towne of Spontendier, in the which were 1000. footemen, and 500. horsemen: but after sir William Scueington had made batterie foure houres, they without yielded the Towne vnto the Duke. The duke remained in Spontendier till the last of October, and then remooued to Knap, where on Albalowne daie the duke made knights, the Lord Herbert, the lord Powes, Oliver Manners, Arthur Poole, Richard Sands, Robert Ierningham, Robert Saliborton, Edmond Benningfield, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantill, George Warham, Edward Seymer. The next morrowe the Armie remooued to a place called Heale. The souldiers being thus ledde from place to place, beganne to grudge, because of the winter season.

D. of Suffolke maketh knights.

The 6. of November the whole army came to a village called Wean, & there rested that night, on the morrow they came to a place called Beusford: at this passage the Duke made 10 Dudley, and Rob. Vireight knights.

The 8. of November the duke removed to Mount St. Martine, and the army removed to Bermon, and there rested for a time. The Welchmen murmured that they might not return home: but there were to the number of 1000. persons under the leading of Sir John Walpole, which had little wages or none, and lived as adventurers, & therefore were so called, and of some called Brokers, these by spoiling of townes, taking of prisoners, and other such practices, daily brought to the campe daily horses, victuals, cloth, and other necessaries, which stood them in great stead.

The 13. of November the duke removed to a place within 2. miles of Bognham castle, there the Welchmen set out great shouts and cried: home, home, & as fast the Brokers cried: hang, hang, whereof great business was like to have ensued: the Frenchmen paid the castle of Bognham, and all the Artillerie, which was 76. pièces great and small. The duke brake up his army and returned, and left at Calencenus all the great ordinance, and returned into England the 30 day of December.

In December, at the city of Coventry, Francis Philip schoolmaster to the kings Wenmen, Christopher Pickering clerk to the kings larder, and Anthony Manuile gentleman, intended to have taken the kings treasure of his subsidies, as the collectors of the same came toward London, there with to have raised men, and to have taken the Castle of Billingswoorth, and then to have made battell against the king, for the which they were drawn, hanged, & quartered at Aborn the 11. of February: the other of their conspiracy were executed at Coventry.

The earle of Surrey burnt Jedburgh in Scotland, and took divers holds. The duke of Albany besieged the castle of Warke, and had in a readines a great army to invade England, but when hee heard the earle of Surrey was coming, he fled into Scotland.

The 25. of May, deceased Sir Thomas Louell knight of the Garter, at Endfield, and was buried at Halywell an house of Mans besides London, unto the which house he had been a great benefactor, not only in building of a beautiful chappell wherein his bodie was interred, but in many other goodlie buildings, and endowing the same with lands: And the same moneth deceased Thomas Loyde Howarde Duke of Norfolk, and was honourable buried at Lambeth.

The souldiers of Guines took a faire in the town of Worcester, and Sir Rob. Iernegan with certain disdillances of Calais, took divers French prisoners.

The first of September, docto; Thomas Hannibal master of the rols, was received into London as ambassado; from Clement the 7. Pope, which brought with him a Rose of Golde for a token to the king, which was presented to him at Windsoxe. This tree was forged of fyne gold, and wrought with Bayes, leaves, and flowers, resembling roses, set in a pot of Golde, which pottes had three set of antike fashion, of measure halfe a pint. In the uppermost rose was a faire sapphire loupe pearced the bignes of an Acorne. The tree was of bright halfe an English pard, and in breadth a foot.

It chanced in the yere passed, as partly hath been touched, a grudge to break out betwixen the French king, and the duke of Burbon, inasmuch that the duke for the safeguard of his life fled out of the French kings dominions, whereof the Cardinall Wolley having intelligence, computed in his head, that if the king our soveraigne Loyde coulde obtaine him to bee his generall in the war against the French king, and considering further that the Duke of Burbon was fled unto the Emperour to invite him to a like purpose, wherefore he being this imagination in his head, thought it good to moove the king in the matter, and after the king was once advertised hereof, and concealing the cardinals invention, at last it came to a consultation among the counsell, so that it was concluded that an Ambassage shoulde be sent to the Emperour about the matter, with whom hee was, that the king and the Emperour shoulde toime in those warres against the French king, and that the Duke of Burbon shoulde be our kings Champion and Generall in the fieldes, who had a great number of good souldiers, over and besides the Emperours Armie, which was not small: and that the king shoulde paie unto the Duke monthly wages, both for himselfe and his retinue, inasmuch, as Sir John Russell laie continually beyonde the seas in a secreete place, both to receive monete of the king, and to paie the same monthlie to the duke, so that the duke beganne the wars with the French king in his owne territoire and Dukedome, which the king had consigned in his owne hands, being not perfectly knowne unto the dukes enemies that he had any aide out of England, and thus he wrought the French king much displeasure, inasmuch, as the French king was constrained to prepare a puissant armie, and in his owne person to resist the Dukes power, and with force the king drove him to take Pavie, a strong Towne in Italie, with his hoste, for their securitie, whereas the king encamped him wonderfullie strong, intending to enclose the duke that hee shoulde not issue forth, yet notwithstanding, the duke did many times issue forth and skirmished with the king.

Some let us retorne agayne to the Cardinall Wolley, who seemed to bee sobornely altered, and to bee more French than Emperiall, howsoever it came to passe: but the French king lying in his Campe, sent secretlie into Englande a privie person, a verie wittie man, to treat a peace betwixt the French king, and our king: this person was named John Iokin, who was kept as secretlie as might bee, for hee was no french man borne, but an Italian, a man of no greater estimation in France, and for his subtill witte, elected to entreate of such Ambassage, as the French king had given him in commission. This Iokin was secretlie conveyed unto Richmonde, and there remained, untill the Cardinall resorted thither unto him, where after Easter terme ended, he kept the feast of Whitsonside verie solemnlie, in which season the Cardinall caused divers times this Iokin to dine with him. Thus continued this Iokin in Englande long after, untill at the last, as it shoulde seeme, hee brought to pass: the matter that he had in commission. After this, there was sent out immediately a restraint to Sir John Russell, into those parts where he made his abiding beyond the seas, that he should receive that money was given still in his hands, until the kings pleasure were to him knowne, which should have been paid to the Duke of Bourbon, being then with his retinue encamped within the Towne of Paup, for want whereof at his date, the Duke and his men were sore dismayed, when they sawe there was not money brought as it was wont to be: and being in so dangerous a case, and where victuals began to be scant and verie scarce, they imagined many waies that should be the lesse, some sayde this, and some sayde that, so that they mistrusted nothing lesse, then the verie cause thereof, in so much as at the last, what for want of victuals, and other necessities, the Souldiers and Captaynes began to grudge and mutter, and at last, for lacke of victuals were like all to perish. The Souldiers being in this extremitie, came before their Captayne the Duke of Bourbon, and sayde: Spz, wee must be of verie force and necessitie constrained to peeble vs hypp to our enemies, and better it were for vs so to doo, then to starve lyke dogges. When the Duke sawe their extremitie he saide unto them with weeping eyes: Spz (quoth hee) yee are both valiant men, and of noble heartes, who have served mee here right worthily, and for your necessitie (whereof I am participant) I doo not a little lament: but I shall desire you, as you are noble in hearte and courage, so to take patience for a day or twayne, and if succour come not then from the King of England, as I doubt nothing that hee will deceyve vs, I will well agree that wee shall all put our selves and our liues unto the mercie of our Lorde, wherewith they were all agreeable. And tarrying the comming of the R. money, untill the terme of two dayes were past: the Duke seeing no remedie, called his noble Captaynes and Souldiers before him, and weeping sayde: O noble men and Captaynes, I see no remedie in this necessitie, but eyther wee must peeble vs unto our enemies, or else famishe: and to peeble the Towne and our felous, I know not the mercie of our enemies, as for my part I passe not for their cruelties, for I knowe verie well that I shall suffer death most cruelle if I come into their hands: it is not for my selfe therefore that I doo lament, but it is for your sakes, it is for your liues, and safegarde of your persons, for so that yee might escape the daunger of our enemies hands, I would most gladly suffer death, therefore god companions, and most noble Souldiers, I shall require you all to consider the daungerous miserie and calamitie that wee stande in, to sell our liues most chere, rather than to be murdered like bestes: if yee will be agreeable, wee will take upon vs this night to give our enemies an assault, and by that meanes wee maye eyther escape, or else give them an overthrow, and thus it were better to die in the field lyke men, than live prisoners in captivitie and miserie, to the which they all agreed: then (quoth the Duke) yee perceyve that our enemies Campe is stronge, and that there is noe waie to enter upon them but one, and that is so planted with Ordnance and strength of men, that it is not possible to attayne to our enemies that waies to fight with them in Campe: And also

now of late you perceyve they have hadde but small doubt of vs, in so much, that they have kept but verie slender watch, therefore my devise shall be this: There shall issue out of the Towne about the deade of the night from us a number of you that be of the moste deliverest to assaulte their Campe, and they shall give the assaulte right secretly, even directly against the place of the entrie which is verie stronge and invincible, your fierce and valiant assaulte shall be to them of the Campe so doubtfull, that they will turne their strength of the entrie that lyeth over against your assaulte, to leave you from your purpose; then will I issue out of the Towne, and come to the place of their strength the which turned, and there or they be aware will I enter, and fight with them in their Campe, and winne their Ordnance, which they have newly turned, and beate them with their owne peeces, and then maye you come and take with me in the field. This device pleased them wondrously well. Then prepared they all that daie for the purpose device; and kept them secretly and close without any noise, or shotte off peeces within the Towne, which gave their Enemies the lesse feare of the assaulte: but at night went to their Tentes, and colowbed quietly, nothing mistrusting that after happened unto them. When the time came that all men were at rest, the assaultantes issued out of the Towne, and there according to their appointmente, they gave so eruel and fierce assault, that they in the Campe hadde as much to doe as was possible to resist them: and even as the Duke declared before to his Souldiers, they within were compelled to turne their shotte that late at the entrie, against their assaultantes. With that issued out the Duke, and with him about fifteene or sixteen thousand men, or more, secretly in the night, his Enemies being not aware of his comming untill hee was entered the field, and at his entrie hee tooke all the Ordnance that late there, and set the Gunners, then hee charged the peeces against his Enemies, and set the them wondrously, hee cutte downe the Tentes and Pavillions, and murdered manie within them, ere they were aware of his comming, suspecting nothing lesse than his entrie, so that hee wanne the field: or ever the King coulde arlie to the rescue; in so much, as the King was taken in his lodging by the Vice-roy of Naples: or ever hee were harnessed, his tentes were robbed and spoiled which were wondrously rich, and in the spoyle and search of the Kings Officers, the Duke of Bourbon found the league under the great Seale of England, newly made betwene the King of England, and the French King, which once perceived by him, beganne to smell the impediment of his monie which should have come unto him from the King, having upon due search intelligence that all the matter was devised by the Cardinall of Englande. The Duke conceived such an indignation hereupon against the Cardinall, that incontinentlie hee went to Rome, and there intended to sacke the towne, and to have taken the Pope, where at the first assault of the waies, the Duke was the first man that was slayne: yet notwithstanding, his Captaynes continued their assaulte, and at the last wanne the towne, and the pope fled unto Castle Saint Angell, where he continued long in calamitie. standing, which ye haue heard, when newes was brought into England of the taking of the French king, great triumph was made for; for the reaf on the 9. of March. Another triumph on the 16. of March, for; for that Rich. de la Pole was slain in the battell of Paup. This battell of Paup is at large fet down by Paulus Iovius.

About such time as Cardinall Wolsey was determined to erect his newe colleges in Wynd and Ipswich, he obtained licence and authoritie of Pope Clement the 7. to suppress all the number of fortie Monasteries of good fame, and bountifull hospitalitie, wherein the king bearing with al his doings, neither bishop, nor tempo;al lord in this realme durst say any word to the contrary.

In the executing of this businesse, five persons were his chiefe instruments, who on a time made a demaund to the Prior and couent of the monastierie of Waintrie, for; occupying of certayne of their groundes, but the Monkes refusing to satisfie their requestes, straightwaie they picked a quartell against the house, and gaue information to the Cardinall against them, who taking a small occasion, commaunded the house to be dissolved, and to be converted to his newe college, but of this irreligious robbetrie done of no conscience, but to patch up pride, which private Wealth could not furnish, what punishment hath since ensued at Gods hande (saith mine Author;) partie our selues haue serue, for; of those five persons, two fell at discorde betweene themselves, and the one slew the other, for the which, the slayer was hanged: the third drowned himselfe in a Well: the fourth beeing well knowne, and valued worth two hundred pounde, became in three yeeres so poore, that hee begged till his dying daie: and the fifth called docto; Allane, beeing chiefe executor of these doings, was cruelly maimed in Irelande, euen at such time as hee was a bishop: the cardinall falling after into the like greivous displeasure, was deposed, and died miserably: the colleges which he meant to haue made so glorious a building, came neuer to good effect: the one at Ipswich cleane pulled down, and the other in Wynd unfinished: and pope Clement himselfe by whole authority the se houses were shrowen down to the ground, was after inclosed in a dangerous siege within the castle of St. Angel in Rome by the emperor, the city of Rome was pittifully sacked, and himselfe narrowly escaped with his life, as shal be shewed in anno 1527.

In the month of March, H. sent Cuthbert Tunstall bishop of London, and Sir Ric. Wingfield chancelor of the duchy, and knight of the garter, into Spain, to common with the emperor; for causes, concerning the taking of the French li. and for wars to be made into France on euery side.

The king being thus determined to make warres in France, and so passe the sea himselfe in person, his counsell considering that about al things, great treasure and plenty of mony must needs be provided, deuised strange commissions, and sent commissioners in euery shire, with priuie instructions how they should proceed in the sittings, to order the people to bring them to their purpose, which was, that the first part of euery mans substance, should be paid in money or plate to the king without delay, for; the furniture of his warre: whereof followed such cursing, weeping, and exclamation against both king and counsell, that pittie it was to heare. And notwithstanding all that could bee faide by the Commissioners, to perswade the people to this contribution, the same would not bee graunted: but in excuse of their deniall, it was alledged that buying was offered, and the ancient customes and lawes broken, which would not any man to be charged with such payments, except it were granted by the estates of the realme in parliament.

The like answer was made by them of the spirituality, of whom was demanded the fourth part of their goods.

Spouiser de Praie the emperours ambassado; whether offended for admittling of Iokin in the realme, as before ye haue heard, or for some other cause, on the ninth of Aprill departed out of England, not taking leaue of the king, cardinall, or rest of the counsell, and did so much, that he passed through France in posture, and came to the emperor; before the Ambassadors of England came thither, and whether it was by his report, or otherwise, the accustomed fauor that the Emperour and his Counsell shewed to the English men beganne to decay.

In this p;ere (saith Hall) H. following his banke, leapt ouer a ditch besides a kitchen, with a pole, and the pole brake, so that if one Edm. Mody a foleman, had not leapt into the water, and lift by his head, which was fast in the claie, hee had bene drowned.

The commissioners in al shires sitting for the leuy of the 6. part of all mens goods, as ye haue heard, the barthen was so greivous, that it was denied, and the commons in euery place were so moued, that it was like to haue growne to a rebellion: when this mischief was shewed to the li. he said, that he neuer knew of that demaund, and therefore with great diligence he sent his letters to the city of London, and to other places, in the which hee gently wrote, that hee would demaund no sum certain, but such as his louing subjects would grant to him of their good wills, toward the maintenance of his warres. Wherefore the cardinall on the 26. of Aprill sent for the mayo; of London, the aldermen, with most substantiall persons of the common counsell, and when they were come to the minister, he said: the king our soueraigne lord, most graciously considereth the great love, zeale, and obedience, which you bare unto him, and where like louing subjects, without any grudge, or gaine-saying of your louing minds you haue granted the first part of all your goods and substance, freely to be paid, according to the first valuation, the which louing grant and good mind, he so kindly accepted, that it was maruella to see: but I my selfe do consider the great losses, and other charges that baile hath and doth to you growe, and that notwithstanding, any losse or charge that hath happened to you, yet you neuer with good nor gaine saide any of the kinges demaunders or commissions, as it appeereth now of late, of which dooings I haue highly the king informed, for; the which hee gaue you hartie thanks. Then I kneeled downe to his grace, shewing him both your good minds toward him, and also the charges that you continually sustaine, the which at my desire and petition, he was contente to call in, and abrogate the same Commission. And where hee by reason of your owne grants might haue demanded the said summe as a berie debt, yet he is content to release and pardon the same, and will nothing take of you but your beneuolence: wherefore take here with you the kings letter, and let it be read to the commons, and I doubt not but you will gladly do as louing lubiects should do. The 28. of Aprill, in the common counsell of the city was read the kings letter, according to the effect above rehearsed. Wherefore the citizens sent 4. aldermen, and 12. commoners to Hampton court, to giue thanks to the L. cardinal, which for business as was said, could not speake with him, wherefore they returned not content. Then euery alderman assembled his ward, in their places accustomed, and gently moued them of a beneuolence to be granted to the king, the which they openlie denied, saying: That they had paid ynough before, with many euill wordes. The 8. of May the cardinal againe sent for the maior and his brethren, which shewed him what they had done. Then said the cardinal, You haue no such commission to examine any man, I am your commissioner, I will examine you one by one my selfe: and then I shal know the god will that you beare to your prince, for I wil aske a beneuolence of you in his name. Then was it answered to the cardinal by a counsellor of the city, that by the law there might no such beneuolence be asked, nor men so examined, for it was contrary to the statute made the 1. yeres of is. Richard the thirde. Also some persons comming before your grace, may for feare grant that, that all daies of their life they shall repent, and come to win your fauor: will grant more than they be able to pay of their owne, and so run in other mens debts, so that by deadly full gladnes, and fearefull boldnes, men shall not be masters of themselves, but as men dismayed, shal grant that, that their wiues and children shall soe rewe. The cardinal heard this saying berie patiently, and answered quietly: Sir, I maruell that you speake of Richard the thirde, which was an vsurper, and a murderer of his owne nephews: then of so euill a man, how can the act be good, make no such allegations, his acts be not honozable: And it please your grace said the counsellor, although be did euill, yet in his time were many good acts made not by him only, but by the consent of the bodie of the whole realme, which is the parliament. Then st. William Bailey lord maior, knaked to wne, and besought his grace, that st. it was enacted by the common council of London, that euery alderman should sit in his owne ward for a beneuolence to be granted, which he perceiued to be against the law, that the same act by the same common council might be reuoked, and no otherwise. Well said the cardinal, I am content. What now will I enter into the kings commission: You maior, & you master aldermen, what will ye giue: app. loyde, saide the maior, I pray you pardon me, for if I should enter into anie grant, it might cost me to cost me my life: your life, said the cardinal, that is a maruellous word, for your good will towarde the king, will the citizens put you in leopards of your life, that were strange: so if they would that way, then must the king come with a strong power them to oppresse, wherefore speake no more such wordes, and with that he stabled a little, and said: app. lord maior, let you and your citizens, if you be grieved with any thing, in this demand humbly and after a good fashion come to me, and I shall so intreat you, that you shall be content, and no displeasure arise, and so I pray you them your neighbors: and so the maior for that daie departed. The maior (saith Hall) did wisely not to assent to grant to any thing, for although he & the aldermen had assented, the common council would neuer haue assented. So on the next morrow it was declared to the common council, that the act that was made, that euery alderman should sit for a beneuolence to be granted, was against a statute law: whereupon the said act was annulled: and then was it declared, that euery man should come to the cardinal, & to grant what he would, with the which saying the citizens were soe grieved: then the maior gently shewed them, how he durst warrant, that they should be intreated gently, and exhorted them to go thither when they were sent for: which saying so offended them, that in their furie they would haue had Richard Gresham and Iohn Hewster mercers, and Richard Gibson sergeant at armes and merchant tailor, banished out of the common council, and so without answer made what they would be, they departed home.

This demand through the realme was bitterly denied, so that the commissioners could bring nothing to passe, and yet they assailed both by faire and foule means. For in Kent the lord Cobham was commissioner, and handled them roughly, and by reason one Ioh. Skudder answered him clabstily, he sent him to the tower of London: for which doing the people muttered against the lord Cobham, and said expressly that they would paie no money, and then they began to account the loanes and subsidies granted, so that they reckoned the kings treasure innumerable: for they accounted that the king had taken of his realme twenty sixtens st. the 14. yeres of his raigne, and in this grudge they euill intreated st. Thomas Bolcine at Spaldstone.

In Essex the people would not assemble before the commissioners in no houses, but in open places. And in Huntingdon shire diners resisted the commissioners, and would be not suffer them to sit, which were apprehended and sent to the skete. The duke of Suffolke sitting in commission about this subiecte in Suffolke, perswaded by curiouse means the rich clothiers to assent thereto: but when they came home, and went about to discharge and put from them their spinners, carders, fullers, weavers, and other artificers, which they kept in woeke afore time, the people began to assemble in companies, whereof when the Duke was aduertised, he commanded the constables that euery mans harness should be taken from them: but when that was knowne, the rage of the people increased, railing openlie on the duke, and st. Robert Drurie, and threatened them to death, and the cardinal also: & brewe with there assembled together, after the manner of rebels, foure thousand men of Lanam, Sudberie, Hadley, and other towne there about, which put themselves in harness, and rang larams to increase their number. The Duke of Suffolke perceiuing this, began to gather such power as hee could, but that was very slender: yet the byldges being broken, those rebels were letted of coming against the duke.

The duke of Suffolke treasurer of England raised a power in Suffolke, & came to the duke of Suffolke, he first sent to the people, to know their grieue.

They answered, that as they had some matters that grieved them, so had they will to spend their lives in the kings service as obedient subjects. When the duke rode to them, and demanded what was the cause of their disquiet, and who was their captain: unto whom one John Greene a man of fiftie yeeres olde answered, that pouertie was both cause and captain. For the rich clothiers spying of Lanam, and other had given ouer occupying, whereby they were put from their ordinarie worke, and lining. The Duke with courteous words willed them to depart home, promising them, that he and the Duke of Suffolke would intreate the king for them, whereupon they became quiet, and returned, and in token of repentance, they came to Saint Edmundsbury in their shirts, and halters about their neckes desiring pardon: the two dukes take a few of them to London, which after some imprisonment were pardoned and deliuered.

When the king at Poysie place, where the cardinall lay, called a great council, in the which he openly protested, that his minde was neuer to aske any thing of the commons, which might sounde to the breach of his lawes, wherefore he willed to knowe by whose meanes the commissions were so straightlye given forth, as to dem in the first part of euery mans goods. The cardinall answered and said, that when it was moued in the counsell, how to leue money to the kings vse, the kings counsell, and namely the Iudges said, that he might lawfullye demand any summe by commission, and that by the consent of the whole counsell it was done, and toke God to witnes, that he neuer desired the hinderance of the commons, but like a true counsellor desired how to enrich the king: and the spirituall men saie, that it standeth with Gods lawe, for Ioseph caused the li. of Egypt to take the fifth part of euery mans goods: but because euery man lately the burthen from him, I am content to take it on me, and to endure the fame and noyse of the people, for my god will toward the king, and comfort of you my lords, and other the kings counsellors, but the eternall God knoweth all. Well said the king, some haue informed me, that my realme was neuer so rich, and that there should neuer trouble haue risen of that demand, and that men would paie at the first request, but now I finde all contrarie: then euery man beid his peace. Then the king said, I will no more of this trouble, let letters be sent to all shires, that this matter maie no more be spoken of. I will pardon all that haue made dentall openie or secretly: then all the lords kneeled downe, and hartlie thanked him. When letters were sent, in the which wete shewed, that the lords and the iudges, and other of the kings counsell, desired that demand, and that the cardinall followed the minde of the whole counsell. And thus was the kings great iourney by to France staied for this time.

Henry Courtney earle of Denonshire, colen german to the king, was created marques of Excester: Henry Brandon sonne to the duke of Suffolke, was created earle of Lincoln: Sir Thomas Manners lord Rosse earle of Rutland, Sir Henry Clifford earle of Cumberland, and the lord Fitz Water, Sir Robert Ratcliffe was created Viscount Fitz Water, and Sir Thomas Boleine treasurer of the kings household, was created Viscount Rochford.

In this winter was a great death in the cite of London, so that the terme was abroinded, and the king kept his Christmas at Eltham with a small companie, wherefore it was called the still Christmas.

The cardinall about this time comming to the court at Eltham, toke order for altring the state of the kings house, many officers and other seruants were discharged, and put to pensions. In which number were 64. yeomen of the garb, which before hauing 12. d. the day with cheke, were now allowed 6. d. the day, without cheke, and commanded to go home into the countries. He also made new officers in the house of the duke of Richmond, which was then newly begun. Also at that time he ordained a counsell, and established another household for the lady Mary, then being princeesse of the realme, so that all thing that was done, was done by him, for to him was the charge of all things committed. At this time the false Cardinall gaue to the king the lease of the maner of Hampton court, which he had of the lease of the lord of S. Johns, and on which he had done great cost in building: In recompence whereof, the king licenced him to lie in his maner of Richmond at his pleasure, and so he lay there at certaine times.

On Shrouetue day, there was holden solemne iusts at Greenwich, the king and 11. other on the one part: and the marques of Excester with 11. other on the contrarie part. At these iusts by chance of shiuering of a speare, Sir Francis Brian lost one of his eyes.

The 11. of February, foure merchants of the Stillyard did pennance at Pauls crosse, and an Augustine frier called dodo: Barnes bare a fagot: there was present the lord cardinall, with 11. bishops, John Fisher bishop of Rochester made the sermon, which was against Martine Luther of Germanie, and his doctrine.

A truce was taken betwene England and France for a certaine space, and ambassadors were sent into Denmarke, for restoring of the king: but the Danes would grant nothing thereunto, they did so deadly hate him for his crueltie.

The 28. of April came to the court to Greenwich Pountier Briond, president of Roane, and John Lokin, which president before the king and his nobles made in the Lat in tong a solemne oration, the effect whereof was, how breadfall the wars had bene betwene the realmes of England and France. He declared further of what power the king of England was, and what conquest he might haue made in France, the french king being prisoner, whereof he humbly thanked him of his pitie and compassion that he had on them in their necessitie, that he would consent to peace: To the which oration, Sir Thomas

By reason of the gods weight, and low valuation of the English coine, merchants daily caried ouer great store, because the same was much inhaunted there: so that to mate with this inconuenience (as it was said) proclamation was made in the moneth of September the first day, throughout England, that the angell should go for 7. shillings 4. pence, the royall for 11. s., and the crowne for 4. s. 4. pence. And on the 5. of November following againe by proclamation, the angell was enhaunted to 7. s. 6. d. and so euerie ounce of of golde should be 45. s. and an ounce of silver at 3. s. 9. d. in valew.

Ambassadors
into France.

King Henry sent Thomas Boleine viscount Rochford, and sir Anthony Browne knight, ambassadors into France, which came to Paris to the bish. of Bathe that lay there for the king as legat, and then these thre went to the court, and saw the French king take the oath to keepe the league and amitie, concluded betwene him and the king of England.

Ambassadors to the emperor.

Also king Henry sent sir Francis Points knight ambassador to Charles the emperor, and with him Clarencieux king at armes, to demand the one halfe of the treasure and ordinance which was taken at Pavia, for so much as the war was made as well at the kings charge as at the Emperors. Also they were commaunded to demand one of the French kings sons, which lay in hostage with the emperor, that is to wit, the Duke of Orleans to be deliuered to the king of England: and further that he should call backe his army out of Ita-lie, and if so were that he refused these requests, then should they in the kings name denounce open war against him.

In this meane time Rome was taken by the emperials, & the pope brought into into captiuitie, as ye shall heare: Charles duke of Borbon, and the emperors army, which all the last winter liued in great pouertie, without clothes, wages, or wages, so that they were in maner desperate, went toward Parma and Bonony, belonging to the sea of Rome. The pope hearing this, sent messengers to the duke to redeme his townes, so that they should not be spoiled. The duke asked 350000. bushels, for sauing of the popes laue, and if they might haue so much money, they would depart to Naples: but when they saw they could not haue their demand, they turned toward Florence, whereof hearing the Romans they were glad, for they thought that the Florentines would hold good war with them, and then the Romans would giue the looking on: but the chance turned, as ye shall heare.

The duke of Borbon had thought to haue gone to Florence for this cause: there was a gentleman in Florence, called Peter de Saluato, which had a brother that serued the Emperors in his warres, which promised to deliuer the citie, for hee determined to cause the commons to rebel in the citie against the heads, and in the meane season the dukes companie should scale the walles: when this Peter knewe that the Emperors army was come to a place called the Chafe, within twelue miles of the citie, to bring his purpose to conclusion, he which such as he had trained to him, cried in the city, Liberte a de populo, that is to say, libertie of the people: with which voice the people stirred, and came to the palace in great number, and there they took the five lords of the counsell, which had the rule of the wealth of the citie, & slue one of them. The familie of Medices, which were the popes kindred, were at this time sore astrait. Thus this Peter de Saluato with the commons, gate that palace, and rang the common bell. In this season was in Florence a capitaine of the French kings called Frederico de Bedlo, he had with him 300. men, and when he sawe this rebellion, he came to the commons and said: Sirs, if you continue in this case, your faire citie is like to be subuerted, for your enemies bee at hand: which notwithstanding that you heare some fauour to the emperor, as appeareth, yet their needinesse and pouertie is such, that without mercie they will rob, murder and slay you, your wiues and children, and set fire on your beautiful city. This Capitaine much staied the citizens, notwithstanding that 20. or more persons were slaine in the ruffie: yet they were well aduised, and suddenlie entered into the city the duke of Urbine, which lay but 6. mile from Florence, and 18. mile from the emperors army, whom he had coalesed: but he thought no aduantage to meddle. This Duke brought with him 5000. footemen, and 600. horsemen, and when he was entered the citie, a crye was made that all things were pardoned, so that euerie man departed home, and deliuered his weapon, and thus the city was appeased the 28. of Aprill. All this doing with, it was unknown to the emperors army, and so for lacke of knowledge this enterprise was lost: which was happie for the Florentines. Soze displeased were the emperors captains when they knew of this chance, and how the duke of Urbine was entered into the city of Florence. And so shortly they departed, and came to the citie of Seines thirtie mile off, and there they lost their great ordinance, and took counsell to go to Rome, notwithstanding the truce concluded betwene the pope, and the vice Roy of Naples and Hugo de Moncada, and so much they travelled by night & day, that the 6 of May, with banners displayed they came before the Citie of Rome. The Romans make Bulwarks, rampiers, and other defences, and laid ordinance on the walls, and shot at them fiercely. The Duke of Bourbon wailing that it were not best to lie still and be slain, considering that they were all naked people, and without great ordinance: determined to take the chauce, and to give the assault, and so manfully they approached the walls, betwene the Burgo novo and old Rome, but the Romans valiantly defended them, with hand guns, pikes, stones, and other weapons, so that the enemies were faine to retire. The Romans were glad, set many fair banners on their towers and bulwarks, which seeing the Duke of Bourbon cried to a new assault: then every man with a ladder mounted, and at the first encounter the Romans again put them a little back: which perceiving the Duke, he cried, God and the emperor: then every man set on manfully, there was a sore fight, many a man killed, but at the last the emperials gotte the wall: and betwene every assault fell a mist, so that they with in could not see what part they without would assault, which was profitable to the emperials. At the third assault were slain three hundred Swichers of the Popes garde. In this last assault was the Duke of Bourbon stricken in the thigh with a hand-gunne, of the which he shortly died, in a chappel of St. Syth, whither his Souldiers hadde brought him. And this chauce notwithstanding, the army entered into Rome, and took the popes palace. The same date that these three assaults were made, pope Clement passed little on the Emperors army, for he had accursed them on the Saturday before, and in his curse he called the Almaines Lutherans, and the Spaniards Murders & Heresies. And when he was hearing of masse, so many the Almaines entered the church, and slew his gard, and divers other. He seeing that fled by a private way to the castle Angell: and all they that followed him that way and could not enter, were slain. The cardinals and other prelates fled to the castle St. Angell over the bridge, where many of the common people were overpressed, and drowned as they gave waie to the cardinals, and other states that passed towards the castle for succour. The cardinal of Senes, of Salsarine, of Sabertine, of Jacobace, and of the Tole, tarried so long, that they could not gette to the Castell for multitude of people: wherefore they were compelled to take another house, called the Palace of Saint George, where they kept themselves for a while, as secretly as they might. You must understand, that through the citie of Rome runneth a famous river called Tiber, and on the other side of the river standeth the castle of St. Angell, or the Borough of St. Angell: and the other side is called Burgo novo. This bridge is called the bridge of St. Peter, which lieth directly before the castle. At the end of this bridge was a wonderous strong Bulwarke, well ordinaiced, and well manned. The emperials saw they could do nothing to the Pope, nor to the port of the citie but by the bridge, determined to assaile the Bulwarke: and so as men without feare came to the bridge: and the Romans so well defended them, that they slew almost foure thousand men. That seeing the Prince of Orange, and the Marques of Cinasto, with all spoke gave assault, and notwithstanding that the Romans shot to great ordinaice, hand-guns, Muscets, and all that might be shot, yet the emperials never shanke, but manly entered the bulwarke, and slew, and threw down out at the loopes al the Romans that they found, and after rased the bulwarke to the ground. The Pope in the castle Angell beheld this fight, and with him were three and twenty Cardinals, of which one called the Cardinal Sandorum quarter was slain, and with him were a thousand prelates and priests, five hundred gentlemen, five hundred souldiers: wherefore immediately the Captaines determined to laie siege to the castle St. Angell, and they within might slay out and turne them to damage: wherefore so dauntle a siege was planted rounde about the castle: In the meane season, the Souldiers fell to spoyle, never was Rome so pilled, neither of the Gothes nor Vandals, for the souldiers were not content with the spoile of the Citizens, but they robbed the Churches, brake up the houses of close religious persons, and overthrowe the Cloisters, they spoiled virgins and ransomed widows: men were tormented if they had not to give every new asker or demander: some were strangled, some were tormented by the priuie members, to cause them to confesse their treasure. This woodnes continued a great while, and some man might thinke, that when they had gotten so much, then they would cease and bee quiet, but that was not so, for they played continually at dice, some 500. some 1000. ducats at a cot: and hee that came to plaie laden with plate, went awaie againe almost naked, and then fell to rising againe: Spanie of the Citizens which could not patientlie suffer that veration, drowned themselves in Tiber. The souldiers that laie at the siege daylie made iesses of the pope, sometime they had one riding like the pope, with a whore behind him, sometime he blessed, and sometime he cursed, and sometime they would with one voyce call him Antichrist. They went about to undermine the castle, and to haue throwne it downe on his head, but the water that enuironeth the castle disappointed their purpose. In this season the Duke of Urbine with fifteen thousand men came to aide the Pope: but hearing that Rome was taken, he taried 60. mile from Rome till he heard other word. The Marques of Salace, and Sir Fredericke de Redfo with 15000. footmen, & 1000. horsemen, were at Vitarbe the 10. of May, where they hearing of the city of Rome was taken, also taried: & cardinal of Colome came with an army of Neopolitans to helpe the emperors men: but when he sawe the crueltie of the Souldiers, he did little to helpe them, but hated them much. The Pope of Rome was thus besieged till the eight of Iulie, at which daie he perished himselfe, for necessitie and penurie of all thinges in the castle. And then he was restored to give graces and grant bulls, as he do before: but he taried still in the castle Saint Angell, and had a great number of Almaines and Spaniards to keepe him: but the Spaniards bare most rule in the castle, for no man entered nor came out of the Castle, but by them. When the month of Iulie was come, cozne beganne to faile in Rome, and the pestilence began to waie strong, wherefore the greates armie removed to a place called Parapa 40. mile from Rome, leaving behind them such as kept the Pope. When they were departed, the Spaniards never were contented, till they

they had gotten the Almains out of the castle of S. Angell, and so they had the whole custodie of the Pope. Thus Rome continued in peace till the month of September, that the armie came againe from Naruta: so; then the Almains wrote, that they would set the Citie and all on fire, except the Pope would paie them their wages. The Pope sent to commune with them, two archbishops, two bishops, and two gentlemen, these six persons the Almains took as pledges, contrarie to the Popes meaning, and said they would keepe them there, till they were paid, and so put them in a strong Chamber, in the Palace of S. George: and euerie daie almost they would bring them forth openly, and scold with them, and threat to hang them if they were not paie, and so they kept them imprisoned in a Chamber, and watched them daie and night without the Chamber: and yet for all that, they gaue out at a chimney on S. Andrews euene, and were no more seene of them. The Almains were so wode with this chaunce, that they came to the prince of Orange their generall captaine, and demanded monie of him, in such rigorous manner, that he was faine secretly to flic to Spaine: and then for him they chose Captaine, the Marques of Cinasto, which governed them till februarye, that hee brought them to Naples.

In the meane space, by means of great armies prepared by the kinges of England, of France, and other, for the popes deliuerance, the Emperour sent letters to the pope, and excused himself, that he neither would nor committed such mischief to be done, and straightly commanded his Captaines to deliuer him. The prince of Orange and other captaines of the emperour, hearing his commandement, took agreement with the pope and his cardinals, and so hee and twelue cardinals were bound to performe certain articles to the number of eleven, and then he was deliuered out of the castle S. Angell, the 10. of December, and was conueied to Crupot, where after he had paid certain monie for the souldiers wages, he was put at full libertie, and the Emperours people departed from him, and from thence he removed to Ancona: the Emperours Captaines (fearing the French armie prepared) caused all the Souldiers to departe out of Rome in the beginning of februarye, and so came into the realm of Naples, and fortified certaine towncs as they passed, and so came to a towne called Topp, and there staid. This removing was to them profitable, for if they had taried at Rome, they had bene set on by the Italians on the one side, and the Frenchmen on the other side, that by euerie mans sedgment they shoulde all haue bene slayne or taken. Thus much for the sacking of Rome.

Also about this time, bluers complaints beeing made of Gerald Fitz Gerald earle of Elybarr, late deputie of Irelande, that hee would sell Irelande to the Earle of Desmond, whome he shoulde haue attached by the kings letters, that hee curried acquaintance, and affinity with many Irish Enemies, that hee hanged, & helved rashlie good fabricates, whome he mistruied to leane to the Watlers friendship, wherefore Elybarr was commanded to appeere, which hee did, leaving in his roome Fitz Gerald of Lerslip, whome they thought hee deppued, and choode the Baron of Delun, whome Oconner tooke prisoner, and there the erle of Desmond, to shew his habilitie of seruice brought to Dublin an armie of Irishmen, having Captaines ouer them, Oconner, Omer, and O'carroll, and at S. Marie abbey was chosen deputie by the kinges counsell. In which office being himselfe (same onelie in feates of armes) a simple Gentleman, he bare out his honor, and the charge of gouernment verie wisely, shewinge the singular wisdome of his Countesse, a Labie of such port, that all Estates of the Realme crouched vnto her, so politike that nothing was thought substantially debated without her aduise, manlike and tall of stature, verie rich and bountifull, a bitter enemye, the onelie meane at those daies, whereby her husbands countrie was reclaimed from the Ruttish and vncleane Irish custom, to English habite, bedding, house-keeping, and ciuillite: but to the vertues was yoked such a selfe-lisiking, and spallie about the fence of a table, that for assurance therof the Ricked not to abuse her husbands honor, against her brothers folle: notwithstanding I learne not that she practised his bawding, which infused, and was to her vndoubtedle great heauines, as vpon whom both the blemish thereof, and the sustentance of that whole family depended after, but that she by indirect means coggeled her brother out of credite to aduance her husband, the common voice and the thing it selfe speaketh. Al this while abode the earle of Elybarr at the court, and with much adu sound list to be called before the lordes to answer solemnly, they saie vpon him bluely assested, and in especiall the cardinall R. Chancelor, distiched his cause, comforted his accusers, and enforced the articles obiected, and what else sooner coulde be gathered therof in these words.

I wrote well (my Lorde) that I am not the meekest man at this boode: to charge you with these treasons, because it hath pleased some of your prynces felowes to report that I am a possessed enemye to all nobilitie, and trancly to the Geraldines: but seeing euerie court vowe can faile as much when hee is controlled, and seeing these points are so weightie, that they shoulde not be denied of vs, & so apparant that they cannot be denied of you, I must haue leaue (notwithstanding your false slander) to be the mouth of these honorable at this present: & to trump your treasons in your way, howe soeuer you take me. First ye remember how the lewde earle your kinsman, who passeth not vnder me seruie, might he change his master, sent his confederates with letters of credence to Francis the French king, and hauing but cold comfort there, to Charles the Emperour, profering the helpe of Montere and Connagh towarde the conquest of Irelande, if either of them would helpe to winne it from our king: howe many letters, what precepts, what messages, what threats haue bene sent you to appehende him, and yet not done? Why so: for sooth I coulde not catch him: Hate, male earle, forsooth, you would not watch him. If he be inslie suspect, why are ye partiall in so great a charge? If not, why are ye fearefull to haue him tried? ye sir it toill be shewne and disposed to your face, that for feare of meeting him, you haue winked, wilfully thynned his sight, altered your course, warned his friends, stopped both eares and eyes against his detectors, and whensoever you took vpon you to hunt him out, there was hee sure as a chard to be out of your walke: surely this ingling and false play little became either an honest man called to such honour, or a noble man put in such trust: had you lost but a colv or a carran of your owne, 200. henneghes would haue come at your whistle to rescue the prae from the furthermost edge of Cilllar; all the Irish in Ireland must haue giuen you the waie: but in pursuing so needfull a matter as this was, mercifull God how nice, how dangerous, how waywarde haue you bene: One while he is from home, another time he keepeth home, sometimes fled, sometimes in the borders, where you dare not venture. I wis my lord, there be thesed bugs in the borders, for the earle of Elydare, to feare the earle, naie the king of Elydare, for when you are disposed you raigne more like then rule in the land: where you are malicious the truest subiects stand for Irish enemies, where you are pleased the Irish enemies stand for dutifull subiects: harts, and hands, liues and lands, are all at your curtesie, who satoneth not thereon, he cannot rest with in your smel, and your smel is so ranche, that you tract them at your pleasure: whilist the cardinall was speaking, the earle chafed and changed colour, and sundry prolers made to answere euery sentence as it came, at last he brake out, and interrupted him thus.

My lord Chancelor, I beseech you pardon me, I am thost twitted, and you I percelue intend a long tale; if you procede in this order, halfe my purgation will be lost for lacke of carriage, I haue no scholre trickes, nor Art of memorie, except you heare me while I remember your words, your second procelle will hammer out the former.

The lordes associate, who for the most part tenderly loued him, and knew the Cardinals manner of taunts so lothsome, as wherewith they were tried manie yeres ago, humbly besought his grace to charge him direaly with particulars, and to dwell in some one matter, till it were examined thorowly: that granted.

Elydare replys to the cardinall.

It is god reason, quoth the earle, that your grace beare the mouth of this chamber, but my lord those mouths that put this tale into your mouth are be rie wide mouths, such as inuad have gaped long for my wacke, and now at length for want of better stufte, are faine to fill their mouthes with smooke: what my cosen Desmond hath compassed as I knowe not, so I be lyeto his naked hart, for holding out so long, if he can be taken by my engins that present lie waste for him, then haue mine aduersaries betrayed their malice, and this heape of belous words shal resemble a man of straw, that seemeth at a blush to carrie some propozition, but when it is felt and poyled, discouereth a banity, seruing onely to fraie crolues. And I verily trust your honours will be the worse, by the thing it selfe, within these foure daies: but go to, suppose he neuer be had, what is Kildare to blame for it more than my god brother of Deserie, who notwithstanding his high prouidles, hauing also the kings power, is yet content to take egges for his money, and to bing him in at lesure: Can not the earle of Desmonde this, but I must be of counsell: can not he be his except I winke? if he be close, am I his mate: if he be friended, am I a traitor: This is a doughie kinde of accusation, which they vse against me, wherein they are stabled and nired, at my first deniall: you would not se him, say the:

who made them so familiar with mine eie sight: or when was the earle in mine equines, or who stood by when I let him slippe, or where are the tokens of my willfull hoodwinke: But you sent him word to beware of you: who was the messenger, where are the letters? Conuince my negatiue: se howe loosely this tale reason gangeth, Desmond is not taken: well you are in fault, why: because you are: who proues it: no body? what coniectures: so it seemeth: to whom? to your enemies: who told it them: they will sweare it: what other ground: none: will they sweare it my lord: why then of like, if they know it, either they haue my hand to thew, or can bing forth the messenger, or were present at a conference, or praiue to Desmonde, or some body betrayed it to them, or the mislures were my carriers, or vicegerents therein, which of these parts will they chuse, so: I knowe them so well, to reckon my selfe comat by their bare words, or headelesse hearfalses, or frantike othes: my letter were soon read, were anie such writing extant, my seruants and friends are ready to be lifted, of my cosen of Desmond the prae lie lewdlie, since no man here can well contrarie them: touching my selfe, I neuer noted in them either so much wit, or so fast faith, that I would haue gaged vpon their silence, þ life of a god house, much lesse mine own selfe. I doubt not, may it like your honours to expose them how they came to know ledge of these matters, which they are so ready to depose, but you shall find their tongues chained to another mans tennch, and as it were knights of the post suborned to sale, sweare, and flate the uttermost they can, as those that passe not what they saie, nor with what face they say it, so they say no truth: but of another thing it grieueth me, that your god grace, whome I take to be wise and sharpe, and who of your own blessed disposition wiseth me well, should be so farre gone in crediting those corrupt informers, that abuse the ignorance of your state and countrey to my perill: little know you my Lord how necessarie it is, not onely for the gouernor, but also for euery noble man in Irel and to hamper his onciwill neighbors at discretion, wherein if they wisited for procelle of law, and had not those liues and lands you speake of within their reach, they might hap to lose their own liues and lands without laber, you heare of a case, as it were in a dreame, and seie not the smart that bereeth vs. In England there is not a mirae subiect that dare extend his hand to philip a pere of the realme: In Ireland, except the L. haue cunning to his strength, and strength to saue his own, and sufficient authority to rake thornes and barlets when they dur, he shall find them swarme so fast, that it will be too late to call for iustice: if you will haue our seruite take effect, you must not tie vs alwaies to these iudiciall proceedings, wherewith your realme thanked be God, is enured. As touching my kingdome my lord, I would you & I had exchanged kingdoms but for one moneth, I would trust to gather vp more crums in that space, then twice the reuenues of my prae earle dome: but you are well and warne, and so hold you, and vphalde not me with such an odious farme: I sleepe on a cabben, when you lie softe in your bed of doine: I serue under the coape of heauen, when you are serued under a canopie: I drinke water out of my scull, when ye drinke wine out of golden cuppes: my counsell is trained to the field, when your genet is taught:

to amble: when you are be-graced and be-loved, and crooked and kneeled to, then find I small grace with our frith boydetters, except I cut them off by the knees.

The cardinall perceived that Spbare was no babe, and rose by a fume from the councill table, committed the earle, deferred the matter, till more direct probations came out of Ireland.

After many meetings, and obsecrations withtill reſelled, they preſſed him ſore with a traiterous err and ſent by his daughter lady of Glane to al his brethren, to Oneale, Oconner, and their adherents, wherein he exhorted them to warre upon the earle of Deſery then deputy, which they accompliſhed, making a wicked conſpiracie againſt the Engliſh of Irelande, and made a bloudie ſtrife. At this treaſon he was found guilty, and replied in the Tower a long time, the gentleman betooke himſelfe to God, and the king, was heartilie loved of the Lieutenant, pittied in all the Court, and ſtanding in ſo hard a caſe, altered little of his accuſomed behav, comforted other noble men Priſoners with him, diſſembling his owne ſorrow. One night when the lieutenant, and he for his diſpoſit were playing at ſhewell groat, ſodainelie cometh from the cardinall, a Mandat to execute Spbare on the morrowe. The earle marking the Lieutenantes deſire in reading the bill, by S. Wheloe lieutenant quoth he, there is ſome mad game in that ſcole: but fall out how it will, this ſchool is for a huddle: when the word was told him, now I pray the (quoth he) doe no more but learne aſſurable, from the kinges owne mouth, whether his grace be willing thereto or not: ſo he doubted the Lieutenant, to diſpleaſe the cardinall, yet of very pure devotion to his friend, he poſſeth to the king at midnight, and ſaid his err and, for at all houres of day or night the lieutenant had acceſſe to the prince upon occaſions. King Henry controlling the ſatocines of the prieſt (for thoſe were his termes) took him by the ſignet in token of countermaund, which when the cardinall had ſerene, he beganne to breathe out unſeaſoned words, which the lieutenant was loth to heare, and ſo he left him ſetting. And withtill ſew yeeres after, Sir William Scuington was ſent our deputy, who brought with him the earle pridd and rid from all his troubles. There aroſe about this time a brute in London, that diſpers great clearks had tolde the king that the marriage betwene him and the Lable Katherine, ſometime wiſe to his brother prince Arthur, was not lawfull: whereupon the king ſhould ſee a denoſe, and marrie the dutcheſſe of Alanſon, ſiſter to the french king, the towne of Calcis this ſommer, and thereupon Account Hocheſode had brought with him the picture of the ſame Lable: but the king being offended with the tales, ſent for S. Thomas Seymore ſpallor of London ſecretlie, and charged him to ſee that the people ceaſed from ſuch talke. But whatſoever the commons talked, true it was, that the king hadde minde to depart from Queene Katherine his wiſe, aunt to the Emperour, and daughter to the king of Spaine, for that ſhe was before eſpouſed to his brother, prince Arthur late deceaſed, and that the Pope coulde not diſpence with one woman to marrie with two brothers: but the king was letted by the Emperour and his Miniſters, ſo that hee coulde not well bring the matter about without aſſiſtance

of the french king. Upon which reſpect, he granted more than the french is deſired: that is, the 400000. crownes, which was one of the principall ſums of the millions, which ſhould be paid preſently, he lent the ſame to the french la. to repay in 5. yeeres: and the 600000. crownes ſoſet by the emperour, he gave to the french king: and the ſlower deluce, valued at 50000. crownes he gave to his god ſon Henry D. of Bleance. And further with the ſaid Mounſier de Langie, there was ſent Sir Frauncis Brian then one of the Gentlemen of the kinges privie Chamber, as well with the obligations and acquittances, as alſo the ſaid ſlower deluce, to be delivered by the french la. when time ſhould ſerve. And for the ſayde Mounſier de Langie, was a Gentleman greatlie ſoſer, as well in the Univerſities of Italie and Germanie, as in the Univerſities of France, and other to the Cardinall Bellay then Biſhop of Paris, hee was at that time travelled withall to procure the opinions and ſudgements of the Doctors and cheſe learned men, ſubſcribed with their handes, and confirmed with their Seales of the cheſe Univerſities; as of Paris, Bleance, and other of France, and of Padua, Vienna, and Boloma in Italie, declaring by the ſame, that the pope coulde not diſpence with the ſaid marriage, as being by gods law prohibited, which afterwarde was procured by the ſayde Mounſier de Langy, travelling in perſon to ſuerie the ſaid Univerſities with the king of Englands commiſſion, who had the french kinges letters of ſingular commendations to the uttermoſt and therein: whatſoever the commons talked, it was concluded by the R. and his counſell, that the cardinall ſhould paſſe into France as his high ambadoſor, but for what cauſe, no perſon knew but the R. till his return. Gwichardine ſaith hee brought with him treaſure amounting to 300000. crowns, both to furniſh his expences, & to impart with the french R. by way of lone if need were. The cauſe of this boiage was ſaith C. C. this, certain great eſtates, and lordes of the counſel bearing little good will to the cardinall, lying in waite to ſpy a convenient time, and occaſion to take the cardinall in a brake, thought it now were a neceſſary time to cauſe him to take upon him the kings commiſſion to travel beyond the ſea in this matter, and by his wit to compaſſe a perfect peace among theſe great princes and potentates: and encouraging him thereto, alledged that it was more mete for his high wit, diſcretion, and authoritie, to bring ſo weightie a matter to paſſe, then any other within this realm. Their intent was none other, but if they might get him from the king out of the realme, then might they ſufficiently adventure to depaſe him unto the R. highnes, and ſo in his abſence to bring him in diſpleaſure with the king, or at the leaſt to be of leſſe eſtimation: Well what will you moze? this matter was ſo handled, & the cardinall was commended to prepare himſelfe to this journey, which hee took upon him, but whether it were with his good will or no, I am not able well to tel you: but that I knowe he made a ſhort abode after the perfect reſolution therof, but cauſed all things to be prepared onwarde towarde his journey: and everie one of his ſervantes were appoynted that ſhould attende upon him in the ſame. When all things were concluded, and for this noble ambadoſage provided and furniſhed, then was there no moze to do, but advance forward in the name of God.

App. L. had with him such of the lords and bishops, and other worshipful persons, as were not of the council or conspiracy: to wit, the earle of Darby, the bishop of London, L. priap seale: sir Henry Gifford knight of the garter, controller of the kings house, the L. Sands knight of the garter: L. chamberlain of the L. house: docto Tailor, App. of the rolls: sir T. Moore knight, chancelor of the duchy of Lancaster: the bishop of Exeter, the L. Mounteagle, the L. Harnden, sir Joh. Dudley knight, App. Ratcliffe, App. Willoughby, App. Parker, App. Sturton: viscounts and barons, sons and heires, sir Fra. Brian, sir Ed. Seimer, sir Rob. Gernigam, docto Stephen Gardener secretary, docto Peter Vannes secretary: of the privy chamber, master Hennege, master Arundell, master Kneuer, master Alford: Physicians, docto Francis, docto Smith: gentlemen viscers of the privy chamber, App. Walgraue, App. Elles, sir Tho. Denis high chamberlaine, App. Sentclere vicechamberlaine: gentlemen viscers, master Wentworth, master Hanford, master Pemery, mast. Constable, App. Warren of household, App. Cade steward, sir William Calcoigne treasurer, App. Collike controller, master Broughton, master of the horse: docto Allen, docto Bener, docto Duke deane of the Chappell, docto Capon Almoner, the archdeacon of Canterbury, the archdeacon of Carlisle: App. John Sent-John, App. Richard Sandes knights, &c. in all to the number of 900. hoxes. Then marched he forward from his own house at Westminster, through London over London Bridge, having before him of Gentlemen a great number, three in a ranke in velvet coates, and the most of them greates of Colde about their neckes, and all his Proomen followed him with foblemen, and Gentlemens servants, all in Denge tawney coates, with the Cardinals Hatte, and a T. C. for Thomas Cardinal, embroidered upon all the coates, as well of his owne servants, as of all the rest of the gentlemens servants: and his sumpter mules which were 20. or more, with all his cariage of carts, and other of his traine, were passed before. He rode like a cardinal very sumptuously on his mule, with his spare mule and spare horse trapped in crimson velvet upon velvet, and stirrups gilt following him: and before him hee had his two great Crosses of silver, his two great Pillars of silver, the kings broad seale of England, and his cardinals hat, and a gentleman carrying his valence, otherwise called his cloakebag, which was made of fyne scarlet, altogether embroidered very richly with gold, having in it a cloak. Thus passed hee forth through London, and all the while euerie daie in his journey hee was thus furnished, having his harbengers in euery place before, which prepared lodging for his traine.

The first journey that he made, was .x. miles beyond Wertsford in Kent, to sit T. Withshires house, and the rest of his traine were lodged in Wertsfoide, and in the country thereabouts. The next daie he marched to Rochester, where he was lodged in the Bishops palace, and the rest of his traine in the Citie and in Stroude. The third daie he rode to Feuersham, and there was lodged in the Abbey, and his traine in the towne there, and some in the country thereabouts. The fourth daie hee rode to Canterbury, where hee encountered with the worshipfull of the towne and countrie, and lodged in the Bishop of Chyts Church, and all his traine in the Citie, where hee continued three dayes, in which season there was a great faire in the towne, by reason it was the feast of Thomas of Canterburie. At which date there was a solempne procession, wherein the cardinall then went appareled in his legantine ornaments, with his hat on his head, who commanded the monks and the quere to sing the Litanie after this sort, Sancta Maria, ora pro Papa nostro Clemente, the Cardinall kneeling at a stole before the quere doze all the while the monks and the quere stood in the body of the church singing the Litanie: at which time the cardinall was seene to wepe bitterly, for heavines to see the pope in such calamitie and danger of the Lances-knights.

The 11. of Iulie the Cardinall arrived at Caleis, who was received with all the officers and counsell of the Towne, the Spalos of the Towne, and the Spalos of the Staple in procession, and in the Lanterne Gate, he kneeled and made his prayers: that done, they passed on before untill he came to S. Maryes Church, from whence he repayed with a great number of foblemen and gentlemen, being peres of the towne, unto a place called the Checker, where he was lodged, and kept his house as long as he abode in the towne. When all his traine and carriage was landed, and euery thing prepared for his journey, he called all his noblemen and gentlemen, being seruants unto him, into his privy chamber, where they being all assembled before him hee saide: I haue called you hither to the intent to declare unto you, that I consider the duty you beare me, and the god will that I semblably beare to you, seeing your intendment to further the authoritie that I haue by commission, which your diligent seruice I will remember hereafter, and therefore I meane to declare the same directly to the king. Secondly, to shew you the nature of the French men. And thirdly, to instruct you howe and with what reuerence ye shall vse me for the honoz of the kings maiestie, and then to enforme you howe ye shall entertaine and accompanie the French men when ye shall mete at any time.

The first point ye shall vnderstand, that the L. maiestie for certaine weightie affaires, of his graces hath for more advancement of his royall dignitie assigned me to be in this journey his lieutenant, & what reuerence belongeth to the same I will tell you, for my part I must by vertue of my commission and lieutenantship assume and take upon me to be esteemed in all honour and degrees of seruice, as to his highnesse presence is mete and due, and that by me nothing to be neglected, that to his royall estate is due and appertinent. And for my part ye shall see me, that I will not omit one tote thereof. Therefore because that ye shall not be ignorant of your dutie in this case, as one of the chiefe causes of this your assembly, willing you as you will haue my fauour, & also charge you in the kings name, that ye do not forget the same in time and place, but that euery one of you doe obserue your duty unto me accordingly, as ye will at your returne avoid the L. indignation, or obtaine & deserve his highnesse thanks, the which I will fet forth, as each of you shall deserve. Now to the second point, the nature of the French men is such, that at the first meeting they will be as familiar with you as they had bene acquainted with you long before, & commune with you in their French tongue, as though ye vnderstand euery word, therefore vse them in like maner, and be as familiar with them as they be with you. If they speake in their naturall tong, speake you again vnto them in the English tong: For, if you vnderstand not them, no more shall they vnderstand you: and speaking merittie to one of the gentlemen there, being a Welchman, said Rice (quoth he) speake you Welsh to them: I doubt not but that thy speach shall bee moze disuile to him, than his French shall be to thee.

And thus quoth he againe to them all, let all your entertainment and behauior be according to the order of all gentlenes and humilitie, that it may be reported after your departure from thence, that ye be gentlemen of right god behauior, and of much gentlenesse, and that ye are men, who knowe your duties to your Soueraigne Lorde, and to your Spasiter, esteeming much your great reuerence. Thus shall ye not onlie obtaine to your selues great commendation and praise for the same, but also aduance the honor of your prince and Countrie. Soke go your waies, breing admonished of all the pointes, and prepare your selues against to morrow, for then we intend (God willing) to set forward. The next morrow, being Mary Magdalens daie, all things being furnished, the Cardinall aduanced out of Calis, with such a number of blake beluet coates, as hath bene seldom seene with an ambassador, all the Speres of Calets and Gules, with all other Gentlemen besides his train, being garnished in blake Tielut Coates and Chaynes of gold. Thus passed hee forward with his Traine of Gentlemen before him thre in a Ranks, which by supposal endured thre quarters of a mile or moze in length, hauing his Crosses and all other his accustomed and glorious furniture carried before him, as I haue before rehearsed, except the Broade Scale, the which hee left in Calets with Doctor Tylour, then master of the Rholes, vntill his returne. Passing thus on his way, and being scantlie ridden a mile, it began to raine so beemently, as lightly had not bene saine the like, which endured vntill they came to Boloigne, & ere they came to Sandwingfield, the cardinall of Lozaine a goodlie young gentleman, encountered the cardinall of Englande, and receiued him with great ioie and reuerence, and so passed forth with the Cardinall in communication vntill they came nigh vnto the saide Sandwingfield, which was a place of Religion, standing betweene the English, French, and the emperors dominions, being a Newter, holding of neither of them. There awaited for him Le Countie Brian Capitaine of Picardie, with a great number of Estradiates or Albenois, standing in arraie in a great peece of greene oates, all in barnes vpon high horses, passing on with the cardinall in a twing vnto Boloigne, and so after through Picardie: for the Cardinall doubted somewhat the Emperors, that he should be late some ambush to betraye him, for which cause the French king commanded them to attende vpon him for the assurance of his person. Thus rode he vntill he came within one English mile of Boloigne, where encountered him the worshipfull citizens of the Towne of Boloigne, hauing a learned man that made vnto him an oration in Latine, vnto the which the Cardinall semblable made answer: And that done, Monsieur de Bees Capitaine of Boloigne with the retinue of

of gentlemen, met with him on horsebacke, and then with all this assemble he rode into the towne lighting at the abbey gate, and from thence conuied with procession into the abbey church there offered, then went hee into the Abbey to his lodging, and all his traine were lodged in the high and base townes. The next morning after, he rode to Mutterell Ser Lemere, where he was in like case encountered with the worshipfull of the towne all in one liuerie, hauing a learned man to make an Oration vnto him in latine, whom he answered also againe in latine. And as hee entred in at the gates, there was a canopy made readie of silke, embroidered with letters, and an hat even as his men had on their Coates, and when that hee was lighted, his footemen hadde the same as a fee due to the office. Soke was there made diuers Pageants for the ioie of his comming, who was called in the French tong there, and in all other places through the realme where hee rode or came, Le cardinal pacifique. The next daie hee tooke his iourneie to waendes Aboule, where hee was encountered with diuers gentlemen of the towne and countrie, and so receiued into the towne with pageantes, as hee rode thoro the towne, hauing a like canopy borne ouer him, but moze richer, and so brought to his lodging: in this towne he remained moze than eight daies, where resorted to him daile diuers of the French is. counsell, sitting with him in counsell euerie daie, and continuallie scadding him & other. When the time came of his departing out of the towne, he rode to the castle beyond the water of Some, called le Chancel de picquy, abiding to the saide water vpon a Roche, within which there was a Colledge of Priests, the situation whereof was much like to the castle of Windingstoe, and there hee was receiued with solempne procession, conuerging him first into the Church, and after into the castle to his lodging. At this castle sometime vpon the brydge that goeth ouer this water of Some, is. Edw. the 4. met with the French king, as ye maye reade in our Chronicles: when my Lorde was settled in his lodging (saith mine author) I heard that the French is. should come that daie into the towne of Amiens, which was not past the English miles from thence. And being desirous to see his coming thither, toke with me one or two of my is. gentlemen, and rode incontinentlie thither, as wel to furnish me of a conuenient lodging, as to see the is. And when we came thither, being but strangers, toke by our inne at the signe of the angell, discreit against the West doze of the cathedra church de nostra Dame. After we had dined there, and taried vntill 3. or 4. of the clock, expecting the is. comming, in came madam Regent the is. mother, riding in a very rich chariot, & with her therein was the Countess of Auance her daughter, furnished with 100. or moze of ladies and gentlewomen following, euerie one riding vpon white palfreys: besides diuers and manie ladies, some in rich horsesters, and some in chariots, who lighted at the next doze with all this train of ladies and gentlewomen, besides her gard, which was not small in number.

Then within 2. houres after the king came in with a great shotte of guns, and diuers pageants made onelie for ioie of his comming, hauing about his person and beside him, beside the wonderful number of noblemen and gentlemen, thre great guards apparelled diuerslie: the first was of Switzers, and

Burgonians with gunnes and pikes: the second was of French men, some with bowes and arrows, and some with billes: the third guard pour le corps was of tall Scottes, which were more comelier persons than all the rest. The French guard and the guard of the Scots had one liuerie, being appparelled with rich coates of white cloth guarded with a rich garde of silver bullions of an h.m.dessull byoad. The king came riding vpon a goodlie gennet, and alighted at the faide great Church, and so conueyed with procession into the Bishops palace, where he was lodged, and also his mother. The next morning I rode againe to Picardie, to attend vpon my Lorde, at which time of my reioyce, my Lorde was reddie to go to horsebacke toward Amiens, and passing on his waie, he was encountred with diuers noble personages, making vnto him diuers orations in latine, to whom he made answer extempore. Then was word brought him, that the king was comming to encounter him, wherefore he had none other shift, but to light at an old chappell that stood hard by the his waie, and there he new appparelled himselfe into rich apparell, and so mounted againe vpon a molle verie richlie trapped, with a sote cloth altogether of crimosin beluet vpon beluet, purled with gold, and fringed about with gold fringe verie cosly: his stirrops of silver and gilt, the bolles of the same, and the chokes of his mules bit were all gilt. And by that time that he was mounted againe, after this gorgeous sort, the king was come verie nere, within lesse than a quarter of an English mile, mustering vpon a hill, his guard standing in array vpon the top of the same hill, expecting my lordes comming, to whom my Lord made as much haste as he conveniently might, till he came within a paire of butts lengths, and there he staid. The king perceiving that, hauing two worthy young gentlemen with him, the one called mounier Vadamont, and the other mounier de Guise, both brethren to the Cardinall of Lozaine, and to the D. of Lozaine: also being like appparelled, as the king was in purple beluet, lined with cloth of silver, their coates cut: The king caused mounier Vadamont to issue from him, and ride to my lord cardinall to know the cause of his tarrying: and this mounier being mounted vpon a faire great gennet, took his race with his horse vntill he came euen to my Lord, and there caused his horse to come aloofe twice or thrice, so nigh my Lordes moffe, that he was in doubt of his horse, and with that he alighted, and doing humble reuerence, did his message to my Lorde, and that done he mounted againe, and made his horse to doe the like at his departing, as before he had done, and so repaired againe vnto the king: and his answer ended to the king, the king auanced forwards. That seeing, my Lord did the like: and in the midway they met, embracing each other with amiable countenance and entertainment. Then theye into the place all noble men and gentlemen on both partes, with wonderfull chere made one to another, as though they had ben of old acquaintance. The place was such and so thicke, that diuers had their legges hurt with horses. Then the kings officers cried, march, march, deuant ale deuant. Then the king and the Cardinall on his right hand rode forth towards Amiens, euerie English gentleman accompanied with another of France. The traine of these two princes endured two long long English miles, they were nobly receined into the Towne of Amiens with shot of guns and collicie pageants, till the k. had brought the cardinall to his lodging, and then departed for that night, the king being lodged in the Bishops palace. The next day after dinner the cardinall rode to the court to the king, at which time the king kept his bed: yet neuertheless, the Cardinall came into his bed chamber, where, on the one side of the bed sat the kings mother, and on the other side the Cardinall of Lozaine, accompanied with diuers other noble men of France, and after a short communication and drinking of a cuppe of wine with the kings mother, he departed to his owne lodging, accompanied with diuers gentlemen and noblemen, where they supped with him. Thus continued the Cardinall and the king in Amiens, the space of a fortnight and more, consulting and feasting eche other diuers times. In Amiens the king and my Lord heard masse, and both of them receiued the sacrament. And vpon our ladie daie the assumption my Lord said masse before the Regent, and the Quene of Spauarre, and gaue them the sacrament. And there the king dyessed a number of sicke folkes. When the k. and the Cardinall remoued to a city called Champain, which was more then 20. English miles from Amiens, they were both lodged in the great castle of the towne, where of the Cardinall had the one halfe assigned him for his lodging, and the king the other halfe. And likewise they denided a long Gallerie betwene them, where was made in the midst a strong wall, with a window and a doore. The king and the Cardinall would manie times mete at the same window and talke: and diuers times they would goe into the other at the said doore. Then came there to my lord Cardinall the lord Chancelor of France, with all the kings counsellors, where they took great paines daile in consultation, insomuch that the Cardinall of England fell out with the Chancelor of France, laying to his charge, that he went about to hinder the league which before his comming was concluded, insomuch, that Adam Regent her selfe and manie nobles of France, with much labor and trauell could scarcele bring the cardinall to his former state of communication, he was in such a way against the Chancelor: by these meanes, he brought other things to passe, that before he could not attaine, which was more for feare than for any affection to the matter, he had the heads of the counsell to binder his girde. The next morning after this conflict he rose earlie about foure of the clocke, and sat him downe to write letters, into Engl and vnto the king, commanding one of his chaplaines to prepare him reddie to saie masse, insomuch that the chaplaine stood in his vestures untill foure of the clocke in the afternone: all which season the Cardinall neuer rose to cate or drinke, nor to make water, but continuallie wrote letters with his owne hand, hauing all that time his nightcap and his hercheefe on his head, and about the houre of foure in the afternone hee made an end, commanding Christopher Gunner the kings seruant, without delaye to ride post into England with those letters, whom he dispatched a waie or euer he dranke, and then went to masse, and said his seruite with his chaplaine, and then went and walked in a garden the space of an houre and more, and said his euensong, and after went both to dinner and supper all at once, and after supper, making but tarrying, scant an houre, but that he went to bed and toke his rest.

The next night after the cardinal made a great supper for madam Regent, for the Queene of Spanarre and other great estates of Ladies and Noblemen, and at the middelt of the said banquet, the kings of France and of Spanarre, came sodanelie in vpon them vnlooked for, and toke their place in the lowest part of the banquet. The supper and banquet being finished, the ladies and Gentlemen fell to dauncing, and so passed awaie the most of the night ere they departed. There was not only plenty of fine meates, but also much mirth & solace, as wel in mery communication, as with the noyse of my l. minstrels, who plaid there all that night so cunningly, that the king toke therein great pleasure, insomuch that he desired my lord to lende them vnto him for the next night, and after supper their banquet finished, the ladies and gentlemen fell to dauncing, among whom one madam Fountaine a maike had the pryce. And thus passed they the most part of the night ere they departed. The next day the king toke my lordes minstrels, and rode to a noblemans house where was some charge to whom he bowed a pilgrimage, to performe his deuotion. When he came there which was in the night, he daunced, and caused other to do the same, after the sound of my lordes minstrels, who plaid there all night, and neuer rested, so that whether it were with extreme labour of blowing, or with poison (as some iudge) because they were commended by the king more than his owne, I cannot tell, but the player on the Schalme (who was verie excellent in that instrument) died with in a day or two after. When the king returned into Champaigne, and caused a wild Boze to bee lodged for him in the forest of Champaigne, and thither the Cardinall rode with him to see him hunt, where the Ladie Regent with a number of Ladies and Damoysels were standing in Charlots, looking on the tole on the out side, which was pitched there for that purpose: among whom stood the Cardinall to regarde the hunting in Madame Regentes Charlot, and within the tople was the king with diuers minion Gentlemen of France, ready furnished to this high and dangerous enterprise of the hunting of the perillous wilde swine, the king beeing in his dublet and hozen all of sheepes colour cloth, having in his slip a brace of great white Greyhounds, who were armed as the manner there is: and the rest of the kings Gentlemen being appointed to hunt this Boze, were likewise in their dublets and hose, holding each of them in their hands verie sharp boze speares. When the king commanded the keepers to vncooch the Boze, and that euery person being within the tole should go to a standing, among whom were diuers gentlemen and yeomen of England, and incontinent the boze issued out of his den, and followed with an hound, came into a plaine, where being scaled a while, and gazing vpon the people, and incontinent pierced by the hound, hee spied a little bush standing behinde a banke, ouer a ditch (under the which laye two French gentlemen) and thither fled, trailling there to haue defended himself, who thrust his head inslitting into the same bush, which caused the two gentlemen to fly from thence, as from the danger of death. When was the boze by pursuit of hunters and the hound, bytuen from thence, who ran straight to one of the Cardinales footemen, a berie tall peoman, who hadde in his handes a Javeline, with the which hee was sayne to defende himselfe from the Boze a great while, the Boze continually foyning at him with his Tushes, so that he was sayne at last to pitch his Javeline in the grounde betweene him and the Boze: the which the Boze brake with the force of his foyning, and with that the yeoman dyede his sword, and stood at defence, and there with the hunters came to the rescue, and put him once agayne to flight: with that hee fledde to another young Gentleman of Englands, called Master Henry Rache, who was some and heire to the Lord Fitz Walter, since Earle of Suffre, who had bozowed by chaunce of a French Gentleman, a berie fyne and sharpe Boze speare, wherewith hee thrust the Boze in the mouthe, and so into the throte, whereupon the pastime was ended. In the time of the Cardinales abode in France, manie displeasures were doone against him, for all the payne and trauell he had taken for the qualifying of the French Random: and amongst other this was one: there was no place where hee lodged after hee entred the territoire of France, but that hee was robbed in his private chamber either little or much, insomuch that at Champaigne hee lost his Standish, which was all of Silver and gylte, and there it was elsed, and the partie taken, which was a boile of twelue or fourtene pæres old, a russians page of Paris, which wanted my Lordes lodging without suspition, vntill hee was taken lying vnder my Lordes private Statres, vpon which occasion he was apprehended, examined, and confessed all things that hee had stolen, the russian his master had receyued, maintained, and procured him to doo. The Cardinall revealed this to the counsell, by meanes whereof the russian was apprehended, and set on the Pillorie in the midst of the market place, which was but a small punishment for such an offence. Another displeasure was this: some letwode person hadde ingraued in my Lordes Window vpon the leaning stone there, a cardinales hat, with a paire of gallows ouer it, in derision of my Lord, with diuers other vnkinde dealinges, the which I omit to write, they be so scandalous matters. The Cardinall passing diuers dayes in consultation, and in other matters, expecting the returne of Christopher Gunner, at the last he returned with letters againe, vpon receyt whereof the Cardinall intended to remoue: being then at masse in his Cloiset, hee consecrated the Chauncelloe of Fraunce Cardinall, and put vpon him his habite, his hat and cap of Scarlet, and then toke his iourney, returning againe into England, making such necessary expedition, that hee came to Guilnes, where hee was noblely receiued by the lord Sandes then Captayne there, with all the retinue of the same. And from thence hee rode to Calcis, where hee taried the shipping of his stuffe, horses and train. And in the meane time, he established there a mart for all nations. These things and other, for the weale of the Towne and garrison by him perfect, hee tooke shipping and arrived at Dover the twenty foure of September, from thence hee rode to the Court, the king beeing in his progress at Wyndesore Wyatts house in Kent, hee went immediatlie to him, with whom hee had long talke, & continued two or thre daies there in the court, and then returned to his house at Westminster, where hee remained vntill Michaelmas Terme, which was in lesse than a fortnight after, and exercised his office of chancelorship as hee was accustomed.

Such scarcitie of bread was in London, & all England, that manie died for default thereof: the king of his goodnes sent to the citie of his owne provision 600. quarters, or else for one week there had been little bread. The bread carts coming from Stratford toward London were met at the Hile end by the citizens, so that the maiors and Sherrifs were forced to goe and release the same carts, and to see them brought to the markets appointed. Wheat was then at fifteen shillings the quarter: but shortly after the merchants of the Stilpord brought from Danke such store of Wheate and Rye, that the same was better cheape to bee solde in London, than in anie other parte of the Realme befores.

After the beginning of the terme the cardinall caused to be assembled in the Star chamber, all the noblemen, Judges, and Iustices of peace that were in Westminster hall at that time present: and there made to them a long oration, declaring the cause of his ambassage into France, and of his proceedings there: among the which he said he had concluded such an amitie, as neuer was heard in the realme before, aswell between the emperor and vs, as between the k. our soueraigne and the French k. with a perpetuall peace, the which should be confirmed in writing, sealed in fine gold: affirming further, that the k. of England should receiue yearly his tribute by that name out of the dutchie of Friesland, with all the costs which he had sustained in the warres. And also, where there was a restraint made in France of the French Dukes dowrie (whome the duke of Suffolke had married) for diuers yeres during the wars, it was concluded, that she should not only receiue it againe, but also the arrerages that were vnpaid. This peace thus concluded, there should bee such an amitie betwix the gentlemen of each realme, and entercourse of merchants, that it should seme to all men both territories to be but one monarch: gentlemen made trauell from one Countrie to another, for their recreation and pastime: the merchants being in either country assured, that they should be assured to trauele about their affaires in peace and tranquillity, so that this realme shall soie and prosper for ever, &c.

The 20. of October were receiued into London certaine ambassadors out of France, about 80. in number, of the most noble and worthy gentlemen in all France: they were lodged in the bishops palace in Pauls churchyard, to whom diuers noblemen resorted, and gaue them diuers presents, especially the maiors of the city of London, as wine, sugar, war, Capons, Wildfowle, beeres, muttens, and other necessarie things in great abundance, for the expences of their house. Then they resorted vnto the court, being at Greenwich, where they were receiued by the king. They had commission to establish the king in the order of France, for whom they brought, for that intent, a collar of fine golde, with the Michaell hanging thereat, and robes to the same order appertinant, the which was of blew velvet richly embroidered. And the king to gratifie the French k. with the semblable he sent a noble man of the order here in England, with Cartar the herault into France, to establish the French king, in the order of the Cartar, with a semblable Collar, with a Cartar and Robes according to the same.

The ambassadors remaining here untill their returne, all things being concluded concerning the perpetuall peace vpon solemne ceremonies and othes contained in certain instruments touching the same, which was confirmed by receiuing of the Sacrament in Pauls Church of London by the king, and the great master of France, who represented the king his master, and there the instruments were sealed with gold, and the king put his hand thereunto, and the great master did the like: betwixen whome the cardinall diuided the Sacrament. And that done, they departed, the k. rode with the Cardinall to Westminster, and there dined with all the Frenchmen, passing all the day after with consultation of weighty matters, touching the conclusion of the saide article of the perpetuall peace.

The king then departed again by water to Greenwich, at whose departing it was concluded by the kings deuise, that all the French men should resort to Richmond, and hunt in euery one of the parkes there: and from thence to Hampton court, and there to hunt, and the cardinall to make there a Supper or banquet, or both to them. And from thence they should ride to Windsor, and there to hunt: and after to returne to London, and so to Greenwich, and there to banquet with the k. Then was there made great preparation of all things for this great assembly at Hampton court: the cardinall called before him his principal officers, as Steward, treasurer, controller, and cleark of his kitchin, to whom he declared his mind, touching the entertainment of the Frenchmen at Hampton court; his pleasure to them known, they sent out eaters, purueuers, and other, the cookes wrought both night and day in fusticettes, the premon and gromes of the wardrobes were busied in hanging of the chambers, and furnishing the same with beds of silk and other furniture: there were provided 280. beds furnished with all manner of furniture to them belonging, to long particularly to be rehearsed.

The daie was come to the French men assigned, and they readie assembled before the house of their appointment, wherefore the Officers caused them to ride to Hampton court, a place and a Parke of the kings within three miles, there to hunt and spende the daie untill night, at which time they returned againe to Hampton court, and euery of them conueied to their severall chambers, hauing in them great fires and Wine for their comforte, remaying here untill the supper was readie. The chambers where they supped and banquetted, were ordered in this sort: first, the great Wayting Chamber was hangd with rich Arras, as none were better than other, and furnished with tall premon to serue. There were set tables round about the Chamber banquetwise couered, a cupbord was there garnished with white silver plate, hauing also in the same Chamber to giue the more light, foure plates of silver set with great lights, and a great fire of wood and coles. The next Chamber being the chamber of presence, was hangd with verie rich arras, & a sumptuous cloth of estate furnished with many goodly gentlemen to serue the tables ordered in manner as the other Chamber was, saying that the high Table was remoued beneath the cloth of estate toward the middell of the chamber covered. Then was there a cupbord, being in length as broad as the chamber, with fire besides of bright, garnished with gilt plate, hauing with lights one paire of candlesticks of silver and gilt, being curiously wrought, which cost three hundred markes, and standing vpon the same two lights of waere burning as big as torches to set it forth. This cupbord was barred round about, that no man could come nigh it, for there was none of all this plate touched in this banquet, for there was sufficient besides. The plates that hung on the wals to giue light were of silver and gilt, hauing in them great prachers of waere burning, a great fire in the chimney, and all other things necessarie for the furniture of so noble a feast. Now was all things in a readinesse. The trumpets were blown to warne to supper: the officers discretely conducted the noble men from their chambers into the chamber where they should sup, and caused them there to sit downe, and that done, their seruice came vpp in such abundance both costly and full of subtilties, and with such a pleasant noise of instruments of musicks, that the French men (as it seemed) were rapt into a heauenly paradise. The Cardinall was not yet come, but they were merrie and pleasant. Before the second course, the Cardinall came in booted and spurred, all boately amongst them, and bade them Proface: at whols comming there was great iole, with rising euerie man from his place. The cardinall caused them to sit still and keepe their courtes, and being in his apparel as he rode, called for a chaire & late in the midd of the high table. Anone came by the second course, with so many dishes, subtilties, and deuises, above a hundred in number, which were of so goodly proportion & costly, that I thinke the Frenchmen neuer saw the like, the wonder was no lesse than it was two the indede. There were castles with images, in the same Pauls church, for the quantity, as well counterfitted, as the Painter should haue painted it on a cloth of wall. There were beasts, birds, and personages, most liuely made and counterfitted, some fighting with swords, some with guns, & crossbowes, some baughting and leaping, some dancing with labies, some on horses in complete harness, iustling with long and sharpe speares, with many more deuises. Among all other was a chesse-boarde made of spiced plate, with men there of the same, and for the good proportion, and because the French men be verie expert in that play, my lord Cardinall gaue the same to a gentleman of France, commanding there should be made a goodly case for the preservation thereof in all haste, that he might conuey the same into his countrey. Then toke my lord a boile of gold filled with hypocrase, and putting off his cap, said: I thinke to the king my loueraigne lord, and next, vnto the king your master, and therewith thanke a god brought: and when he had done, he desired the grand master to pledge him cup and al, the which was well worth 500. markes, and so caused all the boords to pledge these two royall princes: then went the cups so merrely about, that manie of the French men were faine to be led to their beds.

Then rose by the Cardinall, and went into his private chamber to pull off his bootes, and to shift him, and then went he to supper in his private chamber, and making a verie short supper, returned into the chamber of presence among the Frenchmen, vising them so louingly and familiarly, that they could not commend him too much: and whilst they were in communication and other pastimes, all their liueries were serued to their chambers, euery chamber had a balon and an ewer of silver, a great liuerie pot of silver, and some gilt, yea and some chamber had two liuerie pots, with wine and beere: a silver candlesticke, both white and plaine, hauing in it two sizes, and a staffe torch of waere, a fine manchete, and a cheate loafe. Thus was euery chamber furnished through all the house: and yet the cupbords in the two banquetting chambers not once touched.

Thus, when it was more than time conuenient, they were conueled to their lodgings, where they rested that night.

In the morning they dined with the Cardinall, and so departed to Windsor. After the returne of the strangers from Windsor, which place, with the order thereof they much commended: The day approached that they were by the king invited to the court, where first they dined, and after dancing & other pastimes by them done, the time of supper came on. Then was the banquetting chamber in the tilt yard at Grenewich, to the which place these strangers were conducted by the noblest personages in the court, where they did both sup and banquet. But to describe to you the order, the dishes, the subtilties, and strange deuises of the same, I lacke both a head of fine wit, and also cunning in my bolvels to declare these wonderfull deuises. But this ye shall understand, although it were marvellous sumptuous at Hampton court, yet that notwithstanding this banquet excelled the same, as far as golde doth exceede silver in value of weight for weight, and the beholders professed neuer to haue sene the like.

In the middell of this banquet, there was tourneying at the barriers, with liuely gentlemen in complete harness very gorgeous on horse. Then was there the like on horsebacke. And after all this was the most goodliest disguising or enterlude made in latine, the players being so rich, and of so strange deuises, that it passeth my capacity to expound.

This done, there came such a number of the fairest ladies and gentlewomen that bare any byte of beauty in all the realme, in most richest apparell that might be deuised, with whom the gentlemen of France danced, untill a gorgeous maske came in of gentlemen, who danced and masked with these ladies. This done, came in a maske of ladies: these ladies toke each of them one of the Frenchmen to dance and to maske: these women masters spake good French to the Frenchmen, which delighted them very much to heare these ladies speake to them in their mother tongue.

Thus was this night consumed, from flue of the clocke untill three of the clocke after midnight, and then euerie man departed to their lodgings. After all this solemne chere at a daie appointed, they resorted to the court to take their leaue of the king and other noble men: then came they to Westminster vnto the cardinall, of whom they receiued the kings rewards, the which were these: euery man of honour and estimation had plate, some to the value of thre or foure hundred pound, and some more, and some lesse, besides other great gifts received before of the king, as gownes of velvet with rich furs, great chaines of golde, and goodlie horses, with diuers other gifts, and the least of them had a sum of crownes of gold: the worst page amongst them had twentie crownes for his part: and being thus noble rewarded, they departed.

A French Cracer sailed to the Tower wharffe of London.

A French cracer, of 30. tunne, being manned with eight and thirty French men, and a Flemish cracer of seauen and twentie tun, and foure and twentie Flemings, meeting at Hargate, the one chased the other along the river of Chamis to the Tower wharffe of London, where sir Edmond Wallingham lieutenant of the Tower, staied them both, and take both their captaines and men.

The 17. day of June, the terme was adourned to Michaelmas, because of the sweating sickness that then reigned in the city of London, and there was no such watch at Midsummer, as before time had bene accustomed: of this sickness died manie sodainlie in the kings court, namely sir William Compton, sir Francis Pointes, and other, who died with little warning. The king for a space removed almost euery daie till he came to Titenhanger, a place of the abbot of Saint Albons, and there he with the quene, and a small company about them, remained till the sickness was past.

Before the cardinals going into France in the preceding page, it was talked among the people, that king Henry (as ye haue heard) was by some perswaded, that his marriage with quene Katherine could not be good nor lawful, wherefore he determined to haue the case examined, cleared and adiudged by learning, law, & sufficient authoritie. The cardinall was by some put in blame for that scruple now cast into the kings conscience, for the hate he bare to the Emperor, and therefore he did not only procure the king of England to ioinc in friendship with the French king, but also (as they said) sought a diuorce betwixt the king and the quene. But howsoeuer it came about that the li. was thus troubled in conscience concerning his marriage, it followed, that to haue the doubt clearly removed, he called together the best learned of the realme, which were of severall opinions, wherefore he thought to knowe the truth by indifferent iudges, lest perauenture the Spaniards and other would say that his owne subiects were not indifferent iudges in this behalfe, and the refore wrote his cause to Rome, as also (as ye haue heard) sent to the Universities of Italie & France for their opinions: and desired the court of Rome to send into the realme a legate which should be indifferent, and of great and profound iudgement to heare the cause debated. At whose request the whole consistorie of the Colledge of Rome, sent thither Laurence Campeius a Priest Cardinall, a man of great wit and experience, which had bene sent hither before in the 10. yere of this king, as ye haue heard, and with him was ioined in commission the Cardinall of Poike, and Legate of England. This cardinall Campeius by long tourneys came into England, and much preparation was made to receiue him triumphantly into London: but he was so fore bereft with the gout, that he refused all such solemnities, and desired that he might without without pompe be conueied to his lodging for his more quiet and rest: and so on the 9. of October he came from S. Mary Werles by water to the Wilt. of Bathes place without Temple barre, where hee was visited of the cardinal of Poike, & diuers other estates and prelates: and after he had rested him a season, he was brought to the R. presence, then being at Wyndeswell, by the cardinal of Poike, and was caried in a chaire between 4. persons, for he was not able to stand, & the cardinal of Poike & hee satte both on the right hand of the R. throne, and the one Francisco secretary to cardinal Campeius made an eloquent oration in Latine: in which he rehearsed first, with what cruelty the emperors soldiers had molested the pope, what tyrannie they had shewed to the cardinals and priests, what sacrilege and spoile they had committed in S. Peters church, how they had violated virgins, rauished mens wiues, and in conclusion, spoiled, robbed, and tormented all the Romans and inhabitants in the citie of Rome. And further he shewed what friendship the colledge of Rome founde at the R. hands, & the French kings in the time of that tribulation, that if they had not ioined together, the city of Rome with all their gouernors had bin brought to utter ruine: for the which he saide, pope Clement and all his Colledge of Cardinals, and the Senators of the Citie with all the Citizens rendred to the king their heartie thanks, and promised him their loue and fauor, and amitie perpetual.

Oration

To the which Oration Doctor Foxe Brouncker of Cambridge, made a discrete aunswere: and as to the first point, hee declared that the king much lamented to heare his friends; yea, or anie other Chyistian men to be handled with such tyrannie: and as touching the seconde point, hee sayde that the king did but the duettie of a Chyistian Prince to relieue his friends being in captiuitie, for the which hee would that the whole citie of Rome should giue thanks to God, and not to him. After which answere made, the two Legates communed secretlie with the king a long space, and after departed to their lodging. Of the coming of this Legate the people, especially the Women, talked largely, and said, that the king would for his owne pleasure haue another wife, & had sent for this Legate to be diuorced from his Quene, with manie foolish wordes, insomuch, that whosoever spake against the marriage, was of the common people abhorred and reprobud, which common rumour was related to the king. Wherefore he like a prudent prince, willing all men to knowe his intent and purpose, caused all his nobilitie, iudges, and counsellors, with diuers other persons, to come to his place of Wyndeswell on Sonday the 8. of September at afternoone, in his great chamber, and there to them sayde, as neere as I coulde carie awaie (saith Hall) in these wordes following: Our trustie and welbeloued subiects, both you of the nobilitie, and you of a meaner sort, it is not unknowne to you that we, both by gods prouision, and true and lawfull inheritance, haue reigned ouer this realme almost 20. yeres: during which time, wee haue so ordered vs, thanked dee God, that no outward enemy hath oppressed you, nor taken anie thing from vs, nor we haue invaded no realme but we haue had victorie and honor, so that we thinke you may none of your predecessors neuer liued more quietlie, more wealthy, nor in more estimation under ante of our noble progenitors. But when we remember our mortality, and that we must die, then we thinke that all our doings in our little time are clearely defaced, and worthe of no memorie, if we leaue you in trouble at the time of our death. For if our true heire be not known at the time of our death, see what trouble shall succed to you and your children. The experience thereof some of you haue sene, after the death of our noble grandfather Edward the 4. and some haue heard what manslaughter continued in this realme betwene the houses of Yorke and Lancaster, by the which dissension this realme was like to haue bene cleerly destroyed. And although it hath pleased God to send vs a faire daughter of a noble woman and me, begotten to our great comfort, yet it hath bene tolde vs by diuers great clarkes, that neither she is our lawfull daughter, nor her mother our lawfull wife, but that we liue together abominably and detestably in open adultery, insomuch, that when our ambassade was last in France, and motion was made, that the D. of Blyssance should marrie our said daughter, one of the chiefe counsellors to the French king saide: It were well done to know whether she be the king of Englands lawfull daughter, or not: for well knowne it is, that he begate her on his brothers wife, which is direadly against Gods law, and his precept. Thinke you (my lords) that these wordes touch not my bodie and soule: thinke you that these doings doe not daily and hourly trouble my conscience and ber my spirits: Yes: we doubt not but if it were your owne cause, euery man would seeke remedie, when the perill of your soule, and the losse of your inheritance is openly laid to you. For this onely cause I protest before God, and in the word of a prince, I haue asked counsell of the greatest clarkes in christendome, and for this cause I haue sent for this legat, as a man indifferent, only to know the truth, and to settle my conscience, and for none other cause, as God can iudge. And as touching the D. if it be iudged by the law of God, that she is my lawfull wife, there was neuer thing more acceptable to me in my life, both for the discharge of my conscience, & also for the good qualities and conditions which I know to be in her: for I assure you all, that be shee her noble parentage of the which she is descended (as all you know) she is a woman of most gentleness, of most humilitie, and bounties, yea, and of all good qualities appertaining to nobilitie, she is without comparison, as I these 20. yeres almost haue had the true experiment, so that if I were to marrie againe, if the marriage might be good, I would sorely chuse her above all other women: but if it be determined by iudgement, that our marriage was against Gods law and cleerly void, then I shall not only sorrow the departing from so good a lady and loving companion, but much more lament and bewaile my infortunat chance, that I haue so long liued in adultery to Gods great displeasure, and haue no true heire of my bodie to inherite this realme. These be the sorres that bere my minde, these be the pangues that trouble my conscience, and for these grieues I seeke a remedie: therefore I requite of you all as our trust and confidence is in you, to declare to our subjects our intent, according to our true meaning, and desire them to praie with vs that the truth may be known, for the discharge of our conscience, & saving of our soule: and for declaration hereof I haue assembled you together, and now you maie depart.

To see what countenance was made amongst the hearers of this oration, it was a strange sight, for some sighed & said nothing, other were for to heare the D. so troubled in his conscience: others fauouring the D. much sorrowed, that this matter was now opened, and so euery man spake as his hart serued him: thus much Hall. And thus G. C. The cardinall of Yorke saith he, being prouoked to declare his opinion, and to decide in the aduancement of the kings purpose, who thought it not mete to wade too far alone, or to giue his haste ingement in so weighty a matter, desired of the D. licence to alke counsel of men of famous learning, both in the diuine and ciuill lawes. What obtained, by his legantine authoritie, he sent his commission out for all the bishops of the realme that were learned in either of the said lawes, or had in any high estimation for their prudent counsel and iudgement, in princelie affaires of long experience. Then assembled those noble prelates and notable clarks of both vniuersities of Oxforde and Cambridge, as also of diuers cathedrall churches of this realme accounted learned, and of witty discretion in determination of doubtfull questions. Then was this matter of the kings case consulted of from day to day, that it was to the learned a godly hearing: but in fine the ancient fathers of both lawes, departed with one iudgement, contrary to the princelie expectation. Then was it thought expedient, that the D. should send out his commissioners into all the vniuersities of christendome, to bring with them the definition of their opinions in the same vnder the seale of euery vniuersitie, which they obtained. Having now a sure stasse to stand by, these proceedings declared to the cardinall, he sent againe for the bishops, to whom he declared the trauell of these commissioners. And for assurance thereof, he shewd them the instruments of euery vniuersity vnder their seuerall seales. They went once againe to consultation. It was then concluded, that the king should send to the pope, declaring the opinions of these vniuersities, authorized by their common seales: to the which it was thought that the consent of these prelates of this realme should be necessary to be sent thither, altogether comprised in an instrument, sealed with all their seales annexed to the said instrument. Not long after the ambassadors were assigned to trauell in the matter, hauing certaine instructions, among which one was this, that if the Pope would not giue iudgement definitive in the kings case, to requite another commission to be granted vnder lead, to stablish a court to be kept in England, for that purpose directed to the lord cardinall and legat of England, and to the cardinal Campeius, who was then (though he were a stranger) bishop of Bath (the which the king had giuen him) to determine, and iustly to iudge according to conscience and discretion: To the which, after long suite made, and the good will of the same Cardinall obtained to trauell into England, the pope granted to their suite, and the cardinall arrived in England, as ye before haue heard.

Now after some deliberation and consultation in the ordering and bing of the kings matters, and his commission, and the articles of his ambassade same and read, and digested, it was determined, that the king and Queene his wife should be lodged at Whitehall. And then in the blacke friars a certayne place was there appointed most convenient for the is. and queenes repaire to the Court, there to bee kept for the disposition and determination of the case, whereas these two legates sate as Iudges, before whom the king and Q. were ascited and sommoned to appeare: which was a strange sight, and the newest deaile that ever was read or heard of before in any region, city, or churche, a king and a Queene to be constrained by proccesse compellatorie to appeere in any court as common persons within their owne Realme and dominion, to abide the iudgements and decrees of their owne subiects, being the royall dignitie and prerogative thereof. Ye shall vnderstande (as I haue sayde before) that there was a court erected in the blacke friars in London, whereas sate these two cardinals for Iudges in the same, in the moneths of Aprill, Maie, June, and Iulie. Nowe will I set you out the manner and order of the same court: first, there was a court platted in Tables and Benches in manner of a Consistorie, one seate rayfed higher for the Iudges to sit on than the other were. Then as it were in the middell of the sayde Iudges aloft about them 3. degrees high, was a cloth of estate hanged, with a Chaire royall vnder the same, wherein sate the king, and besides him, some distance from him sate the Q. and vnder the Iudges sat sate the scribes and other necessary officers for the execution of the proccesse, and other things appertaining to such a court: the chiefe scribe was D. Scuens, after B. of Winchester, and the apparator, who was Caller of the Court, was one Cooke (most commonly called Cooke of Winchester.) Then before the king and the Iudges within the court sate the Archb. of Canterb. D. Warham, and all the other bishops. Then stood at both endes within, the counsellors learned in the lawes, as well the kinges as the Quenes. The doctors of law for the king, were doctor Simpfon that was after bishop of Winchester, and doctor Bell, that was after bishop of Worcester, with divers other, and doctors in the same law on the same side were, doctor Peter, doctor Tregonel, with others. On the other side for the Q. were doctor Fisher B. of Rochester, doctor Scandish, and doctor Ridley, a verie small man of stature, but surelie a great and excellent clarke in divinitie. Thus was the court furnished. The Iudges commaunded the cryer to proclaim silence whilste their commission was read, both to the court, and to the people assembled. What done, the scribes commaunded the cryer to call the king by the name of king Henry of Englande, come into the Court, &c. Whith that the king answered and sayde: Here. Then called hee the Queene, by the name of Katherine Queene of Englande, come into the Court, &c. Whom hee no answer, but rose incontinent out of her Chayze, and because shee coulde not come to the king directlie, for the distance severed betwene them, shee went about by the Court, and came to the king, kneeling downe at his feete in the sight of all the Court and people, to whom shee sayde in effect these wordes, as foloweth: Sp? (quoth shee) I desire you to doe mee iustice and right, and take some pite upon mee, for I am a poore woman, and a stranger, borne out of your dominion, having heere no indifferent Counsell, and lesse advantage of

friendship: Alas sir, what have I offended you, or what occasion of displeasure have I shewed you, intending thus to put me from you after this sort? I take god to my Iudge, I have been to you a true and an humble wife, ever conformable to your will & pleasure, that never contraried or gainesaid any thing thereof, and being alwaies contented with all things wherunto you had any delight or baliance, whether little or much, without grudge or countenance of discontentation or displeasure: I loved for your sake all the whom you loved, whether I had cause or no cause, whether they were my friends or enemies. I have bene your wife these twentie yeeres or mo. and you have had by me divers children, and when ye had me at the first, I take God to be my Iudge, that I was a verie maid, and whether it be true or no, I put it to your conscience. If there be any fault that you can alledge against me, either of dishonestie, or matter lawfull to put me from you, I am content to depart to my shame and rebuke: and if there be none, then I praye you to let me have iustice at your hand. The king your father was in his time of such an excellent wit, that he was accounted among all men for wisdome to be a second Salomon; and the king of Spaine my father Ferdinando has reckoned one of the wisest princes that reigned in Spaine many yeeres before: it is not therefore to be doubted, but that they had gathered as wise counsellors unto them of every realme, as to their wisdomes they thought meete, and as to me surely there were in those daies as wise and well learned in both the realmes, as be at this daie, who thought the marriage betwene you and me good and lawfull: therefore it is a wonder to me to heare, what new inventions are now invented against me that never intended but honestie: and now to come me to stand to the order and iudgement of this court, ye should (as I sayd to me) doe me much wrong, for ye make condemne me for lacke of answer, having no counsell but such as ye have assigned me: ye must consider that they cannot be indifferent on my part when they be your own subiects, and such as ye have taken and chosen out of your owne counsell, whereunto they be partiall, and dare not disclose your will and intent. Therefore I humble desire you in the way of charitie to spare me, untill I may know what counsell and advice my friends in Spaine will advise me to take, and if you will not, then your pleasure be fulfilled: and with that she arose up, making a low courtesy to the king, and departed from thence, supposing that she would have resorted againe to her former place. But she took her way straight out of the court, leaning upon the arme of one of her servants, who was her general receiver, called M. Griffith. The king being advertised that she was ready to go out of the house, where the court was kept, commaunded the cryer to call her againe, who called her by the words, Katherine Q. of Engl. and, come into the court: with that quoth M. Griffith, Spadam, ye be called againe. Wh. on (quoth she) it maketh no matter, it is no indifferent court for me, therefore I will not tarry, go on your waies: and thus she departed without any further answer at that time. On any other, and never would appeare after in any court. The king perceiving she was departed thus, and considering her words which she pronounced before him, said to the audience these wordes in effect: For as much (quoth he)

as the Quene is gone, I will in her absence declare vnto you all: She hath ben to me as true, as obedient, and as comfortable a wife, as I would wish or desire: she hath all the vertuous qualities that ought to be in a woman of her dignity, or in any other of a baser estate: she is also surely a noble woman borne, her conditions will well declare the same. With that (quoth cardinal Wolsey) Sir, I most humbly require your highnes, to declare before al this audience, whether I haue bene the chiefe and first mouer of this matter vnto your maiestie or no, for I am greatly suspected herein. Sp. 3.0.0. Cardinal (quoth the k.) I can well excuse you in this matter: marie (quoth he) ye haue bene rather against me in the tempting hereof, than a setter forward or mouer of the same: the special cause that moued me vnto this matter, was a certaine scrupulositie that picked my conscience, vpon certain wordes spoken at a time when it was, by the B. of Wapton the french ambassadoe, who had been hither sent vpon the debating of a marriage to be concluded betwene the princeesse our daughter the ladie Mary, and the Duke of Orleans, second son to the k. of France, and vpon the resolution and determination of the same, he desired despite to aduertise the king his master thereof, whether our daughter Mary should be legitimate, in respect of this my marriage with this woman, being sometime my brothers wife: which wordes once concluded within the secret bottom of my conscience, engendred such a scrupulous doubt, that my conscience was incontinently accombyed, bered and disquieted, whereby I thought my selfe to be greatly in danger of Gods indignation, which appeared to be (as me seemed) the rather, for that he sent vs no issue male: & all such issues male as my said wife had by me, died incontinent after they came into the world, so that I doubted the great displeasure of God in that behalfe. Thus my conscience being tossed in the waues of a scrupulous conscience, & partly in despaire to haue any other issue than I had already by this ladie now my wife, it behoued me further to consider the state of this realme, and the danger that it stood in for lacke of a prince to succede me, I thought it good in releafe of the weightie burden of my weak conscience, & also the quiet estate of this woorthie realme, to attempt the lawe therein, whether I made lawfull take another wife moze lawfully, by whom God made send me moze issue, in case this my first copulation was not good, without any carnal concupiscence, and not for any displeasure or misliking of the quanes person and age, with whom I would be as well contented to continue, if our marriage may stand with the lawes of God, as with any woman aliu: in which point consisteth all this doubt that we go about now to trie, by the learning, wisdome, & iudgement of you our prelates and pastors of all this our realme and dominion now here assembled for that purpose, to whose conscience and learning I haue committed the charge and iudgement, according to the which, I will (God willing) be right well content to submit my selfe, and for my part obey the same: where- in, after that I perceived my conscience to doubtfull, I moued it in confession to you my lord of Lincoln then ghosly father: and for as much as then you your selfe were in some doubt, you moued me to aske the counsel of al you my lords: whereupon I moued you my lord of Canterburie, first to haue your con-

cence, in as much as you were metropolitan, to put this matter in question, and so I did of all you my lords, to which you granted vnder your seales, and that I haue here to be shewed. That is truth, if it please your grace, quoth the archbishop of Canterburie, I doubt not but my brethren here present will acknowledge the same: so fir not so, vnder your correction, quoth the bishop of Rochester, for you haue not mine: so, ah, quoth the king, loke here, is not this your hand and seale, and shewed him the instrument with seales: so forth, quoth the bishop. Howsaie you to that, quoth the k. to the archbishop of Canterburie: Sir, it is his hand and his seale, said my L. of Canterburie. So my lord (quoth the bishop of Rochester) indeed you were in hand with me to haue both my hand and seale, as other of my lords haue done, but then I said again to you, that I would neuer consent to any such act, for it was much against my conscience, and therefore my hand and seale should neuer be set to any such instrument, God willing, with much moze matter touching the same communication betwene vs. You saie truth, quoth the archbishop of Canterburie, such wordes you had vnto me, but you were fully resolu'd at last, that I should subscribe your name, and put to your seale my selfe, and you would allow the same. All which, quoth the bishop of Rochester, vnder your correction my lord, is not true. Well, well (quoth the king) it maketh no great matter, we will not stand with you in argument, you are but one man. And then the king rose vp, and the court was adioyned untill another daie.

The next court daie the cardinals saie againe, at which time the counsell on both sides were there ready to answer: the kings counsell alleged the matrimonic not to be lawfull at the beginning, because of the carnall copulation had betwene prince Arthure and the Quene. This matter being vertie vehemently touched on that side, and to proue it, they alleged manie reasons and similitudes of truth, and being answered negatively againe on the other side, it seemed that all their former allegations were verie doubtfull to be tried, and that no man knew the truth. Yes (quoth the bishop of Rochester) I know the truth: how know you (quoth my L. cardinal) the truth moze than any other person: Yes forsooth my lord (quoth he) Quia ego sum professor veritatis, therefore I know the truth: I know that God is truth it selfe, and he neuer saith but truth, and God said: Quos Deus coniunxit, homo non separet. And so as much as this marriage was ioued and made by God to a good intent, I saie that I know the truth; and that man cannot beake vpon any lawfull occasion that which God hath made and constituted. So much both all faithfull men (quoth my lord cardinal) know as well as you, yet this reason is not sufficient in this case, for the kings counsell doe alledge diuers presumptions to proue that it was not lawfull at the beginning. Ergo it was not ordained by God, for God doth nothing without a due order, therefore it is not to be doubted, but if the presumptions be true, which they do alledge to be most true; then the conclusion was, we could not be of God. Therefore I saie to you my lord of Rochester, ye know not the truth, unless ye can auoid their presumptions by iust reasons. Then quoth doct. Ridley, it is a shame and a great dishonour to this honorable presence, that any such presumption should be alleged in this open court, which be to detestable to be rehearsed: what (quoth my lord cardinal) Dominus doctor magis reuerenter? No, no, my L. (quoth he) there be although no reuerence to be giuen to this matter, for an irreuerent matter too shold be irreuerently answered: and there they left, and proceeded for th with othe matter.

Thus the court passed from session to session, and daie to daie, that at a certaine daie of their session, the king sent for my L. cardinal to come to him to Wyndesore, who to accomplish his commandement went to him, and being there with him in communication in his private chamber from 11. vnto 12. of the clocke at none and past, my L. cardinal departed from the k. and toke his barge at the Blacke friers, and went to his house at Westminster. The Bishop of Carlisle being in his barge, said vnto him, winding his face, it is a hot daie quoth he: For my L. (quoth the cardinal) if ye had been as well chased as I haue bin within this holmer, ye would saie it were verie hot: and as soon as he came home to his house at Westminster, he went incontinent to his naked bed, where he had not laine full two holwers, but that my L. of Westmire came to speake with him of a message from the k. My Lord vnderstanding of his coming, commanded he should be brought to his bed side, and he being there, shewed him the k. pleasure was that he should incontinent go with the other cardinal vnto the Q. (who was then in Wyndesore in her chamber there) to perswade with her by their wisdomes, and to aduise her to surrender the whole matter into the kings hands, by her owne consent & will, which should be much better to her honour, than to stand to the trial of law, and thereby to be condemned, which should seeme much to her dishonour. So full the kings pleasure, my L. said he was ready, and would prepare him to go thither out of hand, &c. When my L. arose, and made him ready, taking his barge, and went straight to the place to cardinal Campeius, and so went together to Wyndesore, directly to the queenes lodging, & being in her chamber of presence, they shewed the gentleman vsher that they came to speake with the Q. grace. The gentleman vsher aduertised the queen, that the cardinals were come to speak with her: with that she rose vpp, and with a sicke of white sypar about her neck, came into her chamber of presence, where the cardinals were attending, at whose coming, quoth she, Alacke my lords, I am verie soyle to make you attend vpon me, what is your pleasure with me: If it please your grace (quoth cardinal Wolsey) to go into your private chamber, we will shew you the cause of our coming: My lord (quoth she) if ye haue any thing to saie, speake it openly before all these folke: for I feare nothing that yee can say against me, but that I would all the world should heare and see it, and therefore speake your mind openly I praise you. When began the cardinal to speake to her in Latine. Say good my L. (quoth she) speake to me in English, for I can (I thanke God) both speake and vnderstand English, although I vnderstand some latin. Forsooth (quoth the Cardinal) good madam, if it please your grace, we come both to knowe your munde how you are disposed to do in this matter betwene the king and you, and also to declare secretly our opinions and counsell vnto you, which we do only for very zeale and obediens we beare vnto your grace.

My

My lord (quoth she) I thanke you for your good will: but to make you answer in your request, I can not so suddenly, for I was set among my maids at work, thinking full little of any such matter, wherein there needeth a longer deliberation, and a better head than mine to make answer: for I need of counsell in this case, which toucheth me so nere, and for any counsell or friendship that I can find in England, they are not for my profit: what thinke you I praise you my lords, will any English man counsel me, or be friendly to me against the k. pleasure, that be his subiects? nay forsooth: and as for my counsell in whom I will put my trust, they be not here, they be in Spaine in mine owne country: and my lords, I am a poore woman lacking wit to answer to any such noble persons of wisdom as you be in so weighty a matter, therefore I pray you, be good vnto me poore woman, destitute of friends here in a forein region, and your counsell also I will be glad to heare: and therewith she toke the cardinal by the hand, & led him into her private chamber with the other cardinal, where they taried a season talking with the queene: which communication ended, they departed to the king, making to him relation of her talke, and after returned home to supper. Thus this case went forward from court to court, til it came to iudgement, so that every man expected iudgement would be giuen the next day, at which day the king came thither, and set him down in a chaire within a doore, in the end of the gallerie (which opened directly against the iudgement seate) to heare the iudgement giuen, at which time, all their proceedings were openly read in Latine. That done, the kings counsell at the barre called for iudgement, with that (quoth Cardinal Campeius) I will not giue iudgement till I haue made relation to the pope of all our proceedings, whose counsell and commandement in this case I will obserue, the matter is too high for vs to giue any hasty iudgement, considering the highnes of the persons, and the doubtful occasions alledged: and also whose commissioners we be, vnder whose authority we sit, it were therefore reason that we should make our chiefe head a counsell in the same, before we proceed to iudgement definitive. I come not to please for fauor, meede, or dread of any person alive, be he king or other wise, I haue no such respect to the person, that I will offend my conscience, I will not for the fauor or displeasure of any high estate, do that thing that should be against the will of God, I am an old man both weak and sickly, that loke daily for death, &c. And for as much as I do vnderstand, hauing percellurance by the allegations in the matter, the case is very doubtful, and also the party defendant will make none answer, but both rather appeale from vs, supposing that we be not indifferent, considering the kings high dignitie and authority within his owne realme, which he hath ouer his subiects, and we being his subiects, he thinketh that we cannot do iustice for feare of displeasure. Therefore to auoide all these ambiguities and doubts, I will not waite any further in this matter, vntlesse I haue the iust opinion and assent of the pope, and such other of more experience, or as he seeme better in such doubtful lawes, than I am: wherefore I will adioyne the court for this time, according to the order of the court of Rome, from whence semblable iurisdiction is deriued: and if we should go further than our commission doth warrant vs, it were great folie and much to our blames, and maie be accounted breakers of the order of the high court, from which (as I said) our authoritie be deriued. And with that the court was dissolved, and no more done. Then slept forth the duke of Suffolke from the king, and spake with an haull countenance these words: It was neuer merite in England (quoth he) while we had any cardinals among vs: which wordes were set forth both with countenance and beheniencie, that all men marvelled what he intended, to whom no man made answer. Then the Duke spake againe in great despight, to the which our Cardinall (perceiuing his beheniencie) soberlie made answer, &c. This matter continued thus a long season, and my Lord Cardinall was in displeasure with the king, for that the matter in his suite toke no better successe to his purpose, not withstanding my L. excused him by his commission, which gaue him no authoritie to proceed in iudgement without knowledge of the pope, who reserved the same to himselfe. At the last they were aduertised by their post, that the Pope would take deliberation in the matter, untill his courts were opened, which should not be before Bartholome wride next. The king considering the time so long ere it should be determined, thought it good to send an ambassado: to the pope to perswade with him, to shew such honorable fauor: vnto his maiestie, that the matter might sooner be ended than it was like to be, docto: Stephen Gardener secretary was thither sent, and there tarried till the latter end of summer. The king commanded the queene to be removed out of the court, and sent to another place: and his highnes rode in his progresse. And when H. Secretarie was returned from Rome, Cardinall Campeius made suite to be discharged, and was admitted to returne to Rome.

Cardinall Campeius toke his iourney towards Rome, with the kings reward, but that it was I am vncertaine: neuertheless after their departure it was reported vnto the king by the counsell, that cardinall Campeius was departed, & caried with him great treasures of my L. cardinals of England, to be conuaid in great sums to Rome, whither they furnished he would secretly repaire out of the realme: inso much as they caused a post to ride after the Cardinall to search him. And when they ouertooke him at Calie (where he was staied untill search was made) here was not found so much money as he receiued of the kings reward, and so he was dismissed, and went his wate.

After that Cardinall Campeius was thus departed and gone, Michaellmas terme drew on, against which time my L. cardinall resorted vnto his house at Westminster: and when the terme began, he went vnto the hall in such like sort and gesture, as he was accustomed most commonly to do, and sat in the Chancerie being then Chancelor: after which date he neuer sat more.

The next daie he tarried at home expecting the coming of the Dukes of Suffolke & Rosse, who came not that daie: but the next day, to wit, the 18. day of October, they came thither vnto him, to whom they declared the kings pleasure, which was that he should surrender and deliver by the great scale vnto the king, and to depart simple vnto either, which was an house situate nigh vnto Hampton court, belonging to the bishopricke of Winchester. The cardinall demanded of them their commission that gaue them such authoritie:

who answered againe, that they were sufficient commissioners, and had authoritie to doe no lesse by the kings mouth: notwithstanding he would in no wise agree in that behalfe, without further knowledge of their authoritie, saying: That the great scale was deliuered him by the kings person, to enioy the ministracion thereof, with the ronne of the Chancelor, for the terme of his life, wherof for his surety he had the 2. letters patentes: which matter was greatly debated betwene him and the dukes, with manie great and heinous wordes, inso much that the dukes were faine to depart againe without their purpose, and rode to Windsor to the king, and made report accordingly: but the next day they returned againe, bringing with them the kings letters. Then the cardinall deliuered vnto them the great scale, & was content to depart simply, taking with him nothing but only certaine provision for his house: and after long talke betwene him and the dukes, they departed with the great scale of England, and brought the same to the king. Then the cardinall called all his officers before him, & toke account of them for all such stuffe wherof they had charge, and in his galerie were set diuers tables, wherupon lay a great number of golby rich stuffe, as whole pieces of silke of all colours, velvet, satin, damaske, taffata, grograin and other things: also there lay 1000. pieces of fine Holland cloth. There was laid on euery table books, reporting the contents of the same, and so was there inuentories of all things in order against the kings coming. He caused to be hanged the wals of the gallery on the one side, with cloth of gold, cloth of tissue, cloth of siluer, and rich cloth of bodden of diuers colours: on the other side were hanged the richest sute of copes of his owne provision made for his colleges of Wyndesore and Ipswich, that euer was scene in England. Then had he two chambers adioining to the galerie, the one most commonlie called the guilt chamber, and the other the counsell chamber, wherin were set by two broad and long tables vpon trestles, wherupon was set such a number of plate of all sortes, as was almost incredible. In the guilt chamber were set out vpon the table nothing but guilt plate, and vpon a cupboard and in a window was set no plate but gold, very rich: and in the counsell chamber was all white & parcell guilt plate, and vnder the table in baskets was all old broken siluer plate, and bookes set by them, purporting euery kind of plate, and euery parcell, with the contents of the ounces thereof. Thus was all things prepared, giuing charge of all the said stuffe, with all other remaining in euery office, to be deliuered to the 2. to make answer to their charge: for the order was such, that euery officer was charged with the receipt of the stuffe belonging to his office by indenture. When all things being ordered, as to before rehearsed, my lord prepared him to depart by water, and before his going sir William Gascoine being his treasurer, came vnto him (to whome he gaue among other the charge of the deliuerie of the said goods to be deliuered vnto the king) and said vnto the cardinall (then being his lord and master. Sit (quoth he) I am loy for your grace: for ye shall go straight way to the tower, as I heare say. Is this the good comfort and counsel? quoth my L. cardinall vnto him) that you can giue your master in aduersity? It hath ben alwaies your natural inclination to be very light of credit, & much more light of reporting ites. I would you should know sir William, and all those reporters, that it is untrue, for I neuer deferred to come there, although it hath pleased the king to take my house ready furnished for his pleasure at this time. I would all the world knew that I haue nothing but it is his of right; for by him, and of him I haue receiued all that I haue: therefore it is of conuenience and reason, that I tender vnto his maiestie the same againe with all my heart: therefore go your waies, and attend well to your charge. And therewithall hee made him ready, and then with his train of gentlemen and yeomen, which was no small number, hee took his barge at his priuie staires, and so went by water vnto Putney: at the taking whereof, there was walking by and down in Chamis as full of boates, filled with people of London, expecting the cardinals departing by water, supposing that he should haue gone to the tower, whereof they ioied verie much. Wauering and newfangled multitude, is it not a wonder to consider the mutabilitie of this vncertaine worlde, the common people desireth alwaies those thinges for the nouelties sake, which after turneth them to small profit or commoditie? For if the sequele be wel and directly waied and considered, they had small cause to reioice at his fall. What hath succeeded, wise men do knowe, and the common sort themselves haue felt: wherefore to wonder at it were but a follie, to studie the remedie, it profiteth not: for thus it hath euer bene, and will alwaies be, do what wee will to redresse the same it worseth not. I cannot see, but alwaies men in authoritie bee disdained with the common sort of people, and they most of al that do obserue and minister iustice: for where they please some one that receiue the benefit of the law at their hands, according to iustice, they in likewise displease the contrary part, supposing to sustain wrong where they haue right. Thus al iustices be in contempt with the people alwaies, for ministration of their duty, yet most some such bee alwaies elected, and deputed so to do, for else if the world should bee without inquisition and order, there should be too much error and abhominacion. When he was arrived with all his train at Putney, being vpon the land, hee took his mule, and euery man took their horses; and riding not past a paire of butts length, hee espied a Gentleman come ryding in posse downe the hill in the Colone of Putney: And demanding of his Gentlemen about him, what hee was that came ryding downe so fast, forsooth Sir (quoth they) it is master Noris, as it seemeth to vs; and by and by, hee came to my Lorde, saluting him and sayde: Sir, the Kinges maiestie commendeth him vnto you, and commaunded me to theise you, that you bee as much in his fauor as euer you were, and so shall bee: therefore hee would, that you should bee of good cheere, and take no thought, for you shall not lacke. And although hee hath done thus vnkindlie towards you, it is more for the satisfiing of some, than of any indignacion. And yet you knowe well that hee is able to recompence you againe, and restore you to worse so much: and thus hee bad me that I should theise you, and willed me to bid you to take all this matter in patience: and sir for my part, I trust to see you in better estate then euer ye were. But when hee had hearde master Noris report the good and comfortable wordes of the king, hee quicklie lighted from his mule, all alone, as though he had bene the youngest amongst his men, and incontinent kneeled downe in the dirt vpon both his knees, holding by his hands for soy of the kings most comfortable message: mass. Noris lighted also, espying him so soone vpon his knees, and kneeled by him, and took him in his armes, and asked him how hee did, calling vpon him to credite his message: Sp. Noris quoth he, when I consider the sofull newes that you haue brought me, I could do no lesse than greatly reioice, euery word pierced so my hart, that the sodain joy surmounted my memory, having no regard or respect to the place, but I thought it my duty, that in the same place where I receiued this comfort to laud and praise god vpon my knees, and most humbly to render to my soveraign lord my hartly thanks for the same. And as hee was talking thus vpon his knees to Sp. Noris, he would haue pulled off a velvet night cappe which he ware vnder his black hat, and scarlet cap, but he couide not vnboe the knot vnder his chin: wherefore with violence hee rent his laces of his cap, and pulled his said cap from his head, and kneeled bare headed: and this done, hee rose vp, and mounted againe vpon his mule, and so rode sooth by the high waie in the Colone, talking with Sp. Noris. And when hee came vpon Putney heath, where Sp. Noris should depart from him, master Noris gaue him a ring of golde with a stone, and saide vnto him, that the king sent him the same for a token of his good will, which ring (quoth he) the king saith ye knowe very well. It was the priuie token betwene the king and him, when the king would haue anye especiall thing sped at his hands: then said he to master Noris, if I were lord of the realme, the one halfe thereof were to small a reward to giue you for your paines and good newes: but god master Noris, consider with mee that I haue nothing left me, but my clothes vpon my backe, therefore I shall desire you to take this small reward at my hand (the which was a little chaine of gold made like a flagen chaine, with a crosse of gold, wherein was a peece of the holie crosse, which he continually ware about his neck next his bodie: ) and said farther more: master Noris I assure you, when I was in prosperitie, although it seem but small in balne, yet I would not gladly haue departed with the same for a thousand pounde, therefore I shall require you to take it in good worth, & to weare it about your neck continually for my sake, and to remember me to the king, when ye shall see oportunitie, vnto whose highnesse I shall most instantlie require you to haue me most humbly commended, for whose charitable disposition towards me, I can but praye for the preservation of his royall estate. I am his obedient subiect, his poore chaplain, and bread man, and so will be during my life, accounting my selfe nothing, nor to haue any thing but onelie of him, and by him, whome I haue iustlie and trulie serued to the best of my grosse wit: and with that hee took master Noris by the hand barebreasted, and so departed. And when hee was gone but a small distance, he returned againe, and caused Sp. Noris to be called to him: when master Noris was returned, hee sayde vnto him, I am forie (quoth he) that I haue no token to sende to the king: but if ye will at my request, present the king with this poore soole, I trust he will accept him: for he is for a noble mans pleasure, forsooth worth 1000. pounde: so master Noris took the sole, with whome my lord was faine to sende six of his tallest yeomen to helpe him to conuey the sole to

to the court, for the poxe sole toke on like a tirant rather then he would haue departed from my L. but notwithstanding they conuicted him, and so brought him to the court, where the king receiued him verie gladlie.

After departure of Pass. Noris with his token to the king, my Lorde rode strait to Ather, which is an house belonging to the Bishoppe of Winchester, situate in the countie of Surreie, not far from Hampton Court, where my L. and his familie continued the space of thre or foure weekes, without either beds, shertes, table clothes, or dishes to eat their meate in, or wherewith to drinke, howbeit there was good provision of all kinde of viual, and of beere, and wine, whereof there was sufficient, and plentie enough: but my L. was compellid of necessitie to borrowe of master Arundell, and of the bishop of Carleile, plate and dishes, both to drinke in, and eate his meate in. Thus my Lorde with his familie continued in this strange estate untill after his loweltyde.

On Alhalowne daie when the cardinall had finished his seruice, hee returned into his chamber, and called for his dinner, who was serued in his private chamber, and there dined among others his Doctors, among whom master Thomas Cromwell dined: and sitting at dinner, it came to passe that in communication of his gentlemen and seruants true and faithfull seruice, which my Lorde much commended, Master Cromwell tooke an occasion, to tell my Lorde that hee ought in conscience to consider the truth, and good seruice that they had doone him in his necessitie, which did not for sake him in weale nor in tye, and saide: Sir, it shall be well doone for your grace to call them before you, both Gentlemen which be woorthie persons, and also Peomen, and let them vnderstande, that yee right well consider their paines and truth, with their faithfull seruice, and to giue them your commendation, with good wordes, the which shall bee to them great courage, to sustaine your miserie with paines and patience, and to spende their life and substance in your seruice. Alas, Thomas (quoth my Lorde) yee knowe I haue nothing to giue them, and wordes without deedes bee not often well taken, for if I hadde but as I late hadde, I woulde departe with them so frankelie, as they shoulde bee well contente: But nothing hath no fauour: and I am both ashamed and also loze, that I am not able to requite their faithfull seruice. And although I doe releeue, as I maie, to consider the fidelitie that I see in the number of my seruantes, who will not forsake mee in my miserable estate, but bee as diligent, and as seruicable about me, as they were in my great triumph and gloire: Yet doe I lament againe as becommeth the want of substance to distribute among them. Why Sir, (quoth Master Cromwell) haue yee not here a number of Chaplaines, to whom yee haue departed liberallie with spiritual promotions, in somuch, as some maie dispende by your Graces preferment a thousand pounde by yere, and some five hundred Markes, and some more, and some lesse? You haue not a Chaplain within your house, or belonging vnto you, but he maie spend well at the least, by your procurements and promotion, three hundred Markes pcerelie, who haue had all the profite and gaines at your handes: and your other

seruantes nothing: and yet haue your seruantes taken much more paines in one daie, then all your sole Chaplaines haue doone in a yere. Therefore if they will not freele and friendelie consider your liberalitie, and depart with you of the same goods gotten in your seruice, nowe in your great indigence and necessitie, it is pittie that they liue, and all the trouble will haue them in indignation and hatred, for their ingratitude to their Master. I thinke no lesse Thomas (quoth my Lorde: ) therefore I praye you cause all my seruants to assemble without in my great Chamber after dinner, and see them stande in order, and I will declare vnto them in my mind. After that the bozys ende was taken vnto, Master Cromwell came to the Gentleman Alher and saide. Hearde you not (quoth hee) what my Lorde said? Yes Sir, quoth hee, I did: why then, quoth hee, call all the Gentlemen and peomen vnto the great Chamber, and so it was doone: the Gentlemen placed on the right side of the Chamber, and the Peomen on the other side, and at the last my Lorde came out in his rochet vpon a violet gowne like a bishop, who went straight to the upper end of the saide chamber, where was the great Windowe, standing there a while, his Chaplaines about him, beholding the goodlie number of his seruants, who coulde not speake vnto them untill the teares ranne downe his cheekes, which few teares perceiued by his seruantes, caused the fountaines of water to gush out of their faithfull eyes in such sort, as it woulde cause a cruel hart to lament. At the last, after he had turned his face to the window, and dried his moistened cheekes, he spake to them in this sort in effect, good faithfull Gentlemen, and true harted Peomen, I do not lament to see you about mee, but I lament in a maner, a certaine ingratitude on my behalfe towards you all, in whom hath bin a great default that in my prosperitie haue not don so much for you as I might haue don either in deed or in word, which laie in my power then to do, but then I knew not the seluel and special treasure I had in my house of you my faithfull seruantes; but now experience hath taught me, and with the eyes of my discretion I do perceiue the same. There was neuer thing that repented me more that euer I did, then both the remembrance of my great and most obliuous negligence, & unkind ingratitude that I haue not promoted, preferred, and aduanced you all, according to your demerits; howbeit, it is not vnknewen vnto you all, that I was not so follic furnished of temporal promotions in my gift, as I was of spirituall preferments; and if I should haue preferred you to anie of the said offices, then shoulde I haue run in the indignation of the Kings seruants, who would not much let to report be hind my back, that there coulde no office in the gift, escape the cardinal & his seruantes; and thus shoulde I haue run in open Rander before all the world. But now it is come to this passe, that it pleased the King to take all that euer I haue, into his handes, so that I haue nothing to giue you: for I haue nothing left mee but my bare clothes vpon my backe, the which are simple in comparison that I had, howbeit, if it might doe you anie good, I woulde not stick to diuide the same among you, but my good Gentlemen and Peomen, my trustie and faithfull seruants, and of whom no prince had the like, I shall require you to take some patience with me a while; for I doubt not, but that the King considering my suggested offence by mine enemies, which is put against me to be of small griefe or hurt, for so great and sodaine an ouerthrow will shortly restore me to my liuing, so that I shall be more able to deuide my substance among you, wherof ye shall not lacke, for whatsoeuer shall chance hereafter to be an ouerplus and superfluitie of my revenues, at the determination of my peerey accourt, it shall be distributed among you: for I wil neuer during my life, esteeme the gods of riches of this world any other wise, then which shall be sufficient to maintaine the state, that God hath, and shall call me to. And if the king doe not so shortly restore me, then will I write for you, either to the king, or to any noble man within this realme to retein your seruice: for I doubt not but the king or any noble man of this realme will credite my letter in your commendation: therefore in the meane time I would aduise you to repaire home to your wiues, such as haue wiues, and some of you that haue no wiues, to take a time to visit your parents in the Countrey. There is none of you all, but once in a yere ye would require licence to see and visite your wife and other your friends: take this time therefore in that respect, and in your return I will not refuse you to beg with you. I consider that your seruice in my house hath bin such, that ye be not apt to serue any man vnder the degree of a king: therefore I would aduise you to serue no man but the king, who I am sure will not refuse you. Therefore I shall desire you to take your pleasure for a month, and then ye may come againe: and by that time I trust the is. will extend his mercy vpon me. Sir (quoth M. Cromwel) there be diuers of these your gentlemen that would be glad to see their friends, but they lacke money: therefore here be diuers of your chaplaines who haue receiued at your hands great benefices, and liuinges, let them shew themselves vnto you as they be bound to do: I thinke their honesty and charity is such, that they will not see you lacke, that may do you good or pleasure. And for my part, although I haue not receiued of your graces gift one peny toward the increase of my liuing, yet wil I giue you this toward the dispatch of your seruants: and therewith deliuered to my lord 5. l. in gold: and now let vs see what your chaplains will do. I thinke they will depart with you much more liberally than I, who be more able to giue you a pound then I a penie, go to masters (quoth he) to the chaplains: Inasmuch as they gaue to my L. liberallie, some 10. l. some 20. nobles, some 5. l. and so some more, & some lesse, as their powers would extend at that time: by means whereof my lord receiued among them, as much money, as paie the pooremen 10. s. a piece towards their quarters wages, and as much money as would paie euery of them for a months bond wages: and then they departed doونه into the hall, where some determined to go to their friends, and some would not depart from my lord, untill they might see him in better estate. My lord returned in to his chamber lamenting the departure from his seruants, making his moane to M. Cromwel, who comforted him the best he coule, and desired my lord to giue him leave, to go to London, whereas he would either make or marre (which was alwaies his common word.) Then after a little communication with my lord in secret, he departed, and toke his horse, and rode to London. At whose departing he said to my lords gentlemen, farewell, well, ye shall heare hostile of me, and if I speeke well, I will not faile to be here againe within these two daies, and so he rode on his iourneie, Ralph Sadler, since a knight, was then his cleerke, and rode with him. After my L. had supped that night, and all men got to bed, beinge Alhalowne daie about midnight, one of the porters wakened the gentleman vther, & tolde him that there were a great number of horsemen at the gate, that would come in, sayinge that it was Sir John Russell: the gentleman vther had the porter goe doونه, and make a great fire in the looge to dye them, for it had rained al that night most vehemently. The saide gentleman vther rose, cast on his night gowne, and went to the gates, and asked who was there: with that M. Russell spake, and the gates were opened, Sir John Russell went to the fire to dye him, and saide he came from the king on message to my L.orde, Sir, quoth the gentleman vther, I trust your newes be good. Yea I promise you on my fidelitie, and so tel him, that I haue brought him such newes that will please him well. The cardinall was wakened, and told of the iourneie taken by Sir John Russell that trouble some night: I praise God al be for the best quoth my lord: Yea quoth the gentleman vther, he told me it was such newes, as ye would greatly reioice to heare: wel then, quoth he, God be praised, and welcome be his grace, go ye and fetch him to me, and by that time I will be ready to talke with him.

When M. Russell was come to my lord he had cast on his night gowne, vnto whom M. Russell made most humble reuerence vpon his knee, whom my L.orde stooped vnto, and toke him vp, and had him welcome: Sir (quoth he) I commendeth him vnto you, and deliuered him a great ring of gold, with a turke for a token, and willed me to bid you be of god cheere, for he loueth you as wel as euer he did, and is sorie for your trouble, whose minde runneth much vpon you: inasmuch that before his grace fate doونه to supper, he called mee vnto him, and desired me to take the pains secretly to visit you, and to comfort you the best of my power. And Sir I haue had the worst iourneie for so little a waite, that euer I had to my remembrance; my lord thanked him for his paines and good newes, and demanded of him if he had supped, and he said nate: wel then quoth my L. cause the cookes to prouide some meat for him, and cause a chamber to be prouided for him, that he make take his rest a while vpon a bedde: ad whilst commendement was fulfilled, and in the meane time my L. and M. Russell were in secret communication, and in the end M. Russell went to his chamber, and said he would tarie but a while, for he would be at the court, at Orenwich againe before daie, and would not for any thing that it were known that he had bin with my L. that night. And so being in his chamber, hauing a small repast, rested him a while vpon a bedde, while his seruantes sopped, and dyed them. And that doونه, incontinent hee rode awate with speeke againe to the court. After this within a while, my lord was redressed to plate, vessel, and household stoffe, of euery thing necessarie some part, so that hee was better furnished than before.

marum, or thereabouts: and hee being within London desired with himselfe to be one of the Burgessees of the Parliament, and chanced to meeete with one Sir Thomas Rush knight, a speciall friende of his, whose sonne was appointed to bee a burgesse, of whome he obtained his rōme, and so put his foote into the Parliament house: so that within two or three dayes after his departure from my lord he came againe to Athere, with a pleasant countenance: and saide, that he had once adventured to put in his foote, where he would be better regarded or euer the Parliament was finished. When talked hee with my Lord, and after his talk, he rode againe to London, because he would not be absent from the Parliament in the morning. There was nothing doone against him in the Parliament house, but he sent to my Lord to knowe what answer hee might make in his behalfe: Insomuch, that there was nothing alleged against my lord, but that he was ready to make answer thereto. Insomuch, that at the length his honest estimation, & earnest behauior in his spassers cause, grew so in euery mans opinion, how that hee was the most faithfull seruant to his spasser of all other, wherein hee was greatlie of all men commended. Then was there brought in a Bill of Articles into the parliament house, to haue my Lord condemned of treasons, against which bill spasser Cromwell inueyed so discretely with such wittie persuasions, and deepe reasons, that the same could take no effect. Then were his enemies constrained to indight him in a premunstre, all which was to intitle the king to his goods and possessions, the which hee hadde obtained and purchased for the maintenance of his Colledges in Wyndesore and Ipswich, whereof hee was then in building, in the most sumptuous wise: wherein when my Lord was demanded by the Judges which were sent vnto him to knowe his minde, and to take his answer therein, hee answered them in this wise: my lordes Judges (quoth hee) the Kings highnesse knoweth, whether I haue offended his spaciellie or no, in using of my prerogatiue legantine, for the which I am indighted. I haue the Kings licence in my Cofters, vnder his hande, and breade Seale, for the exercising and using thereof in the most largeft wise, the which now are in the handes of mine enemies. Therefore because I will not stand in question with the king in his owne cause, I will here presentlie confesse before you the indightment, and put me wholly to the mercie and grace of the king, trusting that he hath a conscience, and a discretion to consider the truth, and my humble submission and obedience, wherein I might right well stand to the tryall thereof by Justice: but thus much you maie saie to his highnesse, that I am wholly vnder his obedience and will, & do submitte my selfe to all things that shall bee his princelie pleasure, whose will and commandment I neuer disobeyed or repugned, but was alwayes contented, and gladd to please him before God, whome I ought most chieftie to haue obeyed, the which now mee repentes: notwithstanding, I most heartilie requyre you to haue mee vnto his royall spaciellie commended, for whome I doe and will during my life, praye to God to sende him much prosperous honour and victorie ouer his enemies, and therewith they tooke their leaue and departed. Shortly after the king sent the duke of Norfolkke vnto him in message, but that it was, was kept secret. My lord being aduertised that my lord of Norfolkke was comming euen at hand, he caused all his gentlemen to waite vpon him downe through the hall into the base court to receiue the duke at the gates, and commanded all his yeomen to stand in order still in the hall: and he himselfe with his gentlemen went to the gates, where he receiued my lord of Norfolkke bare-headed, who embraced each other: and so led him by the arme through his hall into his chamber. And when the duke had passed through vnto the upper end of the hall, regarding the number of tall Yeomen that stood on each side thereof, he turned againe to the Yeomen and saide: Sirs (quoth he) your diligent and faithfull seruice vnto your spasser in this his calamitie, hath purchased you of all men, noble, and ignoble, much honestie, in somuch, that the king commaunded me to saie to you in his name, that for your true and louing seruice that ye haue doone to your spasser, his highnesse will see you at all times furnished with seruices according to your demerites: with that my Lord put off his cappe, and saide to my Lord of Norfolkke, Sir (quoth hee) these men be all approoued men, wherefore it were pittie they should want any seruice: and being sozie that I am not able to doe for them as my heart wisheth, I will therefore requyre you my good Lord, to be good Lord vnto them, and extend your charitie amongst them, where or when ye shall see occasion at any time hereafter, and that ye will prefer their diligence and faithfull seruice vnto the king. Doubt you not my lord (quoth he) but I will do for them the best in my power, & whereas I shall see cause I will be an earnest suitor for them to the king: and some of you I will haue my selfe in seruice for right honest men, and as you haue begun, so continue, untill ye heare more of the kings pleasure, Gods blessing and mine be with you, and so went by vnto the great chamber to dinner, whom my lord cardinall thanked, and said vnto him: yet my Lord of all other noblemen I haue cause to thanke you, for your noble & gentle heart, the which you haue shewed me behinde my backe, as my seruant Th. Cromwel hath reported vnto me: but euen as ye be a noble man in deede, so haue you shewed your selfe no lesse to all men in calamitie, and in especiall to me, whome ye haue brought down from my high estate: but now againe being in this miserable state, ye haue extended your fauour most honourable, with great charitie, &c. The dinner ended, the cardinall and duke went into my Lordes priuie Chamber, where they continued in consultation: and being there, it chanced spasser Shelley the Judge to come thither, who was sent from the king, whereof relation was made to my Lord: which caused the duke and him to breake vp their communication. And as the duke desired to goe to a Chamber, hee mette with spasser Shelley, to whom spasser Shelley resorted. And after hee had made relation of the cause of his comming hee desired my Lord of Norfolkke to tarrie, and to assist him in dosing of his message: whome hee denied, and saide, I haue nothing to do with your message, wherein I will not meddle, and so departed into a Chamber, where hee tooke his rest for an houre or two: and in the meane time my Lord issued out of his priuie chamber, and came to master Shelley to know his message, who after due salutations, did declare vnto him that the kings pleasure was to haue my my Lordeys house, called Poike place, neere Westminster, belonging to the Bishopricke of Poike, and to possesse the same, according to the lawe of his realme: his highnes hath sent for all the Judges, and for all his learned counsell to know their opinions for the aduarice thereof, whose opinions be fullie resolved that your Grace must make a recognisance, and before a Judge to acknowledge and confesse the right thereof to belong to the king and his successors, and so his highnes shall be assured thereof: wherefore it hath pleased the king to appoint and send mee hither to take of you the same recognisance, hauing in your grace such assistance, as that ye will not refuse so to do. Wherefore I shall desire your grace to know your pleasure therein. Sp. Shelley (quoth my Lorde) I knowe that the king of his owne nature is of a roiall stomacke, not willing more than iustice shall lead him vnto by the lawe: And therefore I counsell you, and all other Judges and learned men of his counsell, to put no more into his head than lawe that maie stande with conscience: for when yee tell him this is the law, it were well done ye should tel him also, that although this be the law, yet this is conscience: for law without conscience is not met to be giuen to a king by his counsell, to be ministred by him, ne by anie of his ministers; for euerie counsellor to a king ought to haue a respect to conscience before the rigor of the law. For Laus est facere quod decet, non quod licet. The king ought for his roiall dignitie and prerogative to mitigate the rigor of the law, where conscience hath no more force. And therefore in his princely place he hath constituted a chancelor: to order for him the same. And heretofore the court of Chancerie, hath bene commonlie called the court of conscience, because it hath iurisdiction to commaund the law in euerie case to desist from the execution of the rigor of the same, where as conscience had most effect. Therefore I saie to you, that in this case, although you and other of your profession perceiue by the orders of the lawe, that the king maie lawfullie do that thing which yee require of me: how say you master Shelley, may I do it with conscience, to giue that auaile which is none of mine from me and my successors: if this be the lawe and conscience, I praye you shewe me your opinion. For sooth my Lorde (quoth hee) there is a great conscience: but hauing regarde to the kings high power, and to a better purpose, it maie the better stand with conscience: whols sufficient to recompence the church of Poike with double the value. That I knowe wel, but here is no such condition (quoth my L.) but onlie a bare & simple departure with anothers right. For if euerie bishop that maie, should so do, then might euerie prelate giue away the patrimony of their dignities, which should be but smallie to the kings honor. Well I will not stand with you long in this matter. Let me see your commission: to whome master Shelley shewed the same. And that seene, Master Shelley quoth he, ye shall shew the kings highnes that I am his most faithfull subiect, obediencer and head-man, whose roiall commandement and request I will in no wise disobey, but fulfill his pleasure in all such things wherein yee fathers of the lawe saie, that I maie lawfullie do, therefore I charge your conscience to discharge me, howbeit shewe his highnes from mee, that I most humble desire his maiestie to call to his most gracious remembrance, that there is both a heauen and hell. And there withall

he clearketoke and wrote the recognisance, and after some secret talke they departed. When rose the Duke of Suffolke from his repast, and after some communication with my lorde, he likewise departed. Thus continued my lorde at Asher, who receiued daily messages from the court, some good, and some as euill, but mo euill than good: for his enemies procured his disquietnesse that they could, as some daie they would cause the king to sende for foure or fixe of his gentlemen from him to serue the king, and another daie they would take auaile some of his promotions, or some of their promotions whome he had preferred before. Then would they fetch from him some of his poynten, in so much as the king tooke strictene of them at one time into his guard. This was his life for a long time, so that there was not one daie, but euier he went to bedde, he had an occasion greatlie to chafe, and sette the heart out of his bodie, but that he was a wise man, and bare all things in patience. At Christmasse he fell verie soze sicke, most likelie to dye, whereof the king beinge aduertised, was verie soze, and sent Doctor Buis his physician vnto him, to see in what estate he was. Doctor Buis came vnto him, finding him lying verie sicke in his bedde: and perceiuing the danger returned to the king, of whome the king demaunded, saying: Haue ye seene ponder man? Yea sir (quoth he.) How do you like him (quoth the king?) Sir (quoth he) if ye will haue him dead, I warrant him, he will be dead within these foure daies, if he receiue no comfort from you shortly: Marie (quoth the king) God for bid that he should die: I praye you master Buis go againe vnto him, and doe your cure vnto him, for I would not lose him for twentie thousand pound. Then must your grace (quoth master Buis) send him first some comfortable message, as shortly as ye can: euen so I will (quoth the king) by you, and therefore make speeche to him againe, and ye shall deliuer him this ring from me for a token, in the which ring was ingrauen the kings Image, within a rubie, as like the king as coulde bee deuised. This ring hee knoweth right well, for hee gaue me the same, and tell him that I am not offended with him in my heart any thing at all, and that shall he knowe shortly: therefore bid him plucke vpp his heart, and bee of good comfort, and I charge you, come not from him until ye haue brought him out of daunger of death. And so Doctor Buis departed with speeche to Asher, after whome the king sent Doctor Cromer the Scot, Doctor Clement, and Doctor Worton, to consult with master Buis for my lordes recouerie.

After master Buis had bene with my Lorde, and deliuered the kings tokens vnto him, with the most comfortable wordes that he could deuise in the kings behalfe, he reioyced not a little, and aduanced him in his bedde, and receiued the tokens most fayfullie, thanking master Buis for his paines and good comfort: Master Buis tolde him furthermore that the kings pleasure was that he should minister vnto him for his health, and to toyne with him for the better and most assured waies, he hath sent hither doctor Clement, doctor Cromer and doctor Worton. Therefore my lorde (quoth he) it were well done they were called in to visit you, and to consult with them: to this most on my lord was contented to heare their iudgements, and it was not long ere they had brought him out of danger, and within foure daies set him on his seate, and got him a stomacke to meate, all which done, they took their leaue to depart, refusing bitterlie all rewards profered them, saying the king had giuen them especiall commandement that they should take of him nothing, for at their retorne he himselfe would reward them. Thus my lord continued at Asher untill Candlemas, against which feast the king caused to be sent to my lord three or foure cart lobes of stiffe, as bedding, plate, hangings, kitchen stiffe, &c. Then commanded he master Cromwell to make earnefull suite to the king, that he might remove from thence to some other house: which suite at the kings hands master Cromwell obtained, for the king was contented he should remove to Richmond, which place my lord had a little before repaire to his great coses: for the king had made an exchange thereof with him for Hampton court. All this was done without knowledge of the kings counsell: for if they might haue had vnderstanding hereof before, then woulde they haue perswaded the king to the contrarie: but when they knewe of the kings grant and licence, although they dissimuled their minde in the kings presence; yet were they afraid of him, least his might resort to the king might moue the king at some brayde to haue resorted vnto him, and to haue called him home againe, considering the great louing affection that the king daily shewed vnto him: wherefore they doubted his rising vp againe, if they found not a meane shortly to remove him further from the king. Inso-much that they thought it convenient for their purpose to moue the king vpon considerations which they inuented, that it were verie necessarie that my lord should goe some into the north vnto his benefice, where he should be a good state for the countrie, to the which the king condescended. Whereupon my lord of Norfolkke bade master Cromwell to saie to him, that he must goe home to his benefice: who at his next repaire to my lord (then lying at Richmond) declared to him how it was determined that he should goe home to his benefice. Told then Thomas (quoth my lord) we will goe to Winchester. I will (quoth master Cromwell) shewe my lord of Norfolkke what ye saie: and so he did. What should he do there (quoth the Duke?) naie let him goe to his Archbishoppshope of York, where his honor and more charge lieth: and so shew him. The lordes who were not his friends, moued the king to giue my lord a pension of 4000. markes out of Winchester, and the rest to distribute among his nobilitie and seruants, and so in likewise to diuide the reuenues of Saint Albons, whereof some had three hundred markes, and some an hundred pounds, and so some more, and some lesse. And all the reuenues of the lands belonging to his Colledges of Oxford and Ipswich, which the king took into his owne hands: whereof master Cromwell had the receipt and gouernance afore by my lordes assignment. Wherefore it was thought verie necessarie, that hee should haue still, who executed all things the reof so exaltie and swiftly, that he was had in great estimation for his behauiour heretofore, and also for the true and faithfull demeanour towards his lord and master. When it came to passe, that hee to whome the king had giuen anie annuities or fees for terme of life by passport, would not be good, but onely during my lordes life, forasmuch as the king had no longer state therein, the which he had by reason of my lordes attainder, in the premunire, and to make these estates good and sufficient for the terme of their liues, there was none other thise, but to obtaine my lordes confirmation of their patents. And this to bee brought about, there was no meane but to sue to master Cromwell to attaine the same at my lordes handes, who they thought the best instrument for the purpose. Then began euerie man, both noble men and gentlemen, who had anie patents of the king out of Winchester or Saint Albons, to make suite to master Cromwell, to sollicite the cause to my lord, to get therein his confirmation, and for his paines therein, both worthily rewarded him, and euerie man to shew him such pleasure as should be at all times in their severall powers, whereof they assured him: wherein master Cromwell perceived an occasion giuen him to helpe himselfe, and to bring to passe that hee long sought for, intending to worke in this matter according to their desires, the sooner to bring his owne enterprise and purpose to passe. Then at his next retorne to my lord he moued this matter to him, and so perswaded with him, that they both wrought together to bring master Cromwell in place where hee might doe good to my lord, and also to himselfe. And now hauing the ordering and disposition of the landes of these Colledges, he had great occasions of suites, besides his continuall accesse to the king, by meanes whereof he grew into the kings fauour, who repayed him to be a verie wise man, and a meete instrument to serue his grace.

Now the lordes thought long to haue the cardinall removed further out of the kings way, wherefore among other of my lordes, the duke of Norfolkke said to Mr. Cromwell: Cromwell (quoth he) me thinke the cardinall thy master ma-kech no haste to go northward, tell him, if he goe not away, but shall tarrie, I will reare him with my teeth: therefore I would aduise him to prepare himselfe abate as shortly as he can, or else he shall be sent forward. These wordes Mr. Cromwell reported to my lord at his next repaire to him, who then had an occasion to resort to him for the dispatch of the noble and gentlemen's patents. And here I will leaue off this matter, and speake of other things that in this meane time happened.

The lady Margaret dutchesse of Sauoy Ant to the emperor, and the lady Lewes dutchesse of Angoulême, mother to the French king, met at Cambray in the beginning of the month of June last past, to treat of a peace, where were present doctor Tontall bishop of London, and sir Tho. Moore chancelor of the duchie of Lancaster, commissioners for the king of England. At length through diligence of the said ladies, a peace was concluded betwene the emperor, the pope, the kings of England, and of France. This peace was called the wo-mans peace, and was proclaimed by heraults, with the sound of trumpets in the citie of London, to the great reioicing of the merchants, who in time of the wars had sustained much hinderance.

The 26. of October at Oxenwith, sir Th. Moore late chancelor of the duchie of Lancaster, was made lord chancelor of England, and the next daie led

The 8. of December was Th. Boileyn viscount Rochford created earle of Wiltshire: Rob. viscount Fitzwater, earle of Suffolke, and George L. Hastings earle of Warrington at Poske place by Westminster.

The new Testament printed in English.

William Tindall having translated the new Testament into English, and caused the same to be printed beyonde the seas, manie of thm were conuicted into England, and there made sale of, as good merchaundise, for many men desired to haue them, but this translation was forbidden by the li. to bee vsed of his subiects: for his counsell, namely the bishops affirmed that the same was not truly translated, and that therein were prologues and p̄fates sounding to heresie, with vncharitable railing against bishops and the clergy. The king therfore commended the Bishops, that they calling to them the best learned men of the Vniuersities should cause a new translation to be made, that the people without danger might read the same for their better instruction in the lawes of God.

Am. reg. 22.

Ambassadors to the emperor and pope.

The li. understanding that the Emperour and the Pope were appointed to mete at Banone or Bologne, where the emperor should bee crowned, sent thither an ambassade from him the earle of Wiltshire. Dodo: Stokesley, elected bishop of London, and his almoner dodo: Edward Lee, to declare both vnto the pope and emperor the law of God, the determinations of the Vniuersities in the case of his marriage, & to require the pope to do iustice according to truchty, and also to shew to the emperor, that the king did moue this matter, only for discharge of his conscience, and not for any other respect of pleasure or displeasure earthly: these ambassadors comming to Bonony, were honorable receiued, and first doing their message to the pope, had answer of him, that he woulde heare the matter disputed when hee came to Rome, and according to right he woulde do iustice. The emperor answered, that he in no wise woulde be against the lawes of God, and if the court of Rome woulde iudge that the matrimonie was not good, hee woulde bee contented to stand by the dispensation, which he thought to bee of force enough to prooue the marriage lawfull. With these answers the ambassadors departed, and returned homewards, till they came on this side the mountaynes, and then receiued letters from the li. which appointed the earle of Wiltshire to go ambassado: to the French li. which then lay at Burdeaux, making gift for money for the redeeming of his sonnes. And the bishop of London was appointed to go to Padua, and other Vniuersities in Italy, to know their full resolutions and determinate opinions in the kings case of matrimonie: and the kings almoner was commanded to returne into England.

Afterwards king Henry upon occasion of delate made by the Pope in his controuersie of divorcement, and through displeasure of such reportes as hee heard had bin made of him to the court of Rome, & thirly picked forward by some counsellors, to follow the example of the Germans, caused proclamation to be made on the 19. of September, forbidding all his subiects to purchase any manner of thing from the court of Rome, containing matter prejudiciall to the high authority, jurisdiction, and prerogative of all of this Realme,

Cardinall Wolley having licence of the king (as ye haue heard) to repaire vnto Richmond, was there lodged within the lodge of the great park, which was a verie pretie house, there my lord lay vntill Lent with a pretie number of his seruants, for the rest went to board wages. You haue heard tofore, what woordes the Duke of Posfolke had to master Cromwell, touching my lordes going vnto his benefice of Poske. At such time as master Cromwell tolde the se woordes to my lord: Spacie Thomas (quoth my lord) then is it time to be going, if he take it so, therefore I pray you to go to the king, and saie I woulde go to my benefice of Poske but for lacke of money, desiring his grace to helpe me with some: for ye maie say that the last money that I receiued from his grace hath bene too little to paie mine olde debts, and to compell me to the painment thereof hath bene too much extremitie, taking my gods from me, wherein I trust his grace will haue a charitable respect: ye maie also shewe my lord of Posfolke and other of the counsell, that I woulde depart if I had money. Cromwell went to London, and my lord removed out of the lodge into the charterhouse at Richmond, where he lay in a lodging with dodo: Collet, made for himselfe, vntill he removed northward, which was in the Passion weeke: and euerie daie resorted to the charterhouse there, and in the after noones hee woulde sit in contemplation with one of the most ancient fathers of that house in their cels, who conuerted him, and caused him to despise the vaine glorie of the world, and gaue him shirtes of haire to weare, the which he wore diuers times after. When master Cromwell came to the court, he shewed my lord of Posfolke, that my lord woulde gladly go northward, but for lacke of money, wherein he desired his helpe to the king. Then was the king moued therein as well by master Cromwell, as by the counsell: which matter the king referred to determine and assigne to the counsell, who were in diuers opinions, so that after long debating it was concluded that he should haue by way of p̄sent a thousand markes of his pension out of Wiltshire: when this determination was concluded, they declared the same to the king, who straightwaile commanded the same thousand markes to bee deliuered out of hande to master Cromwell, and so it was. The king commanded master Cromwell to resort to him againe, when he had receiued the same summe of money: at whose returne to the king, the king saide: Shew my lord, although our counsell haue assigned no summe of money for to heare his charges, yet ye shall shewe him in my behalfe, that I haue sent a thousand pound of my beneuolence, and tell him that he shall not lacke, and bid him be of god chere. After Cromwell humbly in my lordes behalfe, thanked the king, and therewith departed, and came to Richmond to my lord, to whom he deliuered the money, and whereof it was lent, that the counsell sent him, and of the money which the king sent him, adding thereto the kings comfortabable sayings, wherein my lordes got a little reliefe. Then my lord prepared all things for his Iourney, and sent to London for liuerie clothes for his seruants that should ride with him: so that all things being furnished towards his Iourney, in the beginning of passion weeke before Easter he set forward, and rode from Richmond to a place of the abbot of Westminster called Hendon: the next date he removed to a place where Lady Parry lay called the Kite: the next day to Kisson, where he lodged in the priorie: the next date to Huntington, and there lodged in the Abbey. And the next date he removed to Peterborough, and there lodged in the abbey, making there his abode all the next weeke, where he kept his solenne feast of Easter, with all his traine, in number 160. persons, hauing with him twelue cartes to carrie his stiffe of his owne, which he sent for from his Colledge of Wyndesore, that were there provided, beside thre score other cartes of his dailie carriage of necessaries for his buildings. Upon palme sūndae he went in procession with the monkes. And upon maundie thursdae he made his maundie there in our Ladie chappell, hauing 59. poore men, whose fete he washed, and kissed after he had wiped them, he gaue euerie of the said poore men twelue pence in money, thre elles of good canuas to make them shirtes, a paire of new shoes, a cast of red herrings and thre white herrings, and one of them had two shillings. Upon easter date he rose to the resurrection, &c. On thursdae next he removed to master Fitz Williams knight (sometime a merchant taylor of London, and then of the kings counsell, who dwelt within thre or foure miles of Peterborough) where he was ioyfullie receiued, and had honorable entertainment. On mundaie next he removed vnto Stamford, and the next date to Grantham, and was lodged in the house of master Hall. The next night he lodged in the Castle of Newark, where he remained the next date, and from thence rode to Southwell, and there continued the most part of that sommer, not without great reioys of the most worshipfull of the countrey. And diuers noble men hauing occasion to repaire into the same countrey there, thought it good to visit my lord as they travelled, of whome they were most gladly entertained, and had right good chere: whose noble and gentle behauior caused him to haue much loue in the countrey of all kinde of people: he kept there a noble house, where was both plentie of meate and drinke for all commers, and also much almes giuen at his gate vnto the poore of the towne and country. He vsed much charity and clemencie among his tenants and other: he made many agreements betwene gentlemen and gentlemen, and betwene some gentlemen and their wiues, and other meane persons, the which had bene long before a sunder and in great trouble, making for euery of them (as occasion serued) great assemblies & feasts, not sparing his purse where he might make amitie. It chanced vpon Corpus Christi euen, in the night, when my lord and all his household were at rest in their beds, there knoced at the gate two gentlemen, the one named master Brierton one of the gentlemen of the kings priuie chamber, and master Wicherley, who were come from the king in post to speake with my lord. These were let in, my lord was raised, and came to them into the dining chamber: they kring him in his night apparell, did to him due reuerence, whom he took by the hands, demanding how the king his soueraigne lord did. Sir (said they) right well and merry, we must desire to talke with you apart: With a good will (quoth he.) After long talke, they took forth of a little maile a little coffer covered with with greene velvet, and bound with bars of silver and gilt, with a Locke and a gilt key, with the which they opened the chest, out of the which they toke an instrument of writing containing more than a skinne of great parchment, hauing manie leales hanging to the same, whereunto they put more waie for my lordes seale: the which my lord seales, and subscribed his name with his owne hand, and deliuered the same againe vnto them, desiring them to take a bed: for it was somewhat past midnight. But they saide they would straight way ride to the earle of Shrotesburie, to be with him ere he were stirring: so my lord caused them to eate such colde meate as was readie, and to drinke a boile of two of wine: that done, he gaue each of them foure olde souveraignes of fine golde, and so they departed. In this sort and manner my lord late at Southwell vntill about the latter end of grasse time, then he removed to Peterborough, an abbey, to Rufford and Blith abbey, and so to Scroby, where he continued till after Michaelmas, exercising many deedes of charity, & commonly euery sūday he would traueil vnto some poore parish church, and there would say his diuine service, and cause one of his chaplaines to preach vnto the people: that done, he would dine in some honest house of the towne, where should be distributed to the poore a great almes in meate and drinke, as of monie. About the feast of S. Michael, he removed to Catwold castle within 7. miles of Poike, where he lay long after with much honor and loue of the countrey, doing deedes of charitie, and held there an honorable household for all commers, and also built and repaired the castle, hauing artificers and laborers about the number of 300. persons dailie in wages, &c. At length being thereunto persuaded by the doctors of the church of Poike, he determined to be shaled there at Poike minister the next mundaie after Allhalloome day, against which time due preparation was made for the same, but not in so sumptuous wise as were his predecessors. My lord sent his gentleman vther to Poike, to foreshay things there that should bee ordered and provided for the solennitie, which should haue bene as meane as could be. Upon Allhalloome date one of the head officers of the Church of Poike, which should haue the most doolings in all this shalation, was with my lord at dinner at his house of Catwold, and sitting at dinner they fell in communication of this matter, and of the order thereof, saying, that my lord should go on fote from a chappell of Saint Iames, without the gates of the citie vnto the minister vpon cloth, the which should be distributed among the poore after his passage. My Lord hearing this, made answer in this wise: Although our predecessors did go vpon cloth, so we intend to go on fote from thence without any such gloze, for I take God to witness, I do not intend to go thither for any triumph or gloze, but only to performe the rules of the church, to the which I am bound. And therefore I desire you all, and will commaund other my seruants to go as humble thither without any sumptuous or gorgeous apparell, other wise than in decent manner: for I doe purpose to come to Poike vpon Sūndae at night next, and to lodge in the beans house, and vpon munday to be shaled, and there to make but a dinner for you of the close, and for other worshipfull gentlemen that shall chaunce to come thither to the same, and to suppe with some of the residences, and the next daie to dine with the Spaiol, and then to prepare home hiser againe. The daie being once knowne unto all the countrie, which coulde not bee bin, the worshipfull Gentlemen and other, as Abbots and Bishops sent in such provision of viualles, that it is almost incredible, as of fat beasts and muttons, wilde fowle, and venison both red and fallowe, and other daintie things such as would haue plentifully furnished the feast. All which things were unknown to my lord, for as much as hee being prevented and disappointed of his purpose, by reason that he was arrested of high treason, as ye shall heare hereafter, so that most part of this Sommer provision, was sent unto Poike that same daie of his arrest, and the next daie following: for his arrest was kept as close and secret from the countrie, because they doubted the common people, which had him in great estimation and loue, for his great charitie and liberality which he vsed daily amongst them. It is appointed by the king & counsell, that Sir Walter Walsh knight, one of the kings priuite chamber, shoulde be sent downe with a commission into the North unto the earle of Northumberland, who was sometime brought vp in house with the cardinal, and the twaine being iointlie in commission to arrest the Cardinall of high treason: Spasser Walsh toke his horse at the court gate about noone vpon Alhalowme daie, toward the earle of Northumberland. And nowe haue I occasion to declare what happened about the same time, which peradventure signified the troubles following to the cardinall. The cardinall sitting at dinner vpon Alhalowm day, hauing at his bowdes and diuers chaplaines sitting at dinner, ye shall vnderstand that the cardinals great crosse stood in a corner at the tables ende, leaning against the hanging, and when the bowdes ende was taken vp, and a conuenient time for the chaplaines to arise, one doctor Augustine a Cenetian, & physician to the cardinall, rising from the table with the other, hauing vpon him a great golwe of boisterous beluet, ouerthrew the Crosse, which trailing downe along the tappet, with the point of one of the crosses, brake doctor Boners head, that the blood ranne downe, the companie there standing, greaue astonished with the chaunce. The Cardinall perceiving the same, demaunded what the matter meant of their lodayne amaze? and they shewed him of the fall of his Crosse vpon doctor Boners head: and hath it, quoth he, by a wone anie blood? Yea forsooth my Lord quoth they: with that he caste his head asid, and saide shaking his heade, A Salum Omen, and therewith saide Grace, and rose from the Table, and went to his Chamber. Nowe marke the significacion how the Cardinall expounded this matter at Pomfret after his fall. First ye shall vnderstande that the Crosse which hee bare as Archbyschoppe of Poike, signified himselfe, and Augustine the Physician who ouerthrew the Crosse, was onelie hee that accuseth the Cardinall, whereby his enemies caught an occasion to ouerthrowe him: it fell vpon doctor Boners head, who was Spasser of the Cardinales faculties and Spirituall iurisdiccions, and was then damnyfied by the ouerthrowe of the Crosse: yea, and moreover drawing blode of him, betokened death, which shortly after did ensue. About which time of this mischaunce, the same verie daie and season Spasser Walsh tooke his horse at the Court, as high as coulde bee subged, and so must needes bee taken for a

signe or token of that which followed. Nowe the appointed time by the decree of his staulacion, and sitting at dinner vpon the Friday next before the spon daie, on the which daie hee intended to be stauled at Poike, the Earle of Northumberland and Spasser Walsh, with a great companie of Gentlemen of the earles house, and of the countrie, whom he had gathered together in the kings name, came into the hall at Caluod, the officers being at dinner, and the cardinall not fultie dined, being then in his fruites. The first thing that the earle did after hee had set order in the hall, hee commanded the porter at the gates to deliuer him the keyes thereof, who would in no wise obey his commandement although he were roughly threatened, and straitly commanded in the kings name to make deliuey of them to one of the earles seruants: sir (quoth hee) seeing that ye do but intend to set one of your seruantes in my place to keepe the gates, I know no seruant that ye haue, but I am as able as he to do it, and keepe the gates to your purpose, whatsoeuer it be: and also the keyes were deliuered me by my L. and mast. wherefore, I pray you to pardon me, for whatsoeuer ye shall command me to do in the ministracion of mine office, I shall do it with good will: with that (quoth the earle) hold him a booke, and commanded him to late his hand thereon: thou shalt sweare (quoth he) that thou shalt well and truelie keepe the gates to the kings vse, and to do all such thinges as mee shall command, and that ye shall let passe neither in nor out at the gates, but such as ye be commanded by vs, and with this oth, hee receiued the keyes at the earles hands. Of all these doings knew the cardinall nothing, for they stopped the staires, so that none went vp to the cardinals chamber, and the y that came downe, coulde no more go vp againe: at the last one escaped, who shewed the cardinall that the earle was in the hal: whereat the cardinall marvelled, and woulde not beleue him, but commanded a gentleman to bring him the truth, who going downe the staires, saw the earle of Northumberland, and returned, and said it was very he: then (quoth the cardinall) I am sorie that we haue dined, & I feare our officers be not prouided of anie force of good fish, to make him some honorable cheer, let the table stand (quoth hee) with that hee rose vp, and going downe the staires, hee encountered the Earle coming vp with all his suite, and as soon as the Cardinall espied the Earle, he put off his cap, and said, my Lord, ye be most heartilie welcome, and so embraced each other: then the cardinallooke the earle by the hand, and had him vp into his chamber, whom followed all the number of the Earles seruantes. From thence, he led him into his bed chamber, and they being there all alone, the Earle saide vnto the cardinall, with a soft voice, laying his hand vpon his arme, my L. I arrest you of high treason: with which wordes the Cardinall being marvellously astonished, standing both still a good space, at the last, quoth the Cardinall, what authoritie haue you to arrest mee? forsooth my lord, quoth the earle, I haue a commission so to do: where is your commission, quoth he, that I may see it? saide Sir that you maie not, saide the earle: well then, quoth the cardinall, I will not obey your arrest. But as they were debating this matter betwene them in the chamber, so busie was Sp. Walsh in arresting doctor Augustine at the Doore in the Pallace, saying vnto him, go in traitor, or I shall make thee.

At the last master Walsh being entered the cardinales chamber, beganne to plache off his hode, and after kneeled downe to the cardinall, vnto whome the cardinall said, come hither gentleman, and let me speake with you: sir here my A. of Northumberland hath arrested me, but by whose authoritie hee theweth not: if ye be iointed with him, I pray you shew me. And so my lord, quoth M. Walsh, hee theweth you the trueth: well then, quoth the cardinall, I pray you let me see it. Sir, I beseech you, quoth master Walsh, hold vs excused: there is annexed to our commission certain instructions which you maie not see: well quoth the Cardinall, I trowe pee are one of the kinges puaie Chamber, your name is Walsh, I am content to yelo to you, but not to my lord of Northumberland without I see his commission: the worst in the kinges puaie Chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest peerre of the Realme by the kinges commaundement, without anie Commission, therefore put your Commission and authoritie in execution, spare not, I will obeye the kinges will: I take God to iudge, I neuer offered the king in worde nor deed. Then the earle called into the Chamber byers Gentlemen of his owne seruantes, and after they had taken the Cardinales heies from him, they put him in custodie of the earles Gentlemen, and then they went about the house to set all things in an order: then sent they Doctor Augucline awaie to London with as much speede as they coude, who was bounde vnto the houle like a Traytor, but it was Sundae towarde night ere the Cardinall was conueied from Caluod, and lodged that night in the Abbey of Pomfret. The next daie hee remoued toward Danaster, and was there lodged at the Blacke Friers, the next daie he was remoued to Sheffield parke, where the earle of Shrewsbury with his ladie, and a traine of Gentlemen and Gentlewomen receiued him with much honor: And the cardinall being thus with the earle of Shrewsbury, continued there 18. daies after, vpon whome the earle appointed diuers gentlemen to attend continuallie, to see that hee shoulde lacke nothing, being serued in his owne Chamber, as honourable as he had bene in his owne house, and once euerie daie the Earle woulde repaie vnto him, and commune with him. After the Cardinall had thus remayned with the Earle of Shrewsburie about a fortnight, it came to pas at a certain time as he sate at his dinner in his owne Chamber, hauing at his boydes ende a messe of Gentlemen and chaplaines to keepe him companie, toward the ende of his dinner, when hee was come to eating his fruites, his colour was perceyued often to chaunge, whereby hee was iudged not to be in good health: whereupon, one of his Gentlemen sayde: Sir, me seemes you are not well at case: to whome he answered with a loud voise, forsooth no more I am, for I am, quoth he, taken sodainelie with a thing about my stomack, that lieth there along, as colde as a whetstone, which is no more but wind, I pray you go to the Poticarie, and inquite of him if hee haue anie thing that will breake wind bpwarde. Then went he to the earle, and shewed him what estate the cardinall was in, and what hee desired: with that the Earle caused the poticarie to be called before him, and demanded of him if he had any thing that would breake wind bpwarde in a mans bodie, and hee answered hee had such geare. Then, quoth the Earle, fetch mee some: then the

Poticarie fetched a white confection in a faire Paper, and shewed it to the Earle, who commaunded one to giue the same the next before him, and then the same to bee brought to the Cardinall, who receyued it bype all at once into his mouth: But immediatlie after, surelie hee snooded much wind bpwarde. Doe, (quoth hee) pee maie see that it was but wind, and nowe I am well eased, I thanke God, and so he rose from the Table, and went to his prayers: And that doone, there came on him such a loosenesse, that it caused him to goe to his stoole. And not longe after the Earle of Shrewsburie came into the gallerie to him, with whome the Cardinall met, and then sitting downe vpon a Bench, the Earle asked him howe hee did, and hee most lamentable aunswered him, and thanked him for his gentle entertaynement: Sir, (quoth the Earle) if pee remember, pee haue often wished to come before the king, to make your answer, and I haue written to the king in that behalfe, making him priuie of your lamentation that pee inwardlie haue reuelued for his displeasure, who accepteth all your doings therin, as friends bee accustomed to do in such cases: therefore I would aduise you to pluck bp your heart, and be not agast of your enemies, I doubt not but this your iourney to his highnes shall be much to your aduancement. The king hath sent for you that worthyfull knight Master Kingstone, and with him 24. of your other seruants, now of the guard, to the intent pee maie safely come to his maiestie: Sir (quoth the Cardinall) I trow master Kingstone is Consable of the tower: yea, what of that, quoth the Earle? I assure you hee is elected by the king for one of your friends: Well, quoth the cardinall, as God will, so be it. I am subiect to fortune, being a true man, ready to accept such chances as shal follow, and there an end. I pray you where is M. Kingstone? quoth the earle, I will send for him: I praie you so do, quoth the cardinall: at whose message he came, and as soone as the Cardinall espied him, he made haste to encounter him, and at his comming hee kneeled to him, and saluted him in the kinges behalfe, whom the Cardinall bare-headed offered to take vp, and said: I praie you stande vp, kneele not to me, I am but a wretched repleate with miserie, not deserving my selfe but as a vile abiect, betterlie cast awaie without desert as God knoweth. Then saide M. Kingstone with humble reuerence, Sir, the king hath him commended vnto you: I thanke his highnes, quoth the cardinall, I trust hee be in health: yea, quoth M. Kingstone, and hee commaunded me to say to you, that you shoulde assure your selfe that he beareth you as much good will, as euer hee did, and willeth you to be of good cheere, and where report hath bene made, that ye shoulde commit against him certaine heinous crimes, which hee thinketh to bee untrue, yet he can do no lesse than to send for you to your trial, and to take your iourney to him at your own pleasure, commaunding me to be attendant vpon you. Therefore sir I pray you when it shall be your own pleasure to take your iourney, I shall be ready to giue attendance: Master Kingstone, quoth he, I thanke you for your newes, and sir, if I were as lusty as I haue been of late, I would ryde with you in Post, but I am diseased with a sike that maketh mee verie weak: but I shall with all speede make me ready to ryde with you to Worcester. When night came, the Cardinall waxed verie sick with the Aske, the which caused him continually to go to the stole al that night, in somuch, that he had that night 50. stoles: therefore in consideration of his infirmite, they caused him to carrie all that day: and the next daie he took his journey with master Kingstone and them of the guard, till he came to an house of the earle of Shrewsburies, called Harbrike hall, where he lay all night verie euill at ease. The next daie he rode to Nottingham, and there lodged that night more sicke: and the next day he rode to Leicester Abbey, and by the waie wared so sicke, that he was almost fallen from his mule, so that it was night before he came to the Abbey of Leicester: where at his coming in at the gates, the Abbot with all his couent met him with bladders ofches light, whom they honorably receiued and welcommed: to whom the Cardinall said: father abbot, I am come hither to lay my bones among you, riding so still vntill he came to the staires of the chamber, where he alighted from his mule, and master Kingstone led him vp the staires, and as some as he was in his chamber he went to bed. This was on the saturday at night, and then encreased sicke and sicke, vntill sondaie, that all men thought he would haue died. So on Tuesday the 3. Andrewes euen, master Kingstone came to him and bad him good morrow, for it was about fire of the clocke, and asked him how he did: sir, quoth he, I carrie but the pleasure of God, to render vp my poore soule into his hands: not so sir, quoth master Kingstone, with the grace of God, ye shall liue and do better well, if ye will be of god there: nay in god woth master Kingstone, my desire is such, that I cannot liue: for I haue had some experience in phisicke. Thus it is, I haue a sure with a continuall feauer, the nature whereof is, that if there be no alteration of the same within eight daies, either must ensue excoiation of the entrailles, or framic, or else present death, and the best of them is death, and as I suppose this is the eight daie, and if ye see no alteration in me, there is no remedie, saue, though I maie liue a daie or twaine after, but death must ensue. Sir, quoth master Kingstone, you be in such penurians, doubting that thing, that in god saith ye neede not. Well, well, master Kingstone, quoth the Cardinall, I see the matter how it is framed: but if I had serued God as diligentlie as I haue done the king, he would not haue giuen me ouer in my gray haire: but this is the last reward that I must receiue for the diligent paines and studie that I haue had to doe him service, not regarding my seruice to God, but only to satisfie his pleasure: I praie you haue me most humble commended vnto his heauyn maiestie, and beseech him in my behalfe to call to his princelie remembrance, all matters proceeding betwene him and me from the beginning of the worlde, and the progresse of the same, and most especiallie in his weightie matter, and then shall his graces conseruence know whether I haue offended him or no, &c. Master Kingstone answered: I can no more saie, but I wish all things to haue good successe, my time draweth on fast, and euery with that he began to draw his spatch at length, and his tong to faile, his eyes being set, whose sight fayled him, then did they put him in remembrance of Christ his Passion, and caused the yemen of the guard to stand by to see him die, and to witness of his woords at his departure: and incontinently the clocke stroke eight, and then he gaue vp the ghost, and departed departed this present life, which caused him to cal to remembrance how he saide the day before, that at eight of the clocke they should lose their master: One of them looked on the other, supposing that either he knewe or prophesied of his departure.

Here is the end and fall of pride and arrogancy of men exalted by fortune to dignities: for I assure you in his time hee was the haughtiest man in all his proceedings aliuie, hauing more respect to the honor of his person, than he had to his spiritual profession, wherein should be shewed all meeknes, humilitie and charity: the discussing whereof any further I leaue to diuines.

gance.

After that he was thus departed master Kingstone sent a poste to the king, advertised him of the departure of the cardinall by one of the gard, that saue and heard him die. And when master Kingstone and the abbot had consulted for the order of his buriall, it was thought good that he should be buried the next daie following: for master Kingstone would not farr be the returne of the poste: and it was thought good, that the Apaloz of Leicester and his brethren should be sent for, to see him personallie dead, to auoid false rumors that might happen. In the meane time the body was taken out of the bedde, who had vpon him next his bodie a Shirte of haire, besides his other Shirte of holm: now hauing put vpon his deade corpes, all such ornaments, as hee was possessed in, when he was made Bishoppe and Archbyschoppe, as Mitre, Crosse, Ring, and Pall, with all other things due to his order and dignitie: and lying thus all daie in his Coffin open faced, euery man that would might see him there dead, as the Apaloz, his brethren, and other did. About foure or fife of the clocke at night, he was carried downe into the Church, by the Abbot and canons, and service was sung for the funerals: And about foure of the clocke in the morning master Kingstone and his seruantes came into the Church, and there carried the erecting of bladders cermonies, and then was hee buried in the midd of our ladies chappel, and by that time it was fire of the clocke in the morning. Then prepared euery man to horseback being so. Andrewes day the apostle, & so took their journey to the court. And thus ended the life of this rich cardinall of England, whose history, who list to read with a cleare eye, maie behold the mutabilitie of balne honors, and brittle assurance in abundance, the vncertaintie of dignities, the flattering of fained friends, and the sicke fauor of tooholp princes: whereof this Cardinall had felt and tasted both of the sweet & soure in each degree, as flasting from honors, losing of riches, deposed from dignities, forsaken of friends, and the mutabilitie of princes fauor: of all which things hee had in this worlde, the full felicitie, as long as fortune smiled vpon him, but when hee beganne to frowne, how soone was hee deuiued of all these mundaine iotes, and balne pleasures, which in twentie yeeres with great trauaile and studie hee obtained, was in one yeere and lesse, with great care and sorow lost and consumed. O madness! O sonde desire! O foolish hope! O greedy desire of balne honor, dignities, and riches! of what vncoustant hope and trust is it, in the false fained countenance and promise of fortune, wherefore the Prophet saide full well: The superbius & ignorat cui congregabit ea. Who is certayne that hee shall leaue his riches: that hee hath gathered in the world, unto them whome he hath purposed: The Wilsenman saith: That an other whome peradventure he bated in his life, shall spende it out, and consume it.

The clergy condemned in the premunire.

The Clergie of England, being iudged by the R. learned counsell to bre in the premunire, for maintaining the power legantine of the cardinal, were called by proccesse into the kings bench to answer, wherfore in their conuocation they concluded a submission, wherin they called the king supreme head of the church of England, according to the law of God, and not other wise, and were contented to giue the king 100000. poundes, to pardon their offences touching the premunire.

When the parliament was begun the 6. of Januarie, the pardon of the spiritual persons was signed with the kings hand, and sent to the Lordes, which they consented to, and signed the bill. But when the same came downe to the commons it could not so easilie passe, because diuers froward persons would also that the R. should pardon the laity as well as the spirituality, saying that all men which had dealt with the Cardinal were in like danger: This their saile and bold demand was thought more then reason, for that they would same to enule other mens wealth, and also to restraine the king of his libertie: but at length they seemed to be frowardfull for that they had dealt so unaduisable, and then the king sent them their pardon, for the which they humbly thanked him.

Conclusions as against the kings marriage.

The 30. daie of March the Lordes Chancelor, and diuers other Lordes, both spiritual and Temporal, came into the Common house, and there the Lord Chancelor declared what the king had done, touching the doubt of his marriage, to knowe the opinions of learned men of diuers Vniuersities in Christendome, and there were read the determinations of the same Vniuersities, which they had written and sealed, concluding, that the kings marriage could not be lawfull: there were shewed also diuers bookes diuine, by doctors of foraine nations, which were to the same effect, but were not read, for that the daie was spent.

A Cooke boyled in Smithfield.

The 5. of Aprill one Richard Rose a Cooke, was boyled in Smithfield, for poisoning of diuers persons, to the number of 16. or more, at the Bishop of Exchesters place, amongst the which Benet Curwine gentleman was one, and he intended to haue poisoned the bishoppe himselfe, but hee eate no portage that daie, wherby hee escaped, marie the poore people that eate of them, manie of them died,

An. reg. 23.

King Henry sent unto the Queene diuers Lords of the Counsell, about the last of Maie, the which Lordes in her Chamber at Greenwich, declared unto her the determinations of the Vniuersities concerning the marriage betwixt them two, and demanded of her, whether shee would for the quietnesse of the kings conscience, put the matter to foure prelates, and foure temporal lordes of the realme: but she still affirmed her selfe to be his lawfull wife, and therefore would abide in that point, till the court of Rome had made a finall end there in.

Chanterie priests of London against their bishop.

The chanterie priests of London being called afore the bishop, who would haue

haue had them contributaries toward the payment of the 100000. l. granted to the R. for his pardon of the premunire, kept such a stir, in breaking into the Chapiter where the Bishop sat, that the Bishop was faine with faire wordes to dismisse them for the time: but after vpon complaint made to the Lordes Chancelor, dyuers of them, and of their partakers were arrested and committed to prison, to the number of fiftene priests, and fure laie men, some to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and to other prisons, where they lay long after.

This yere king Henry tooke into his hands, the Hospitall of Saint Iames, nere vnto Charing Crosse, and all the medelbes to the same belonging, compounding with the Sisters of that house, they to haue pensions during their liues. And then builded in place of the said hospitall, a goodlie mansion, retaining still the name of S. Iames: hee also there inclosed a parke with a wall of bricke, now indifferently seruing to the saide mansion, as also to his place of Whitehall at Westminster.

After Christmas the Parliament beganne againe, in the which the Commons declared themselves to be fore agreed, with the crakties of the ordinarie, that called men afore them ex officio. At length a booke was drawn of all their griefes, and the same deliuered to the king by the speaker, who humbly beseeched him in the name of the Commons to take such direction therein, as to his highnes might same expedient: wherunto the king answered hee would take aduice, and heare the partie accused speake. In this Parliament was made an act, that bishops should pay no more annuities, or other wise monie for their bulls to the pope, for it was affirmed that there had bene paid for bulls, of bishops and other, sith the fourth of Henry the seueneth, 60000. pounce sterling.

The parliament began againe after Easter, there was a motion made to helpe the king with mony towardes his charges about the edifying of pyles and other fortifications, vpon the borders for eaneuill Scotland, both for better habitation to be hadde there, and also for restraint of the Scottes that fled to make inuasions: there was therefore a siffence granted, but not inacted at this season, because that sodainly began a pestilence in Westminster: wherfore the parliament was proroged.

An. reg. 24.

The 15. of May, sir T. Moore after great suite made by him, was discharged of his chancelorship.

A siffence granted to the king.

The twentieth eyght of Maie, frier Elshowe standing in the Roode losse of the friers Church at Greenwich, contrarying the preacher doctor Curwine, sayde hee lyed, before the king, and was for the same sent to prison. This Doctor Curwine was sometime Drane of Hereford, after Archbyschoppe of Dublin in Irelande, and lastlie Byschoppe of Exrsetre in Queene Maries dayes.

A stout frier told the Drane, wher before he had that he lied.

The 4. of June the king dubbed Tho. Audley knight, made him keeper of the great seale, and not long after lord chancelor.

Lorde Audley made L. chancelor.

The 15. of June, 5. men were hanged and quartered at tower hill, for coining and clipping of the coine.

Coiners and clippers executed.

Christ church suppressed.

In the month of July, the king suppressed the priorie of the holie Trinitie commonly called Christ-church in London, he sent the Chanons of that house to other priories, and gave their church, plate, and lands, to sir Thomas Audley, late made keeper of the great seale.

The thye and twentieth of August, William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, deceased after he had late archbishop eight and twentie yeres and thye moneths, he was buried at Canterburie, Thomas Cranmar succeeded in the archbishopschike.

King Henry rode to Boloigne.

The twentieth five of October, whilst the king lay thus in Boloigne, the French king called a chapter of the companions of his order called Saint Esphell, of whome the king of England was one, and to be there elected the Dukes of Beffolke and Suffolke, to be companions of the same order, the being brought to the Chapter had their collars delivered to them, and were sworn to the statutes of the order. The same daie, they departed out of Boloigne toward Calets: without the towne of Calets, about the distance of two miles, the Duke of Richmond the kings base sonne, with a great company of noble men, which hadde not bene at Boloigne, met them, and shewing the French king, embraced him in most honorable and courteous manner. Then they passed forward to Helwenhambridge, and so to Calets, where was such provision made for the receiving of them, as well for lodging, plate, and all such other furniture of household, as also of all sortes of viandes, wines, and other necessaries, it seemed wonderful. The French kings train was 1200. horse or more, among the which was the king of Navarre, the Cardinal of Boloigne, and many Dukes, Bishops, and great Estates of France, Gascoigne, Bypaine, and Normandy: but there was lodging enough in Calets, not onlie for them, but also for many other, so that there were above 8000. persons lodged within the towne at that time. Whilst these two kings lay at Calets, King Henrie made the king of Navarre knight of the Garter. The next daie, the French king, with the king of Navarre, and all the great Lordes of France, rode againe to Boloigne: and King Henry of England rode with them to Sandringfield, where hee made the French king a costly banquet. At this entervile, there was a communication of a joint armie to be made by them both, against the Turke, who hadde at that time a great armie in Hungarie. The two kings should bring into the felde against him fourescore thousand men, whereof 10000. to bee horsemen with artillerie and furniture, but the enemy of peace (the diuell) stirred all christian princes against the Emperour, for that they feared he sought to be monarch of all Italie. Whereupon King Henry of England sent presentlie to the French king, by the Lord of Noerie the French ambassado: 50000. crownes. The king of England feared if the Emperour, for queene Katharine his Aunts sake (whome the saide king had refused to be his lawfull wife) would ioinc with the Pope against him, wherefore hee made great complaints to the French king against the saide Pope, for the wrong hee did him in the matter of deuotise, and namelie in that hee would constrainc him to goe in proper person to Rome, or else to sende thither a Deputie with sufficient prier to answer the lawe, which the saide king helde for rigorous: furthermore hee requested the French king that they two might sende Ambassadors together against the Pope to summon him to a counsell, to see what abuse and great wronges hee had done against Christian Princes, and their subiects, and crating of the clergie of England, and that the same, by the saide counsell, might be reformed. To this the French king agreed, and forthwith willed the king of England to make all sure at home, and let him alone to deale abroad, but not to call the Pope to any counsell, for that by their two powers, hee was otherwise to be dealt withall. Thus was the king of England now bent against the Pope, where of late hee hadde given manerlie threescore thousand angelles, towardes the paie of an army under Mounfier de Foys, for the popes illuery, when he was holden prisoner in Castle Angel, by the late Duke of Burbons soldiers, and the prince of Orange.

The banquet being ended at Sandringfield, as is aforesaid, the three kings departed like loving brethren in great amitie. Whilste the king of England was in the French kings dominions, he had the upper hand, and likewise had the French king in the dominions of the king of England. And as the French king paid all the English mens charges at Boloigne, so did the king of England pay the French mens charges at Calais.

The fourteenth of November the king returning into England landed at Dover.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Greenwich, and after Christmas Sir Thomas Audley keeper of the great seale, was made Lord Chancellor of England.

King Henry privately married the Lady Anne Bolaine in his closet at Whitehall, on the five and twentieth day of January being S. Pauls day: Mistress Anne Sauvage bore by Duene Annes traine, and was her self shortly after married to the lord Berkeley, doctor Rowland Lee, that married the king to Duene Anne, was made Bishop of Chester, then Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, and president of Wales.

And then began the parliament, in the which was chosen Speaker Humphrey Wingfield Gentleman of Greys Inn. In this parliament was enacted, that no person should appeale for any cause out of this realme to the court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the archbishop to the king, and all causes of the kings to be tried in the upper house of the Conuocation. It was also enacted the same time, that Duene Katherine should no more be called Duene, but Princess Dowager, and the widow of Prince Arthur.

After that the king perceived his new wife to be with childe, he caused all officers necessary to be appointed to her, and so on Easter eue being the 12. day of Aprill, she went to her closet openly as Duene, and was proclaimed Duene of England: and then the king appointed the day of her coronation to be kept on Whitsonday next following, and writings were sent to all Sherifes, to certifie the names of men of forty pound lands, to receive the order of knighthode, or else to make fine for the same. The assailement of which fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell master of the kings iebell house, who so used the matter, that a great summe of mony was lent to the kings by those fines.

The matter of appeale made by Duene Katherine, whereunto she still sticked, and by no means could be removed from it, was communed of both in the Parliament house, and also in the conuocation, where it was so handled, that many were of opinion, that not onlie her appeale, but also all other appeales made to Rome, were void, and of none effect, so; that in ancient councelles it had bene determined, that a cause rising in one province should not be determined in another. This matter was opened with all the circumstances to the Lady Katherine Dowager, the which persisterd still in her former opinion, and would by no means reuoke her appeale to the court of Rome. Whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury doctor Thomas Cranmer accompanied with doctor John Stokesley bishoppe of London, Stephen Gardner bishoppe of Winchester, the bishops of Bath and Lincoln, and divers other learned men in great number rode to Dunstable, which is five miles from Amphyll, where the princeesse Dowager late, and there by one doctor Lee she was assited to appeare before the said Archbishop in case of matrimony in the same towne of Dunstable: but she made default and appeared not, wherefore she was called preumptuously every daie 15. dales together, and at the last for lacke of appearance, by the assent of the learned men there present, she was iudged from the king, and the marriage declared to be void and of none effect.

In the moneth of Pale Pope Clement sent an orator to the king, requiring him to appeare personally at the generall Councell, which was appointed to be kept in the yere following: but when his commission was shewed, at the earnest request of the king, there was neither place nor time certaine specified for the keeping of that councell, and so with an uncertaine answer to an uncertaine demaunde, he departed, but not unrewarded. Shortly after the king understanding that the Pope, the Emperour, and the French king should meet at pise in June following, he appointed the duke of Suffolk, the Lord Rocheford brother to Duene Anne, Sir William Pawlet controller of the kings house, Sir Anthony Browne, and Sir Francis Brian knights, to go in ambassage to the French king, and both to accompanie him to pise, and also to commune with the pope there, concerning his late in the kings divorce. These made their provision ready, and so with the number of eight score horses they went to Dover, and passing over to Calais, toke their waie through France, to accomplish their ambassade as they had charge.

The kings highnesse addrest his letters to the Spalot and communalte of London, signifying unto them, that his pleasure was to solemnise the coronation of his most beare and welbeloued wife Duene Anne at Westminster on Whitsonday next ensuing, willing them to make preparation, as well to fetch her grace from Greenwich to the Tower by water, as to see the Citie garnished with pageants in places accustomed, for the honour of her grace, when the shouds be conueyed from the tower to Westminster. Whereupon a common councell was called, and commandement giuen to the Haberdashers, of which craft the Spalot was, that they shoulde prepare a Barge for the Bachelors, with a wafter, and a fopple, garnished with banners, like as they vse when the Spalot is presented at Westminster, on the morrow after the feast of Saint Simon and Jude. Also all other Craftes were commanded to prepare Barges, and to garnish them, not onely with their banners accustomed, but also to decke them with targets by the sides of the Barges, and to set up all such seemely banniers and Bannets, as they had in their Halls, or could get to furnish their said barges, and euerie barge to haue muskets, according to which commandement great preparation was made for all things necessarie for such a noble triumph.

The nine and twentieth daie of May being thursdaie, the Spaloz and his brethren all in Scarlet, and such as were knights had collars of Eddes, and the residue having great chaines, and the Councell of the Citie assembled with them at Saunt Marys Hill. And at one of the clocke descended to the newe faire to their barge, which was garnished with manie goodly banners and streamers and richly covered, in which barge was Schalmes, Schage, bulcke, and divers other Instruments of musique, which playing continuallie.

After that the Spaloz and his brethren were in their barge, seeing that the companies to the number of fiftie barges were ready to waite upon them, they gave commandement to the companies, that no barge should tow neare to another, than twice the length of the barge, and to see the order kept, there were three wheries prepared, and in every part one of the two officers to call on them to keepe their order.

After which commandement given, they set forth in order, as hereafter is described. First, before the Spalozs barge was a foisse, for a waister full of ordnance, in which foisse was a great red Dragon continually moving and casting wilde fire, and round about the saide foisse stood terrible monstrous and wilde men casting fire, and making hideous noise: next after the foisse a good distance came the Spalozs barge: on whose right hand was the Bachelers barge, in the which were trumpets, and divers other melodious instruments: the decks of the saide barge and saile yardes and the top cables were hanged with rich cloth of golde and silke: at the foreship and the stern were two great banners rich beate[n] with the armes of the King and the Queene: and on the top castle also was a long streamer newly beate[n] with the saide armes: the sides of the barge was set full of flags and banners of the devices of the companies of Haberdashers and merchant Adventurers, and the lastiers of robes were hanged with innumerable penfels, having little bekes at the endes, which made a goodlie noise, and was a goodly sight, waivering with the winde: on the out side of the barge were three dozen Scoutrons in partiall, of the armes of the King and Queene, which were beate[n] upon square Buckram decided, so that the right side had the Kings colours, and the left side the Quenes, which Scoutrons were fastened on the clothes of Golde and silur, hanging on the yokes: on the left hande of the Spaloz was an other foisse, in the which was a mount, and on the mount stood a white Faulcon coloured upon a robe of Golde, enuironed with white roses and red, which was the Quenes device: about which mount sate Virgins singing and playing melodiously: Next after the Spaloz followed his fellowship the Haberdashers next after them the Specters: then the Specters, and so every company in his order, and last of all the Spalozs and Sheriffes officers, every company having melodious instruments by themselves, and goodly garnished with banners, and some covered with silke, and some with arras of such like, which was a goodly sight to behold: and in this order they rowed by Greenwich to the point beyond Greenwich, and there they turned backward in in an other order, that is to waite, the Spalozs and Sheriffes officers first, and the meanest craft next, and so ascending to the uppermost craft in order, and the Spaloz last, as they go to Pauls at Christmasse, and in that order they rowed downe ward to Greenwich towne, and there cast anchor, making great melodie. At three of the clocke, the Quene apparelled in rich cloth of Golde, entered into her barge, accompanied with divers Ladies and Gentlewomen, and incontinent the Citizens set forward in their order, their minstrels continually playing: and the Bachelers barge going on the Quenes right hande, which she took great pleasure to beholde. About the Quenes barge were many noble men, as the Duke of Suffolke, the Marquesse Doyet, the Earle of Wiltshire her father, the Carles of Arundale, Warby, Rutland, Worcester, Huntington, Sulter, Erford, and manie bishops and noble men, every one in his barge, which was a goodly sight to behold: she thus being accompanied rowed towards the Tower: and in the meane waite the ships which were commanded to lie on the shoare for letting of the barges, shot divers peales of guns, and ere she landed, there was a marvellous shot out of the Tower, I never heard the like: and at her landing, there met with her the Lord Chamberlaine with the officers of Armes, and brought her to the King, which received her with loving countenance at the posterne by the water side, and kissed her, and then she turned backe againe and thanked the Spaloz and the Citizens with manie goodlie wordes, and so entered into the Tower.

After which entrie the Citizens all this while howred before the Tower, making great melodie, and went not aland, for none were assigned to lande but the Spaloz, the Recorder, and two Aldermen: but to speake of the people that stood on everie shoare to behold this sight, he that saw it not will not belave it.

On Fridaie at dinner served the King all such as were appointed by his highnes to be brights of the Bath, which after dinner were brought to their chambers, and that night were bathed, and thysmen according to the old usage of England, and the next daie in the morning the King dubbed them according to the ceremonies thereto belonging, whose names hereafter ensue nineteen in number.

From thence the quene with her traine passed to Leaden hall, where was a godly pageant with a tipe and beauntly Rose, and under the tipe was a godly rose of golde, set on a little mountaine enuironed with red roses and white, out of the tipe came downe a fancon all white, and set vpon the rose, and incontinent came downe an Angell with great melodye, and set a cloie crowne crowne of gold on the faulken head: and in the same pageant sate S. Anne with all hir issue beneath her: and under Mary Cleophe sate hir four children, of the which children, one made a goodly Oracion to the Quene of the fruitfulness of S. Anne, and of her generation, trusting that like fruit should come of her. Then she passed to the conduit in Cornhill, where were the three Graces set in a stone, afoze whome was the Spring of Grace, continuallie running wine: afoze the fountaine sate a poet, declaring the property of every Grace: that done, every Lady by hir selfe according to hir property, gave to the Q. a severall gift of Grace.

That done, she passed by the great Conduite in Cheape, which was netwlie paynted with Armes and devises, out of the which Conduite, (by a goodlie fountayne set at the ende,) ranne continuallie wine, both white and Claret all that afternoone: and soe she rode to the Standart, which was richlie paynted with Images of Kings and Quenes, and hanged with banners of armes, and in the toppe was maruepous sweete Harmonie, both of songs and Instruments.

Then she went forwarde by the Crosse, which was netwlie gille, till she came where the Aldermen stode, and then Spallster Baker the Recorder came to her with lowe reverence, making a proper and bylese proposition, and gave to her, in the name of the cite, a thousand marks in golde, in a purse of golde, which she thankfullie accepted with manie good wordes, and so rode to the little Conduite, where was a rich pageant full of melodie and songs, in which pageant were Pallas, Iuno, & Venus, and afoze them stode Mercurie, which in the name of þe three goddesses, gave unto her a ball of Gold, blisded in three, signifying three gifts which these three goddesses gave to hir, that it to say, wisedom, riches, and felicity.

As she entered into Pauls gate, there was a prettie pageant, in which sate three Ladies richlie clothed, and in a circle on their heade was written Regina Anna, prosper, proceede, and raigne. The lady in the middell had a tablet, in the which was written Veni amica, coronaberis, and under the tablet sate an angell with a clofe crowne. And the ladie sitting on the right hand had a tablet of silver, in which was written, Domine dirige gressus meos. And the third lady had a tablet of gold, with letters of azure written, Confido in Domino, and under their feet was written:

Et parit populus antea facta suis.*

And these Ladies cast downe Walters, on the which she sayde two verses were written.

From thence she passed to the East end of Pauls church against the school, where stood a scaffold, and children well apparelled, which saide to her divers goodly verses of Poets translated into English, to the honoz of the Q. and her, which she highly commended. And then she came to Ludgate, which gate was new garnished with gold and blisse, & on the leades of S. Martins church stood a goodly godly quere of singing men and children, which sang newe Ballets made in praise of her grace.

After that she was past Ludgate, she proceeded toward Fleetstreet, where the conduit was netwlie painted, and all the armes and angels refreshed, and the shalmes melodiously sounding. Upon the conduit was made a Tower with foure turrets, and in every turret stood one of the cardinall vertues with their tokens and properties, which had severall speeches, promising the Quene never to leaue her, but to be aiding and comforting her: and in the middell of the tower closely was such severall solemne instruments, that it seemed to be an heavenly noise, and was much regarded and praised: and besides this, the conduit ran Wine, claret and red all the afternoone, so she with all her company, and the Spaioz, rode forth to Temple bar, which was netwlie painted and repaired, where stode also divers singing men and children, till she came to Westminster Hall, which was richlie hanged with cloth of arras, and netwlie glassed, and in the middell of the hall she was taken out of her litter, and so led up to the high becke under the cloth of estate, on whose left hand was a cushion of terrages high, maruepous rich and beautiful to beholde, and within a little season was brought to the Quene with a solemne service in great standing Spice plates, a boppe of Spice, and subtleties, with Spocrasse, and other Wines, which she sent downe to her ladies, and when the ladies had drunk, she gave hartly thanks to the lords and ladies, and to the Spaioz, and other that had given their attendance on hir: and so with diverse hirselfe with a few ladies to the White hall, and so to her chamber, and there shifted hir, and after went in hir barge secretly to the king to his mannoz of Westminster where she rested that night.

Queens Band.

On Whitsundaye the 1. of June the Spaioz clad in crimosin velvet, with his roller, and all the Aldermen and Sheriffs in scarlet, and the counsel of the city, took their barge at the crane by seven of the clock, and came to Westminster, where they were welcommed, and brought into the hall by M. Treasurer, and other of the kings house, and so gave their attendance till the Quene should be come forth: betwene eight and nine of the clocke she came into the hall, and stood under the cloth of estate, and then came in the Kings Chappell, and the monks of Westminster, all in rich coapes, and many Bishops and abbots, in Coapes and spitters, which went into the middell of the hall, and there stode a season, then was there a rap cloth spread from the quenes standing in the hal, through the pallace and sanctuary, which was railed on both sides, to the high altar of Westminster, after that the rap cloth was cast, the officers of armes appointed the order accustomed. First went gentlemen, then Esquires, then knights, then aldermen of London in their cloakes of scarlet, cast over their gounes of scarlet.

After them, the Judges in their mantles of scarlet and coifes: then followed the knights of the Bath, being no lords, every man having a white lace on his left sleeve: then followed barons and bicomts in their parliament robes of scarlet: after them came Carles, Marquesses, and Dukes in their Robes of Estate, of Crimosin velvet, furred with Ermin, powdered according to their degrees.

degrees. After them came the Lord Chancellor in a robe of Scarlet, open before, bordered with lictice. After him came the kings chappell, and the monks solemnly singing, with procession. Then came abbots and bishops mitered, then Sergeants and officers at armes: Then the Mayor of London with his mace, and Garter in his coate of armes: then the marques Dorset in his robe of estate, which bare the Scepter of gold, and the earle of Arundell, which bare the rod of moze with the dove both together: then alone the earle of Wiltshire high Chamberlaine of England, which bare the crowne. After him the duke of Suffolke in his robe of estate, for that day being high Steward of England, having a long white rod in his hand, and the Lord William Howard with the rod of the marshalls ship, and everie knight of the garter had on his collar of the order. Then proceeded forth the Quene in a circote and robe of purple velvet, furred with Ermine in her haire, cosse, and circlet, as she had the Saturday, and over her was borne the Canopie, by foure of the Cinque postes, all in Crimolyn, with points of blew and redde hanging on their sleeves, and the Bishops of London and Winchester bare by the laps of the Quenes robe, and her traine which was verie long, was borne by the old Dutchesse of Suffolke. After her followed Ladies, being Lordes Wittes, which had circotes of scarlet, with narrow sleeves, the head all lictice, with barres of powder according to their degrees, and over that, they had mantles of scarlet furred, and every mantle had lictice about the neck like a neckerchiefe, likewise powdered, so that by the powderings their degrees might be knowne. Then followed Ladies being ladyes wives, in Gownes of Scarlet, with narrow sleeves without traines, onely edged with lictice, likewise had all the quenes Gentlewomen.

When she was thus brought to the high place made in the midst of the Church betwene the quere and the high altar, she was set in a rich Chaire, and after that she had rested a while, she descended downe into the high Altar, and there prostrated her selfe while the bishop of Canturburie said certain collectes over her. Then she rose, and the bishop annointed her on the head and on the breast, and then she was led by againe to her chaire, where after divers orisons said, the archbishop set the crowne of S. Edward on her head, and then delivered her the Scepter of gold in her right hand, and the rod of Moze with the dove in the left hand, and then all the quere sung Te Deum, &c. Which done, the bishop took off the crowne of S. Edward being beate, and set on her heade the Crowne made for her, and so went to masse, and when the offering was begunne, she descended downe and offered being crowned, and so ascended uppe agayne and sate in her Chaire till Agnus, and then she went downe and knelt before the high altar, where she receaved of the archbishop the holy sacrament, and then went by to the place agayne. After that Masse was done, she went to S. Edwards shrine, and there offered. After which offering done, she withdrew her into a little place made for that purpose on the one side of the quere. Now in the meane season every Dutchesse put on her bonet a coronell of gold wrought with flowers, and everie marchionesse put on a very coronell of gold, and every countesse a plain circle of gold without flowers, and and every king at armes put on a crowne of copper and gilt, all which were onne till night.

When the Quene had a little rested her, the companie returned in the same order that they set forth, and the Quene went crowned, and so did the ladies aforesaid: her right hand was sustained by the earle of Wiltshire her father, and her left hand by the Lord Talbot, deputy for the earle of Shrewsbury, & Lord Furnival her father. And when they were out of the sanctuary within the pallace, the trumpets played marvellous freshly, and so she was brought to Westminster hall, and so to her withdrawing chamber: during which time, the lordes, Judges, mayo, and aldermen, put off their robes, mantles, and cloakes, and took their hodes from their neckes, and call them about their shoulders, and the Lordes sate onlie in their circotes, and the Judges and Aldermen in their gownes, and all the Lordes that served that day served in their circotes, and their hodes about their shoulders. All buyers officers of the kings house being no Lordes, had circotes and hodes of Scarlet, edged with miniver, as treasurer, controller, and master of the iswell house, but their Circotes were not gilt.

While the Quene was in her Chamber, every Lord and other that ought to do service at the coronation, did prepare them according to their degree, as the Duke of Suffolke high steward of England, which was richly apparelled, his doublet and jacket set with orient pearle, his gowne crimolyn velvet embrothered, his courser trapped with a close trapper, headed all to the ground with crimolyn velvet, set full of letters of gold of Goldsmithes worke, having a long white rod in his hand. On his left hand rode the Lord William, deputy for his brother, as earle marshall with the marshalls rod, whose gown was crimolyn velvet, and his horse trapper purple velvet cutte on white sattin, embrothered with white Lions. The earle of Wiltshire was high chamberlaine, the earle of Essex carver, the earle of Suffolk sewer, the earle of Arundell chiefe butler, on whom twelve citizens of London did give their attendance at the cupbord: the earle of Darby cupbearer, the viscount Lile panter, the Lord Burgeyn chiefe larer, the Lord Bray almoner for him and his copartners, & the mayo of Wiltshire kept the buttery bar, and Th. Wyat was chosen ewerer for Sir Henry Wyat his father.

When all things were ready and ordered, the Quene under her canopie came into the hall and washed, and sate downe in the midst of the table under her cloth of estate. On the right side of her chaire stood the countesse of Wiltshire widow, and on her left hand stood the countesse of Worcester all the dinner season, which buyers times in the dinner time did holde a fyne cloth before the Quenes face when she like to spitte, or doe otherwise at her pleasures: and at the Tables end sate the Archbyschoppe of Canturburie on the right hande of the Quene, and in the midst betwene the Archbyschoppe and the countesse of Wiltshire stood the Earle of Wiltshire with a white hose all dinner time, and at the Quenes feete under the table sate two gentlewomen all dinner time. When all these things were thus ordered, came in the duke of Suffolke, and the Lord William Howard on horsebacke, and the sergeantes of armes before.

before them, and after them the sewer, and then the knights of the Bath, bringing in the first course, which was eight and twenty dishes, besides subtleties, and ships made of wafer, marvellous gorgeous to behold, all which time of service the trumpets standing in the windowes at the neather ende of the hall, played.

When the was served of two dishes, then the Archbishops service was set downe, whose sewer came equal with the third dish of the Quenes service on his left hand. After that the Quene and the Archbishops were served, the barons of the Ports began the table on the right hand next the wall, then at the table sate the masters and clerkes of the Chancerie, and beneath them other Doctors and Gentlemen. The table next the wall on the left hand by the cupboorde was begunne by the Spaior and Aldermen, the Chamberlaine, and counsell of the Citie of London, and beneath them sate substantiall merchants, and so downeward other worshipfull persons. At the table on the right hand in the middell of the hall sate the lord Chancellor, and other temporall lordes: on the right side of the table in their circotes, and on the left side of the same table sate bishops and abbots in their parliament robes: beneath them, sate the Judges, Sergeants, and the Kings Counsell: beneath them, the knights of the Bath. At the table on the left hand in the middle part sate Dutchesses, Marqueses, Countesses, Baroneses in their robes, and other Ladies in circotes, and Gentlewomen in gownes, all which Gentlewomen and Ladies sate on the left side of the table along, and none on the right side, and when all were thus set, they were incontinent served so quicklie, that it was marvellous, for the servants gave so good attendance, that meat, nor drinke, nor any thing else needed to be called for, which in so great a multitude was marvell. As touching the fare, there could be devised no more costly dishes, nor subtleties. The Spaior of London was served with four and thirtie dishes at two courses, and so were all his brethren, and such as sate at his table. The Quene had at her second course four and thirtie dishes, and thirtie at the third course, and betwene the last courses, the kings of armes crowned, and other officers of armes cried larges in three partes of the hall, and after stode in their place, which was in the behens of the kings bench: and on the right hand out of the cloyster of Saint Stephens Chappell was made a little closet, in which the king with divers ambassadours stode to behold the service, the Duke of Suffolke, and the Lord William rode oftentimes about the hall, chiering the lordes, ladies, and maiors, and his brethren.

After they in the hall had dined, they had toasters and spocasse, and then they washed, and were commanded to rise and stand still in their places before the tables: on the fourmes till the Quene had washed. When she had taken toasters and spocasse, the table was taken up, and the Earle of Rutland brought by the surnape, and laide it at the boordes end, which immediately was drazone and cast by master Reade marshall of the hall, and the Quene washed, and after the archbishop, and after the surnape was withdrazone: then the rose, and stode in the middell of the hall place, to whom the earle of Suffex, in a goodly

spice plate, brought a boide of spice and confectons. After him, the Spaior of London brought a standing cup of gold, set in a cup of assay of gold, and after that he had drunke, he gave the maiors the cup, with the cup of assay, because there was no couer, according to the claime of the Citie, thanking him and all his brethren of their paine.

Then the under her canapie departed to her chamber, and at the entry of her chamber, she gave the canapie with bells and all to the barons of the ports according to their claime, with great thanks: then the Spaior of London bearing his cap in his hand, with his brethren, went through the hall to their barge, and so did all other noblemen and gentlemen, for it was five of the clocke.

On Spundate were the iustices at the tilt before the kings gate, where the Spaior and his brethren had a goodly standing, but there were few speaces by then, by reason the horses would not cope.

On Wednesdate the king sent for the Spaior and his brethren to Westminster, and there he himselfe gave unto them hartie thanks, with manie goodly words.

On Spidsummer even deceased Mary the French Quene, sister to King Henry the eight, and wife to Charles Duke of Suffolke, and she was buried at Saint Edmundsburie.

The fifth of Julie Quene Katherine was proclaimed Prince Archures widowe.

The seventh of July two merchants were murdered on the Thames by one Wolfe and his wife.

It was this yeare enacted, that butchers should sell their beefe and mutton by weight, beefe for a halfe penny the pound, and mutton for three farthings: which being devised for the great commoditie of the realme (as it was thought) hath pleased farre otherwise, for at that time fat oxen were sold for five and twenty shillings and eight pence the peece, fat breatheres for three shillings and four pence the peece, fat calves of the like price, a fat lamb for twelve pence. The butchers of London sold penny pieces of beefe for the reliefe of the poore, every piece two pounce and a halfe, sometime three pounce for a penny: and shirterne, sometime fourtene of these pieces for twelve pence: mutton eight pence the quarter, and an hundred weight of beefe for four shillings and eight pence: what price it hath growen to since it needeth not to be set downe. At this time also, and not before, were foraine butchers permitted to sell their flesh in Leaden hall market of London.

The 7. of September being Sunday, betwene three and foure of the clocke after none, the Quene was delivred of a faire Ladie, for whose good deliverance Te Deum was sung incontinently, and great preparation was made for the christning. The Spaior, and his brethren; and foure of the chiefe Councillors were commanded to be at the christning the Wednesdate following. Upon which daie the Spaior Sir Stephen Peacocke in a gowne of crimson velvet, with his collar of essex, and all the aldermen in scarlet with collars and gawnes, and all the counsell of the citie with them took their barge at one of the clocke, and the Citizens had another Barge, and so rowed to Græntoie, where were many lords, knights, and gentlemen assembled: all the walles betwene the kings pallace and the Friers, were hanged with arras, and all the way strewed with græne rushes. The Friers Church was also hanged with rich arras: the font was of silver, and stood in the midst of the church three steps high, which was covered with a fyne cloth: and dyvers Gentlemen with Rapiers and Towels about their neckes, gave attendance about it, that no fish should come to the Font: Over it hung a square Canopie of Crymson sattin, fringed with Golde, about it was a rayle, covered with redde Sale, betwene the quere & bodie of the church was a close place with a pan of fire to make the Childe reddie in. When all these thinges were ordered, the Childe was brought to the Hall, and then everie man set forwarde: first the citizens two and two, then gentlemen, Esquires, and Chaplaines, next after them the aldermen, and the Spaloz alone, and next the kings counsell, then the kings chappell in coopes, then barons, bishops, earles, the earle of Essex bearing the covered basons gilt, after him the Marques of Excester with a taper of virgin wax, next him the Marques Dorset bearing the salt, behind him the lady Mary of Norfolkke bearing the crisme, which was herie rich of Pearle and Stone. The old dutchesse of Norfolkke bare the child in a Gantle of Purple velvet, with a long traine furred with Ermine. The Duke of Norfolkke with his marshals rodde went on the right hand of the said dutchesse, and the duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went officers of armes, the countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the chilles mantle, and in came betwene the child and the countesse of Kent went the earle of Arundell and the earle of Darby on either side, supporting the said traine in the middelt: over the child was borne a rich canopie by the Lord Rochford, the lord Hussey, the Lord William Howard, and the Lord Thomas Howard the elder. After the child followed many ladies and gentlewomen. When the child was come to the church doore, the Byshoppe of London mette it with dyvers Byshoppes and abbots mitred, and beganne the observances of the Sacrament. The Godfather was the Lord Thomas Archbyshoppe of Canturburie: the Godmothers were the old dutchesse of Norfolkke, and the old marchionesse of Dorset widowes, and the child was named Elizabeth, and after that all thinges were done at the church doore, the child was brought to the font and christened: and that done, Garcar chiefe king of armes cried aloud: God of his infinit goodnes send prosperous life and long to the high and mighty pynesse of Englannde Elizabeth, and then the trumpets blew, then the child was brought by to the altar, and the gospell said over it. After that immediately the archbishop of Canturburie confirmed it, the marchionesse of Excester being Godmother: then the bishoppe of Canturburie gave unto the pynesse a standing cup of golde, the dutchesse of Norfolkke gave to her a standing cup of golde fretted with pearle, the marchionesse of Dorset gave three gilt boles pounted, with a cover, and the marchionesse of Excester gave three standing boles grauen, all gilt with a cover. Then was brought in waters, confectes, and hypocrasse, in such plenty, that every man had as much as he wolde desire: then they set forwarde, the trumpets afoore going going in the same order toward the kings pallace as they did when they came thitherward, saying that the giftes that the Godfather and godmothers gave, were borne before the child by 4. persons, that is to say, first sir John Dudley bare the gift of the Ladie of Excester, the Lord Thomas Howard the younger bare the gift of the Ladie Dorset, the Lord Fitz Walker bare the gift of the lady of Norfolkke, and the Lord of Worcester bare the gift of the Archbyshop of Canturburie, and all the one side as they went was full of stiffer torches, to the number of four hundredes, born by the gard and other of the kings servants: and about the child were many other proper torches born by gentlemen. And in this order they brought the pynesse to the queens chamber doore, and then departed.

The Spaloz went to the kings chamber, & carried there a table with his brethren the Aldermen, and at the last, the dukes of Norfolkke and Suffolke came out from the king, and reported to the Spaloz and his brethren, that the king thanked them heartilie, and commaunded them to give them thanks in his name, and from thence they were had to the seller and dyanke, and so went to their barge.

About this time the crafty praaises of one Elizabeth Barton, named the holy maide of Kent, came to light, and were discovered, so that shee and her adherents in November following, were brought to the Star chamber, and there before the kings counsell confessed their fained hypocritie and dissimuled holines, traitorous purposes and intentes. The names of those her adherentes, which were presented with her before the lords in the Starre chamber, were as followeth: Richard Master parson of Aldington in Kent, Edward Bocking doctor of divinitie a monke of Canturburie, Richard Dering monke also of Canturburie, Edward Twaites Gentleman, Thomas Laurence Register to the Archdeacon of Canturburie, Henry Golde parson of Alder Sparie in London, Hugh Rich frier observant, Richard Risby, and Thomas Golde gentleman. These were adjudged upon their confession, to stande at Pauls Crosse in the Sermon time, where they with their owne handes shoulde severallie deliver each of them to the preacher a bill declaring their subtil and superstitious doings, which thing they did the Sunday next following, standing upon a stage or scaffold before the Crosse, the bishop of Bangor late abbot of Hyde there preaching, shewed their offences, from whence they were committed to the tower of London.

In this meane time the Scottes were not quiet, but robbed the kinges satellites both by sea and lande, whereupon the king caused them to bee requested, not onlie by the Borderers and other to them associate, which entering the marches, burnt manie of their houses and strong holdes; but also he set forth certaine shippes, which entered into their streames, and fetched out many of those pikes, which they had taken out of their haucns, yet was there no warre proclaimed.

At the suite of Ladie Katherine Dowager, a curse was sent from Rome, which accursed both the king and the Realme. This curse was set up in the towne of Wymherke in flanders (for the byinger thereof durst approach no nearer).

never where it was taken do tunc by one William Lock a Mercer of London because (as it was said) that the lady Katherin Dowager had procured this cure of the pope, the duke of Suffolke was sent to hir, as then lying at Wyndesore neere Huntingdon, where according to that hee had in commandement, he charged a great sort of her household servants, and yet left a convenient number to serve hir like a pynceesse, which were sworn to serve her, not as a queen, but as pynceesse Dowager: but such as toke that othe thee bitterly refused, and would none of their service, so that she remained with a smal number of servants about her.

her attainted.

After Christmasse the Parliament beganne, wherein the forenamed Elizabeth Barton, and other her complices were attaynted of treason, for sundry practises by them put in use, sounding to the bitter reproch, perill, and destruction of the kinges person, his honour, fame, and dignitie, for they hadde put into the heades of manie of the kinges subiects, that to the said Elizabeth Barton was given knowledge by revelation from god and his Saints, that if the king proceeded to the divorce, and married another, he should not be king of this Realme one moneth after, and in the reputation of God, not one day nor houre.

This Elizabeth first through sicknesse, being oftentimes brought as it were into a trance, whereby her visage and countenance became marvellously altered at those times when she was so bereft: at length by the encouraging, procurement and information of the forenamed Richard Master parson of Aldington, she learned to counterfeite such manner of traunces, as in her sickness by force of her disease she had beene acquainted with, so that shee thrust into the people dyvers maruels, and sundry alterations of the scribable parts of her bodie, craftilie uttering in her falsed fained traunces dyvers counterfeits vertues and holie wordes, tending to the rebuke of sin, and reproofing of such new opinions as then began to be spread. And to bring the people the more to beleefe with hir hypocritical doings, she was counselled to say, that she should never be perfectlie whole, till she had visited an image of our Lady at a place called Court at strate, within the parsh of Aldington aforesaide. Whither was she brought, and by the means of the said Richard Master and Edward Bocking there was assembled a two thousand persons at the date appointed of hir thither coming to see the miracle. At which time shee bring thither brought aforesaid all that assemble multitude of people, the falsly fained & shewed in the chapel of our Lady of Court at strate manie alterations of her face, and other outward sensible parties of her bodie: and in those trances she uttered wondrous wordes, as she was before subtiltie induced by the sayde Edward Bocking and Richard Master. And amongst other things she uttered, that it was the pleasure of God, that the said Bocking should be her ghostlie father, and that shee should be a religious woman. And within a while after such fained traunces, she appeered to the people to bee sodaynlye releued from hir sicknesse by the intercession of the image of our Lady being in the said chapel, by reason of which hypocritical dissimulation, the sayde Elizabeth was brought into a marvellous fancy, credite, & good opinion of a great multitude of people of this realme, and to increase the same by the command of the sayde Edward Bocking he became a nunne in the priory of Saint Sepulchres at Canterbury, to whome the said Edward Bocking had commonly his resort: and by conspiracie betwene her and him, she still continued her dissembled trances, alledging that in the same she had revelations from almighty God and his Saints: and among other, that which as before we have mentioned, touching the kings marriage, shee have heard. This matter proceeded so farre, that there was a booke written by her complices, namely, by Thomas Laurence Register to the archdeacon of Canterbury, of her fained miracles, revelations, and hypocritical holinesse. All things were handled so craftilie, that not onely the simple people, but also the wise and learned were deceived by the same: in so much, that William Warham late Archbisshope of Canterbury, and John Fisher bisshop of Rochester, and divers other being informed the proof, gave credit therunto. All which matters and many other had bene traitorously practised amongst the parties many yeres, chiefly to interrupt the divorce, and to destroy the king, and deprive him of the crowne and dignitie reioice of the realme, as in the act of their attainder made more at large doth appeare.

In this Parliament also was made the act of succession, for the establishing of the crowne, to the which everie man was sworn being of lawfull age.

During this parliament, every Sunday at Pauls crosse preached a bisshop, declaring the pope not to be supreme head to the Church. Also in other places of this realme great troubles were raised about preaching, namely, at Wytham where Mr. Latimer preached, and there preached against him one master Hobberton, and doctor Powell, so that there was great part-taking on both sides: insomuch that divers priests and other set by billes against the spallie, and against master Latimer, but the maiors (permitting lay men to preach) caught divers priests to be apprehended and cast into Newgate with bolts upon them, and divers other ran away and lost their livings, rather than come in the maiors handling.

The 30. of Aprill the parliament was proroged, and every lord and knight and burgeisse were sworn to the act of succession, and subscribed to a schedule fixed to the statute. And then were commissioners sent into all parts of the realme, to take the like oth of all men and women.

At which time also were attainted of treason on the same matter, John Fisher bisshop of Rochester, and John Aleson his chaplaine, Thomas Able priest, Thomas Golde gentleman, and Thomas Laurence register to the archdeacon of Canterbury.

Ann. reg. 28.

Justs at Greenwich.

The eyght of Iannarie dyed Lady Katherine Dowager at Rymbalton, and was buried at Peterborough.

The twentieth nine of Iannarie, Quene Anne was deliuered of a man Child before her time, which was boyne deade.

In a Parliament begunne in the moneth of februarye, was granted to the king and his betres all religious houses in the realme of Englande, of the value of thio hundred pounds and under, with all lawres and goods to them belonging: The number of these houses then suppressed, were 376. the value of these houses the 32000. pound, and moze by pece, the mouerable goods as they were solde, Robine Hoods pennie twoo;thes, amounted to moze than one hundred thousande poundes, and the religious persons that were in the sayde houses, were cleerlye put out, some went to other greater houses, some went abroad to the world. It was (saith mine author) a pitifull thing to heare the lamentation that the people in the Countreie made for them: for there was great hospitallitie kept among them, and as it was thought moze then tenne thousand persons, maisters and seruantes had lost their livinges by the putting downe of these houses at that time.

On the date was a great Jousting at Greenwich, where were Challengers the Lorde Rochforde and other: and Defenders Henric Norrice and other. From this Jousts King Henric sodaynelle departed to Westminster, havinge oncke with him 6. persons: of which sodayn departure many men marueyled.

On the next morrowe, George Boleine Lorde Rochforde, Brother to the Quene, and Henric Norrice, were brought to the Tower of London prisoners. Also the same date, about five of the clocke in the afternoone, Quene Anne Boleine was brought to the Tower of London by Sir Thomas Audley Lorde Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell secretarie, and Sir William Kingstone Constable of the Tower. And when they came to the Tower Gate entering in, they fell on her knees before the sayde Lordes, beseeching God to helpe her, as she was not guiltie of that whereof they were accused, and then desired the sayde Lordes to beseech the Quenes grace to be good unto her, and so they left her there prisoner.

On the 15. of Maie Quene Anne was arraigned in the Tower of London on a scaffold for the purpose made in the kings hall, before the Duke of Norfolk, who sat under the cloth of estate as high steward of England, with the Lord Chancellor on his right hand, the Duke of Suffolk on his left hand, with marquesses and lords, &c. and the earle of Surrey sat before the duke of Norfolk his father, as earle marshall of England: The kings commission being read, the Constable of the Tower, and the Lieutenant brought the Quene to the barre, where was made a Chaire for hir to sit downe in, and there her indictment was read, whereunto she made so wise and discreet answeres, that she seemed fully to cleare hir selfe of all matters laid to hir charge, but being tryed by hir peeres, twenty 6. in number, whereof the duke of Suffolk was chiefe, she was by them found guiltie, and had iudgement pronounced by the Duke of Suffolk, to be hanged on the greene in the Tower, or else to have hir head

smitten off, as the kings pleasure should be further knowen, and so she was conuicted to warde againe: the lady Kingston, and the lady Bolein her Aunt attending on her. And then immediatly, the lord Rochford the Quenes brother was likewise arraigned and condemned: the Spatoz of London, his brethren the aldermen, the wardens, and foure persons moe of euery the twelue principall companies being present.

The seventene date of May, the lord Rochford brother to the Quene, Henric Norrice, Marke Smeeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weston, all of the kings priute Chamber, about matters touching the Quene, were beheaded on the tower hill, the lord Rochfords bodie with the heade was buried in the chappell of the tower, the other foure in the churchyarde there.

On the nineteenth date of May about eight of the clocke in the morning, Quene Anne Bolein was brought to the greene within the tower of London, by the white tower, the lord chancellor, the duke of Richmond, the duke of Suffolk, with the most of the kings counsell, as earles, lords, and nobles of the realme being present, also the Spatoz of London, with his brethren the aldermen, and themselves, and certaine of the principall companies of the citie, &c. All these being on a scaffold made there for the execution, the said Quene Anne saide as followeth: Masters, I here humbly submit me to the lawe, as the lawe hath iudged me, and as for mine offences, (I here accuse no man) God knoweth them, I remit them to God, beseeching him to haue mercie on my soule, and I beseech Iesu saue my Soueraigne and master the King, the most gobildest, noblest, and gentlest Prince that is, and long to raigne ouer you, which wordes she spake with a smiling countenance: which done, she kneeled downe on both her knees, and said, O Iesu Christ I commend my soule, and with that word suddenly the hangman of Caleis smote off her head at one stroke with a sword: her body with the head was buried in the quire of the chappell in the tower.

Rob. Greene.

Quene Anne
beheaded.

The twentieth of May, the king married lady Jane daughter to sir Iohn Seimour knight, which at Whitsonside was openly shewed as Quene, and on tuesdaie in the Whitson weeke, Sir Edward Seimour was created vicount Beauchampe, and Sir Walter Hungerforde made Lorde Hungerforde.

King H. married lady Jane.

The 8. of June began a parliament, and the cleargie helde a conuocation in Pauls church, where after much disputing and debating of matters, they published a booke of Religion, entituled, Articles deuised by the kings highnes. In the which booke is mentioned but thre sacraments.

Articles of re-
by the king.

On Saint Peters night, the king and Quene stood at the Percers hall, and saw the watch most brauely set forth.

The 29. of June, the king held a great iousting and triumph at Westminster, where were ordained two lighters made like ships to fight upon the water, one of the which was in the midst, whereby some Gates gentlemen, a seruuant of master Kneuers was drowned in his harness. In the other, a gunne blast her chamber, and maimed two of the marksmen.

After

After that the earle of Wylshire and Symond, called sir Thomas Bolein, had deliuered the kings priuie seale, whereof he was Chifor, into the kings hands: Thomas Cromwel secretary to the R. and H. of the rolles, was made h. keeper of the said priuie seale. And Christopher Hales the kings attorney, was made master of the Rolles, and maister Baker Recorder of London was made the kings attorney.

The 9. of Iuly, the L. Fitzwaren was created earle of Bath, and the mo; row after T. Cromwel was made lord Cromwel.

The 18. of Iuly, lord Cromwel was made knight, and high vicar generall ouer all the spirituallty under the king, and saie diuers times in the conuocation among the bishops, as head ouer them.

The 22. of Iuly, Henry duke of Richmond and Somerset, earle of Nottingham, a ballard son of h. Henry, borne at Blakmore: in Essex, of the lady Taile boile, that time called Elizabeth Blunt, died at saint James, and was buried at Thetford in Norfolk.

This month of Iuly, lord Thomas Howard, youngest brother to the duke of Norfolk, was sent to the tower of London, for making a priuie contract of matrimonie with the Lable Margaret Dowglas, daughter to the Queene of Scots by the earle of Angus, and neece to king Henry of England: the said lord Thomas was attaint by parliament, and also the said lady Margaret Dowglas was after committed to the tower for the same.

In September, Thomas Cromwel lord priuie seale, and vicegerent, sent out vnder the kings spirituall seale, certaine iniunctions to the prelates and clergie of the realme, charging Curates to preach and to teach their parishioners, the Ten commandments, Aue and Credo, the commandements and articles of the sayd in English, with other articles.

In the beginning of October, at a fise for the Kinges subside kept in Lincolnshire, the people made an insurrection, and gathered nigh twentie thousand persons, who take certaine lords and gentlemen of the country, causing them to be sworne to them vpon certaine articles which they had deuised, and such as refused to sweare, they kept prisoners, and beheaded a priest, who was the bishop of Lincolnes chancelor: Against those the king did send the Duke of Suffolk, the earle of Sheshburie, and the Earle of Rutlande with a strong powner, whereof when the rebelles hearde, they desired pardon, brake by their armie, and departed home, but their Captaynes were apprehended and executed.

The ninth of October, a priest and a butcher were hanged at Windsor, by martiall lawe, for wordes spoken in the behalfe of the Lincolnshire men, the butcher wished the good fellows (as he termed them) in Lincolnshire, to haue the death on his stall, rather than to sell it at such price as hee was offered: the priest standing by, likewise wished them to haue it, for he said they had need of it. Also James Maister doctor of law, late chaplaine to Q. Katherine, for like wordes was executed at Chelmsford in Essex.

Ye shall not enter into this your pilgrimage of grace for the common wealth onely, but for the loue that you do beare to Gods faith and the church militant, and the maintenance thereof, and the preservation of the kings person and his issue, and the purifying of nobilitie, and to the intent to expresse all villaines blood, and euill counsaillers against the common wealth, from his grace, and the priuie counsell of the same. And that ye shall not enter into our said pilgrimage for no particular profit to your selues, nor doe any displeasure to any priuie person, but by the counsell of the common wealth, ne to murder or slep for any enuy, but in your hart to put away all feare from the common wealth, and to take before you the crosse of Christ, and in your hearts his faith, to the restitution of Gods church, and to the suppression of erroneous opinions. God saue the king.

Against those rebelles, the king sent the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Suffolk, the Earle of Sheshburie, and the Marquise of Exeter, with a great armie, with whome a battaile was appointed to haue bene fought, on the fene of Saint Simon and Iude: but as God woulde, there fell such raine the night before, that the two armies coulde not meete: Whereupon, they desired the Duke of Norfolk to sue vnto the kings maiestie for their pardon, and that they might haue their liberties, &c. which the duke promised, and rode posse to the king then lying at Windsor, to knowe his pleasure, and so appeared them. Sir Robert Aske, that was chiefe of this rebellion, came to London, and was not onely pardoned, but rewarded with great gifts.

Sir Ralph Eure kept Sharboisow Castle in the North, being sixe weekes besieged by the rebelles, twentie daies whereof he and all his companie (which were his onely friendes, seruants and tenants, and serued for good will to him) were forced to sustaine themselves with bread and water, and yet kept the same safe to the ende of the said rebellion, and so deliuered it to king Henrie, who sent him some after to serue in the bozdures against Scotland, where in great credite he continued his seruice, keeping the Scots without doing hurt to England, and with such obedience of them, as within twentie miles of the bozdures of Scotland fore against him, there was not a Scot but at his commandement, and so continued till he was killed in Anno 1545.

The 13. of Nouember, maister Robert Pagation a graue citizen, and a mercer of London, was slaine with a gun, as he was going from his house, by Soper lane end, to morrowe masse in S. The 9. of Iuly, T. L. Cromwell earle of Essex being in the counsell chamber, was suddenly apprehended, and committed to the tower of London. The 19. he was attainted by parliament, of heresie and high treason, as appereth by the same at taindo: which I haue seene and read, but forbeare to set downe the same being long.

On the 28. of July, the said Thomas Cromwell was brought to the scaffold on the tower hill, where he spake these words (as was then noted) I am come hither to die, and not to purge my selfe, as may happen some thinke I will, for if I should so doe, I were a very wretch and miser. I am by the law condemned to die, and I thanke my Lord God that hath appointed me this death for mine offences: for sithence the time that I came to piers of discretion, I have liued a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aske him heartilie forgiveness. And it is not vnknewe to many of you, that I have ben a great traoueller in the world, and being but of a base degre was called to high estate, and sithen the time I came the reuinto, I have offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartily forgiveness, and beseech you al to pray to God with me, that he will forgive me. O father for: giue me, O sonne forgive me, O holy ghost forgive me, O thre persons in one God forgive me. And now I pray you that be here to beare me record, I die in the catholike faith, not doubting in any article of my faith, no no: doubting in any sacrament of the church. Many haue slandered me, and reported that I haue bene a bearer of such as haue maintained euill opinions, which is untrue: but I confesse, that like as God by his holy spirit both instruct vs in the truth, so the diuel is readie to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me witness that I die in the catholike faith of the holy church, and I hartily desire you to pray for the kings grace, that hee may long liue with you in health and prosperitie, and after him that his sonne prince Edward that goodly empe may long reigne ouer you. And once againe I desire you to pray for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I waue nothing in my faith. And then made he his prayer which was long, and after committed his soule to the hands of God, and so laid him downe, and patiently suffered the strokes of the axe, by the hands of him who lawfully performed his office. At the same time also with the said earle was beheaded the lord Hungerford of Hertsbery, who at the houre of his death seemed so vnguyet, that many iudged him rather frenzie than other wise: he suffered (as it was said) for buggerie.

Thomas Cromwell (as before is shewed) was attainted by parliament, but neuer came to answer. He was borne in Putney a village in Surrey by the Thames side, about 4. miles west from London, and was son to a black smith (in his latter daies a buyer) after whose decease, his mother was married to a sherman in London. This Thomas notwithstanding the baseness of his birth, through a singular excellency of wit, toynd with industrious diligence of mind, grew to such a sufficient ripenes of vnderstanding and skill in ordering of waightie affaires, that he was thought apt and fit to any comth of office wherunto he should be admitted, which being aperceined of the cardinal Wolsey, he took him into seruice, & making him his solicitor, imployed him about businesse of great importance, wherein hee acquitted himselfe with such vertueritie, as answered alwaies the credite to him committed. At the fall of the cardinal he got him to the court, saying he would make or marre, as before ye haue heard: where, being once aduanced into the kings seruice, he behauid himselfe so aduisedly in matters which he took in hand, that in short time time he rose to the greatest authoritie that might be in this realme, vnder the maiestie of the king, wherein peradventure forgetting the fall of his late master cardinal Wolley (a notable spectacle) he fell himselfe, as ye haue heard.

In this meane time, to wit, on the 25. day of June, the k. caused the queene to remoue to Richmond, perswading it should be more for her health & pleasure, by reason of the cleere and open aire there. But on the 6. of July, certaine lords came downe into the netter house of the parliament, and expressely declared causes, for the which the marriage was not to be taken lawfull: and in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation clerely determined, that the king might lawfully marry where he would, and so might she: and thus were they clerely diuorced. And by the parliament it was enacted, that she should be taken no more for Quene, but called the lady Anne of Cleue.

This yere the lord Leonard Gray brother to Thomas marques Dorset, being the kings lieutenant in Ireland, was trauelled home, and vpon his coming to London, was sent to the tower.

The 30. of July were hanged from the tower of London to west Smithfeld Robert Barnes doctor of diuinity, T. Gerard parson of Dunplaine, and William Ierom bicar of Stepeneth, bachelors in diuinity: also Edward Powell, Thomas Able, and Richard Fetherstone all thre doctors. The first thre were drawn to a stake & there burned. The other thre were drawn to a gallows, and there hanged, headed and quartered. The thre first as appeareth in their attainders, were executed for diuers heresies. The last thre for treason, as in their attainders was mentioned, to wit, for denying the kings supremacie, and affirming his marriage with queene Katherine to be good: of the which argument doctor Powell wrote a booke which was printed in quarto, and I haue seene it.

The 4. of August, Thomas Emplon sometime a monke of Welfminster, which had bene prisoner in Newgate more than thre yeres, was brought before the Iustices of goale deliuerie at Newgate, and for that he would not aske the king pardon for denying his supremacie, nor be sworn the reto, his monkes cole was plucked from his backe, and his body repled till the king were informed of his obstinacie. The same 4. of August were drawn to Newgate 6. persons, and one led betwixt twaine, to wit, Laurence Cooke prie of Dancaister, William Home a lay brother of the Charterhouse of London, Giles Home gentleman, Clement Phillip gentleman of Caleis, and seruant to the lord Lisle, Edmond Bromholme prie, chaplaine to the said lord Lisle, Darby Gening, Robert Bird, all hanged and quartered, and had bene attainted by parliament, for deniall of the kings supremacie.

The eight of August, Ladie Katherine Howard daughter to Edmond lord Howard, next to the duke of Norfolk, was shewed openly as Quene at Hampton court.

The latter end of this sommer, was vniuersally through this realme great death by a strange kinde of ague and flure, with some pestilence: in which season was such a drought, that wells and small riuers were dried vp, so that much cattel died for lacke of water.

The twentieth two of December, Ralph Egerton servant to the lord Audley lord chancellor, and Thomas Harman servant to master Fighwood, were executed: the one for counterfeiting the kings seale in leade, where with they had sealed divers Warrants counterfeited and antedated, making strangers denisons, under the names of divers clerks of the chancery: the other for limiting them. One Tuckfield being of their faction, robbed the lord Audleys chappell, of the chalice, pyre, basons and candlesticks of silver, and fled, who being afterwards apprehended at Caleis, whith to wone he would haue betrayed, hee betide himselfe with a bag.

In Aprill, certaine persons beganne a new rebellion in Poweshyre, which were shortly after taken, and put to execution in blactes places: of which, Leigh a gentleman, Tawfall a clothier, and Thornton a peoman, were put to death at London: Sir Iohn Neuill knight, a ten persons or mo were put to death at Powke.

The 27. of Maie, Margaret countesse of Salisburie, sometime daughter and heire to George Duke of Clarence, wife to sir Richard Poole knight, and mother to cardinal Poole, was beheaded in the towre of London, being neuer arraigned nor tried before, but condemned by act of parliament.

The 9. of June, Dampont and Chapman, two of the kings gard, were hanged at Orenetwich for robbery.

The tenth of June, Sir Edmond Knevet knight of Northfolke, was arraigned before the kings Iustices (sitting in the great Hall at Orenetwich master Gage comptroller) of the kings household, master Suthwell, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Anthony Winkfield, spaißer Witley, and Edmonde Pechem confessor of the kings household, for striking of one spaißer Clerc of Northfolke, servant with the Earle of Surrey, within the kings house in the Kenise Court. There was first chosen to go upon the said Edmond a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of peomen, to inquire of the false stripe, by the which inquiry, he was founde guiltie, and had iudgement to lose his right hande: whereupon was called to do the execution, first the sergeant chirurgion, with his instruments appertaining to his office: the sergeant of the Wardpade with the mallet and a Blocke, whereupon the hande shoulde lie: the master cooke for the king with the knife: the Sergeant of the larder to set the knife right on the soyl: the Sergeant farrier with his searing pyons to seare the Veines: the Sergeant of the powderie with a Cocke, which cocke shoulde haue his head smitten off upon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the peoman of the chandry with seare clothes: the peomen of the scullery with a pan of fire to heat the pyons: a chafer of water to cole the ends of the irons: and two fourmes for all officers to set their stufte on: the sergeant of the seller with wine, ale, and beere: the peomen of the etoyie in the sergeantes stede who was absent, with basons, etoyes, & toweles. Thus a curty man in his office ready to do the execution, there was called forth Sir William Pickering knight marshall, to bring in the said Edmond Knevet, and then he was brought to the bar, the chiefe iustice declared to him his trespassse, and the said Knevet confessing himselfe to bee guiltie, humbly submitted him to the kings mercy: for this offence he was not onely judged to lose his hand, but also his bodie to remaine in prison, and his landes and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the false Sir Edmond Knevet desired that the king of his benigne grace, would pardon him of his right hande, and take the left: for (quoth he) if my right hande bee spared, I maye hereafter do such good seruice to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. At this submission and request, the Iustices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnes, considering the gentle heart of the said Edmond, and the good report of lordes and ladies, granted him pardon, that he shoulde lose neither hande, lande, nor goods, but shoulde go free at liberty.

The lord Leonard Gray being indicted of certaine pointes of treason by him committed, as was alledged against him, during the season that hee was the Kings Lieutenant in Ireland, to witte, for delivering his nephew to Geralde Fitz Gerarde, Brother to Thomas Fitz Gerarde before executed, and also for that hee caused certaine Irishmen to invade the lawes of the Kings friends, whom hee favoured not: The 25. of June he was arraigned at Westminster in the Kings Bench, and appointed to bee tried by Knights, because hee was a lord by name, and no lord of the parliament, but hee discharged the jury, and confessed the indictment, whereupon he had iudgement, and on the 28. of June being St. Peters euen, he was beheaded at towre hill, where he ended his life very quietly and godly.

This noble man, as he was come of high lineage, so was he a right valiant and hardy personage, hauing in his time don his prince and country good seruice, both in Ireland, France, and other places, greatly to his commendation, although now his hap was thus to lose his head.

The same day that he suffered, there were executed at Saint Thomas Wall, twinges three gentlemen, John Mantel, John Frouds, and George Roidon. They died for a murder committed in Souther (as their indictment imposed) in companie of Thomas Fines lord Dacres of the South. The truth whereof was thus. The said lord Dacres through the lewd persuasion of some of them, as hath bene reported, meaning to hunt in the parke of Nicholas Pelham esquire at Loughton in the same Countie of Souther, being accompanied with the said Mantell, Frouds, and Roidon, John Cheincy, and Thomas Illey gentlemen, and Richard Middleton and Iohn Goldwel peomen, passed from his house of Hurstmanecoy the last of Aprill in the night season, toward the same parke, where they intended to go to hunt, and coming into a place called Wikehay in the parish of Hillingley, they founde one Iohn Busbrig, James Busbrig, and Richard Somener, standing there together; and as it fell out through quarrelling, there ensued a fraye betwixt the false lord Dacre: and his company on the one part, and the false Iohn and James Busbrig and Richard Somener on the other, insomuch that the said Iohn Busbrig received such hurt, that hee died thereof the seconde of Maie next ensuing; whereupon as well the false lord Dacres, as those that were there with him, and diuers other likewile that were appointed to go another waie to mete them at the false parke, were indicted of murder, and the threen and twentieth of June the lord Dacres himselfe was arraigned before the lord Audley of Maloien, then lord chancellor, sitting that date as high Steward of England, with other pères of the realme about him, who then and there condemned the said L. Dacres to die for that transgression: and afterwards the nine and twentieth of June being Saint Peters daie, at cleuen of the clocke in the forenoone, the Sheriffs of London accordingly as they were appointed, were readie at the tower to haue receiued the sayd prisoner, and him to haue led to execution on the Tower hill. But as the prisoner should come forth of the Tower, one Heire a gentleman of the lord chancerys house came, and in the kings name commanded to stay the execution til two of the clock in the afternoone, which caused manie to thinke that the king would haue granted his pardon. But neuertheless at three of the clock in the same afternoone hee was brought forth of the Tower, and deliuered to the Sheriffs, who led him on foote betwixt them vnto Tyborne, where he died. His bodie was buried in the church of Saint Sepulchers: he was not past foure and thentie yeres of age when he came thus through great mishap to his end; for whom manie fore lamented, and likewise for the other three gentlemen, Mawtely, Frouds, and Roidon, but chiefly for the said young lord beeing a right towerly gentleman.

The 1. of July, a Welchman a minstrel, was hanged and quartered for singing of songs, which were interpreted to be prophesying against the K. Sir David Genson knight of the Rhodes was drawn through Southwarke to St. Thomas of Watrings, and there executed for the supremacy.

In the month of August, the K. took his progresse toward York, and passed through Lincolnshire, where was made vnto him an humble submission, &c. About this time Westminster and Bishopp were made bishopps.

On Christmas euen at seven of the clock at night, began a great fire in the house sometime named Elsing spittle, then the house of Sir John Williams G. of the kings iewels, where manie of those iewels were byent, and more imbezelled, as was thought.

The Lady Katherine Howarde, whom the King hadde married, for her brashesse being committed with Thomas Culpepper and Francis Derham, was by Parliamente attainted; Culpepper and Derham were put to death at Tyborne the tenth daie of December. Culpepper was headed, his bodie buried at Saint Sepulchers Church by Newgate; Derham was quartered, &c.

The 23. of January the K. was proclaimed king of Ireland.

The 12. of February, the lady Howard, otherwise called M. Katherine, and the lady Jane Rochford for being of her counsell with Th. Culpepper, were both beheaded within the tower of London.

In the beginning of the moneth of March died Arthur Plantagenet viscount Lisle, Bastarde sonne to Edward the fourth, in the Tower of London vntainted, when he should haue been deliuered and set at libertie (as it was said) the occasion of his trouble in the tower, rose vpon suspicion that he should be puaie to a practice which some of his men (as Philpot and Brindholme creew the last yere) had consented vnto, for the betraying of Calais to the French whilste he was the kings Lieutenant there. But after that by due tryall it was knowne that he was nothing guiltie to the matter, the king appointed Sir Thomas Wriothesley his secretarie to go vnto him, and to deliuer vnto him a ring with a rich diamond for a token from him, and to tell him to be of good cheere, sith it was manifestly proued that hee was void of all offence, for hee should thinke that he would make account of him, as of his most true and faithfull kinsman, and not onelie restore him to his former libertie, but otherwise be readie to pleasure him in what he could. After secretarie set forth this message with such effectfull wordes, as he was an eloquent man, that Lorde Lisle took such an immoderate iote thereof, that his heart beeing oppressed therewith, hee died the night following through too much reioicing (as was said.) After whose decease, to witt, the 12. of March, Sir John Dudley was at Westminster created Viscount Lisle, by the right of his mother lady Elizabeth sister and heire to Sir John Gray Viscount Lisle, who was late wife to Arthur Plantagenet viscount Lisle late deceased, as ye haue heard.

The 17. of March, Margaret Daue a maid, was boiled in Smithfield for poisoning of three households that she had dwelled in.

The 28. of March, the Parliament sitting, George Feres Burgess for the town of Blimnouth, was arrested in London vpon a condemnation, whereupon the sergeant at armes of the common house was sent to the counter in Westminster to fetch him, but the clerks would not deliuer him, till the Sheriffs came themselves, who in the end deliuered him: notwithstanding, this matter was so taken in the common house, that the Sheriffs, the clerks, and shue officers, with the party plaintiff, were sent to the Tower, and there late two daies, and were then deliuered by the speaker and common house: the Sheriffs were deliuered from all charges, except twenty pound for their fees.

In May the king took a loan of money, of all such as were valued two; fifty pound or upward in the booke of subsidie.

In the moneth of August, James Earle of Desmond in Ireland, came and submitted himselfe to the king, and so returned.

The first of October, the great Orcale of Ireland was created Earle of Ulster, and his base son Mathew Orcale baron of Donganow, for Shane Orcale the only son of his body lawfully begotten was then little chierie.

The duke of Norfolk entred Scotland the 21. of October, burning and wasting all the marches, and there tarried without any battell proffered by the Scots, vntill the midst of November.

After the departure of our army from Scotland, the king of Scots made a raide into England, and did much harme, but at the last Sir Thomas Wharton and Sir William Musgraue with a few of the borderers, met the Scottes, where they being in number 15000. were ouerthrowne: in which conflict was taken the earle of Cassels and Glencarne, the Lord Maxwell admiral of Scotland and Warden of the West marches, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somerwell, the Lord Oliphant, the Lord Gray, the Lord Oliuar Sioclere, &c. more then two hundred of the better sort, and more then 8. hundred of meaner persons. They took also foure and twenty peeces of ordnance, 4. cartes laden with speares, and ten pauillions. The king of Scots took such grieue and inward thought for this overthrow, and also for the murder of an English herald that was slain at Dunbar by one Lech an English man (the which for the rebellion in Lincolnshire was fled into Scotland) that he fell into a fever, and died. Of the prisoners before named 21. of them were brought up to London, and on the 19. of December entered the cite at Bishops gate, and so were conveyed to the tower, where they remained the space of two daies, and upon S. Thomas day the apostle, they were conveyed to Westminster, sir John Gage Constable of the tower riding before them, and the lieutenant of the tower riding behinde them, they rode two and two together, and eight of them being earles and lordes had new gownes of blacke damaske furred with blacke conies, coates of blacke velvet, and doublets of fatten, &c. all newe of the kings charge. Comming thus before the kings counsell in the starre chamber, the lord chancellor declared to them their untrusty and unkindnesse, for the which the king had cause of warre against them, as well as for the deniall of their homages, and also for their traitorous insallions made into his realm without defiance, and also for keeping his subiects prisoners without redemption, contrarie to the lawes of the marches, for the which doings, God as they might well perceive had scourged them. Wholbeit the king more regarding his honor than his princely power, was content to shew them kindnes for unkindnes, right for wrong. And although he might keepe them in dreight prison, yet he was content that they shoulde haue libertie to be with the nobles of the realme in their houses, and so according to their estates they were appointed to dukes, earles, bishops, knights and gentlemen.

The 22. of December came tidings of the king of Scots death. And upon Saint Johns daie in Christmas weeke, the foresaid lords of Scotland were brought to the court then at Greenwich, where they had great chere, and were lodged within the court. And here it is to be considered, that where the king of Scots had left no issue but only one daughter: the king and his counsell perceiving a meane now offered, whereby without warre the two realms might be united: the Scottish lords having first made the motion themselves for a marriage to be had betwixt Prince Edward and their young Quene, the king required them to helpe to the furtheraunce of that matter, which might be such benefite to themselves and their country. This they promised faithfullie to doe, and as well by themselves, as their friends, to bring the same to effect, so much as the king could require, whereupon the king was not onely contented to release them home, but also highly rewarded them with rich gifts.

The 30. of December, they departed from the court, and the morrow after eight of them dined with sir John Coats then lord mayor of London, and the rest with the sheriffes, and had very great chere. On New-yeres day they departed from London homewards toward Scotland, and by the way dined at Cusfield there to behold the prince, whom they highly commended, for the great liking they had of his person, from thence they kept on their journey till they came to the north partes, where they found the Duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant there, and with him they remained till such pledges were come forth forth of Scotland, as it was covenanted they shoulde leaue behinde them. The Duke after he had receiued the hostages, permitted them to depart, and so they returned into Scotland, where they were joyfully welcomed home, to their friends. With them went the earle of Angus, who had bene banished Scotland, and having remained here in England a long time, receiued of the kings fee a thousand markes by yere: and likewise his brother sir George Dowglas, who had 500. markes by yere, likewise of the kings gift. They were now both restored home into their country, and that was (as was saide) by the last kings will. The said earle of Angus, and diuers of the lords that had bin prisoners here in England, were made of the privy counsell of the realme, by the earle of Arraine, that was chosen gouernour to the young quene, and of the realme, as next heire apparent. Notwithstanding that, the archbishop of S. Andrewes Cardinall, enemy to the K. of England, had a will (soged as some haue saide) compelling how the king had made him gouernour, as well of the quene as realme, whereupon the said earle, according to his right, as he pretended, with the helpe of his friends took upon him the authoritie of gouernour, and put the said cardinall in prison, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes, and the other English prisoners, by their bondes, according to the custome of the marches.

The 9. of February, a proclamation was made, whereby the people were licenced to eate white meates in Lent, but dreightly forbidden the eating of flesh. Whereupon, shortly after the earle of Surrey with diuers lords, knights, and gentlemen, were imprisoned for eating of flesh in the same Lent, contrary to the said proclamation.

The 8. of May one Lech sometime Baylie of Louth, who had killed Somerset one of our heraults of armes at Dunbar in Scotland, was dyalune to Tybzone and there hanged and quartered. And the 12. of June, Edward Lech his brother, and with him a priest for the same fact, were likewise executed at Tybzone.

King Henry minding wars with France, made great preparation and provision of munitions and artillery as also of brasse ordnance, amongst the which, at that time, by one Peter Bawd a French man borne, a gunfounder, or maker of great ordnance, and one other Allen, called Peter van Collen, a gunsmith, both the kings seed men, who conferring together, deuised and caused to be made, certaine moster pieces, being at the month, from 11. inches unto 19. inches wide, for the vse thereof, the said Peter, and Peter caused to be made certaine hollow shot of cast yron, to be stuffed with fierworke, or wilde fire, whereof the bigger sort for the same, had length of yron to receiue a match to carry fire kindled, that the fierworke might be set on fire, for to breake in small pieces the same hollow shot, whereof the smallest piece hitting any man would kill or spoile him. And after the kings return from Walen, the said Peter Bawd by himselfe, in the first of Edw. the first did also make certaine ordnance of cast yron, of diuers sorts, and formes, as falconets, falcons, spinions, sakers, and other pieces: unto this Bawd, John Iohnson his covenant seruant, serving his master, did likewise make and cast yron ordnance, cleaner and to better perfection, to the great use of this land: his sonne Th. Johnson is yet living, a speciall workeman, in the yere 1595. hee made 42. calf pieces of great ordnance of yron for the earle of Cumberland, Henry Canons weighing 6000. or 3. tunne the piece.

The 3. of June, the Obrine a lord in Ireland, and divers of the wilde Irish, submitted them to king Henry.

In July the said Obrine was created earle of Clawzicarde.

The 12. of July, king Henry married lady Katherine Par, late wife to the L. Latimer and sister to the Marques of Northampton at Hampton court, and then was the proclaimed queene.

This yere in a parliament holden at Westminster a subsidie was granted to the king to be paid in thre yeres, every Englishman being worth in goods 20.s. and upward to 5.l. paid 4.d. of every pound, from 5.l. to 10.l. 8.d. from 10.l. to 20.l. 16.d. from 20.l. and upward of every pound 2.s. strangers, as well denizens as other, being inhabitants, doubled this sum: and every stranger not being an inhabitant that was 16. yeres of age and upward paid 4.d. of every pole. And for lands, fees, and annuities, every one boine within the kings dominions paid 8.d. of the 1. from 20.s. to 5.l. and from 5.l. to 10.l. 16.d. from 10.l. to 20.l. 2.s. and from 20.l. upward 3.s. strangers still doubled the sum. The cleargie granted a subsidie of 6.s. the pound, to be paid of the benefices, and perpetuities in thre yeres, and every priest having but an annuall stipend, 6.s. 8.d. 10. as in the statute.

About the same time the king of England, and the emperor, sent Garter, and Toysonodor kings at armes, to demand the performance of certain articles of the French k. which if he denied, they were commanded then to desie him, but he would not suffer them to come within his Lande, and so they returned. Therefore the k. of Engl. caused the demands to be declared unto the French ambassadoz at Westminster. And in the month of July the k. sent over 6000. men, under the leading of sir John Wallope, accompanied with sir T. Seimer marshall, sir Robert Bowes treasurer, sir Richard Cromwell capitaine of the horsemen, and sir George Carew his lieutenant. There were likewise sir T. Palmer, sir John Rainsforth, sir John Scint-John, and sir John Gascoigne knights, that were capitaines of the footemen: they were appointed to loime with the emperors powder, and so to make war into France: they departed from Caleis the 22. of July. The 3. of August open war was proclaimed betwixt the emperor and the k. of England on the one party, and the French king on the other party, as enemy mortall to them both, and to all other christian kings as he that had confedered himselfe with the Turke.

The armie that was sent over under the leading of Sir John Wallope, passed forth from the marches of Caleis, and keeping alongst betwixt the borders of the French and Burgonians poles, and continuing, and loyning with the emperors forces, Spaniards, Mallons, and Dutch, came at length byfoze Landarsey, a towne lately fortified by the French, within the borders of the emperors dominions, to the which they laid strong siege. At length the emperor having dispatched his wars against the D. of Cleue, who had submitted himselfe himselfe unto him, came now to the siege of Landarsey, with a mighty power of sundry nations, so that the towne was sore constrained, and in danger to have been lost, if at that present the French king had not likewise with him an huge armie of French men, Swissers, Mantiquits, Italians, and other, came to the rescue, pitching downe his campe, making countenance as if hee ment presently to have given battaile: and verilie it was thought that two such powers as were there at that time so nere together should never have departed without battaile. The Emperour thinking surely to fight, raised his siege, and drew his people into the felds. The Frenchmen thereby espying their advantage, put as well fresh men as veterans, and all kinde of munition necessary into the towne, and in the meane while kept the Emperours men occupied with hottie skirmishes: but now after the towne was thus relieved, which thing the French king onely wished to accomplish, the next daie when the emperor was ready with his army inranged in battailes to have fought with his adversaries, the French king put his armie also in order, but having no minde to come forward, he trilled forth the daie, and in the night following secretly departed with as much haste as possible. When the next morning had discovered the French mens flight, it was no neede to bid divers troupes of the Emperours armie to hie after them: but some made to much haste, for the French king suspecting what would ensue, appointed his eldest sonne Henry the Dolphin, to remaine behinde with the reterward, accompanied with divers noble captaines, which ordered their people in their retire with such swiftnesse, that such of the Emperours campe as adventured over rashly, fell within danger of such ambushes as were by the waie late in places of advantage: and so divers were taken, as sir George Carew, sir Thomas Palmer knight, portier of Caleis, Edward Bellengham and others. Nevertheless a great number of the French men were snappd by, slain, and taken in no small numbers by their enemies that followed them. And this was after Alvalontide, so that nowe by reason the winter was farre entered, the Emperour byake by his campe, and licensed the most part of the people to depart home.

In the meane space, to wit on the 28. of July, Anthony Parson, Robert Testwood, and Henry Filmer, were bzent at Windsor. And a great drath of pestilence was at London, and therefore Michaelmas terme was adourned to Saint Albons.

About Alhalontide, a road was made into Scotland, by the garison there, and Ralph Euars with the men of Tindall and Kilsdale, bzent in the middle marches of Scotland, Thesford with 15. other towne, killed 18. The west borderers with the helpe of the Scots of Lidsdale, bzent 21. towne, killed 8. Scots, toke 160. prisoners, 500. cattell, 1000. shepe, and 100. geldings, sum of the towne bzent, 55. An army sent into Scotland.

The third of May, sir John Dudley Countess Lislehigh Admirall of England, arrived with his fleet of 200. saile in the frith of Scotlande, where he landed blunders of his men, and toke there blunders vessels. The 4. of May he landed the residue of his men at Leth, and from thence marched forward in the great battayles, where of the sayde Lord Admirall ledde the Watward, the Earle of Shrewsburie the Kerward, and Edward Seymer Earle of Hertford Lieutenant Generall of the Battayles. Here they founde the Scottes to the number of sir thousand hoisemen, besides manie footemen ready to stop the ir passage, who at the first, made as they would haue set on the Watward, but after certaine shotte on both sides, they sodaynelie, leauing their artillery behinde them, fled towarde Edenborough, the foremost in fleeing was the earl dinall of Saint Andrewes, the Earle of Huntley gouernor, Murray and Bothwell, and then the Englishmen entered the towne of Leth, where they found such riches, as they thought hadde not bene in anie towne of Scotland. The next daie our armie went towarde Edenborough; and when they approached nere, the Pronost of the towne with other profered to haue deliuered the same, vpon condition, that the people might departe with Bagge and Baggage, and the towne to bee safe from fire. Whereunto our Lieutenant answered, that hee was sent thither to take vengeance vpon them for their detenable falsehoode, and that vnlesse they would preelde vpp the towne simple without condition, and cause man, woman, and child to depart into the fields, submitting them to his pleasure, hee would put them to the sword, and their stand to their defence, and so departed, and forthwith the Lord Lieutenant commanded the Watward to march towarde the towne, which they did so contragandie with helpe of the English gunners, that then kept the Scotts from their ordinance, and so entred Caniegate, and there slew a great number of the Scotts, Edenborough and set fire on the Colowe, which continued three daies after burning. Shortly after came to the Lord Lieutenant by land, William Lord Earle warden of the East March of England, and gouernor of Warwicke, with his sonne sir Ralph Earle, and ioined themselues with the armie thus lying in Leth, where after their comming they did such exploitess, in riding and wasting the Countreyp, that within seuen miles euerie ware of Edenborough, they left few places, either pile, billage, or house vnbrent. And besides this, they brought great numbers of cattaille daplie into the armie, and not without much god stufte which the inhabitants of Edenborough had for safety of the same conuied out of the Colowe.

Earle of Hertford made knights at Leth.

The 13. of May the Englishmen brake down the pite of the haueu at Leth, and burnt euery dicke of it. This done, and hauing shipped their great artillery, and picked forth all such Scottish ships as were meet to serue, they toke vpon them to retorne home by land. Amongst other ships, they toke out of Le-th haueu, there were two of notable fairenes, the one called the Salamaunder, the other the Unicorn; the rest of the Scottish shippes beeing taken awaie together with their owne ships, were for the most part pestered with the spoile and boties of the souldiers and mariners.

The fiftenth of May the armie and fleet departed from Leth, both in one houre, the towne being set on fire, and burned to the ground. The english army encamped that night at a place called Soton, frauen miles from Leth, where they burnt the castle, and spoiled the grounds about it. The same daie was Haddington burnt, with an house of Nunnes, and an house of Friers.
The next night they encamped beside Dunbar, and in the morning burnt the Colowe, Leth burned.
Haddington

Dunbar burnt.

Towne, and marched forward, and on the eighteenth daie of May they entered into Berwicke, so ending their boiage.

About the same time the Earle of Lenior fledde out of Scotlande into the realme of England, where he was right gladlie receiued by king Henry, and shortly after he obtained in marriage the lady Mary Dowglas, niece to king Henry, and returned with a competent crewe of English men, but finding no such friendship amongst his countrymen as he looked for, he returned without achieving the enterprise which he had taken in hand.

Base money coined.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 16. of May, proclamation was made for the enhaunting of gold to 48. s. and silver to foure shillings the ounce. Also the king caused to bee coined base monyes in great abundance, which was since that time, to wit, in the fift yeere of king Edward the first, called dolone, from twelue pence to nine pence, from nine pence to sixe pence: and in the seconde yeere of Quene Elizabeth called in to hir maiesties mints, and there refined.

Procession in English.

In the moneth of June, the Leticanie or Procession was set forth in English, with commendement by the king to be generallie blessed in euerie parish Church.

An armie into France.

The king tooke order for the leuying of a mightie Armie to passe ouer into France, according to the appointmets made with his confederate friends the Emperour, against the French king. There were therefore appointed three Battailles: The forewarde vnder the leading of the Duke of Norfolkke: the Battaille vnder the Duke of Suffolke, which also was counted the kings Battaille, because hee minded to bee present with the same in person, and the helerwarde was ledde by the Lord Russell, Lord Priuie Seale. Those of the forewarde vnder the Duke of Norfolkke, were apparelled in blew Coates garded with redde, and had rappes and hosen after the same fash, partie blew, and partie redde. The Battaille vnder the Duke of Suffolke in Coates, Cappes, and hosen in like manner, but the colours blew and yeallow. The Duke of Norfolkke, and the lord priuie Seale, accompanied with diuers other noble men, as the Earle of Surrey Marshall of the field, the Earle of Arundell, the Lord Grey of Wilton Lieutenant of Ham, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, and Sir Richard Deuereux his sonne and heire, they brought with them a great number of Welchmen, Sir Thomas Cheney Lord Warden of the Portes, the lord Mountioy, Sir Francis Bryan knight, Sir Thomas Poyninge Capitaine of Gwines, and diuers other, passed ouer to Caleis about Whitsonde, and from thence forward to France, left Boloigne on their right hand, and keeping forwardes towards Spiterrell, lodged with an Armie which the Emperour hadde raised for that purpose, vnder the leading of the Countie of Buren, Admirall of the lowe Countreys, and so these Armies being vnited in one, came before Mutereil, and there laide Siege to the Towne, being well manned, and furnished with all things necessarie for defence, as well in munition as in bladaill, the chief Capitaine of which Towne, was Mounfirc de Biz, one of the Marshallles of France.

The

The Duke of Suffolke with the kings armie passed ouer, accompanied with the Earle of Arundell marshall of the field, the Lord Seint Iohn, and the Bishpope of Winchester, Sir Iohn Gage, comptroller of the kings house, Sir Anthonic Browne, Master of the kings horse, with diuers other Captaines, the which on the nineteenth of Iuly came before Boloigne, and encamped on the east side of the same Towne, aloft vpon the hill, and after remoued into a valley, where after many sharpe skirmishes, they first entered the base Towne, being lesse and forsaken by the inhabitants, which having set fire on their flying nagges, and other such baggage, vnder couert of the smoke, got them vp into the high Towne, before the English men coude syle them.

After this the old man, a tower standing without the towne for a direction to them that were to enter the haven, and now being kept by 16. souldiers, was yeilded up by them.

The Frenchmen within the towne, being dispoiled of these two places, yet spared not to shote off from their walls and bulwarks, doing what they could, and namely from the Castle, and greene bulwarke, they did much hurt to the Englishmen with their shotte.

The 14. of Iuly k. Henry in person, accompanied with diuers noble men, passed the Seas from Dover to Caleis, and on the 26. of Iuly encamped before Boloigne on the north side, within lesse then three quarters of a mile of the Towne, where he remained till the Towne was surrendered into his hands: the kings liuertie was red garded with yeallow. Besides the trenches which were cast and brought in manner round about the Towne, there was a mount raised vpon the east side, and diuers pieces of artillerie planted aloft the same, the which together with the moister pieces, sore annoyed them within, battered downe the Steple of our Ladie church. To conclude, the batterie was made in most forceable wise in three severall places, and the walls, towers, and castle were undermined, and the towne within so beaten with shotte out of the campe, and from the mount and trench, by the moister pieces, that there were verie few houses left whole therein. The towne thus standing in great distresse, there were 200. Frenchmen and Italians, which enterprised vnder the conduct of Ioncurio to enter the Towne in couert of the night, which exploit they so warily achieved, that by meanes of a piess that could speake the English tong, they passed by the scowlers, and through the watch, so as the most part of them were got ouer the trenches, ere it was knowne what they were: to the number of an hundred and twentie of them got into the towne, but the residue being intercepted, were either taken or slaine. At length when a piece of the castle was blowne vpper, and the breaches made as was thought reasonable, the assault was giuen by the admirall lord Dudley that was come thither by the sea; which he had scoured, after his returne out of Scotland. This assault was conragiously giuen, and also manfully defended, so that when 5. assailants had perished in what estate the breach stood, and what prouision they within had made for defence of their towne, which was great, they were called backe, and retired, but not without losse on both sides, especially of them within: for during the assault, the great artillery did beate still upon them that presented themselves at the breaches to repulse the assailants, and so divers of their valiant captaines and brave soldiers were slaine at this assault: shortly after, the captaines within the towne, doubting to be effronces assaulted, and perceiving themselves in extreme danger to lose the towne by force, if they provided not the sooner, by rendering it, to save themselves: they sent forth two of their chiefe captaines, Mounſier Semblemount, and Mounſier de Veruine, gouverneur of the towne, his request was contented to deliver the towne to his grace, with condition that they might passe with bag and baggage, which request the king granted, and so the next day the duke of Suffolke rode into Boloigne, unto whom, as unto the king the keys of the towne were delivered, and in the afternoon departed all the Frenchmen. The number of all the men of war that were strong, and able to serve were of horse-men 67. of foot-men 1563. of hurt men 87. of women and children 1927. beside a great number of aged and sicke persons, not able to depart with the rest.

Boloigne yielded to Henry

Henry entered Boloigne.

The 25. of September, the king having the sword borne before him by the lord Marquesse Dorset, like a conqueror rode into Boloigne, and the trumpeters on the walls sounding. In the entering, there met him the duke of Suffolke, and delivered unto him the keys of the towne, and so he rode forth to his lodging that was prepared on the south side of the towne, two daies after the king rode about the towne, within the walls, and appointed that our Ladye church of Boloigne should be taken downe, and in place thereof a mount to bee made, for strengthening of the towne: finally, after that he had set things in order for the safe keeping of the town, he appointed sir John Dudley, Lord Lisle, high admiral of the seas, to be his deputy of the same towne, and then taking the seas, he returned into England, landing at Dover on the first of October.

The 9. of October in the night, the French men came unawares upon the Englishmen in base Boloigne, and slew of them a great number: howbeit, they were shortly after chased from thence, and the base towne holden after in good quiet.

This yere was taken by the kings shippes of the West countrey, and of the English coast the number of 300. French shippes and more, so that the Grey Friers Church in London was laide full of wine, the Austin Friers and Blacke Friers, were laid full of hearing, and other fish that was taken going into France.

The king demanded a benevolence of all his subjects, spiritual and Temporal, towards his wars in France and Scotland.

And the twelfth of January the lord Chancellor, the duke of Suffolke, and other of the Kings Councell began to sit at Baynards Castle, where they first called before them the Palor and Aldermen, &c. And because Richard Read Alderman would not agree to pay as they set him, he was commanded upon a great paine to serve the king in his wars of Scotland, who departed from London the thre and twentieth of January, where he was taken prisoner, and, &c. Also sir William Roche Alderman, for words of displeasure taken by the kings councell, was by them sent to the flate, where he remained till passion Sunday.

Sir William Roche sent to the flate.

The five and twentieth of January, there camped on the West side of Boloigne beyond the haven, an army of French to the number of foureteene thousand, where they lay ten daies, and the first of February, were put to flight, by the earle of Hertford, and sir John Dudley lord Admirall then being deputy of Boloigne.

The 13. of February, a plect was set on the pillorie in Cheape, and burnt in both chokes with the letters F. and A. and a paper on his head, wherein was written for false accusing, which judgement was given by the Lord Chancellor in the Star Chamber, a notable example of Justice: great cause have I to wish the like Justice had been ministered unto him, that after he had defrauded me of my twofold goods, sought to have deprived me of my life, by likewise accusing me of many articles (seaven score and odds) suborned witnesses (detected of perjury, burnt in the hand for felony, and such like) which all could prove neuer one article against me, before the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other her maiesties high commissioners, (as appeareth in their register) by whom I was answered, there was no reimebie against the accuser, by meane of a statute late made, &c. Whereupon the false accuser of his master and eldest brother, sweareth to some, he neuer did any such acte: to other, that all those articles were true, and also largely (to the like effect) libelleth against me.

False accuser set on the pillorie, and marked in the face, as he and other the like have well deserved.

In the beginning of March, a road was made into Scotland toward Edinburgh, by the Englishmen, who at the first got great praise, but they were so greedy, and went so farre, that a great army of Scots met them with three battels, where the Englishmen for the most part were slaine, and taken at Baner Hotwiche, among whom sir Ralph Eure lord Eure, and warden of the East Marches was slaine, and R. Read Alderman of London, with other taken prisoners by the Scots. T. Wriothesley L. Chancellor made knight of the garter.

Crinitie terme was adjourned because of the wars.

About the 15. of June was a great tempest of winde in Warbissire, where through trees were over-turned, and divers Churches, chappels, and houses, were uncovered. Also in Lancashire, there fell hailestones as big as mens fists, which had divers prints in them, some like mens faces, some like Can holes, &c.

The nineteenth of July, the French kings naule comming out of Fletowen, and Depe, arrived on the coast of England in Sussex, above bright Hamstead, where they set certaine of their soldiers a land to burne: but the Beacons were fired, and the men came downe to thicke, that the Frenchmen fled and did little hurt.

The 20. of July the king being at Portsmouth, a gallye shippe of England, called the Warry Rose, with sir George Carrow the capitaine, and manie other gentlemen were drowned in the midst of the haven, by great negligence.

The 21. of July, the French galleies and naue came afoze Portsmouth ha- uen, and landed certayne of their army in the Ile of Wight, at Saint Helens Point, and there burned and encamped about 2000. men: but they were sone driven abacke with losse of their capitaine and manie souldiers. Within fewe daies after, the whole fleet remoued from the Wight to a place in Sussex, cal- led Newhaven, foure miles from Lewes, and there landed manie capitaines and souldiers, who by the balliantnes of the gentlemen and yeomen of Sussex, were slaine and drowned in the haven a great number of them, and the rest hardly recouered their ships and galleies.

In the moneth of August, deceased at Gullforde Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, and lord great master of the Kings householde, who was honozable buried at Windsor.

In August the earle of Hereford was sent into Scotland, with an army of 12000. men, where hee destroyed divers townes, and greatly endamaged the Scots.

The 9. of September sir Iohn Dudley, L. Lisle, L. admirall of England, lan- den with 6000. men at Trecport in Normandy, and there bent the towne and abbey with other houses about it, and 30. ships with a barke that lay in the ha- uen, with losse of 14. Englishmen, and so returned.

The 24. of November began a parliament, wherein was granted to the K. a subsidy of 2. s. 8. d. of the pound in goods, and 4. s. of the pound in lands. Also all colledges, chauntries, and hospitals, were committed to the K. order, to al- ter and transpore, which he promised to do to the glory of god and the common profit of the realme.

The 24. of December the Parliament was prorogued, on the which daie the K. comming into the house to giue his roial assent vnto such acts as were pas- sed, the speaker made vnto him an eloquent oration: to the which, although the custome hath alwaies bin that the Lord chancelor should make the answer, it pleased the K. at this present to make the answer himselfe, which hee uttered as here followeth, set downe by Edward Hall.

Although my chancelor for the time being, hath before this time used verie eloquentlie and substantiallie to make answer to such orations, as hath bin set forth in this high Court of Parliament, yet is hee not so able to open and set forth my minde and meaning, and the secrets of my heart in so plaine and ample maner, as I my selfe am, and can do: wherefore I taking vpon me to answer your eloquent oration. O. speaker, say that where you in the name of our welbelovyd commones, haue both praised and extolled mee, for the no- table qualitties that you haue concluded to bee in mee, I most heartily thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembrance of my duetie, which is to inde- uor my selfe to obtayn and get such excellent qualitties and necessary vertues as a prince or gouernor ought to haue, of which gifts I recognize my selfe both barren and bare: but of such small qualitties as God hath indowd me withall, I

render to his godnes my most humble thankes, intending with all my wit & diligence to get and acquite to me such notable vertues and princely qualitties as you haue alleaged to be incorporated in my person: these thankes for your loving admonition and good counsell first remembered, I restles thanke you againe, because that you, considering our great charge, not for our pleasure, but for your defence, not for our gaine, but to our great cosse, which wee haue lately sustained, as well in defence of our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that forreine. which was to this Realme most displeasing, and shall hereafter by Gods Grace bee to our nation most profitable and pleasant, haue freelie of your owne minds granted to vs a certaine subsidie, here in an as specified, which verily we take in god part, regarding more your kindnes, than the profite thereof, as hee that lets more by your louing heartes, than by your substance. Besides this heartie kindnes, I cannot a little reioice when I consider the perfitt trust and confidence, which you haue put in mee, as men hauing vndoubted hope, and vnfaigned beleefe in my god doings and iust pro- cedings for you, without my desire or request haue committed to mine or- der & disposition, all chantries, colledges, hospitals, & other places specified in a certaine act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glory of god, and the profit of the common wealch: surely if I contrary to your expectation should suffer the ministers of the Church to decaye, or learning, which is so great a we- ll to be minished, or poore and miserable to bee vncultured, you might saie, that I, being put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trustie friend to you, nor charitable to mine owne churche, neither a louer of the pub- like wealch, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account must be renderd of alour doings. Doubt not I pray you, but your expectation shal be serued more godly and goodly than ye will wish or desire, as hereafter ye shal plainly per- celeue. Now sithence I finde such kindnes on your part towards me, I cannot chafe but loue and saueur you, affirming, that no Prince in the worlde more knoweth his subiects, than I doe you, nor no subiects or commones more loued and obeyed their Soueraign Lord than I percelue you do me, for whose defence my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if needfull require, my person shall not be vnaduentured: yet although I wish you, and you wish me to be in this per- fitt loue and concord, this friendly amitie cannot continue except both you my lords temporal, and my lords spirituall, and you my louing subiects studie and take paine to amend one thing which surely is amisse, and farre out of order, to the which I most heartily require you, which is. That Charitie and concord be not among you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in euery place: Saint Paul saith to the Corinthians the 13. Chapter, Charitie is gentle, Charitie is not proud, and so forth in the same chapter. Behold the m- what loue and charity is amongst you, when the one calleth an other brethren, and anabaptist, and hee calleth him againe Papist, hypocrite, and Pharisee: bee the tokens of charitie amongst your selues: so, no, I assure you that this lacke of Charitie amongst your selues will bee the hinderance and alwa- ging of the seruient loue betwene vs, as I said before, except this wounde be shued and cleerelic made whole, I must needs iudge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partlie by negligence of you the fathers and preachers of the spiritualty: for if I know a man which lieth in adultery, I must iudge him lecherous, and a carnall person: if I see a man boast and bragge himselfe, I can not but deeme him a proud man. I heare daily that you of the cleargie preach one against another, teach one contrary to another, envying one against another, without charity or discretio: some be too stricke in their old Mumfimus, other be too busy and curious in their new Sumpimus: thus all men almost be in variety and discord, and few or none preach truly and sincerely the word of God, according as they ought to doe. Shall I iudge you charitable persons doing thus? No, no, I cannot so do: alas how can the poore soules live in concord, when you preachers so amongst them in your sermons debate and discorde? of you they looke for light, and you bring them into darknes. Amend these crimes I exhort you, and let forth Gods word, both by true preaching and good example giving, or els I, whom God hath appointed his vicar and high minister here, will see these dissensions extinct, and these enormities corrected, according to my bevy duty, or els I am an unpardonable servant, and untrue officer. Although I saie the spirituall men be in some fault, that charity is not kept amongst you, yet you of the temporalltie bee not cleere and unpotted of malice and envie, for you raille on bishops, speake slanderouslie of prelates, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrarie to good order, and christlan fraternitie: if you knowe surely that a Bp. or preacher, preacheth or teacheth peruers doctrine, come and declare to some of our counsel or to us, to whom is committed by god the high authoritie to reforme and order such causes and behaviors, & be not iudges your selves of your own fantastical opinions and vaine expositions, for in such high causes you may lightly erre: and although you be permitted to read holy scriptures, and to haue the word of god in your mother tong, you must understand it is licenced you so to do, only to inform your consciences, and to instruct your children and familie, and not to dispute and make Scripture a railing and a taunting stocke, against prelates and preachers, as manie light persons do. I am verie soie to knowe and heare howe unrequenitlie that most precious tell the word of God is disputed, rymed, sung, and rangeled in euerie Alehouse and Tauerne, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: and yet I am euen as much soie that the readers of the same, followe it in dooing so faintly and coltelic: for of this I am sure, that charity was neuer so faint amongst you, and vertuous and godlie liuing was neuer less bled, no: God himselfe amongst christians was neuer lesse reuerenced, honored, or serued: therefore, as I saide before, bee in charity one with another, like brother and brother: loue, deare and serue god, to the which I as your supreme head and soveraigne Lord exhort and require you: and then I doubt not, but that love and league, that I spake of in the beginning, shall neuer bee dissolved or broke betwene us. And to the making of lawes which we haue now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making and furthering of the same, or else your labors shall be in vain, your common wealth nothing relieved, how to your petition, concerning our roiall assent, to be giuen to such actes as haue passed both the houses, they shall be read openly, that ye may heare them. And so heeing read his grace assented, and so rose and departed.

Many proper feates of armes were exploited and done in this meane while betwixt the English and the French about Boloigne.

In the morrowe after the feast of the Epiphantie, there came a conuoie of victualles towarde the French fort builded besides Boloigne, garded with three or foure thousande Launcequents, under their Coronell, the Reingraue and certaine Frenchmen. The earle of Surrey then lieutenant of Boloigne advertised thereof, made out with such power as hee might conveniently spare out of Boloigne, and the olde man, to cut off those victualles: but coming to encounter with the enemies at S. Etienne he was put to flight, sir Edward Poynings captain of a band called the B. gard of Boloigne was slain in that conflict, with sixtene or thirtene other Captaines, besides officers and common souldiers.

In the latter end of March, the shewes on the banks side of the Thamis, in Southwarke was put downe, by the B. commandement, which was proclaimed by sound of trumpet no more to bee privileged or used as a common boydel, but the inhabitants of those houses, to keepe good and honest rule, as in all other places of the realme.

The 27. of Aprill, being Tuesday in Easter weeke, W. Foxley potmaker for the mint in the tower of London, fell asleep, and so continued sleeping and could not be wakened with plying, cramping, or other wise burning whatsoeuer, till the first day of the next terme, which was full 14. daies, and 15. nights, for that Easter terme beginneth not afore 17. daies after Easter. The cause of his thus sleeping could not be knowne, though the same were diligently searched for by the kings physicians and other learned men, yea the king himselfe examined the said W. Foxley, who was in all points found at his wakening to be as if he had slept but one night, and liued 41. yere after, to wit, till the yere of Christ 1587.

The 18. of May, there were 4. of the B. ships, and 4. pinnaces abroad on the seas afore the haven of Hamble tow, and there came an 8. of the french gallees to set upon them, there was great shooting betwixt them, but at the last one of the galleies was taken, in the which were 280. souldiers, and 140. rowers. The rest of their galleies packed away. Howsoever while the campe lay thus at Hamble tow, it chanced y one day a mautenie rose among the Lansquenets against their captaine, so that they got themselves into order of battell, felled upon the great artillerie, and shewed countenance, as if they would haue set upon the residue of the whole campe. Whereupon every man was commanded to repaire to his ensign, and the Spaniards came and ioined themselves with the Englishmen ready to take such part as they did. At length by the diligence of the christians, and good countenance of the English souldiers & Spaniards, the tumult was staid, and 6. of the principall beginners therof were hanged.

The 21. of May, the french army came and encamped beyond Boloigne at the church on the hill, & the morrowe after the earle of Hertford marched with his power to a place withyn 2. miles of them, and certain horsemen & footemen went forth and skirmished with them, and in the mean time the artillery ceased not to shot off, as well from the French Campe, as from Bologne, and the Old-man. This day were slain 14. Frenchmen, and 2. taken prisoners: and 3. of the English part were taken, and so the earle of Hertford returned to his camp, and left the Lancquents upon the hill, encamped before the entrenches, not 2. miles distant from them, in which place a fort was begun to be raised, which was called the fort of Bologne brage.

The 23. of May, the soldiers of Bologn and the Lancquents skirmished with the Frenchmen, and here took of them about the number of 7. score, of the which there were 40. of them in velvet coats, and some with chains.

In this meane while, by the motion of diuers Princes, a meeting was had of diuers Commissioners appointed to treat of some peace, to be concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France, herupon there came to Swines for the Li. of Englaunde, the earle of Hertford, the bishop of Winchester, Sir Iohn Dudley bicount Lisle, baron of Pannas, and high admirall of Englaunde, Sir William Paget the kings Secretarie, and Doctor Nicholas Wotton Deane of Canterburie: for the French king there came to Arde, Monsieur Claude Danebaulte Admirall of France, the Bpshoppe of Carcor, Monsieur Reymond chiefe president of Roane, the Secreterie Boucherell. These mette diuers times betwixt Arde and Swines. After long debating, on the seuenth of June a peace was concluded, which peace was with heraultes and sound of trumpets, proclaimed at London on Whitsonday, being the 13. of June, and the same daie was a general Procession, before the which was borne all the richest silver crosses in London, to wit, of euery church one, then proceeded all the parish clerkes, conboates, quitters, and priests in London, with the Duke of Paule, all of them in their richest coapes, singing: When the companies of the Citie in their best lueries. The Lozde Spaloz, the Aldermen and Sheriffs in scarlet, &c. All these went from Pauls church through Cheape, and Cornhill by to Leaden hall, and so back again to Pauls. And this was the last shew of the richest crosses and coapes in London: for shortly after this, with other their church plate were called into the kings treasury and wardrobe. And the same daie was the same Peace likewise proclaimed in the Citie of Paris, in Roan, & other places: the first article of which peace was, that the French king paying to the Li. of England 800000. crownes, within the terme of 8. yeres, he should haue Bologn again to him restored, which in the mean time should remain in the hands and possession of the king of England.

Afterouer for the full establishing of the peace, and for to receiue the French both, the bicount Lisle L. admirall, with the B. of Durham, and diuers other lords and gentlemen to the number of more than 100. all in velvet coates and chaines of gold, with 45. yeomen (specially appointed, went into France from Bologn, the 10. of July, & came to Spellune, a town beyond Paris, where the French li. lay: by whose, and the Dolphin his son, they were totally receiued, feasted & banqueted: and hauing don that for, the which they came, the said lord admirall Dudley the 1. of August took his leaue of the French li. who rewarded him with a cupbord of plate of gold, valued at 1500. pound. The Lozds also and gentlemen had chaines of gold giuen to them, and yeomen had 1200. crownes bestowed amongst them, and so they returned into England.

The 16. of July were burned in Smithfield for the sacrament Anne Askew the Keme, Io. Lassels, Nicholas Oorden, priest, Io. Adam tailor, and Doctor Shaxton sometime bishop of Salisburie preached at the same fire, and there recanted, persuading them to do the like, but they would not.

The 21. of August came into England Claude de Honnebuld high admirall of France, who brought with him the sacre of Diep, and 12. galleies, he landed at the tower Whitehall, where he was honorably receiued, and brought to the Bishop of Londons palace, where he lodged two nightes, and then rode to Hampton court where the king lay. By the way prince Edward receiued him with a company of 500. coates of velvet, with one liue of cloth of golde, and halfe the coat embrothered with gold: there was in all to the number of 800. houpes. And so the French admirall came to the court, giuing the prince the vpper him and as they rode; and at the entry gate of the court, the L. chanceloz and all the li. counsell receiued him, and brought him to his lodging.

On Bartholomew day the king admitted him to his presence, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the chappell, where the li. receiued his oath, to performe the articles of the league. I omit to speake of huntings and banquettings, which was wonderfull. But on the 27. of August, he being rewarded with a cupbord of plate to the value of 1200. l. he returned to London, and so to his galleies, and departed homeward: besides the li. gift, he had giuen to him by the city of London two flagons gilt, and two other parcell gilt, valued at 136 l. besides wine, wax, &c.

The 12. of December Th. D. of Norfolk, and Henry Earle of Surrey his son and heire upon certain surmises of treason, were committed to the tower of London, the one by water, the other by land, that the one knew not of the others apprehension.

The 3. day of January, the late dissolved church of the grey Friers in London was opened, and made sung there; and that day preached at Pauls crosse the bishop of Rochester, who declared the kings gift to the city of London, for the relieuing of the poore people, which gift was by Patent under his great seale, S. Bartholomewes Spittle in Smithfield, lately valued at 305 pounce 6. shillings and 7. pence, and surrendered to the king, the church of the said grey Friers, valued at 32. pounce, 19. s. and seauen pence, and surrendered, and two parish Churches, the one of S. Nicholas in the Shambles, the other Saint Ewine in Pelwgate Market at Martolke lane end, all to be made one parish, in the said church of the Grey Friers: and in lames hie gaue for the maintenance of the same church, with divine seruice, reparation, &c. 500. markes by yere for ever, and this church to be named Christs church, founded by king Henry the eight.

The thirtieth daie of Januarie, the king then lying dangerously sick, the Earle of Surrey was arraigned in the Guild hall of London. before the lord Spaloz, the lord chanceloz, and other lords and iudges being there in commission; some things he flatly denied, weakening the credite of his accusers, by

And for that he was no lord of the parliament, he was enforced to stand to the trial of a common inquest of his countrey, which found him guiltie, and thereupon he had iudgement of death: and shortly after, to wit, on the 19. of January he was beheaded on the tower hill.

On S. Peters day Stephen Gardiner B. of Winchester preached in the palace of White hall at Westminster before the K. for the which sermon he was on the morrow after sent to the tower of London.

The 7. of July a priest was hanged and quartered in Smithfildes, for that hee and other in Cornewall had slaine M. Body, one of the kings commissioners, the others of his societie were put to death in diuers other partes of the Realme.

This yere a great mortality by the pestilence was in London, therefore commandement was giuen to all curates and other hauing to do therewith, that no corpses should be buried before 6. of the clocke in the morning, nor after 6 of the clock at night, and that there should at the buriall of euery corpse, be rung one bell at the least by the space of 3. quarters of an houre.

In September died Quene Katherine, late wife to king Henry, and after married to Sir Thomas Seimer lord admirall; he died of childbirth, being deliuered of a daughter.

The 16. of Januarie, Sir Tho. Seimer knight of the garter, baron of Sudley, lord admirall, brother to the lord protector, and uncle unto king Edward, was arrested, and sent to the tower of London. On the 19. of January Sir William Shepington was also committed to the tower; which Sir William on the 14. of february, was arraigned in the Guild Hall at London, and condemned of treason, for misusing of the kings mint at Wythlow. The lord Th. Seimer uncle to the king was condemned by the Parliament, and neuer came to his answer. This Parliament brake vp on the 14. of March, and on the 20. of March the saide lord Th. Seimer was beheaded on the Tower hill, hee tooke it on his death, that hee had neuer committed or meant anie treason against the king nor realme. The 29. of March doctor Latimer preached before the king at Westminster, and there in his sermon, declaring manie things against the lord Thomas Seimer late beheaded, he affirmed that in time whyles he was prisoner in the Tower, he wrote letters vnto the ladie Mary, and the ladie Elizabeth the kings sisters, that they should make some warre against the lord protector, and reuenge his death.

The 6. of Aprill, proclamation was made for the Masse to bee put downe through the whole realme.

The 20. of Aprill, the cloister of Pauls church in London, called pardon church yerde, by the dance of death, commonlie called the dance of Pauls about the same cloister cosily and cunningly wrought, and the chappel in the middle of the same churchyard, were all begun to be pulled downe. Also the charnil house of Pauls, with the chappel there (after the tombes and other monuments of the dead were pulled downe, and the dead mens bones buried in the fields) were converted into dwelling houses and shops.

About the same time the steeple, and most part of the church of S. Iohn of Zeruusalem, neere vnto Smithfild, most beautifullie new builded, and late destroyed, by the lordie prioz named Docary, was undermined, and ouerthrowne with

Smith, D. Maie Deane of Pauls, and D. Cok deane of the arches, and chancelor to the archb. of Cant. these sate on the altar of our ladie in iudgement of these anabaptists, and at their next sitting, there sate with them the sherifs of London; and on the next Sunday being low Sundaye, one of them named Champenes bare a fagot at Pauls crosse, Myles Couerdale preached the rehearsal sermon there: on the next Saturday the said commissioners sate there againe, before whome was brought loan of Kent, alias Ioan Butcher, alias Knel, the was condemned: and a tanner of Colchester named Puno recanted, and on the morrow bare a fagot at Pauls crosse, and after that at Colchester. Also that date stood at Pauls crosse a butcher an anabap. of Mary Magdal. parish in old Smithfild, & againe Sunday after because he made a mock at the first time: thus much of anabap. of that time.

In the month of May, by meanes of a proclamation for inclosures, the commons of Somersetshire and Lincolnshire made a commotion, and brake vp certain parkes of Sir W. Herberd, and L. Sturtons, but Sir W. Herberd slew and executed many of those rebels.

In July, the commons of Essex & Kent, Suffolk & Norfolk, rose against the inclosures, and pulled downe diuers parkes and houses.

Also the Commons of Cornewall and Devonshire rose against the nobles and gentlemen, and required not onely that the inclosures might bee disparched, but also to haue their old religion, and act of five articles restored: the beleaged the citie of Excester, which was ballantlie defended. Against these rebels was sent Iohn L. Russell Lord prioz seale, with a number of souldiers, who entred the city of Excester the 5. of August, where they slew and took prisoners of the rebels more than 4000. and after hanged diuers of them in the towne and country about. The L. Gray was also sent with a number of strangers, Maine and Germaine horsemen, who in diuers condiactions slew manie people, and spoiled the country.

The last of July, Wil. L. marques of Northampton, entred the city of Norwich, and on the next morning, the rebels also entred the towne, burned parte thereof, put the L. marques to flight, and slew the L. Sheffield.

In this meane time diuers persons were apprehended as aiders of the force, said rebels or repaters of their doings, of the which one was the Bailife of Romford in Essex, hanged with in Algate, and an other of Kent, at the bridge sat toward Southwark, both on Mary Magdalens day by martiall law.

The 8. of August the French L. ambassador, did in name of his master the fr. king, make defiance vnto the K. of England, and so the wars to begin with all their force, & the same night following, all Frenchmen were taken prisoners, and their goods registred.

In the beginning of August, the French L. determining to take the Isles of Cornueles and Jersey, did set there landmines vpon our ships with a great number

The 16. of August, a man was hanged without Bishopsgate of London, and one other without Aldgate, the third at Tottenham, the fourth at Walltham, and so forth in divers other places, all by marshall law.

French men apprehended.

The 8. of August, the French ambassadors gave a defiance to the lord protector, whereupon all French men with their goods being no denizens were apprehended and committed to prison.

The rebels in Norfolk and Suffolke encamped themselves at mount Surrey, in a wood called St. Nicholas wood, nere unto Norwich, against whom sir Io. Dudley earle of Warwicke went with an army, where both he & a great number of gentlemen meeting with the rebels were in such danger, as they had thought all to have died in that place, but God that confoundeth the purpose of all rebels, brought it so to passe, that aswell there as in all other places, they were partly by power constrained, partly by promise of their pardon, persuaded to submit themselves to their prince: the earle of Warwicke entered the city of Norwich the 27. of August, when he had slain about 5000. of the rebels, and taken their chiefe captaine Robert Ket of Wintham Tanner, which might dispend in lawes fifty pound by yeere, and was worth in movables above a thousand markes, when he had put to execution divers of the rebels in divers places about Norwich, he returned.

The 28. of August tidings was brought to H. Edward, and the lord protector, that the French men had taken Blacknes, Hamletw and Retowanen by Boleine, and had slain all the Englishmen, and taken the kings ordinance and victuals, which was reported to be begun by one Sturton a ballard son of the lord Sturtons, which had betrayed Retowanen, and went himselfe to the French kings service: hereupon the captaine of Boleine Barke for feare of the French army conveyed all the ordinance, victuals, goods, and men of that fort, to the high towne of Boleine, and after their departing, with gunpowder blew by the fort.

Norfolke.

About this time also, a commotion began at Semer in the north-riding of Yorke shire, and continued in the east-riding, and there ended: the principall rasyers whereof were William Ombler of east Hyellerton preman, Thomas Dale parish cleark of Semer, and Steuenson of Semer: being prevented by the lord president from rising at Waintringham, they dyed to a place at Semer by the sea coast, and there by night rode to the beacon at Starston, and set it on fire, and so gathered a rude route: then they went to master Whites house, and took him, and Clopton his wines boy, Sauage a merchant of Yorke, and Bery servant to sir Walter Mildmay, which foure they murdered a mile from Semer, and there lefte them naked: their number increased to 3000.

On the one and twentieth day of August, the kings pardon was offered, which Ombler and other refused, who were shortly after taken, and brought to York, where Thomas Dale and other were executed the 21. of September.

The first of September Edmond Boner bishop of London preached a sermon at Pauls crosse, for the which he was accused unto the council by William Latimer, parson of St. Laurence Pountney, and John Hooper, sometime a white monke, and so conveyed before the Archbishop of Canterbury and other commissioners at Lambeth on the thirtieth, the thirtieth, the eightieth, and on the one and twentieth day of that same month he was sent to the sparrhalles in his habite of a bishop, but on the first of October he was de- prived of his bishopricke, for disobeying the kings order in religion.

On the first day of October in the morning, the earle of Warwicke with other lords of the council sent for the lord protector and the Aldermen of London, to his place in Holbozne, where was declared to them by the lord Chancellor and other of the kings counsell, divers abuses of the lord protector, concerning the kings person, and his affaires both in England and also in Scotland, and other his pecces beyond the seas. And that after none was kept a court of the aldermen in the Guild hall, where was shewed a letter, from the king and the lord protector for to have one thousand men of the citie, well armed with weapons for defence of the kings maiesties person. And another letter also from the lords of the council, to have two thousand men to aide them, for defence of the kings person: and also, that the citie should bee well kept with watches both day and night, &c.

And the same first day, the king being at Hampton court, the lord protector caused proclamations to be made in divers towne nere to the court, for men to aide the king against the lords, and also sent letters to divers towne to the same effect: whereupon great assemblies of people were made at Hampton court. And in the night of the same day, he conveyed the king to Windsoze, with a great number of horsemen and footmen.

My lords, we commend vs most hartly unto you: and whereas the kings maiestie was enjoined that you were assembled in such sort as ye doe notve remaine there, was abused by us, and such other of his counsell, as were here about his person, to send master secretary Peter unto you with such a message as whereby might have ensued the suretie of his maiesties person, with preservation of his realme and subsidies, and the quiet both of us, and your selves, as master secretary can well declare unto you, his maiestie, and we of his counsell here, do not a little marvel that you stay still with you the said master secretary: and haue not (as it were) vouchsafed to send an answer to his maiestie, neither by him, nor yet by any other. And for our selfe, we do much more marvel, and are right loy, as we and you haue god cause to be, to see the manner of your doings, bent with force and violence to bzing the kings maiestie and us to those extremities, which as we doe intend, if you will take none other way but violence, to defend us, as nature and our allegiance both binde us to extremity of death, and put it into Gods hands, who giueth victory as pleaseth him. So if our reasonable conditions and offers will take no place, as hitherto none hath bene signified unto us from you, nor we doe not understand what ye doe require or seeke, nor what ye do meane, and that ye speake no hurt of the kings maiesties person: as touching all other priuat matters, to auoide the effusion of christian blood, and to preserve the kings maiesties person, his realme, and subjects, ye shall finde vs agreeable to any reasonable conditions that you will require. For we do esteeme the tranquillity and tranquillity of the realme more than all other worldly things, yea more than our owne liues. Thus praying you to sende vs a determinate answer herein by your secretary Peter (or if ye will not let him go) by this bearer, we beseech God to giue both you and vs grace to determine this matter as may be, to Gods honor, the preferuacion of the king, & the quiet of vs all, which may be, if the fault be not in you. And so we bid you most hartly farewell. From the kings maiesties castle of Windesore the 7. day of October, 1549.

My lord, I cannot perswade my selfe that there is any ill conclusiō in your heart as of your selfe against me, for that the same seemeth impossible, that where there hath ben from your youth and mine so great a friendship and amity betwixt vs, as neuer for my part to no man was greater, now so suddenly there should be hatred, and that without iust cause, what sooner rumours and brutes, or perswasions of others haue moued you to conclude, in the sight and iudgment of almighty God, I protest & affirme this vnto you, I neuer meant worse to you than to my selfe, wherefore my lord, for God sake, for friendship, for the loue that euer hath bin betwixt vs, or that hereafter may be, perswade your selfe with truth, and let this time declare to me and the world your iustness, and perseverance in friendship, the which God be my witness, who hath all harts, was neuer diminished, nor euer shall be whilst I liue. And because my heart and minde shall be more plaine and open than my writings: this bearer master Hobie shall declare vnto you the effect thereof at length, to whom I pray you giue credite, &c. the 8. of October, 1549.

After our hartly commendations vnto your god L. we haue receiued from the same a letter by master Hunnings, dated at London yesterday, whereby you doe vs to vnderstand the causes of your assemble there, and charging the lord protector with the manner of government, require that he will shew himselfe from the kings maiesty, disperse the force which hee hath leuid, and be contented to be ordered according to iustice and reason. And so you will gladly commune with vs, as touching the suretie of the kings maiesties person, and the order of all other things, with such comfort as shall be behalfe as appertaineth, and otherwise you must (as you write) make other account of vs, than you trust to haue cause, and burden vs, if things come to extremities. To the first point we verily deliue, that as brutes, rumors, and reports, that your lordships intended the destruction of the lord protector; induced his grace to flie to the defence which he hath assembled, excuse your lordships, hearing that his grace intended the like destruction towards you, haue ben moued to doe as you haue done, so as for lacke of vnderstanding one of any others right meaning, things be growen to such extremities, as if the saving of the kings maiesties person, and the common weale, take not more place in his grace and your lordships, than private respect of affaires, you see, we doubt not, as we doe, that both our king, our countrie, and also our selues shall as verily as God is God, be utterly destroyed and cast away. Wherefore, might

If please you, for the tender passion of Iesus Christ, vse your wisdome, and temper your determination in such sort, as no blood be shed, nor crueltie vsed, neither of his graces part, nor of your lordships; for if it come to this point, both you and we are like to see presently with our eyes, that which every beine of all our hearts will bleed to behold. Wherefore, as true subiectes to the kings maiesty, as faithful Counsellors, though unworthy Counsellors to his maiesty, and his realme, and as lamantable petitioners, we beseech your lordships most humble, and from the bottome of our hearts, to take pity of the king and the realme, whereof you be principall members, and to set apart Summum ius, and to vie at this time Tum bonum et equum; and thinke not that this is written for any private seare or other respect of our selues, but for that vndoubtedly we heare and know more of this point with your fauors, than you there do know; yea, and howeuer it shall please you to account of vs, we are true men to God, to the king, to the realme, and so will we liue and dy where euer we be, and in respect of them thre esteeme little any other person or thing, no not our owne liues; and hauing cleere consciences, as somewhat sooner ill maie followe, vpon the vse of extremities here, that neither now is, nor shall be found fault in vs, and so quieting our selues we rest. Now to that you would haue the lord protector to do, for his part his grace and wee haue communed herein, & much to our comfortes and yours also, if it shall like you to waite the case, who is contented if you will againe for your parts vse equity, to put that now in execution which many times he hath declared by his wordes, that is to saie, so as the king and the realme maie be otherwise well serued, hee passeth little for the place he now hath. Sparye he both consider, that by the kings maiesties with all your aduices, and the consents of the nobles of the realme he was called to the place (as appereth in writing vnder his maiesties great Seale and Signe, whereunto your owne handes also and ours, with all others the lordes of the vpper house in parliament are subscribed): And therefore in this lent sort to be thus thrust out against his will, hee thinkeeth it not reasonable: he is here with the kings person, where his place is to be, and we bee here with him we trust in God for the good seruice of the king, the weale of the realme, and the good acquitting both of his Grace and of your lordships, which we most heartily desire, and so such hope beere thereof, as if you be not too long bent vpon the extremities, as is reported, and as equity canne take no place, my lordes grace maie liue in quiet, and the kings maiesties affaires maintained in such order, as by his maiesties Counsellors shall be thought convenient; marie to put himselfe simple into your handes, hauing hearte as both we and he haue, without first knowledge vpon what conditions, it is not reasonable. Life is sweete my lordes, and they saie, you seeke his blood and his death; which if ye do, and maie haue him otherwise conformable to reason, and by extremitye dyne him to seeke extremitye againe; the blood of him and others that shall die on both sides innocentlie, shall bee by God iustlie required at your handes. And when peradventure you would haue him againe vpon occasion of seruice, you shall see him to haue lost him. Wherefore god my lordes, we beseech you againe and againe, if you haue conceived any such determination, to put it out of your heads, and incline your hearts to kindnesse and humanitie, remembryng that he hath neuer been cruell to any of you, and why shoulde you be cruell to him? as we trust you be not, what so ever hath been said, but will shew your selues as conforinable for your parts, as his grace is contented, for the zeale he beareth to the king and the realme, to bee for his part, as this bearer sir Phillip Hobic will declare unto you, to whom we prae you to giue credite, and to returne him hither againe with an swere hereof. And thus beseeching the liuing God to direct your hearts to the making of a quiet end of these terrible tumults, we bid your lordships most hartlie well to fare. From the kings maiesties castle of Windsor the eight of October, 1549.

These letters notwithstanding, the same eight of October, after a common council in the Guild hal at London, whither all the lords of the counsell came, the lord Chancellor and other declared diuers abuses of the lord protector, desiring the citizens to be ayding and assisting with them, for the preserving of the kings maiesties person, which they greatly feared, being in his aduersaries hands. The lords dined with master Yorke one of the sheriffs, and in the afternoon proclamation was made in diuers places of the citie with trumpets, heraults, and kings at armes, wherein was contained diuers articles touching the euill government of the lord protector.

First they charged him with making inward diuision, whereby the quiet state of the realme left by king Henry the 8. was now disturbed, and thousands of the kings naturall subjects slain.

Item, the losse of his maiesties peeces beyand the sea, which his highnes sauer (not long before his decease) won to the honor of himselfe, and commoditie of the realme, not without the auenture of his owne person.

Item, that in all times of the wars in France and Scotland he hath enriched himselfe, and builded sumptuous and faire houses, leauing the kings poore soldiers unpaid of their wages.

Item, that he hath labored to make himselfe strong in all countries.

That he hath subuerted all lawes, iustice, and good order of the Realme, whereby he hath fearfully shaken the chaire of the kings state.

That he hath little esteemed the graue aduice of the kings good and faithfull counsellors.

That he hath little regarded the order appointed by the late H. Henry the 8. for the government of the king his sonne, his realmes and dominions in his tender age.

That he hath labored to sowe diuision in the realme among the nobles, gentlemen, and commons.

Finally, that it is easie for euery man to see what losse the king and realme have of late suffered by his wilfull negligence, and lacke of prouision and succour of the peeces beyand the sea. Subscribed,

The tenth of October, by a common counsell at the Guild hall, was granted foure hundred men of the citie, (100. to be horsemen) to be ready on the next morrow: and this day the lords dined with master Turke one of the sheriffs of London.

The 11. of October, the lords sitting at the L. great masters, sir Anthony Wingfield captaine of the gard was sent to the king at Windsor, and seuered the L. protector from his person, and caused the garde to watch him till the lords coming. On the morrow, the lord chancelor with the rest of the counsell, rode to Windsor to the king, and that night the lord protector was put in ward into Beauchamps tower in the castle of Windsor.

The 14. of October in the afternoon, the duke of Somerset was brought from Windsor, riding betwixt the earles of Southampton, and of Hunting-ton, through Oldborne in at Petigate, and so to the tower of London, accompanied with diuers lords and gentlemen, with 300. horse: the lord maior, sir Ralph Warren, sir John Gresham, master Recorder, sir William Lock, and both the sheriffs, and other knights sitting on their horses against Cooper lane, and all the officers with halbarbes, and from Oldborne byrge to the tower, certayne aldermen or their deputies on horse-backe in euery streete, with a number of householders standing with bills as he passed. There was with him committed to the tower, sir Michaell Stanhope, sir Thomas Smith, sir John Thin knights, Wolfe of the priuie chamber, and Grey of Reading.

The 17. of October, king Edward came from Hampton court to his place in Southwarke, then called Suffolke place, and there dined, where after dinner he made master John Yorke one of the sheriffs of London knight, and then rode through the citie of London to Westminster.

Short letters of Sir. phen Gardner bishop

byance by his letters, wherein (after commendations had unto them) he wrote as followeth: I have continued here in this miserable prison now one yere, one quarter, and one moneth, this same day that I wrote these my letters, with want of aire to relieue my body, want of booke to relieue my mind, want of god companie, the onely solace of this world, and finally, want of a iust cause why I shoulde haue come hither at all. Whereof this letter came not to my hands, but that the lords took it in good part, laughed herie merrillie thereat, saying, hee had a pleasant head, for towards wherof they gaue him leave to remaine still in prison five or six weekes after, without saying or sending a ny word to him, which when he considered, then hee wrote to them this letter following.

After my due commendations to your good lordships: Howsoeuer the time is stolen from you with the multitude of busineses and varietie of matters, wherewith ye bee traueilled, whereby ye rather want time (as I suppose) than bee gladd with it; yet with mee (being alone comfortles in this miserable prison) the time passeth more sensibly, and as the griefe groweth in length, so it byingeth more encomble and traueil with it. And being now the time of parliament, whereof I am a member in my degree, called unto it by writ, and not out from it by any fault, but only by power kept here: it is a double calamity to be detained in prison by so intolerable wrong, and excluded from this assembly so much against right. I have suffered the like in the late lord protector's time against all reason; which god hath giuen you power now to reforme, And among manie other things which in his time were by the same misse, no one thing (as I suppose) was of worse example, ne more prejudiciall to the good order of the high court of Parliament, which is the direction of all mens liues, lands, and goods in this realme, than to allowe for a president, that any one man being member thereof, might without cause be excluded, and so leited to parle there his minde in publicke matters, for the wealch of the realme, and such other priuate causes as do occur. If the strength of the parliament be not empaiued by wrong in one, because right consisteth not in number, it shall bee at the pleasure of him that ruleth, to do the same in me, whereby others may take more harme then I, as experience hath shewed in such examples. But I know it becommeth me not to reade the strength of that court, ne the order of it: the lawyers of this realme know that, and to their knowledge I submit my iudgment, and take for god that they allow. But this I dare say, when religion is entreated in a generall council of Christendome, if the rulers of the council let any mans repaire thither that hath right to be there. Whatsoeuer is there concluded, is in the lynes of the world abroad taken of no force, by excluding of one member wrongfully that should furnish the bodie, which I write into your lordships, for the good opinion I haue of you, trusting that ye intend not to uphold or followe the late lord protector's doings by wrong, but to fashion your proceedings, as they maie agree with iustice at home, and seem agreeable to reason, to others abroad: being so assured of mine innocence, that when your lordships shall heare what can be said against me: none answer thereunto, there shall appere cause why I shoulde haue had praise, thanks & commendations from of the late L. protector (if truth, honestie, and due obedience might take therfore) and no cause of trouble or displeasure at all, so wrongfully haue I been tormented in this prison, so boldly dare I speake to you of my cause, with such an opinion and estimation of your wisdoms which I knowe, and reuerence, as I ought not, ne would not vainly hope to abuse you with words: but upon certain confidence of your indifferencies, verily I trust that ye will deeme & take things in such sort, as being plainly and truely opened, shall appere vnto you by-matter indeed. In consideration whereof, I reuew my suit vnto your lordships, instantly requiring you that I may be heard according to iustice, & that with such speed, as I delay of your audience giue not occasion to such as be ignorant abroad of my matter, to thinke that your lordships allowed and approved the detaining of me here. Which without hearing my declaration I trust ye will not, but haue such consideration of me, as mine estate in the common wealch, the passing my former life amongst you, and other respects do require, wherein you shall bind me, and do agreeably to your honours and iustice: the first course whereof, you haue honorably taken vpon you, to make open to the realm without respect, which is the onely establishment of al commonwelths, and therefore the zeale of him was allowed that said, Fiat iustitia, & ruat munda: signifying, that by it the world is kept from falling in decaye, although it might seeme otherwise in some respect, and some trouble to arise in doing it. And this I write, because in the late L. protector's time there was an insinuation made vnto me, as though I were kept here by policie, which with the violation of iustice take neuer good effect, as I doubt not of your wisdoms ye can and will consider, and do therefore accordingly: for the effectuall execution whereof I shall not faile to praise almighty God with the preservation and increase of your honours. From the tower. Thus much concerning these letters haue I thought good to set downe, for that I find not the same otherwise constant in larger discourses of the said W. writings.

The 29. of November, Robert Ket and William Ket his brother were delivered out of the tower of London, to Sir Edmond Windham knight, and the rise of Roystholme to be conveyed to Roystwich, where Robert Ket was hanged in chains on the top of Roystwich castle, and William Ket likewise hanged on the top of Windham Steele.

In the moneths of November and December, the Scots took Burthorpe in Scotland, and other holds then possessed by Englishmen, where the Scots slew man, woman, and child, except Sir John Luttrell the captaine, whom they took prisoner.

The lords of the counsell resorted to the tower of London, and there charged the lord protector with sundrie articles, which he confessed, and subscribed vnto them as followeth.

1. First, you did take vpon you the offices of protector and gouernor vpon condition expressedly and specially, that ye would do nothing in the kings affaires publicke or priuate, but by the assent of the late kings executors, or the most part of them.

The submittioun of the D. of Somerset prisoner in the tower, made the 2. of February.

I am most fearefull and full of heavinesse my verie good Lordes, to stande at my last letters were not better accepted at your lordships handes, to whome I am bounde during my life, for your most gentle and mercifull dealing with me, that it pleased your goodnes to bying my case to a fine. I trust your lordships neuer thinke that I ever did or would intende to stande against the kings Maiestie and your lordships goodnes, or that I would goe about to iustifie my cause, saving his maiestie and your lordships offereth clemencie, mercie and pardon. Although the fine be to me impossible, yet I doe commit my selfe wholly to his highnes, and your lordships mercies. I pray onely the moderation of it: And did couet to declare to your goodnes mine inability to beare it: And yet referred all to his Maiestie, and your wisdom, goodnes, and discretion. And I most humble desire your lordships not to thinke that I was about to contende with your lordships, when I did speake of my conscience, I might erre, in that I thought I did for the best, as I doe acknowledge and confesse, that neither I am the wisest man in the woylde, nor yet if I were, I shoulde not escape without a most singular grace, but manye times I shoulde offende: But I leave all that, and most humble, simple, whole, and lowlye, I submit my selfe to the kings spaciellie, and to your good lordships: appealing from the rigour and extremitie of his spaciellie lawes, to his maiesties great mercie and clemencie, praying your goodnesse to bee meane to his spaciellie not to bee offended with me, nor to exclude his maiesties mercie and benignitie from me, for my rudenes and lack of discretion, but to accept my god minde as one that faire woulde doo that were well. And when I cannot, or haue not doone that thing I ought to do, I woulde gladlie amende, and am readie at all times, without condition to doo and suffer willingly that thing that your honours will appoint mee, accepting that clemencie or mercie wherewith I obtayne to bee of his spaciellies, and your goodnesse: most humble on my knees praying, his spaciellie and your good Lordships to pardon mine offences, and to order mee for them as to his moste high mercifull clemencie shall appere convenient. And finallye flying from extremitie of iustice, desire mercie, as you be and are called most mercifull counsellours, not imputing my writings, and doings hitherto as of stoutenesse or stubbornnesse, but onlie for lacke of discretion and wisdom. For the which once againe I require pardone fauor: to be shewed. And if it pleased your good lordships to heare me, I trust ye should find me lowly unto your honours, and so conformable unto your lordships orders, that I trust to make amends, and obtaine pardon for my former folly. And thus I most humbly commit your good lordships to almighty God: To whome I shall alwaies pray that he make long continue in hono. From the Towre the 2. of Februarie.

In the month of August, a miller, servant to the miller at Wattlebylge in Southwarke, was set on the pillorie in west Cheape of London, and had both his eares cut off, for seditious wordes by him spoken against the duke of Somerset, as that he had proclaimed himselfe king in the countrey, which was false.

Also in the month of September, Grig a poulter of Surrey, taken among the people for a prophet, in curing of divers diseases by wordes and psalters, and saying he would take no money, &c. was by commandement of the Earle of Warwick, and other of the counsaile, set on a scaffold in the Towne of Croydon in Surrey, with a paper on his breast, wherein was written, his deceitfull and hypocriticall dealings. And after that on the eight of September set on the pillorie in Southwarke, being then our ladie saies there kept, and the spall: of London with his brethren the aldermen riding through the saies, the saide Grig asked them and all the citizens forgiveness. Thus much for Grig.

Of the like counterfette phisition have I noted (in the summarie of my Chronicles Anno 1582.) to be set on horse-backe, his face to the horse-taile, the same taile in his hande as a byble, a collar of Iordans about his necke, a whetstone on his breast, and so led through the citie of London, with ringing of balons, and banishing. Whereunto I had added as followeth. Such deceivers no doubt are many, who being neuer trained by in reading, or practise of phisicke and Chirurgie, boast to doe great cures, especially upon women, as to make them straight that before were crooked, or cramped in any part of their bodies, &c. But the contrary is true, for some have received gold, when they have better deserved the whetstone. These wordes tending generallie against all such counterfette phisitions, hath bin so hardly taken to hart, by one private person, not of the best, or second sort, (but my common adversary) that he hath largely libelled against me, to my great slander, but to the sol bewraying of himselfe, as one touched more then other, that being wiser, helde their peace. I forbeare to answer his libelling, as I have before borne his false accusing, and other greater matters, still referring my cause to the Almighty: who abhorreth lying lips, and maketh the proud to stumble.

On Saint Valentines daie, at Fewertham in Kent, one Arden a gentle man was murdered by procurement of his owne wife, for the which fact, she was the fourteenth of March byent at Canterburie: Michaell master Ardens man was hanged in chaires at Fewertham, and a maiden byent: Mosbie and his sister were hanged in Smithfield at London: Greene which had fled, came againe certaine yeeres after, and was hanged in chaires in the high way against Fewertham, and Blacke Will the ruffian that was hired to doe that ad, after his first escape, was apprehended, and byent on a scaffold at Finsbury in Zealand.

The 15. of Aprill, the infectious sweating sicknesse began at Shrewsbury, Sweating which ended not in the North part of England untill the ende of September. In this space what number died, it cannot be well accompted, but certaine it is that in London in fewe daies 960. gave up the ghost: it began in London the 9. of July, and the 12. of July it was most vehement, which was so terrible, that people being in best health, were suddenly taken, and dead in foure and twenty houres, and twelue, or lesse, for lacke of skill in guiding them in their sweat. And it is to be noted, that this mortalitie fell chiefly on rather on men, and those also of the best age, as betwixt thirty and forty yeeres, fewe women, nor children, nor olde men died thereof. Sleeping in the beginning was present death, for if they were suffered to sleepe but halfe a quarter of an houre, they neuer spake after, nor had any knowledge, but when they wakened fell into panges of death. This was a terrible time in London, for many one lost suddenly his friends, by the sweat, and their money by the proclamation. Seaven honest householders did slip together, and before eight of the clocke in the next morning, six of them were dead: they that were taken with full stomacks escaped hardly. This sicknesse followed English men as well within the realme, as in strange countries: therefore this nation was much afraid of it, and for the time began to repent and remember God, but as the disease relented, the devotion decayed. The first wake died in London 800. persons.

The 17. of August, the shilling which of late was called by the name. Second fall of pence, was called downe to 6. d. the groate to 2. d. the halfe groate to one penny, the penny to an halfe penny.

under the cloth of estate as high steward of England, the indictment of the said duke being read, he was immediately arraigned on the same of felony & treason, and after tried by his peers the nobles there present, which did acquit him of the treason, but found him guilty of the felony: whereupon after their verdict given, he had judgement to be had from thence to the place he came from, and from thence to the place of execution, there to be hanged till he were dead: but the people in the hall supposed he had bene clearely quit, when they saw the axe of the tower put downe, made such a thicke casting vpp of caps, &c. that their crie was heard to the long Ayre beyonde Charing crosse, which made the lords astonished. About five of the clocke at night the said duke landed at the Crane in the Wintrie, and so was had through Canblewaite strate to the tower.

The 7. of December, there was a muster before the king in St. James field beyond Charing crosse, the king sitting on horse-backe with his privie counsell about him. The 22. of January, Edward duke of Somerset was beheaded on the tower hill. The same morning early the constables of every warbe in London (according to a precept directed from the counsell to the Mayor) streightly charged every household of the same citie not to depart any of them out of their houses before ten of the clocke of that day, meaning thereby to restrain the great number of people, that otherwise were like to have bene at the said execution: notwithstanding by seven a clock the tower hill was covered with a great great multitude, repairing from all parts of the citie, as well about of the suburbs, and before 8. of the clocke the duke was brought to the scaffold inclosed with the kings gard, the sheriffs officers, the wardens of the tower, & other with halbaros: the duke being ready to have ben executed, suddenly the people were driven into a great feare, & so no more knowing the cause: wherefore I thinke it good to write what I saw concerning that matter.

with small cause

The people of a certaine hamlet, which were warned to be there by 7. of the clocke to give their attendance on the lieutenant, now came through the porters: & perceiving the duke to be already on the scaffold, the foremost began to run, crying to their followes to followe fast after, which suddennes of these men being weaponed with bills and halbaros their running, caused the people which first saw them, to thinke some power had come to have caused the duke from execution, and therefore to crie away, away, whereupon the people ran one way some another, many fell into the tower ditch, and they which carried thought forkepaten had been brought, some said it thundered, some that a great rumbling was in the earth under them, some that the ground moved, but there was no such matter, more than the trampling of their feete, which made some noise.

By this Booke of Common praiser all carps and bestments were forbidden through England, and prebends of Pauls left off their hoods, the bishoppes left their crosses, &c. as by an act of parliament more at large is set out.

through the cite with a great company of young lordes and gentlemen to the house of sir George Barne lord mayor, where he with the chiefe of his company dined, and after had a great banquet, and at his departure, the lord mayor gave him a sharding cap with a cover of silver and gilt, of the value of ten pounds for a reward, and also set a hogthead of wine and a barrell of beer at his gate for his traine that followed him, the residue of his gentlemen and servants dined at other aldermens houses, and with the thicrife, and so departed to the tower wharfe againe, and to the court by water, to the great commendation of the mayoꝝ and aldermen, and highly accepted of the king and counsell.

In the month of January, the king fell sicke of a cough at White hall, which grievously encreased, and at the last, ended in a consumption of the lungs.

The first of March began a parliament at Westmynster, and all the lordes spirituall and tempozall assembled that date in the White hall in their robes, where a sermon was preached in the kings chapel by doctor Ridley bishop of London, and his maiesty with divers lordes received the communion. Which being done, the king with the lordes in order, went into the kings great chamber on the kings stee, which that day was prepared for the lordes house: the king sitting under his cloth of estate, and all the lordes in their degrees, the bishop of Ely doctor Godrike lord Chancellor, made a proposition for the king: which being ended, the lordes departed. This was done, because the king was sickely.

The mayroz after, the burgesse sat in the common house at Westmynster, and chose for their speaker master Diar, one of the late made sergeants at the law.

The 3. of March being good friday, the parliament brake up, and was clerly dissolved at the kings palace of White hall at 7. of the clocke at night.

The 3. of Aprill, being monday after Easter day, the children of Chylles hospitall in London came from thence through the cite to the sermon kept at St. Maris spittle, all clothed in plonket gasses and red caps, and the maiden children in the same hysers, with her chylles on their heads, all which with their matrones and other governess were there placed on a scaffold of eight stages, and there sat the same time, which was a goodly shew.

The tenth of Aprill, the lord mayoꝝ of London was sent for to the court at White hall, and there at that time the king made him give to him, to the commonalties and citizens, for to be a hospice house for the poore and idle persons of the Cite of London, by place of Wyndehell, and seven hundred marks land of the Swanow rents, with all the beds, bedding, and other furniture of the hospitall of the Swanow, towards the maintenance of the said twelve houses of Wyndehell. And the hospitall of Saint Thomas in Southwiche, king Edward confirmed the said gift, by his charter dated the six and twentieth of June next following.

The 11. of Aprill, the lord mayoꝝ was presented to the king in his palace of White hall at Westmynster, and was made knight by his maiesty, and the same day the king removed in the afternone to Wyndehell.

In this month of Aprill and in May, commissioners were directed through England,

England, for all the church goods remaining in cathedrall and parish churches, that is to say, towels of golde and silver, crosses, candlesticks, censors, chalices, and all other such like, with their ready money, to be delivered to the master of the kings jewels in the tower of London, all coopes and vestments of cloth of gold, cloth of tisse, and silver, to the master of the kings wardrobe in London, the other coopes, vestments, and ornaments to be sold, and the more to be delivered to the kings treasurer sir Edmond Peckham knight, reserving to every church one chalice or cup, with table clothes for the communion bazed at the discretion of the commissioners, which were for London the lordes mayoꝝ, the bishop, the lord chiefe Justice, with other.

The 20. of May, by the encouragement of one Sebastian Cabot, thre great ships wel furnished were set forth for the adventure of the unknowne boiage to Polconia, and other east partes by the north seas, divers merchants and other being free of that boiage, yelved towards the charges of the same five and twenty pounds apiece. Sir George Barnes and sir William Garrard being the principall doers therein.

About the same time two other ships were sent to take adventures southwardes.

Whiles king Edward lay dangerously sicke, lord Gilford the duke of Northumberland fourth son, married lady Jane the duke of Suffolks daughter, whose mother being then alive, was daughter to Mary king Henries sister, which was first married to the French king, and after to Charles duke of Suffolke. Also the earle of Pembrokes eldest son married lady Katherine, the said dukes second daughter. And Martin Keies gentleman porter, married Mary the third daughter of the duke of Suffolke. And the Earle of Huntingtons son called lord Hastings, married Katherine youngest daughter to the duke of Northumberland.

King Edward being about the age of 16. yeres ended his life at Wyndehell, on the first of July, when he had reigned six yeres, five moneths, and eode daies, and was buried at Westmynster. He was in this his youth a prince of such towardnes in vertue, learning, and all godly gifts, as seldom hath ben seen the like.

The 8. of July, the lord mayoꝝ of London was sent for to the court then at Wyndehell, to bring with him six aldermen, as many merchants of the staple, and as many merchant adventurers, unto whom by the counsell was secretly declared the death of king Edward, and also how he had obtained for the succession of the crowne by his letters pattents, to the which they were sworn, and charged to keepe it secret.

The 10. of July in the afternone about 3. of the clocke, lady Jane daughter to Francis Dutchesse of Suffolke, (which lady Jane was married to the lord Gilford Dudley, fourth sonne to the duke of Northumberland) was conveyed by water to the tower of London, and there received as Quene. After five of the clocke the same afternone, was proclamation made of the death of king Edward the first, and how he had obtained by his letters pattents, bearing date the 21. of June last past, that the lady Jane (as is aforesaid) should

The 11. of July, Gilbert Poore brother to Ninon Saunders vintner, dwelling at St. Johns head within Ludgate, who was accused by the said Saunders his master, was set on the pillory in Cheape with both his ears nailed, and cleave cut off for words speaking at the time of the proclamation of Lacie Jane, at which execution was a Trumpet blowne, and a Herald in his coat of armes read his offence, in presence of William Garrard one of the Sheriffs of London.

About 5. of the clocke the same day in the afternoon, Ninon Saunders master to the said Gilbert Poore and John Owen a gunmaker, and both gunners of the tower, comming from the tower of London by water in a Gallie, and shooting London bridge towards the Black friers, were drowned at St. Mary Lock, and the thirry men saued by their Dyes.

The 12. of July, the lady Mary sent to Norwich to be proclaimed there, which they refused to do, for that they were not certain of the kings death: but on the next day after, they did not only proclaim hir, but also sent hir men and munition to aid her.

The same twelfth of July, word was brought to the Councell, being then in the tower with the ladie Jane, that the ladie Mary, eldest daughter to king Henry the eight, was at Kenninghall castle in Norfolk, and with her the earle of North, Sir Thomas Wharton sonne to the Lord Wharton, Sir John Mordaunt sonne to the Lord Mordant, Sir William Drurie, Sir John Shelton, Sir Henry Beddingfield, Master Henry Ierningham, Master John Sulherde, Master Richard Freston, Master Sargeant Morgan, Mr. Clement Higham of Lincolnshire, and others others, and also that the Earle of Suffolk, and Master Henry Ratcliffe his sonne were comming towards her: whereupon by speedie counsell it was there concluded, that the Duke of Suffolk with certaine other noblemen, shoulde go towards the ladie Mary, to fetch hir up to the tower: this was first determined: but by night of the same date, the said volage of the Duke of Suffolk was cleane dissolved by the speciall meanes of the ladie Jane his daughter, who taking the matter beaullie, with weeping teares made request to the whole councell, that hir father might tarry at home in her company: whereupon the counsell perswaded with the duke of Northumberland, to take that volage upon him, saying, that no man was so fit therfore, because that he had atchieved the viduoy in Norfolk once already, and was therfore so feared, that none durst once lift up their weapon against him: besides that, he was the best man of war in the realme, as wel for the ordering of his campes and souldiers both in battell and in their tentes, as also by experience, knowledge & wisdome, he could both animate his army with witty perswasions, also pacify and lay his enemies pride with his stout courage, or else to distance them if need were, from their enterpryse. Finally said they, this is the short and long, the Quene will in no wise grant, that her father shall take it upon him: wherefore (quoth they) we think it good, if it may please your grace, if such in you to cume by the matter. Well (quoth the duke then) since ye think it good, I and mine will go, not doubting of your fidelity to the queens maiesty which I leave in your custody: So that night he sent for both lordes, knights and other that shoulde go with him, and caused all things to be prepared accordingly: then went the counsell in to the ladie Jane, and tolke her of their conclusion, who humbly thanked the Duke for respecting her father at home, and beseeched him to be his diligence, whereto he answered, that he would do what in him lay.

The morrow following, great preparation was made, the Duke early in the morning called for his owne harnesse, and sawe it made ready at Durham place, where he appointed all his retinue to mete.

The same day carts were laden with munition and artillery, and helde paces were set for ward.

The same forenoon the duke moued the counsell to send their powers after him, as it was before determined, he came to meet with him at Aylesmer, and they promised they would. He said further to some of them: My lordes, I and these other noble personages, with the whole army that now go forth, as well for the behalfe of you and yours, as for the establishing of the rightnes, shall not onelie adventure our bodies and liues amongst the bloudie strokes and cruel assaults of our aduersaries in the open fields, but also we do leave the conservation of our selues, children, and families at home here with you, as altogether committed to your truth and fidelities, whom, if we thought ye would through malice, conspiracy, or dissention leave us your friends in the byers and betraye us, wee could as well send by water forre and provide for our owne safegardes, as any of you, by betraying us, can doe for yours. But now by the onelie trust and faithfulness of your honours, whereof wee thinke our selues most assured, wee be hazard our liues, which trust and promise if ye shall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion, yet shall not God count you innocent of our bloods, neither acquite you of the sacred and holie oth of allegiance made freely by you to this vertuous lady the queenes highnesse, who by your and our enticement, is rather of force placed therein, than by her owne seeking and request. Consider also, that Gods cause, which is the preferment of his loyde, and feare of papistes entraunce, hath bene (as ye have here before alwaies saide) the originall ground whereupon ye even at the first motion granted your good willes and consentes therunto, as by your handes writing appeareth: and thinke not the contrarie, but if ye meane deceipt, though not forthwith, yet hereafter God will reuenge the same.

I can saie no more, but in this troublesome time with you to be constant heart, abandoning all malice, enuie, and private affections: and therewith, all the first course for the lordes came by, wherefore the duke shut by his talke with these wordes: I have not spoken to you in this sort upon any mistrust I have of your truthes, of which alwaies I have ever hitherto conceived a trusty confidence, but I have put you in remembrance thereof, what chance of variance shewer might grow amongst you in mine absence, and this I pray you, with mee not worle god speake in this journey, than ye would have to your selues. My lord, saith one of them, if ye mistrust any of us in this matter, your grace is far deceiued, for which of vs can wash his hands cleane the reof? and if we should thynke from you as from one that were culpable, which of vs can excuse him selfe to be guiltles? therefore here in your doubt is to far cast, I pray god it be (quoth the duke) let vs go to dinner: and so they ate down. After dinner the duke went in to the D. where his commission was by that time sealed, for his lieutenant Shippe of the army, and then toke his leave of hir, and so did certayne other lordes also.

When as the Duke came through the counsell chamber, hee tooke his leave of the Earle of Arundell, who prayed God bee with his grace, saying, he was forie it was not his chance to go with him, and beare him companie, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his bloude, even at his feete: then the earle of Arundell tooke Thomas Louell the Dukes boie by the hande, and saide, farewell gentle Thomas with all my heart. Then the duke, with the L. Sparques of Southampton, the L. Grey, and diuers other, tooke their barge, and went to Durham place, and to White hall, where that night they muſtered their men: and the next daie in the morning, the Duke departed with the number of 600. men, or thereabouts. And as they rode through Shorditch, saith the duke to the Lorde Grey, the people presse to see vs, but not one saith God speake vs.

The same day Sir John Gates and other went out after the duke.

By this time word was brought to the tower, that the Lady Mary was fled to flavingham castle in Suffolke; where the people of the countrey almost wholy resorted to hir; and that William L. Willndor, Sir Edward Hastings, Sir Edmond Pecham with others, were proclaiming Quene Mary in Buckinghamshire, Sir Io. Williams in Orfordshire, &c.

About this time, sixe Ships well manned, that were appointed to lie before Dartmouth, and to haue taken the ladie Mary if she had fled that waie, were by force of weather driven into the Hauen, where one Maister Ierningham was raising powder on the Ladie Maries behalfe, who hearing thereof, came thither, whereupon the captaine tooke a boate and went to the ships, but the Sailers and Souldiers asked Maister Ierningham what he would haue, and whether he would haue their Capitaines or no? and he said yea: marie said they, ye shall haue them, or we will throwe them into the bottome of the Sea, but the Captaine sayde forthwith, that they would serue Quene Marie willingly, and so brought forth their men, and conuersed with them their great Obdinance: Of the coming of these Shippes the ladie Marie was wonderfull ioyous; and afterwarde doubted little the Dukes puissance: but when newes thereof was brought to the Tower, each man there beganne to draw backward, and ouer that, word of a greater mischiese was brought to the Tower, that is to saie, that the shoblemens tenants refused to serue their lordes against quene Marie.

The duke thought long for his succors, and wrote somewhat sharpelie to the counsell at the tower in that behalfe, as well for lacke of men as of munition, but a slender answer had he againe: And from that time forward certayne of the counsell, to wit, the earle of Pembroke, and Sir Th. Cheyne lord Warren, and other, sought to get out of the Tower to consult in London, but coulde not yet.

The 16. of July, being Sunday, doctor Ridley Bishop of London, by commandement of the counsell preached at Pauls crosse, where he vehemently persuaded the people in the title of the ladie lane, late proclaimed D. and inuicled earnestly against the title of lady Marie, &c.

The same 16. of July, the lorde Treasurer was gone out of the tower to his house in London at night, and forthwith about 7. of the clocke the gates of the tower upon a sodain were shut vp, and the keyes born vp to the lady lane, which was for feare of some packing in the L. treasurer, but he was fetched again to the tower, about 12. of the clocke in the night.

The 18. day, the D. perceiving that the succors promised came not to him, and also receiuing from some of the counsell letters of discomfort, hee returned from Wury backe againe to Cambridge.

The 19. of Iulie, the Councell, partlie moued with the right of the ladie Maries cause, partlie considering, that the most of the realme was wholy bent on her side, chaunged their mindes, and assembled the themselves at Barnardes castle, where they communed with the Earle of Pembroke: And the earle of Shrewsburie, with Sir Iohn Maſon Clerk of the Councell, spake to the lorde Sparke secretly, that he with the Sheriffes and such other of the Aldermen with the Recorder, as he thought best, to maie him and the Councell at Barnardes Castle, within lesse than an houre: which they did, where the counsell declared to the lorde Sparke and his brethren, that hee and they must ride with them into Cheape to proclaim a newe Quene, which was the ladie Maries grace, daughter to King Henry the eight; and they riding from thence to Pauls Church-yarde, and into Cheape, the people were so assembled, that the Lordes coulde not ride by them to the Crosse, where Maister Gatar king at armes in his rich Coate of armes, with a Trumpet beeing readie, the Trumpet was sounded, and then they proclaimed the ladie Mary, Daughter to King Henry the eight and Quene Katherine, Quene of Englands, Fraunce, and Irelande, defender of the faith, &c. Which proclamation ended, the Lorde Sparke, and all the Counsell rode to Pauls Church, where the Canticle of Te Deum was sung. And the same night the Earle of Arundell, and the Lorde Pager, rode in posse to Quene Mary with little hoſte with them.

The 20. of Iulie, Iohn Duke of Northumberland, beeing then in Cambridge, and having sure knowledge, that the ladie Mary was by the nobilitie and others of the Counsell remaining at London proclaimed Quene; about five of the clocke the same night, he with such other of the nobilitie as were in his companie, came to the market crosse of the towne, and calling for an Herald, himselfe proclaimed quene Mary, and among other he thetore vpp his own cappe, and within an houre after he had letters from the counsell, by the handes of Richard Rose heratour: Dated at Westminster the 20. of Iune in the same following.

The rumour of these letters was no longer abroad, but every man departed. And shortly after, the Duke was arrested in the Kings Colledge by one master Slegge, Sergeant at armes. At the last letters were brought from the counsell at London, that all men should go each his way: Whereupon the Duke said to them that kept him, Ye doe me wrong to withtake my libertie, se ye not the Counsell letters without exception, that all men should go whither they would. At which wordes, they that kept him and the other noble men, let them at libertie, and so continued they to that night, inasmuch, that the Earle of Warwick was ready in the morning to have rode afoote, but then came the Earle of Arundale from the quene to the Duke into his Chamber, who went out to meete him, and as long as hee sawe the Earle of Arundale, hee fell on his knees: and desired him to be good to him, for the love of God, consider (saith he) I have done nothing but by the consents of you and all the whole Counsell: Wherupon the Earle of Arundale I am sent hither by the Quenes maieste, and in her name I doe arrest you: and I obeye my Lord (quoth he) I beseech you my Loide of Arundale (quoth the Duke) his merche towards mee, knowing the case as it is: my Loide (quoth the Earle) ye should have sought for merche sooner, I must doe according to my commandement, and therewith he committed the charge of him, and of other to the guard and gentlemen that were by.

On the next morrow, Edward Courtney was made marquisse of Excester, and the other fornamed prisoners pardoned, and discharged in the Quenes chamber.

Shortly after all the Bishops which had bene deposed in the time of king Edward the first, were restored to their Bishopricks, and the other which were placed in king Edwards time, removed: also all benefited men that were married, or would not forsake their opinion, were put out of their livings, & other known to be of the contrarie part, were set in the same, especially if any were allow, that had of late bene put out of the same, as bishop Daie of Chichester, Heah of Worcester, &c.

Sir Nicholas Hare master of the Kols, was made keeper of the great seale, for the space of a fortnight or thereabout.

The 9. of August, in the afternoon, the Quene helde an Obsequie in the tower for king Edward, the dirge being sung in Latin, and on the morrow a masse of Requiem, whereat the Quene with her ladies offered. The same daie the corpses of king Edward was buried at Westminster, the lord Treasurer, the Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Shrewsburie being chief mourners, with others other noble men and other. last, violently cast into the vile prison of the Sparthalsea, and there kept during the reigne of king Edward: which saying so offended some of the audience, that they breshing silence, said the bishop had preached abomination, or for some cries (meaning of the preacher) pulled him out, pulled him out, and some being nere the pulpit, began to cline, wherewith the preacher stepped backe, and one Maister Bradford a preacher of king Edwards time, stepped into his place, and gently perswaded the audience to quietnes and obedience, alledging S. Paul to the Romans: Let every soule submit himselfe to the authority of the higher powers, &c. Where thes master Bourne standing by Maister Bradford, one threw a dagger at him, which hit a flie post of the pulpit, and rebounded back again a great way, whereupon M. Bradford brake off his speech, and forced himselfe with the helpe of Jo. Rogers another preacher, to converse M. Bourne out of the audience, which with great labor they brought into Pauls churche.

The 18. of August, John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, William Parre Marques of Northampton, and John earle of Warwicke son and heire to the duke, were arraigned at Westminster hall, before Thomas D. of Norfolkke, high steward of England, where the duke of Northumberland with great reverence to wards the iudges, protested his faith and alleageance to the queen, whome he confessed greedously to have offended, and said, that he meant not to speake any thing in defence of his fact, but requested to understande the opinion of the court in two points. First, whether a man doing any act by authority of the princes counsell and by warrant of the great seale of England, and doing nothing without the same, might bee charged with treason for any thing which he might do by warrant thereof. Secondly, whether any such persons as were equally culpable in that crime, and those, by whose letters and commandments he was directed in all his doings, might be his iudges, or passe upon his triall as his Judges;

Whereunto was answered, that as concerning the first, the great Seale (which he said for his warrant) was not the seale of the lawfull Quene of the realm, nor passed by authority, but the seale of an usurper, and therefore could bee no warrant to him. As to the second, it was alledged, that if any were deeply to be touched in that case as himselfe, yet so long as no attainder were of record against them, they were neuertheless persons able in law to passe by any trial, and not to be chalenged therefore, but at the princes pleasure. After which answer, the Duke used set words, but confessed the indictment; by whose example the other prisoners arraigned with him did the like, and thereupon had judgement.

And when judgement was given the duke said, I beseech you my lordes, all to be humble suiters to the M. maiestie, and to grant mee foure requestes, which are these. First, that I mite have that death which noble men have had in times past, and not the other. Secondlie, that her Maiestie will bee gracious to my children, which mite herre after do good service, considering, that they went by my commandment, who am their father, and not of their own free willes. Thirdly, that I mite have appointed to mee some learned man for the instruction and quiet of my conscience. And fourthlie, that they both send two of the counsell, to commune with mee, to whome I will declare such matters as shall be expedient for her and the common weale: and thus I beseech you all to pray for me.

On the nineteenth of August were arraigned at Westminster, Sir John Gates, Sir Henry Gates, Sir Andrew Dudley, and Sir Thomas Palmer, where without any quest they pleaded guiltie, and submitted themselves to the Queenes mercie, and so hadde iudgement.

The twentieth of August, Doctor Watson, Chaplaine to the Bpghope of Winchester preached at Pauls Crosse, by the Queenes appointment, and for feare of the like tumult, as had beene the Sundae last past, certain lordes of the Counsell repaired to the Sermon, as the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privie Seale, the Earle of Bedforde, the Earle of Pembroke, the Lord Wentworth, the Lord Rich, and Sir Henrie Gernigam capitaine of the garde, with 200. of the guard, which stood about the Preacher with halberts. Also the spallio had warned the companies of the cite to be present in their liveries, which was well accepted of the Queenes counsell, and the Sermon was quietlie ended.

The twentieth two of August, Sir John Gage Lieutenant of the Tower, delivered to the Sheriffes of London, by Indenture these prisoners following: first Sir John Gates was brought forth, and set at the Garden Gate, then the Duke of Northumberlande, was likewise brought forth, and Sir Thomas Palmer after him: When the Duke and Sir John Gates mette, Sir John saith the Duke, God haue mercie vpon vs, for this date shall ende both our liues, and I praye you forgive me whatsoever I haue offended, and I forgive you with all my heart, although you and your counsell was a great occasion hereof: Well my Lord quoth Sir John Gates, I forgive you, as I would be forgiven, and yet you and your authoritie was the originall cause of all together, but the Lord pardon you, and I praye you forgive me. So either making obelance to other, the Duke proceeded, and when he came vpon the Scaffold, hee putting off his Cowne of Crane coloured Damaskie, leaped vpon the Cast Ileale, and saide to the people: God people, all you that be here present to see mee die, though my death be odious, and horrible to the flesh, yet I praye you iudge the best in Gods workes, for hee doth all for the best. And as for mee, I am a wretched sinner, and haue deserved to die, and most iustlie am condemned to die by lawe. And yet this Acte wherof I die, was not altogether of mee (as it is thought) but I was procured and induced thereunto by other, I was, I saie induced thereunto by other: Howbeit, God for bidde that I shoulde name any man vnto you, I will name no man vnto you, and therefore I beseech you looke not for it. I for my part forgive all men, and praye God also to forgive them. And if I haue offended any of you heere, I praye you and all the worlde to forgive mee; and most chiefele I desire forgiveness of the queenes highnesse, whome I haue most grievously offended. And I praye you all to witness with mee, that I depart in perfect loue and charitie with all the worlde, and that you will assist me with your prayers at the houre of death. The rest of his speech almost in euery point, was the like as hee hadde saide in the Chappell of the Tower, in the daie before, saying, when hee hadde made confession of his beleeve, hee hadde the wordes. And heere I doe protest vnto you good people, moste earnestlie, even from the bottome of my heart, that this which I haue spoken is of my selfe, not being required nor moued thereunto by any man, nor for any flatterie, or hope of life, and I take witness of my Lord of Worcester heere, mine olde friende and Chollie father, that hee founde mee in this minde and opinion, when hee came to mee; but I haue declared this onelie vpon mine owne minde and affection, and for the zeale and loue that I beare to my natural Countrye. I coulde good people heare me more euen by experience that I haue of this euill that is happened to this Realme by these occasions, but you knowe I haue another thing to doe, whereunto I must prepare mee, for the time draweth awaie. And now I beseech the Queenes highnesse to forgive mee mine offences against her Maestie, wherof I haue a singular hope, for as much, as she hath already extended her goodnesse and clemencie so farre vpon mee, that where as she might for ought, without iudgement or any further tryall, haue put mee to most vile and cruell death, by hanging, drawing, and quartering, for as much as I was in the field in armes against her highnesse, her Maestie neuertheless of her most mercifull goodness spared me to be brought to my iudgement, and to haue my triall by law, where I was most iustlie and tooorthie condemned. And her highnesse hath now also extended her mercie and clemencie vpon mee, for the manner and kinde of my death. And therefore my hope is, that her grace of her goodnesse will remit all the rest of her indignation and displeasure towarde mee, which I beseech you all most heartilie to praye for, and that it maie please God long to preserve her Maestie to raighe ouer you in much honour and felicitie. After hee had thus spoken he kneeled downe, saying to them that were about him: I beseech you all to beare me witness that I die in the true Catholike faith, and then saide the Psalmes of Miserere and De profundis, his Tear noster, and five of the first Verses of the Psalm, In te Domine speravi, ending with this verse: Into thy handes O Lord I commend my spirit; and when hee had thus finished his prayers, the executioner asked him forgiveness, to whome hee sayde: I forgive thee with all my heart, and doe thy parte without feare. And bowing towarde the Blocke, hee saide, I haue deserved a thousand deaths, layde his heade vpon the Blocke and so was beheaded. Whose bodie with the heade was buried in the Tower, by the bodie of Edward late Duke of Somerset, so that there lieth before the high Altar, in St. Peters church two dukes, betwene two queenes, to wit, the duke of Somerset, and the duke of Northumberland, betwene queene Anne, and queene Katherine, all foure beheaded.

At the same time and place also, was likewise beheaded Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, which Sir John Gates in that place dyed the 10. like wordes. My comming hither this daie good people is to die, wherof I assure you all I am well tooorthie: for I haue liued as viciouslie and wickedlie all the dates of my life as any man hath don in the world: I was the greatest reader of scripture that might be of a man of my degree: And a worse follower thereof not living: for I did not read to the intent to be edified thereby, nor to seeke the glory of God: but contrariwise, arrogantly, to be seditions, and to dispute thereof, and p[er]suade to interpret it after my owne h[um]aine and affection. Wherefore good people I exhort you all to beware howe, and after what sort you come to read Gods holie word: for it is not a trifle, or playing game to deale with Gods holie mysteries: stand not too much in your owne conceits, for like as the bee of one flower doth gather honie, and the spider poison of the same, even so you, except you humble submit your selues to God, and ch[ri]stianitie shall be the same to the intent to be edified thereby, it is to you as poison, and worse: and it were better for to let it alone. And then after hee had asked the Quene's highnes forgiveness, and all the world; he desired the people of the charitie to pray unto God with him for remission of his sinnes, and then refusing the herchefe laide downe his heade, which was stricken off at thre blowes. Sir Thomas Palmer, as soone as he came to the scaffold, take every man by the hand, and desired them to pray for him; then putting off his gown, hee leaned upon the Cast Kyele, and saide these wordes in effect: My Masters (quoth hee) God saue you all: it is not unknowne unto you wherefore I come hither, which I haue toochille well deserved at Gods handes, for I know it to be his dutie or dinance, by this meanes to call mee to his merite, and to teach mee to know my selfe, what I am, and whereunto we are all labored: I thanke his mercifull goodnes, for he hath caused me to learne more in one little darke corner in ponder Tower, than ever I learned by any traueil in so many places as I haue bin, for there (I say) I haue seen God, what he is, how vnscarceable his wonderous workes are, and how infinit his mercies be; I haue seene here my selfe througly, and what I am, nothing but a lump of sin, earth, dust, and of all vilenes most vilest; I haue seene there and knowe what the world is, how vaine, deceitfull, transitorie, and th[us]: it is, how wicked and wretched the workes thereof are in the sight of Gods maiesty, how he neither regardeth the manaces of the proud men and mighty ones, neither despiseth the humblenes of the poore and lowly which are in the same world. If I might, I haue seene there what death is, how nere hanging ouer euery mans head, and yet how vncertaine the time, and how unknowne to all men, and how little it is to be feared; and should I feare death: or be sad therefore? haue I not seene too die before mine eyes? Yea, and with in the hearing of mine eares? No, neither the sprinkling of the blood, or the shedding thereof, nor the bloody death selfe shall make me afraid: and now taking my leaue to the same, I pray you all to pray for me: come on good fellows (quoth he) art thou hee that must be the doer: I forgive thee with all my hart, and then kneeling downe, laying his head on the blocke, said, I will see how meet the blocke is for my necke, I pray thee strike not yet, for I haue a few prayers to saie, and that done, strike on Gods name, good leaue haue thou, his prayers ended, and desiring each man to pray for him, hee laid downe his heade againe, and so the executioner take it from him at one stroke.

The 27. of September, Quene Mary came to the tower by water, accompanied with the Lady Elizabeth her sister, and other ladies, before whose arrival was shot a great peale of guns.

Coronation.

The last of September, Quene Mary rode through the Citie of London towards Westminster, sitting in a chariot of cloth of tinsse drawn with fire horses, all trapped with the like cloth of tinsse. Shee sate in a gowne of purple belnet furred with powdered ermine, hanging on her head a caule of cloth of tinsell, beset with pearle and stone, and about the same upon her head, a round circlet of gold beset so richly with precious stones, that the value thereof was inestimable, the same caule and circlet being so masse and ponderous, that shee was faine to beare by her head with her hand, and the canopy was borne ouer her chariot. Before her rode a number of gentlemen and knights, then iudges, then doctors, then bishops, then lords, then the council: after whom followed the knights of the Bath, thirtene in number, in the first robes, the bishop of Winchester lord Chancelor, and the marquesse of Winchester lord high treasurer, next came the duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earle of Arundell, who bare the sword before her, the mayor of London in a gowne of crimson belnet bare the scepter of gold, &c. after the Quene's chariot, sir Edward Hastings led her horse in his hand: then came an other chariot, having a covering all of cloth of siluer all white, and fire horses trapped with the like, therein sate the lady Elizabeth and the lady Anne of Cleue, then Ladies and Gentlewomen riding on horses trapped with red belnet, and their gownes and kirtles likewise of red belnet: after them followed two other chariots covered covered with red saltire, and the horses betrapped with the same, and certaine gentlewomen betwixe every of the saide chariots riding in crimosin sattin, their horses betrapped with the same, the number of the gentlewomen riding were 46. besides them in the chariots. At Church Lane was a costly pageant made by the Gentry: at Grace-church corner there was another pageant made by the Gentry. At the upper end of Grace street there was an other pageant made by the Florentines verie high, on the top whereof there stood foure pictures, and in the midst of them and most highest, there stood an angel all in graine, with a trumpet in his hand, and when the trumpetter who stood secretly in the pageant did sound his trumpet, the angel did put his trumpet to his mouth, as though it had bene the same that had sounded, to the great marvelling of many ignorant persons: this pageant was made with three thousand farces or gates, &c. The conduit in Cornhill ran wine, and beneath the conduit a pageant made at the charges of the cite, and another at the great conduit in Cheape, and a fontaine by it running wine. The standard in Cheape new painted, with the waites of the Cite aloft thereof playing. The crosse in Cheape new washed and burnished. One other pageant at the little conduit in Cheape next to Paules made by the Cite, where the aldermen stood: and when the Quene came against them, the Recorder made a short proposition to her, and then the chamberlaine presented to her in the name of the maior and the city, a purse of cloth of gold, and 1000. marks of gold in it: then the robe forth, and in Paules churchyard against the shole, one Master Haywood sate in a pageant under a vine, and made to her an oration in Latine and English. When was there one Peter a Dutch man stood on the weathercocke of Paules steeple, holding a streamer in his hand of five yardes long, and waving thereof, he stood sometime on the one cite, and shoke the other, and then kneled on his knees, to the great marvell of all people. He had made two scaffoldes under him, one above the crosse, having toches and streamers set on it, and one other over the hole of the crosse, likewise set with streamers and toches, which could not burne the winde was so great: the said Peter had sixteen pound thirte shillings and foure pence given him by the cite for his costs and paines, and all his stuffe. When was there a pageant made against the deane of Paules gate, where the questers of Paules played on viols, and song. Ludgate was newly repaired, painted, and richly hangged, with minstrels playing and singing there: then was there another pageant at the conduit in Fleet street, and the Temple barr was newly painted and hangged. And thus she passed to White hall at Westminster, where she took her leave of the lord maior, giving him great thanks for his paines, and the Cite for their cost. On the morrow, which was the first daie of October: the Quene went by water to the olde palace, and there remained till about eleven of the clocke, and then went on foote upon blew cloth, being raised on either side unto Saint Peters Church, where she was solemnly crowned and annointed by the Bishop of Winchester, which coronation and other ceremonies and solemnities then used according to the olde custome, was not fully ended till it was nigh foure of the clocke at night that she returned turned from the Church, before whom was then borne three crowns shadded, and one naked. The great service that day done in Westminster hall at dinner by divers noble men, would aske long time to write. The lord maior of London and twelve citizens kept the high cupbord of plate as builders, and the Quene gave to the Maior for his fee a cup of golde with a cover waiping sixteen ounces.

The 5. of October, the parliament began at Westminster, Sir John Yorke, Parliament. and Henry Dudley, were deliuered out of the Tower.

The 25 day of October, the Barge of Charlesende, a Catch running upon water, was overturned, and foureteen persons drowned, and sixteen saved by swimming.

Cardinall Poole, who had long time bene forth from this realme, and now in great estimation in the court of Rome, was sent for by Quene Mary to returne into his countrey of England.

The 2. of November, the weathercocke of Paules was set up, which cocke weighed forty pound, his length from the bill to the taile was foure fote, and his breadth over the wings three fote and a halfe, the which cocke being of copper, was our gilt.

The thirtieth of November, Doctor Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Ladie Jane that was before proclaimed Quene, and the lord Guilford her husband, and the lord Ambrose Dudley, were arraigned at the Guild hall of London, and condemned of treason: Sir Henry Gates was deliuered out of the Tower.

The Parliament was dissolved on the first of December. And on the one and twentieth of December, began throughout England the Church service to be done in Latine, as was enacted by the last Parliament, and as the same had ben left in the last yeere of King Henry the eighth. The Lady Jane had the liberty of the Tower, to walke in the Quenes Garden and on the hill. The lord Ambrose Dudley, and the lord Guilford Dudley, had the liberties of the ports where they were lodged: the Marquesse of Northampton had his pardon and was deliuered.

In the beginning of the month of January, the Emperour sent a noble man called Edmon I., and certaine other Ambassadors into England to conclude a marriage betwene King Philip his son, and Quene Mary of England.

The 14. of January, Doctor Stephen Gardener bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor of England, in the chamber of presence at Westminster, made to the Lords, Nobility, and Gentlemen, an oration very eloquent, wherein he declared that the Quenes State was partly for unity, and other weighty considerations had, after much suite on the Emperours and Prince of Spaines behalfs made, determined by the consent of the Counsell and Nobility, to match her selfe with the saide Prince in most goodly and lawfull matrimony: and declared further, that she should have for her dowry 30000. ducckets by the yeere, with all the low-countrey of Flanders, and that the issue (if there happened any) betwene them two lawfully begotten, should be heirs as well to the Kingdome of Spaine, as also to the said low-countrey. He said therefore that they were all bound to thank God that so noble, worthy, and famous a Prince would vouchsafe so to humble himselfe, as in this marriage to take upon him rather as a subject, than other wise, for the Queene and her counsell should rule all things as she did before, and that there should be of the council no stranger, neither to haue the custody of any forts, or Castles, nor haue any rule or office in the quenes house, or else where in all England, with diuers other articles there by him rehearsed, whereof he said the quens pleasure and request was, that like good subiects for her sake, they would most lovingly receiue him with reuerence, loy and hono.

The next day, the Lord maior of London, with his brethren the aldermen, were sent for to the court, and to bring with them fortie of the head commons of the citie, vnto whom before the counsell, the lord chancelor made the like oration, desiring them to behaue themselves like good subiects with all humbles and reioycing.

Robert Dudley sonne to the late duke of Northumberland, was arraigned at the Guild hall of London of high treason, he confessed the indictment, and had iudgement giuen by the earle of Sussex, to be drawne, hanged, botwelled and quartered.

Within five daies after, there was worde brought to the court, how that Sir Peter Carow, Sir Gawine Carow, Sir Thomas Deny with diuers other, were by in Denonshire, in the resisting of the king of Spaines comming thither, and that they had taken the city of Excester, and castle there into their custody.

About the thre and twentieth of iune and twentieth day of January, Sir James a Crofts departed from London toward Wales, as it was thought, to haue raised power there.

Conspiracy

The purpose of the Quenes marriage was so grieuously taken of diuers men, that for this & for religion, they in such sort conspired against the quene, that if the matter had not broken out before the time by them appointed, men thought it would haue brought much trouble and danger.

Commotion in went by Sir
Thom. Wyatt

The 25. of January, Sir John Gage lord Chamberlaine, certified the lord maior of London, that Sir Thomas Wyatt with certaine other rebels, were by in Kent about Spaldeshone, whereupon great watch was kept, and that night the lord maior rode about to peruse the same, and euery night after two aldermen did the like: in the day time the gates of the Citie were warded by substantiall citizens.

The 26. day of January was brought into the tower as prisoners, the lord marquess of Northampton, Sir Edward Warner, and other. And the same night there went out certaine of the gard, and other against the Kentish men. And the city of London began to be straightly kept and watched by harnessed men, by the appointment of the lord treasurer, who had the day before sent for the lord maior and aldermen, and giuen them so in charge for safety of the city. And the same day, or rather on the day before, the duke of Norfolk with his power went dooene toward Grauesend.

About the which time the lord Burgaunoy, by chance, encountered with Sir Henry ile (one of Sir Thomas Wyatts faction) and due 2. or 3. of his men, he saying with the rest of his company to Wyatts camp.

The 27. of January, the Lord Treasurer came to the Exchange hall from the counsell, to request the citizens to prepare 500. footemen well harnessed to go against Wyatt, which was granted and made ready the same night, and on the morrow were delivered to their captaines, and sent to Grauesend by water.

The 29. of January, the D. of Northfolke lieutenant of the army, and with him the earle of Arundell, Sir Henry Ierningham captain of the garde, with a great number of the guard, and other soldiers, and the captaine and soldiers that were sent from London, minded to assault Rochester Castle, where Wyatt and his people late, so that vpon Spaldeshone they were set in arraie to wardes Rochester brydge, which was kept by Wyatts companie, and furnished with 3. or 4. double cannons: but before the setting forward of these men, the D. sent master Nory an Herault vnto Rochester, with the D. proclamation to all such as would desist from their purpose, who comming to the brydge, would haue gone through into the citie, but they that kept the brydge would not suffer him till that the captaine came, who at the last granted the same to be read in the citie, but holding a dag against him, cried, speake soft, lie, or els they would shot him through, so that they would not suffer the people to be as the D. proclamation: which being ended, each man cried they had don nothing therefore they should need any pardon, and in that quarrel which they had taken in hand, they would lie and die: nevertheless, at the last Sir George Harpar receiued the pardon outwardly, and being receiued under the D. of Northfolkes protection, came on forward against the Kentishmen, and euen as the companie were set in a readines, and marched forward toward the brydge, Bret being captaine of the 500. Londoners, of which the more parte were in the foreward, turned himselfe about, and drawing out his sword, saide these or like words: spakkers woe go about to fight against our nation Countrymen of England and our friends, in a quarrel vnrighful, partly wicked, for they, considering the great miseries which are like to fall vpon vs, if we shall be vnder the rule of the proude Spaniards or strangers, are here assembled to make resistance of the same, for the avoiding of so great inconveniences lieth to fight, not onely vpon themselves, but on euery of vs of the whole realme, therefore I thinke no English hart ought to say against them, much lesse by fighting to withstande them: therefore I and others (meaning such as were in that ranke with him) will spend our blood in the quarrel of this worthy captaine Sir Wyatt, and other gentlemen here assembled: which wordes once pronounced, each man turned their ordinance against their soldiers, and thereupon cried: a Wyatt, a Wyatt, of which so daime noise, the Duke, the captaine of the guard and other, beinge abashed, fled forthwith: immediately he came in master Wyatt and his companie on horsebacke, rushing in amongst as well the guard as the Londoners, and said: so muite as will come and tary with vs shall be welcome, and so muite as will depart, god leaue take they, and so all the Londoners, part of the gard, and more than the parts of the citie, went to the campe of the Kentishmen, where they still remained, and thus distressed, the Duke lost eight hundred of his men, with all other ordinance and ordinance, and himselfe with fewe other hardly escaped.

The last of January, Wyat and his compaignie came to Wertsford, and the next day they came full and whole to Wrentwith and Depeford, where they remained thurday, friday, and the forenone of satterday. On the friday, which was Candlemas day, the most part of the householders of London, with the maiors and aldermen were in harness, yea this daie and other daies the iustices, sergeants at the law, and other lawyers in Westminster hall, pleased in harness.

In this meane time, to wit, on the 25 of January, Henry duke of Suffolke, father to the lady Iane, fleeing into Leicestershire and Cheshire with the lord John Grey, and the lord Leonard Grey and a small compaignie in divers places as he went made proclamation against the queenes marriage with the prince of Spaine, &c. but the people inclined not to him.

The first day of february, proclamation was made at London, that the duke of Suffolke was discomfited, and fled with his two brethren. And also that sir Peter Carow, with his uncle sir Gawine Carow and Gibbes, were fled into France: and further, that the queene did pardon the whole compaignie of the Gentlemen, except Wyat, Harpar, Rudstone, and Isely, and that whosoever could take sir Thomas Wyat, except the false foure persons, should haue an hundred pound lardes to him and his heires for ever.

Wyat came to the Guild hall in London.

The same day in the afternoon being Candlemas euen, the commons of the city assembled in their liberties at the Guild hall, whither the queene with her boyes and ladies came riding from Westminster, and there after behoement words against Wyat, declared, that she meant not other wise to marry than the counsell should thinke both honorable and commodious to the realm, and that she could continue unmarried, as she had done the greatest part of her age, and therefore wished the men truly to assist her, in repressing such as contrary to their parties rebelled. When she had done, understanding that many in London did favour Wyats part, she appointed lord William Howard lieutenant of the citie, and the earle of Pembroke generall of the fleete, which both prepared all things necessary for their purpose.

Wyat came to Southwarke.

In the meane season, to wit, the third daie of february, about thre of the clocke in the afternoon, sir Thomas Wyat and the Gentlemen marched forward from Depeford towards London with five hundred, being by estimation about two thousand, which they comming so close as it was perceived, there was shot off out of the white tower five or eight shot, but missed them, sometime shooting over, and sometime shot. After knowledge thereof once had in London, forthwith the water bridge was entte downe, and the bridge gates shut: The maiors and sherifes harnesses, commanded each man to shut in their shops and windows, and to be readie harnesses at their doores, what chance sooner might happen. By this time was Wyat entred into Kent street, and so by saint Georges Church into Southwarke. Himselfe, and part of his compaignie came in good array downe Warmondsey strate, and they were suffered peaceably to enter Southwarke without repaire, or any stroke stricken, either by the inhabitants, or of any other: yet was there many men of the countrey in the fynes, called and brought in by the lord Wyat, and after, to have gone against the said VVyar, but they all agreed themselves to the Gentlemen, and the inhabitants with their best entertained them. Immediately upon the said VVvars comming, he made proclamation, that no souldier should take any thing, but that he should pay for it, and that his comming was to redde the Spanish king. And standing forth with his uers of his compaignie being Gentlemen (as they saide) went to the Tower place, made haucke of the Bishops goods, (he being lord Chancellor) not onely of his vituals, whereof there was plentie, but whatsoeuer else, not heauing so much as one loche of a doge, but the same was taken off and carried away, nor a booke in his gallerie or librarie burnt, or rent into pieces, so that men might haue gone by to the knes in leanes of bookes, cut out and spoyle under fate.

At the bridge foote he laid two pieces of ordinance, and began a great trench betwene the bridge and him. He laid one other piece of ordinance at saint Georges, and one going into Warmondsey strate, and an other towards the Bishop of Winchester's house.

On saturdaye the first of february sir Thomas VVyar removed out of Southwarke, toward Kingston bridge, which was done upon this occasion. The night before his departing out of Southwarke, by chance as one of the lieutenants men of the Tower named Thomas Menches, rowed with a sculler over against the Bishop of Winchester's place, there was a waterman of the Tower staires, desired the said lieutenants man to take him in, who did so, which being espied of VVvars men, seven of them with barguebois, called to them to land againe, but they would not, whereupon each man discharged their piece, and killed the said waterman, which forthwith falling downe dead, the sculler with much paine rowed through the bridge to the tower wharfe with the lieutenants man, and the dead man in his boate, which thing was no longer knowne to the lieutenant, but that euen the same night, and the next morning, he bent seauen great pieces of ordinance shurling, and demie-cannons full against the foote of the bridge, and against Southwarke, and the two chaples of saint Oliues, and saint Mary. Besides, he shot all the pieces on the white Tower, one colouring on the black Tower, and thre fauconets on the water-gate: which so done as the inhabitants of Southwarke understood, certaine bold men & women came to VVyar in most lamentable wise, saying, Sir, we are all like to be bitterly budging and distressed for your sake, our houses shall by and by be shewen downe upon our heads, to the bitter spoile of this borough, with the shot of the Tower, all ready bent and charged towarde us, for the love of God therefore take pittie upon us: at which wordes, he being partly abashed stayed a while, and then saide: I praie you my friends be content a while, and I will some ease give you of this mischiefe, for God forbid that you, or the least here should be killed or hurt in my behalfe. And so in most speeche manner he marched away. As he marched towarde Kingstone, he met, by chance a merchant named Christopher Dorell, whom he called, saying, Cousin Dorell, I praie you commend certaine purposed, and forced with shot to shut the Court Gates against them. In this repulse the said lord chamberlain and others were so amazed, that many cried treason in the court, and had thought that the Earle of Pembroke, who was assaulting the taile of his enemies, hadde gone to Wyat, taking his part against the Queene: there was running and crying out of Ladies and Gentlewomen, shutting of doores and windows, and such a shouting and noise, as was wonderfull to heare. Wyat with his men marched still forward all along to Temple bar, and so through Fleetstrate till hee came to the Bell Sausage an faine high unto Ludgate, without resistance, his men going not in any good order or array. It is saide, that at Strand, certaine of the Lordes treasurers band, to the number of three hundred men, whereof the lord Chiche Powlett his sonne was captaine, met them, and so going on the one side, passed by them on the other side, without any thing saying to them. Also this is more strange, the said Wyat and his company passed along by a great company of harnessed men which stood on both sides the strates, without any thing standing them. And as hee marched for ward through Fleetstrate most with their swordes drawn, some crying, Queene Mary hath granted our request, and given us pardon: other said, the Queene hath pardoned vs. This some of Wyatts men, some say it was Wyat himselfe, came curren to Ludgate and knooled, calling to come in, saying there was Wyat, whome the queene had granted to haue their request, but the lord William Howard stood at the gate, and saide, auaunt traitor, thou shalt not come in here: Wyat a while stood, and tested him vpon a stall ouer-against the Bell Sausage gate, and at the last seeing hee could not get into the citie, and being deceived of the aide hee hoped for, returned backe againe in arraye towarde Charing Crosse, and was neuer stopped till hee came at Temple barre, where certaine boilemen which came from the fildes, mette them in the face, and then beganne the fight againe, till Clarencius an Herault came and sayde to Maister Wyat: Sir, you were best by my counsell to yeelde, you see this bate is gone against you, and in resisting, you canne get no good, but see the death of all these your soldiers, to your great perill of soule: perchance you maye finde the Queens mercifull, and the rather, if ye shalnt to great bloodshed as is like here to be. VVyat here with being somewhat assented (although he saw his men bent to fight) said, Well, if I shall nowde yeelde, I will yeelde me to a gentleman, to whome Sir Maurice Berkeley came straight, and had him leape by behinde him, and an other toke Thomas Cobham and William Kneuet, and so carried them behinde them vpon their horses to the court, then was taking of men on all sides. It is saide, that in this conflict, one pikeman, setting his backe to the wall at Saint James, kept severall of his boilemen off him a great time, and at the last was slaine. The whole number on both sides slaine at this battell passed not fortye persons, as farre as coulde be learned by them that hit toke the fildes, but there were manie sore hurt. The noyse of women and children, when the conflict was at Charing Crosse, was so great, that it was heard to the toppe of the white tower, and also the great shot was well discerned there out of Saint James fildes: there stood vpon the leades the Marques of Hampton, Captaken.

Hampton, Sir Nicholas Poyntes, Sir Thomas Pope, Maister John Seider, and other.

About five of the clocke, Thomas Wyat, William Kneuet, Thomas Cobham, two brethren named Mancks, and Alexander Bret, were brought by Sir Henry Kermingham by water to the tower prisoners, where Sir Philip Denny received them at the bulwarke, and as Wyat passed by hee saide, go traitor, there was neuer such a traitor in England: to whome Sir Thomas Wyat turned and saide, I am no traitor, I woulde thou shouldest well knowe, thou art more traitor than I, it is not the pointe of an honest man to call mee so, and so went forth: when hee came to the tower gate, Sir Thomas Bridges lieutenant toke in through the wicket, first Manck and saide: Ah thou traitor, what hast thou and thy companie wrought? But hee holding bolone his head saide nothing: then came Thomas Kneuet, whome Maister Chamberlaine gentleman porter of the tower toke in: then came Alexander Bret, whome Sir Thomas Pope toke by the bolome, saying: Oh traitor, how couldest thou finde in thy heart to worke such a villanie, as to take wages, and being traitor ouer a bande of men, to fall to bet enemies, returning against her in battell? Bret answered, yea, I haue offended in that case; then came Thomas Cobham whome Sir Thomas Poyntes toke in, and saide, Alas maister Cobham, what wouldest thou to worke such treason? and hee answered, oh Sir, I was seduced. Then came in Sir Thomas Wyat, whome Sir John Bridges toke by the collar, and saide: Whon blame and unhappie traitor, howe couldest thou finde in thy heart to worke such detestable treason to the Queens spaciouse, who gaue thee thy life and being once already, although thou diddest before this time beare Armes in the fildes against her, and noise to yeelde her battell, to her marvellous troubles fright? If it were not (saith he) but that the law must passe vpon thee, I woulde sticke thee through with my dagger; to the which Wyat holding his armes vnder his side, and looking quernoulte with a grimme looke vpon the lieutenant, saide, it is no matter now, and so passed on. Thomas Wyat had on a shirt of maille, with sleeves very faire, thereon a velvet cascoche, and a pellow lace, with the windance of his dag hanging thereon, and a paire of bootes and spurs on his legs, and on his head a faire hat of velvet, with broad bone worke lace about it.

VVilliam Kneuet, Thomas Cobham, and Bret were the like apperelled.

On the morrow, and next day following were brought into the tower prisoners, George Cobham, Sir VVilliam Cobham, Anthony Kneuet, Hugh Booth, J. Vane, Robert Rudfords, Sir George Harpar, Edward VVyat, Edw. Fog, George Moore, and Curbert Vaughan; which Curbert being a verie handsome man, Sir Thomas Bridges at his entrie into the Tower, did wounde with a rapier him, calling him ranke traitor, and saide that hanging was too good for him: to whom this Vaughan answered with a stout courage saying; I pray God to sende you chaunce, and I would all men knewe it: I am as true a man to the queene and common wealth, as any man that I shall leaue behinde me, and my death, I care not for it.

The tenth of February, the Earle of Huntington, and other Gentlemen, and and to the number of 300. horsemen, brought into the Tower as prisoners the W. of Suffolke, and the L. John Grey his brother from Courtenay, where the W. had remained these daies after his taking in the house and custody of Christopher Warren alderman there.

The 11. day Sir Henry Illey, who had fled, was brought into the tower prisoner in an old fustee coat, and old paire of hose, all his apparel not worth 4 s. The same day came in two of the Culpeppers, one Cromer, and T. Rampton the Duke of Suffolks secretary.

The 12. of February being sponday, about tenne of the clocke, there went out of the tower to the scaffold on the tower hill, the L. Guilford Dudley, son to the W. of Northumberland, husband to the lady Jane Gray, daughter to the W. of Suffolke, who at his going out, took by the hands Sir Anthony Browne, M. John Throckmorton and many other gentlemen, praiesing them to pray for him: and without the bulwarke gate M. Thomas Offley one of the Sheriffs of London received him and brought him to the scaffold, where after a small declaration, he knelt down and said his praies, then holding up his eyes and hands to heaven, with teares, at the last he desired the people to pray for him, and after was beheaded: his body being laide in a car, and his head in a cloth, was brought into the chappell within the tower, where the lady Jane, whose lodging was in master Partridges house, did see his deade carcasle taken out of the car, as well as three bid for him before allue going to his death, a sight to his woofle than death.

By this time was there a scaffold made upon the greene, ouer against the white tower, for the lady Jane to die upon, who with her husband was appointed to have been put to death on the Friday before, but was staied till then: his lady being nothing at all abashed, neither with feare of her owne death, nor when approached, neither with the sight of the dead carcasle of her husband when he was brought into the chappell, came forth, the lieutenant leading her, with countenance nothing abashed, neither her eyes any thing moistened with teares (although her gentlewomen Elizabeth Tilney and mistress Helen Woon verduily wept) with a booke in her hand, wherein she praied until she came to the said scaffold, whereon when she was mounted, she was beheaded: whose deathes were the more hastened for feare of further troubles and str for her title, like as her father had attempted.

The same day was brought into the tower as prisoner by the lord chamberlaine and 200. of the gard, Edward Courtney earle of Devonshire, who as hee passed by the lieutenant, being asked the cause of his thither coming, answered, he would not accuse himselfe.

The 14. and 15. of February, about the number of 50. of Wyatts faction were hanged on 20. paire of gallows made for that purpose in diuers places about the citie.

The 17. of February was proclamation made, that all strangers should leaue the realme within foure and twentie daies next ensuing, upon paine of their goods to be confiscate, all free denizens, merchantes, and ambassadors excepted.

The same seventeenth daie of February the Duke of Suffolke was conducted to Westminster by the clearkie of cheeke and the guard, at his going out he went with a cheerefull and a verie froute countenance, but at his returne hee penitens and heaunte, desiring all men to praye for him, the Lord Courtney lying in the Bell tower saw both his going out and returning, hee seeing arraignes, and the earle of Arundell sitting upon him in iudgement, hee saide it was no treason for a peere of the realme, as he was, to raise his powder, and to make proclamation, onely to auoid strangers out of the realme, and the reason he asked the sergeants at law standing by the bar it were or no, but they would say nothing: then was it laid to his charge, hee mette with 200. men in armes, the Queenes lieutenant the earle of Huntingdon, which was treason against the Queene, forsomuch as the lieutenant representeth the prince; to the which he answered, that he knew not the said earle to be such a lieutenant, but quoth he, I met him indeed with 50. men or thereabouts, and would not haue shooke from him if I had had fewer, by which wordes hee was founde to be guilty of treason. Whereupon, he partly accused his brother the Lord Thomas, who had, as he said, perswaded him rather to fly into his country, than to abide, which it was to be feared, he should againe be committed to the tower, where as being in his country amongst his friends and tenants, who durst fetch him? Touching other articles laid to his charge he said he neuer knew of them, saying that one should say at his table once at supper, that he would undertake for need, only with 100. men to set the crowne upon Courtneys head, and so hee was condemned.

The 18. of February, Alexander Bret one of the Captaines of the Londoners that fled to Wyat, and 22. persons more of the Gentlemen, were delivered to the Sheriffe of Kent, to be executed in diuers places of Kent, but for the most part, they were all pardoned. This Bret going out of the tower embraced M. Chamberlaine the gentleman porter, & desired him to commend him to Sir T. VVyat, then praiesing al men to pray for him, he said, I am worthy of no lesse punishment than I now go to suffer, for besides my owne offence, I refused life and grace three times offered, but I trust God doeth all for the best, that I might repent, and thereby obtaine grace.

The 20. of February VVilliam Thomas late clearkie of the counsell, VVilliam Wincer, and Sir Nicholas Throckmorton were sent to the Tower, and on the next morrow were Sir Iames a Crofts and the Lord Thomas Grey sent to the Tower.

The 20. of February certaine of VVyatts faction, to the number of 400. and more were ledde to Westminster, coupled together with halters about their necks, and there in the tiltyard, the W. (who looked forth of his gallery) pardoned them.

The 23. of February Henry Grey duke of Suffolke was beheaded on the tower hill, his wordes on the scaffold were these: Good people, I am come hither to die, being iustly condemned for my disobedience against the W. highnes, of whom I do most humbly aske forgiveness: doctor VVeston answered and saide, my Lord, her grace hath already forgiven you: then saide the Duke,

I beseech you all good people, to let me be an example to you for obedience to the Lord, and the magistrates, for the contrary therof hath brought me to this end. I desire you all to beare me witness, that I die a true christian man, believing to be saved by none other means but by almighty God, through the passion of his son Iesus Christ: and now I praye you to praye with me: then kneeling downe, doctor Weston with him, they said the psalme of Miserere mei Deus, and In te Domine speravi, the duke one berke, and doctor Weston another, which done, he put off his gowne and dublet, knitt the kerchiefe about his eyes, held up his hands, laid his head over the block, which head at one stroke was taken from him.

The 26. of february William Thomas had almost slain himselfe, by thrusting a knife under his paye.

The 11. of March, Wil. Howard admirall of England, was created baron of Effingham at Westminster.

The 14. of March, the earle of Bedford L. pryncp seale, chiefe ambassador to the prync of Spaine, set forward on his bolege to fetch him hither.

The 15. of March, sir T. Wyat was arraigned at Westminster, of whose arraignment you maie reade in larger volumes, wherein I have becomen my labours.

The 18. of March being Palm Sunday, the lady Elizabeth the Quene, was by the L. treasurer and the earle of Suffe conveyed to the tower of London, from Westminster by water.

The 24. of March, were released out of the tower, the Marques of Northampton, the L. Cobham, sir Wil. Cobham, John Few Williams, Culpepper, Vane, John Harington, Corbet &c.

The 2. of April, the parliament began at Westminster, which was appointed to have bin kept at Wyndesore.

The 5. of April sir I. Williams was created baron of Emsay at St. James.

The 7. of April sir Edw. North was created baron of Charllege by writ at St. James.

The 8. of April, sir John Bridges was created baron Chandois of Sandryat St. James. The same 8. of April, being then Sunday, a cat with his head shaven, and the likenes of a bestment cast over him, with his four feet tied together, and a round peece of paper like a singing cake betwixt them, was hanged on a galloves in Cheape, nere to the crosse, in the parish of St. Mathew, which cat being taken downe, was caried to the Bishp of London, and he caused the same to be shewed at Pauls crosse, by the preacher D. Pendleton. The 10. of April, D. Granmer archb. of Cant. D. Ridley B. of London, and Hugh Latimer once B. of Worcester, were conveyed prisoners from the tower of London to Wyndesore, and after from thence to Wyndesore, there to dispute with the divines and learned men of the contrary opinion.

The 11. of April, sir Th. Wyat was beheaded on the tower hill, and after quartered, his quarters were set up in divers places, and his head on the galloves at Wyndesore nere Wyndesore park, from whence it was shortly after stolen and conveyed awaie. This sir Tho. Wyat before his coming down out of the tower, was conveyed by the L. chamberlaine, and the Lord Shandos to the tower over the water gate, where the L. Courtney late, and there he remained in talk more than halfe an houre, but what was spoken betwixt them I know not. Then was he brought downe, and at the garden pale, the L. chamberlain took his leave of him, and likewise did master secretary Bourne, to whom sir Thomas Wyat saide, I praye you to pray for me, and be a means to the quene for my poore wife and children, and if it might have pleased her grace to have granted me my wife, I trust to have done her such good service as should have recompensed mine offence: but since not, I beseech God to have mercie on me, to the which master Bourne made answer, and so Wyat came toward the hill betwixt Doctor Weston and the lord Shandos: when he was upon the scaffold, he desired all men to pray for him and with him, and then said in effect the same of the like words: Good people, I come presently here to die, bringing thereto lawfully and lawfully condemned, for I have soze offended against God and the quenes maiesty, I trust God hath forgiven me, and will take mercie upon me: I beseech the Quene maieesty also of forgiveness: She hath forgiven you quoth Doctor Weston: then, quoth he, let euerie man betwixt howe hee taketh any thing in hand against the higher powers, vntil God be prosperable to his purpose it will neuer take good effect or successe, whereof you may now learn of me, and I pray God I may be the last example in this place, for that or any other like. And where it is said and noised abroad, that I should accuse the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney, it is not so good people: for I assure you, neither they nor any other now ponder in holde was psonie of my rising but I began, as I have declared no lesse to the Quene's council, and that is most true. When said doctor Weston at those words, marke this my masters, he saith that, that which hee hath shewed to the council in writing of them is true, and so without any more talke sir Tho. Wyat turned him, and put off his gowne, untwisted his points, then taking the earle of Huntington, the L. Hastings, sir T. Strangulish, and many other by the handes, hee plucked off his dublet and waistcoat, and then kneeling downe, laid his head to the block, and raising himselfe againe on his knees after a few wordes spoken, with his eyes lifted up toward heauen, hee knitt the kerchiefe over his eyes, and holding up his handes, Iohannelle laide downe his heade, which the executioner tooke from him at one stroke.

The 4. of Januarie, a ship before Greeneuich (the Court being there) shot off his Ordnance, one peece being charged with a bullet of stone, which passed through the wals of the Court, and did no more hurt.

In the yeere 1556. an Ambassadour from the high and mightie Euan Vasiluich Emperour of all Russia, great Duke of Moldenier, Polcoua and Poouogrode, Emperour of Cassan and of Astrachan, &c. sent by the Sea from the port of Saint Nicholas in Russia, his honorable Ambassadour furnished Osep Napea, to the famous and excellent Princes Philip and Marie, King and Quene of England with certaine letters, together with certaine presents and gifts, as a manifest argument of a mutuall amitie to be made and continued betwene their Maisties and subiectes, for the commodities of both Realmes, and people: which Orator was the twentieth of Iulie imbarked in a good English ship named the Edward Bonauenture, belonging to the company of the English Merchants, Richard Chancellor being ground Pilot, and John Bucklande Maister of the said ship. In which was laden, ware, oyle, tallow, fures, felts, yarne, &c. to the summe of twentie thousand pound sterling, together with certaine Russkes: Over and aboue ten other Russkes shipped in an other ship called Bona Speranza, with goods to the value of five thousand pound sterling, which ships in their Iourney towards the coast of England, were by contrarie winds leuered the one from the other, to wit, the said Bona Speranza with two other English ships, the one named the Philip and Marie, the other the Confidentia, were diuinc on the coast of Norway, where the said Confidentia was seene to perill on a rocke, and the Bona Speranza: leuied to winder there. The third being the Philip and Marie, arrived in the

In which shipwrecke not onely the said shippe was broken, but also the goods laden in her was by the rude people of the countrie, rifled and carried away. Thomas Stafford, and other hauing conspired diuers treasons against the King and Queene, fearing iust punishment for their delicts, fled beyond the seas, and there remayning attempted diuers times to stirre rebellion within this Realme, by sending Bookes, Billes, and letters, written and printed, farred full of vntruthes, and at length the said Stafford, and other English rebels, and some straungers, entered this Realme, on the twer and twentieth of Aprill, and tooke by stealth the Castle of Skarborough in the countie of Yorke, and let out a shamefull Proclamation, wherein he trayterously called and affirmed the Queene to be unrightfull and most vnworthie Queene, and that the King had brought into this Realme the number of twelue thousand Spaniards, and that into their hands were delivered twelue the strongest holdes in this Realme. In which Proclamation the said Stafford named himselfe Protector and gouernor of this Realme, but he with the other his complices, by the good diligence of the Earle of Westmerland and other noble men, were apprehended on the last of Aprill.

Also he hath receiued sundrie famous pirates, and notorious enemies, and of late he sent Stafford with other rebels, to besiege the castle of Scarborough: proclamation was made to giue warning to our subjects to forbeare all traffike with any of that Realme, and to repute the French king and his subjects as open enemies, &c.

The last of June, the lord Philip Howard, sonne of Thomas Duke of Norfolkke, was borne in London, at the earle of Arundels house without Temple bar, which house sometime belonged to the bishop of Bath, and shortly after was christened in the queenes chappell at Westminster in about of gold, where Philip king of Spaine, and Nicholas Heath archbishop of Poike, then chancelor of England were his godfathers in proper person, and the lady Elizabeth duchess of Norfolk his great-grandmother, was his godmother. This lord Philip was the onely begotten child of the said Duke, borne of the lady Marie, daughter and heire of Henry six Allen, the last earle of Arundell of that name. To whome the inheritance and dignitie of the said Earle therefore descended.

The 6. of July, the king passed ouer to Calcis, and so into Flaunders, where he made great prouision for warre against the French king. This yeare in Michelmass terme, men might haue scene in Westminister hall at the kings bench barre, not two men of law before the Iustices, there was but one named Foster, who looked about, and had nothing to do, the Iudges looking about them. The 20. of Nouember, sir Thomas Trelham knight, receiued the order of the Croſſe, and was made lord prior of S. Iohn of Ierusalem in England.

The first of Ianuarie, the duke of Guise with a great armie of French men, entered a plot of ground, entrenched at Sandgate, and there diuiding his power into two parts, sent the one with certaine pieces of ordnance along the doones towards Rifebanke: and the other with battering pieces to Strewnam bridge, which two forts both at one time they shot at, and soone reconeered without resistance, for there was not a man in them, for they priuily fled into the towne of Calcis. The next day therefore the Frenchmen began a battery from the sandhills, next Rifebanke, against the wall of Calcis, betwixt the watergate and the prison, and continued the same by the space of two or three daies, untill they had made a little breach, but not yet sawtable, neither was it meant, but to make the Englishmen to haue the lesse regard to the defence of the castle, where they were accustomed to haue an easie entrie: so that while the Englishmen travelled to defend that breach, the Frenchmen being passed through the ditch full of water, entered the castle, and thought to haue entered the towne that way: but by the prowes of sir Anthonie Agar knight, and marshall of the towne, they were put backe into the castle, but the same sir Anthonie Agar lost his life, and this was on the first of Ianuarie. The same night William L. Wentworth, deputie or lieutenant of the towne, sent Nicholas Fellowes alias Gwies, and Richard Turpin alias Hams to the castle to demand parle, which they granted, putting forth of the posterne two French gentlemen, and receiued in pledge of them into the castle I. Hiefield, maister of the ordnance, and Edmond Hall a constable of the staple. Hereupon they falling in talk, at length agreed, that the towne with all the artillerie, victuals and munition, should be yielded to the French, the liues of the inhabitants saved, they under safe conduct to pass, whither they would, saving the lord deputie with 50. other, such as the duke of Guise should appoint, to remaine prisoners, & to be put to ransom. The next morning, the Frenchmen entered the towne and possessed it. And forthwith, all the men, women and children were commaunded to leave their houses, and to go into certaine places appointed for them, there to remaine till order were further taken for their sending away. The places appointed for them to remaine in, were chiefly foure, the two churches of our lady, and of Saint Nicholas, the deputies house, and the staple, where they rested part of that day, the night following, and the next day till the afternoon. And while they were thus in these four places, proclamation was made in their hearings, straightly charging them that were inhabitants of the towne of Calcis, having about them any money, plate, or jewels to the value of foure pence, to bring the same forthwith, and lay it on the high altars of the said churches upon paine of death, bearing them in hand they should be searched. By reason of which proclamation there was made a forsworn offering, and while they were at this offering in the churches, the Frenchmen rifed their houses, where they found inestimable riches & treasure: but especially in that towne, ordnance, armour, & other munitions as the Frenchmen write, besides the great riches of gold & silver, coine, jewels, plate, woolls, & other merchandize (which was inestimable,) there were found 30. peeces of brass mounted on wheeles, & as many of yron, with such furniture of powder, pellets, armor, victuals, & other munitions of war scarcely credible. On the next day being the 7. of January in the after noon a great number of y<sup>e</sup> meanest for were suffered to passe out of the towne in safety, being garbed through the army with a number of costly light horsemen, who befide the Englishmen very well & friendly, and after this, every day for the space of 3. or 4. daies, there were sent away diverse companies, till they were all avoided, those excepted that were referred prisoners.

There were in the towne of Calcis, 500. English souldiers in ordinarie pay, & of the towne men about 200. fighting men: & there were in the whole number of men, women & children, as they were accounted going out of the gate, 4200. persons or thereabout. The lord Wentworth deputie of Calcis, Sir Ralph Chamberlaine captain of the castle, John Harlestone capitaine of Kilsbanke, Nicholas Alexander capitaine of Petouan bridge, Edward Grimstone controller, John Rogers surior, with other to the number in all of 50. were sent prisoners into France. The losse of this towne seemed strange to many men of great experience, the same towne being to many yeres so strongly fortified with all munitions that could be devised, should now in so short space be taken of our enemies without fight or slaughter of any man, more then Sir Anthonie Agar, as ye haue heard. The counsell of England had which all expedition raised a great power, to haue bene sent for the defence of that towne, but it was not, for such a tempest of wind arose, as the like in many yeres had not bene scene, whereby no ship could brooke the sea, by means whereof our men were forced to remaine at Dover in a readinesse to haue passed the seas, till news were brought the towne was lost as ye haue heard, and then every man returned to his home. And shortly after, to wit, in the same month of January y<sup>e</sup> strong forts of Calcis and Hancues, though most valiantly defended by the lord Gray of Wilton and others, English men, was wonne by the French, & by them possessed: whereof maister George Ferrers hath written at large, for he collected the whole historie of M. Mary, as the same is set downe under the name of Richard Gratton.

The 18. of Januarie, Edward Hastings knight of the garter, lord chamberlaine to the Q. was created baron Hastings of Loughborough at Westminster.

The 20. of Januarie began a parliament at Westminster.

In the month of March, a p<sup>e</sup>ss was granted to the queene by the citizens of London, of twentie thousand pound, which was leuied of the companies, for the

which summe to be repaid againe, the Queene bound certaine lands, and also allowed for interest of the money twelue pound of every hundred for a yere.

The 28. of April, Francis the French kings eldest sonne called the dolphin, was married unto Mary Steuani daughter and sole heire of James the sixt late king of Scotland, in the cite of Paris, with great pompe and triumph.

The losse of Calcis being generally grievous to the whole realm of England, but specially to queene Mary, she could not to trauell with king Philip her husband, as with her owne counsell, & lords of the realm which way should be best to revenge this iniurie, especially now whilst the French king was occupied in wars with king Philip, to endowage some of his countries by way of invasion, & to surpris some of his townes upon a sudden. And amongst sundry devices none was thought to fit to be attempted as an haue towne in Britaine called Bick, a towne as well for the situation the most convenient to receive fresh succours, & victuals out of England by sea, as also for that it was knowne to the queene & her counsell at that present not to be furnished with any garrison of souldiers sufficient to repulse the power of a prince upon a sudden. Wherefore there was immediately order given to Edward lord Clinton then high admiral of England, with all expedition to prepare himself, with all the queens ships of war furnished with souldiers, munition, & victuals, to ioyne with the admiral of king Philip, who had like order to ioyne with y<sup>e</sup> navy of England, for the achieving of this enterprise.

In the meane tyme while M. Philip being absent from the low countries, was occupied with his wars in France, monsieur de Thermes captain of Calcis, being a man very expert in the wars, taking out of Calcis to many of his souldiers as might be spared from thence, adioyned to the all the forces of the French garrisons in Artois, Flanders, & Picardy, whereof together with the souldiers of Calcis being to the number of 700. footmen & 300. light horsemen, there were assembled 14. companies of the French footmen, & 8. companies of Almaines, 4. of 500. men at arms of France, besides the light horsemen Scots, amounting in the whole to the number of 9000. footmen, & 1500. horsemen entered into Flanders with full determination to spoile king Philips countie along the sea coast, & namely a proper haue towne called Dunkerk, & with like purpose to haue surpris the towne of Ghaveling. This captain of pollicie passing by the towne of Ghaveling laid siege to a little towne not far from thence called Berghes, which he won with small resistance. And without long slaying marched on to Dunkerk, & planting a siege there, battered the same to shreds with the cannon, that within lesse then foure daies he won the towne which he like as the other put to sack, & after setting the towne on fire, he with his French men spread abroad, wasted the most fruitful quarter of that part of Flanders almost to destruction, & encamped within halfe a mile of Ghaveling. The countie Fegmont lieutenant generall for king Philip in the low countries assembled all the power as well of king Philips garrisons, as also of men of war in the low country, to the number of 14. M. of more footmen, & 2. or 3. M. horsemen, determining so to affront the French, that either they should passe no further into the country, or at the least to impeach the further siege of Ghaveling: monsieur de Thermes hearing of this power assembled, made all possible hast toward Ghaveling, where he was no sooner arrived, but that he saw his enemies readie raised ranged in the field, by reason whereof his studie was now nothing else but how he might bring home his army in safety to Calcis. The county Egmond slipping the Frenchme bent to march away with the spoile of the countrie, cut betwene the and home, placing his battells in such order, that the Frenchmen had no way to passe, but upon the lands betwene the towne and the sea: whereas by good chance lay a great flecte of M. Maries ships of warre, within the danger of whose gunshot the French men had no shift, but to passe as their journey lay: and so being forced either to fannish or to fight at disadvantage. Monsieur de Thermes without staying any longer, caused his vanguard to passe ouer the riuer somewhat neare the towne to avoid the shot of the English ships, and said upon the further side for the residue of his battells: there came such thicke haile shot of artillerie out of the towne on the one side, and from the English ships on the other side, that there was a full barriere made upon the Frenchmen on all sides, which they neuertheless abode without breaking order for the tyme, when suddenly appeared before them two great troupes of horsemen of 1500. a peece, part swart Rutters, and part Burgonians, whereof the one in front, and the other in flanke, gaue strong charges vpon the French vanguard, who being well backed with their other battells, stoutly repulld those two best troupes. Thus both parties being at a stay, the countie Egmond with 1800. men of armes, and his foote battells following, before the French had well recovered breath, recharged vpon them with all his forces together so terribly, that he shot all their battell, and the number take the to flight, the victorie was soone had, by reason the Spaniards beaten backe with the artillerie, as well of the towne as of the ships, brake their order, and came not to the shoocke, whereby the whole charge of the battell rested vpon the Frenchmens heads. This field was foughten the 13. of July, vpon the sea lands neare to Grauling where besides those that were slaine which were esteemed to the number of five thousand, there were taken prisoners the marshall de Thermes captain of Calcis, monsieur Senerpont gouernor of Boloigne, monsieur Villebon gouernor of Picardie, monsieur Annabaw sonne to the late admirall, monsieur de Moruilliers gouernor of Abvile, monsieur de Channe gouernor of Cozbier, beside a number of gentlemen, capitaines and souldiers, but specially the bandes of Calcis went to wacke, so as very few returned home. The admirals before named knew nothing of this matter, wherefore, following their prescribed course, and joining together at the place appointed, sailed from thence with prosperous wind, and on the nine and twentieth of the same month, with seven score ships of warre appeared before the haven of Conquet in Britaine: at whose arrivall there, they sounded their trumpets, and with a peale of great ordnance gaue a loud salve to the Brittaines: and by eight of the clocke the same morning, the Englishmen manning forth their ship-boates, recovered landing, and within short time became masters of the said towne of Conquet, which they sacked and burnt with a great abbe, & many pretty townes and villages neare therabouts, where our men found great store of pillage.

This being done, the Englishmen withdrew downe to the sea side, where their ships lay readie to receive them. But the Flemmings being covetous of the spoyle, passing farther into the land, before they could recover their ships againe, were encountered by the power of the countrie, by whom there were slaine of them to the number of foure or five hundred. The admirall perceiving the power of the countrie greatly to increase, thought it not best to attempt any assault against the towne of Brest, or to make longer abode there, but returned home.

In this meane time, while king Philip and the French king with two most puissant armies skouted each other neere unto the water of Somme, either of them being obstinately bent to drive the other out of the field, for which cause they entrenched their camps: diuers conferences were had concerning peace, and at the last concluded vpon all controuersies, except the restitution of Calcis, required by the ambassadors of Queene Marie, which the French part would in no wise heare of, by reason of which difficultie, this treatie could take no effect, nor come to good conclusion. King Philip thinking himselfe bound to stand in that case with the Queene his wife, did therfore stay a long time before he concluded peace with the French king.

The second of July, the Lord Wentworth and diuerse other that had bene gouernours of Calcis, were attainted of treason being then in France.

The 11. of July, within a mile of Nottingham was a marvellous tempest of thunder, which as it came through two townes, beate downe all the houses and Churches, the bells were cast to the out side of the Church yards, and some webs of lead foure hundred foote into the field, withen like a paire of gloues.

The riuer of Trent running betwene the two townes, the water with the mud in the bottome was carried a quarter of a mile, and cast against the trees, the trees were plucked by by the rootes, and cast euerye score off. Also, a child was taken forth of a mans handes two speares length high, and carried a hundred foote, and then let fall, wherewith his arme was broken, and so died. Five or six men therabout were slaine, and neither flesh nor skin perished: there fell some hailestones that were sixtene inches about, &c.

This yeere in harvest time, the quartaine agues continued in like manner of more vehemently, than they had done the last yeere passed, wherethrough died many olde people, and specially priests, so that a great number of parishes were without, and no curates to be gotten, and much corne was lost in the field for lacke of workemen and laborers.

In the beginning of this yeere, corne rose to foureteene shillings the quarter, and wood wared frant in London, and was sold for thirteene and foureteene shillings the thousand of billets, and coles at ten pence the sacke, by reason of the great death and sickness the last summer for lacke of helpe and carriage.

King Philip being absent out of the realme (as ye haue heard) and Queene Marie being dangerously sicke, ended her life at her manor of Saint James by Charing crosse the seuenteenth of Nouember, in the yeere 1558. when she had reigned five yeeres, foure monethes and odder daies. The same day deceased cardinal Poole at Lambeth, and a little before, two of her physicians, besides diuerse bishops and noble men. Queene Marie was buried at Cheshmire, and cardinal Poole at Canterburie.

Queene Elizabeth.

Ann. reg. 1.

LIZABETH our most gracious and soueraigne Lady, borne at Greenwich, second daughter to king Henry the eight, to the great comfort of England, was with full consent proclaimed Queene of England, Fraunce, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. on the 17. of November, in the year of our Lord God 1558. Forthwith the posts and haueis were stopped, and none suffered to passe out of the realme without licence. Proclamation was made, forbidding all men to preach, save such as should be appointed: also to alter any rites or ceremonies used in the church, save as it was in her Graces chappell.

The Queene cometh from Hatfield.

The 19. of November, Queene Elizabeth came from bishops Hatfield in Hertfordshire, unto the lord Northes house in the late dissolved Charterhouse of London, the Herikes of London meeting her grace at the farther end of Sarney to wone within the shire of Spidleser, and so rode before her, till she came to the Charterhouse gate next Aldersgate, where her grace remained.

The Queene remoueth to the towre.

On monday the eight and twentieth of November, about two of the clocke in the after noone, Queene Elizabeth rode from the lord Northes house along by the Barbican in at Creeplegate, then along by the wall to Bishopsgate, which gate was richly hanged, where the waiters of the city plaide, and ouer against the kings-head fauourine, a scholler of Pauls schoole made a short oration to her maieslie in Latin verses, the company of Sericers standing in their railles next the scholler, & so all the other companies of the city in order from thence to Hart lane end next unto Barking church in tower streete, the lord maior of London riding with maister Garter king at armes, bearing a scepter before her maieslie, which lord maior met her at the Charterhouse gate next Aldersgate, where maister Recorder saluted her grace in the name of the lord maior and the whole city, and so with lords, knights, and gentlewomen richly appareled, brought her to the tower of London: but when her grace entered at Hart lane, a peale of guns began to be shot off at the tower, which continued almost halfe an hour.

The first of December, the Queene remoued by water from the tower to Somerset place neare to the Strand.

Sir Thomas Cheney treasurer of the household and lord warden of the cinque ports, discaled the 8. of December.

Sir Nicholas Bacon Attourney of the court of wards, was made lord keeper of the great seale of England the 20. of December.

The 13. of December, the corps of queene Mary was honorably conveyed from Saint James to the abbey of Westminster, and there placed vnder a rich hearke decked with penons, banners, and scutcheons of the armes of England and Fraunce, where she remained that night, and on the morrow, after the masse of Requiem, and a sermon preached by Doctor Whiche bishop of Winchester was ended, she was buried in the chappell of king Henry the seventh on the north side.

The four and twentieth of December, was solenne obsequie kept in the abbey

The first of Januarie, the lord Maior and Aldermen gaue in commandment to every ward in London, that the parson or curate in every parish church in London, should reade the Epistle and Gospel of the day in the English tongue in the masse time, and the English procession then used in the Quenes chappell, according to a proclamation sent from her maieslie and priuie counsell, proclaimed in the Citie of London the 13. of December, which commandment was that day obserued in most parish churches of the citie.

The ninth of Januarie in the morning, the image of Thomas Becker which stood ouer the doore of the Percers chappell in London toward the street, was found broken and cast downe, and a bill set on the church doore depauiing the letters by thereof.

The twelfth of Januarie, the Quenes maieslie remoued from her place of White hall to the Tower by water, the lord maior of London and his brethren the aldermen in their barge, and all the Craftes of the citie in their barges richly decked with targets and banners of euerie mysterie. The batchelors of the anatois companie in their barge, with a foyle, hauing three tops, trimmed and richly decked to waite on them, which shot off guns all the way: all these awaited on her Maieslie, who tooke her barge about two of the clocke in the after noone, the lord maior following after, and euery companie in order with great melodie of muscalle instruments, till her grace was through London bridge, and landed at her priuie staire of the tower wharfe, and then the maior after leave taken and thankses of the queene, returned through the bridge with the shoud, and landed at the three cranes wharfe in the binetree.

The 13. of Januarie were created in the tower of London, these noble men following, Sir William Per knight was created marques of Northampton, Edward Seymour was made viscount Beauchamp a earle of Hertford, lord Thomas Howard viscount of Wyndon, Sir Oliver Saint Iohn knight, lord Saint Iohn of Wiltfall, Sir Henry Carew knight, lord Carew of Hunsdon.

The fourteenth of Januarie, at which time the Londoners had made sumptuous prouision of pageants and otherwise, as hath bene accustomed, the quenes maieslie passed through the city of London to her palace at Westminster: the next day she was crowned by doctor Oglethorpe bishop of Carlisle.

Coronation.

The five and twentieth of Januarie, began a parliament at Westminster, before the staires wherof, doctor Coxo late come from beyond the seas, and sometime schoolmaister to king Edward the first, made a learned sermon.

Parliament.

In this parliament, the first fruits and tenthes were graunted to the crowne, and also the supream gouernment ouer the state Ecclesiasticall.

The first fruits and tenthes graunted to the crowne.

Likewise, the booke of comunon prayer and administration of the Sacraments in our bulgar tongue was restored, to be done as in the time of King Edward the first. Moreover, in the time of this parliament a motion was made by the common

The which petition being mooued to her grace, she most honourable aged and considered threasures, and alligard a day of hearing: when the day came, the speaker and common house resorted vnto her graces pallace at Westminster called the White hall: and in the great gallery there her grace most honourably shewed her selfe ready to heare their motion and petition. Answer of her maiesty.

fram,

The Queenes maiesty after a little pause, made this answer following. Is it haue good cause to do I giue you all my hearty thanks for the good zeale and louing care you seeme to haue, as to all towards me, as to the whole estate of your country: your petition I pectriue, consider of three parties, and must answer to the same shall depend of need.

And to the first part I may say vnto you, that from my yeares of vnderstanding, sith I first had consideration of my selfe, to be borne a creature of almighty God, I happily chose this kind of life: in the which I yet liue, I assure you for mine owne part hath hitherto best contented my selfe, and I trust hath bene most acceptable vnto God. From the which, if either ambition of high estate offered to me in marriage by the pleasure and appoyment of my Prince, whereof I haue some records in this presence (as you our treasurer well know) or if eschewing the danger of mine enemies, or the avoiding of the perill of death whole messenger, or rather a continual watchman, the princes indignation, was no little time daily before mine eyes, by whose means, although I know, or iustly may suspect, yet I will not now utter, or if the whole cause were in my sister her selfe, I will not now burthen her therewith, because I will not charge the dead: if any of these, I say, could haue drawne or disswaded me from this kind of life, I had not now remained in this estate where in you see me, but so constant haue I alwaies continued in this determination, although my youth and voyes may seeme to some hardly to agree together: yet is it most true, that at this day I stand free from any other meaning, that either I haue had in times past, or haue at this present, with which trade of life I am so thoroughly acquainted, that I trust God, who hath hitherto therein preserved and led me by the hand, will not of his goodnesse suffer me to go alone.

For the other part, the manner of your petition I do well like, and take it in good part because that it is simple, and containeth no limitation of place or person, if it had bene otherwise, I must needs haue misliked it very much, and thought it in you a very great presumption, bring writhing and altogether vnmeet for you to require them that may commaund, or those to appoint, whose parts are to desire, or such to bind a limite, whose duties are to obey, or to take upon you to draw my love to your likings, or to frame my will to your fancies: for a guardon constrained, and gift freely giuen can neuer agree together. Wherefore, if any of you be in suspect, that when soeuer it may please God to incline my heart to another, another kind of life, you may well assure your selves, my meaning is not to do or determine any thing, wherewith the realme may or shall haue iust cause to be discontented. And therefore put that cleane out of your heads, for I assure you, what credit my assurance may haue with you, I cannot tell, but what credit it shall deserve to haue, the sequels shall declare. I will neuer in that matter conclude any thing that shall be prejudiciall to the realme: for the totale, good and safety whereof, I will neuer thin to spend my life. And whom soeuer my chance shall be to light vpon, I trust he shall be such, as shall be as careful for the realme and you, I will not say as my selfe, because I cannot so certainly determine of any other, but at the leastwise by my good will and desire, he shall be such, as shall be as careful for the preservation of the realme, and you as my selfe. And albeit it might please almighty God to continue me still in this mind to live out of the state of marriage, yet is it not to be feared, but he will to heeke in my heart and in your wisdomes, as good prouision by his helpe may be made in conuenient, whereby the realme shall not remaine destitute of an heir, that may be a fit gouernour, and peraduenture more beneficiall to the realme, then such of-spring as may come of me. For though I be neuer so careful of your well doings, and mind euer so to be, yet may issue grow out of kind, and become perhaps vngenerous. And in the end this shall be for me sufficient, that a marble stone shall declare, that a Queene hauing reigned such a time, liued, and died a virgin. And here I end, and take your comming vnto me in good part, and giue vnto you all commissions my hearty thanks, more yet for your zeale and good meaning, then for your petition.

The twentieth of Februarie, one of the queenes takers of freshly fish, for abusing his authority, was set on the pillory in Cheape, where he stood thre market daies, from nine of the clocke till twelue of the clocke, which punishment with more (whereof I write not) was by commandement of the Queene by her owne mouth, as a good example of iustice.

In the Easter holidays, preached at the Spittle, doctor Bill the queenes almoner, doctor Cox, & maister Horne, the two last came lately from beyond the seas.

On Loh Sunday, the 2. of April, maister Saunple, lately come from beyond the seas, made the recharfall Sermon at Pauls crosse: but when the Lord Mayor and aldermen came to their places in Pauls Churchyard, the pulpit doore was locked, and the key could not be heard of: whereupon the Lord Mayor sent for a smith to open the locke, which was done, and when the preacher should enter the place, it was found very filthy and buelcane: moreover, the Warger that had the key of the place where the bishops and prelates use to stand to heare the sermon, could not be found: whereupon certaine gentlemen, with a forme broke open the doore. This disorder chanced by reason that since Christmase last past, there was not a sermon preached at Pauls crosse, for an inhibition had bene sent, from the counsell vnto the bishop of London, that he should admit no preacher, because of the controuersie betwixt the bishops, and them of the clergy that were newly returned vnto the realme from beyond the seas.

The last of March, the parliament yet continuing, a conference was begun at Westminster, concerning articles of religion betwixt the bishops and other of the clergy on the one part, and certaine learned preachers, of whom some had bene in dignity in the Church of England, before that time on the other part. The declaration of the proceeding wherein, and the cause of the breaking up of the same conference by default and contempt of certaine bishops, part of the said conference was published in a treatise printed by Richard Iugge and John Cawood, printers to the Queenes maiesty as followeth.

The Queenes most excellent maiesty, hauing heard of diuersity of opinions in certaine matters of religion, amongst sundry of her louing subjects, and being very desirous to haue the same reduced to some godly and Christian concord, thought it best by the aduise of the lordes and other her priuy counsell, as well for the satisfiacion of persons doubtfull, as also for the knowledge of the very truth in certaine matter of difference: to haue a conuenient chosen number of the best learned of either part, to conferre together their opinions and reasons, and thereby to come to some good and charitable agreement. And hereupon by her maiesties commandement, certaine of her priuy counsell declared this purpose to the Archbishop of Yorke (being also one of the same priuy counsell) and required him that he would impart the same to some of the bishops, and to make choyse of eight, nine or ten of them, and that there should be the like number named of the other part: and further also declared to him (as then was supposed) what the matters should be: And as for the time, it was thought meete to be as soone as possible might be agreed vpon. And then after certaine dayes past, it was signified by the sayd archbishop, that there was appointed by such of the bishops to whom he had imparted this matter, eight persons, that is to say, foure bishops, and foure doctours, who were content at the Queenes maiesties commandement to shew their opinions, and as he termed it, render account of their faith in those matters which were mentioned, and that specially in writing, although he sayd they thought the same so determined, as there was no cause to dispute vpon them.

It was hereupon fully resolved by the Queenes maiesty, with the aduise aforesayd, that according to their desire, it should be in writing on both parts, for auoyding of much alteration in words, and that the sayd Bishops should, because they were in authority, of degree superiours, first declare their minds and opinions to the matter, with their reasons in writing: and the other number being also right men of good degree in schooles, and some hauing bene of dignity in the church of England, if they had any thing to say to the contrary, should the same day declare their opinions in like manner. And so each of them should deliver their writings to the other, to be considered what were to be imposed therein, and the same to declare againe in writing at some other conuenient day, and the like order to be kept in all the rest of the matters: all this was fully agreed vpon with the archbishop of Yorke, and so also signified to both parties. And immediately hereupon diuers of the nobility and states of the realme, understanding that such a meeting and conference should be, and that in certaine matters, whereupon the court of Parliament consequently following, some lawes might be grounded: they made earnest meanes to her maiesty, that the parties of this conference, might put and reade their assertions in the English tongue, and that in the presence of them of the nobility, and others of the parliament house, for the better satisfiacion and inhabling of their owne iudgements, to treat and conclude of such lawes as mought depend thereupon. This also being thought very reasonable, was signified to both parties, and so fully agreed vpon, and the day appointed for the first meeting to be the Friday in the forenoon, being the last of March, at Westminster Church, where both for good order, and for honour of the conference: by the Queenes maiesties commandement, the Lordes and others of the priue counsell were present, and a great part of the Nobilitie also: and notwithstanding the former order appointed and consented unto by both parties, yet the bishop of Winchester, and his collegues, alleging they had mistaken that their assertions, and reasons should be written, and so only recited out of the booke, sayd their booke was not ready then written, but they were ready to argue and dispute, and therefore they would for that time repeat in speech that which they had to say to the first proposition. This variation from the order, and specially from that which themselves had by the sayd archbishop in writing before required, adding thereto the reason of the Apostle, That to contend in words is profitable to nothing but to subuersion of the hearer, seemed to the Queenes maiesties counsell somewhat strange, and yet was it permitted without any great reprehension, because they excused themselves with mistaking the order, and agreed that they should not faile but put it in writing, and according to the former order, deliver it to the other part, and to the said Bishop of Winchester and his collegues appointed Doctor Cole Drane of Pauls to be the vtterer of their minds, who partly by speech onely, and partly by reading of authorities written, and at certaine times being informed of his collegues what to say, made a declaration of their meaning, and their reasons to their first proposition, which being ended, they were asked by the priue Counsell, if any of them had any more to be said: and they said no. So as then the other part was licensed to shew their minds, which they did according to the first order, exhibiting all that which they meant to be propounded in a booke written, which after a prayer and imocation made most humble to almightie God, for the enuoying of them with his holy spirit, and a protestation also to stand to the doctrine of the Catholike Church, builded vpon the Scriptures, and the doctrine of the Prophets and the Apostles, was distinctly read by one Robert Horne Bachelor in Diuinitie, late Drane of Duresme. And the same being ended with some likeness, as it seemed, that the same was much allowable to the audience, certaine of the Bishops began to say contrarie to their former answers, that they had much more to say to this matter: wherein although they might haue bene well reprehended for such manner of euasillation, yet for auoyding of any mistaking of orders in this colloquie or conference, and for that they should utter all that which they had to say: it was both ordered and thus openly agreed vpon of both parts in the full audience, that vpon the monday following, the Bishops should bring their minds & reasons in writing to the second assertion, and the last also if they could, and first reade the same, & that done, the other part should bring likewise theirs to the same. And being read, each of them should deliver to other the same writings.

And in the meane time the bishops should put in writing, not onely all that which Doctor Cole had that day uttered: but all such other matters as they any otherwise could thinke of for the same, and as soon as they might possible, to send the same booke touching that first assertion to the other part, and they should receive of them that writing which maister Horne had there read that day, and upon monday it should be agreed what day they should exhibite their answers touching the first proposition. Thus both parts assented thereto, & the assembly quickly dismissed. And therefore upon monday, the like assemble began againe, at the place and houre appointed, and there, upon what sinistre or disordered meaning is not yet knowne (though in some part it be understood) the Bishop of Winchester and his colleagues, and especially Lincolne, refused to exhibite or read, according to the former notorious order on Friday, that which they had prepared for the second assertion. And thereupon by the Lord keeper of the great scale, they being gaily and fauourably required to keepe the order appointed: and that taking no place, being secondly as it behooued, pressed with more earnest request, they neither regarding the authoritie of that place, nor their owne reputation, nor the credite of the cause, utterly refused that to doo. And finally, being againe particularlie curie of them apart dissently by name, required to vnderstand their opinions therein, they all sauing one (which was the Abbot of Westminster, hauing some more consideration of order, and his dutie of obedience than the other) utterly and plainelie denied to haue their booke read, some of them as more earnestly than other, some so also, some other more indiscreetelie, and vnrerentially then others. Whereupon, giuing such example of disorder, stubbornesse and selfewill, as hath not bene seene and suffered in such an honourable assemble, being of the two Estates of this Realme, the Nobilitie and the Commons, besides the presence of the Queenes Maiesties most honorable priue Counsell, the same assemble was dismissed, and the goodly and most Christian purpose of the Queenes Maiestie made frustrate. And afterward for the contempt so notoriously made, the Bishops of Winchester and Lincolne, hauing most obstinately both disobeyed common authoritie and varied manifestly from their owne order, and especially Lincolne, who shewed more folly than the other, were condignly committed to the Tower of London, & the rest (sauing the Abbot of Westminster) stood bound to make dayly and personall appearance before the counsell, & not to depart the citie of London and Westminster, vntill further order were taken with them for their disobedience & contempt.

The three propositions, whereupon conference was determined to haue bene at Westminster.

1 It is against the word of God, and the custome of the ancient Church, to vse a thing vnknowne to the people, in common prayer, and the administration of the Sacraments.

2 Every Church hath authoritie to appoint, take away and change ceremonies and ecclesiasticall rites, so the same be to edification.

3 It cannot be prooued by the word of God that there is in the Masse offered by a sacrifice propitiatorie for the quick and the dead.

The bishops and doctors sate on the one side of the quier at a table, and the other learned men sate at another table on the other side of the quier. And at the upper end thereof at another table sate the queenes counsell to haue heard some good conclusion of the said conference, but it came to small effect as ye haue heard.

The 5. of April the bishops of Winchester, doctor White, and of Lincoln, doctor Kealon, were committed to the tower of London.

In this meane time a treatie of peace, which had bene in hand the last yeare, betwixt the two kings of Spaine and Fraunce, was now renewed againe, and the deputies were appointed to meete at Chalken Cambes, a five miles distant from Cambray. For the king of Spaine, the Duke of Alva, the prince of Orange, the bishop of Arras, Rigomes de Silua, Earle of Melito, Monsieur Vigilius Zwischen knight, and president of the priue counsell in the Low countries, who was letted by sicknesse, and could not come. For the French king there came the cardinall of Lozayne, the Constable, the Marshall of Saint Andre, the bishop of Saliance, and Claude de Aubespine the said kings secretary. For the Queene of England, the bishop of Elye, the Lord William Howard baron of Effingham, lord Chamberlaine to the said Queene, doctor Nicholas Wotton, deane of Canterburie and Poike. After this treatie had continued long, and now rested nothing to stay them from concluding a generall peace, but onely the article touching Calais, at length that matter was also accorded by a speciall treatie betwixt the Queenes maiestie of England and the French King. The substance of which article was, that Calais should rest in the French mens hands for the terme of 8. yeeres, and at the end of that terme, to render the same to the Queenes highnes, or for default thereof, to forfeite vnto her the sum of 500000. crowns: & for surety herof, to deliuer fower hostages, such as her Maiestie should thinke sufficient. It was concluded also a firme peace betwixt the Realmes of England & Scotland, such fortresses to be rased as had bene built, and made by the Scots and French in the borders towards England. Sir Iohn Mason knight secretary for the French young, was sent ouer in post with instructions vnto the English commissioners, after whose coming, within two or three daies, a generall peace was concluded betwixt all the parties. And so on the 7. of April, the said peace was proclaimed, to wit, betwixt the Queenes maiestie on the one party, and the French king on the other, their Realmes, Dominions & Subiects, and likewise betwixt her Maiestie and the king Dolphin, & Queene of Scots his wife, their Realmes, Dominions and Subiects. This Proclamation was made at London by Carter & Norrey kings at armes accompanied with three other heraults, and six trumpeters, the Lord Marquis and Adormen in their scarlet gownes, being present on horsebacke.

Lord Wentworth arraigned and quit.

The 22. of April, William Wentworth late deputy of Calais, was arraigned at Westminster upon an indictment of treason found against him, in the late M. Maries daies, for the losse of Calais, but he was acquit by his peers, the lord Marquesse of Portsmouth, sitting that day as chiefe steward of England: so he was deliuered presently unto his house, without returning to any prison.

The 8. of May, the parliament brake vp, in which parliament, besides other things before recited, a subside was graunted to the queene of two shillings eight pence the pound of mooueable goods, and foure shillings of lands to be paid at two seuerall paymētts of euery pson, spirituall and temporell.

Church service in the English tong

The 8. of May being Whitunday, the service in churches began according to the booke of common prayer, set forth and established by this last parliament, correspondent to that of king Edwards time.

Citizens of London mustered at Greenwich.

The 2. of July, the citizens of London had a muster above the Queenes maiestie at Greenwich in the park, of 1400. men, whereof 800. were pikemen, all in fine coiflers, 400. harqueburs, in shirts of mail, with morrys, and 200. halberters in alman cincts, which were furnished and set forth by the companies of the citie of London: they had to euery hundred two wisclers richly appareled, and twelve wardens of the best companies clothed in coates of blacke velvet to conduct them with drums and fifes, and fire ensignes, all in ierkins of white bydgers latten, cut and lined with blacke sarsenet, with caps, hosen, and shakles according, the capitaines Robert Constable and maister Saunders, brought them in battell ray above the Queene, even as they should haue fought, which made a goodly sight before her Maiestie, the emperours and French kings ambassadours being present.

In the moneth of July, the old bishops of England then living, were called and examined by certaine of the queenes maiesties counsell, where the bishops of Poike, Ely, and London with other, to the number of thirteene or fourteen, by refusing to take the oth touching the Queenes supremacie and other articles, they were deppriued from their bishopricks. And likewise were diuerse deacons, archdeacons, parsons, and vicars, deppriued from their benefices, and some committed to prison in the tower, Fleet, Marshalsea, and kings bench.

Commissioners.

Commissioners were likewise appointed for the establishing of religion through the whole Realme. For London were appointed sir Richard Sackville knight, Doctor Horne a Deuine, Doctor Huicke a Civilian, and maister Salvage, who called before them diuerse persons of euery parish, and swore them to enquire and present upon certaine inuincions.

Houses suppressed.

Also the houses of Religion created by queene Mary, as the priorie of S. John of Jerusalem by Smithfield, the nunnies and brethren of Sion and Shene, the blacke friers in Smithfield, and the friers of Greenwich were all suppressed: the abbot and monkes of Westminster were put out, a dean, prebends, and canons placed there, and so named the college of Westminster founded by M. Elizabeth.

Church images burned.

On the euen of Saint Bartholomew, the day and the morrow after, &c. were burned in Paules church yard, Cheape, and diuerse other places of the citie of London, all the roodes and other images of Churches, in some places the coopes, bell-ments, altar clothes, bookes, banners & pulchers, and good lots were burned.

The 5. of September there fell a three houers tempest at London in forenoon in the end whereof a great lightning with a terrible clasp of thunder, strake the spire (bring stone) of the steeple of Allhallowes Church in Birdstreete, about a tenn foote beneath the top, out of the which fell a stone that slew a dogge, and ouerthrew a man playing with the same dogge, and not long after the same spire was taken downe by the Church wardens, to saue the charges of repairing. And at the same instant, by the same tempest, one of the south doores of S. Dionys Church in Fenchurch streete, with the doore of the reueltrie of the same Church, were both stricken through and broken.

Churches in London stricken and broken by tempest.

The 8. and 9. of September. a solenne obsequie was kept in Paules Church at London, for Henrie the second of that name King of France, who deccased about the 10. of July last past, of a wound received the 29. of June, in running at tilt in solenne Jukes holden at Paris, in honor of the marriage celebrated betwixt his sister the lady Margaret of France, and Philibert Duke of Savoy. He was stricken on the biler with a lance, as he ranne against the Countre Mount-gomerie: the spillys entering by the sight of his head piece, and piercing through his aie into his head, so pressed his braine, that there was no meane to saue his life. The obsequie for him was kept in very solenne wise, with a rich hearse made like an imperiall crowne, sustented with eight pillars, and covered with blacke velvet, with a balence fringed with gold, and richly hanged with scarions, penons, and banners of the French Kings armes, without any lights. And on the beere was laid a pall of cloth of gold, with a coat armour of the armes of France, and a crest with an imperiall crowne standing upon the beere. Doctor Parker Archbishop of Canterbury elect, Doctor Barlow bishop of Chichester elect, and Doctor Scory bishop of Hereford elect, executing at the dirige of the euenng song in English, they sitting in the Bishops of Londons seate, in the upper quire in surplices, with doctors hoods about their shoulders. The chiefe mourner, was the Marquesse of Winchester Lord Treasurer, assisted with ten other Lords mourners, with all the heralds in blacke, and their coats armours uppermost.

On the morrow being the 9. of September, a Sermon was preached by Doctor Scorie in place of Doctor Grindall Bishop of London. After the Sermon, six of the Lords mourners received the Communion with the Bishops, which bishops were in copes on their surplices, onely at the ministrallion of the said Communion. Which being finished, there was a great dinner kept in the Bishop of Londons palace by Paules, where the mourners appareled them, and so ended the solennitie of the said obsequies.

About the last of September, John Duke of Finland, second sonne to Gustavus King of Sweethen, was sent by his father to treat a marriage for his eldest brother Ericus, with the Queenes Maiestie of England, he arrived at Hartwich in Essex, and was there honorably received and entertained by the Earle of Orford: which said Earle, and the Lord Robert Dudley, with a goodly band of gentlemen and yemen, conveyed him to London, where he was received of diuers knights and gentlemen of the Court, on the 5. of October, and was with his traine of about the number of 50. persons well horsed, conveyed to the bishop of Winchester place in Southwarke, where he was lodged during his abode here, and remoued from thence 2. daies before Easter homeward, and sped on his message, as may appaere by that which followeth taken out of Iohannes Leuenclij. comment. de bellis Belgicis.

Ericus king of Sweden, sonne of Gustabus late king of the said kingdome, hauing committed to prison his brother Iohn Duke of Finland, whom a little before he had employed into England on an ambassage to the Quenes maiestie, whom he sued to for marriage, and had his sute refused: againe, the second time solicited her maiestie in the same sute, notwithstanding (to his great dishonour, and (as it fell out) his iust disgrace) he attempted the same matter with the youngest daughter of Philip Landgraue van Hessen, at whose hand, hauing the second time bene refused of her Maiestie here the matter being knowne there, he also not onely refused a deniaill, but the lady was by her father bestowed vpon Adolfe Duke Van-Holt, vnkle of Frederike king of Denmarke, then enemy of the said Ericus.

The 22. of December, Chamberlen that was captaine of the castle of Calis, and Hurlstone that was captaine of Wilsbank were condemned of high treason, because they left their charge, when the French men came thither.

In this meane time, through controuersie raised betwixt the Scottish nobilitie, and the queene Dowager of Scotland, which chaunced specially about matters of religion, certaine of the lords there minding reformation therein, and the queene resisting them to her power, diuerse companies of souldiers and men of warre, were sent out of Fraunce into Scotland to aide the said queene, where they were placed in diuerse townes and forts, to the displeasure of the more part of the Scottish nobilitie, who were forced to sue vnto the queene of England for aide to expell the French. Their sute was the better liked of for that it was doubted lest the French men vnder pretence of bringing an armie into Scotland to appease the Scots, might attempt some inuasion here in England, considering that by procurement as was thought of the duke of Guise, vnkle to the queene of France and Scotland, a title should seeme to be pretended by his neece the aforesaid queene, as might be gathered by coniectures. The names of the lords of Scotland that made sute for aide against the French men at this season were these:

The

The Quenes maiestie with aduice of her graces counsell, considering of this weightie businesse, and withall, foreseeing the malicious purpose of her aduersaries, and howe the Queene of Scots was in Fraunce married and gouerned. So as she was not able to bte the libertie of her crowne, did thinke it best to prevent such mischiftes as might ensue, if timely remedy were not vied. To displace such dangerous neighbours the Frenchmen, that began to nestle themselves thus strongly sonare at hand. Hereupon was a power raised and sent forth, both by sea and land: the duke of Norfolk being appointed Generall, and sent into the North for the direction thereof. And first maister William Winter appointed vice Admirall of the Quenes nauie, Northwards made saile towards Scotland, and waisting along the coast, in the moneth of Januarie, came into the Forth, and so to the rode of Leth, and there cast anchor, as well to impace such Frenchmen as might happily be sent forth of Fraunce against the Scottish lords of the congregation, as also to keepe them that lay in Fife from victuals: moreover after that the army by land was come together into the North parts and had sojourned a while at Berwick, and thereabout, the Lord Grey of Wilton being appointed Generall of the said armie, departed with the same, and marched to Col-dingham, where they encamped that night.

The 30. of March, sir Iames Croft, & sir George Howard, departed fro Berwick to the armie, with all the lawnces and light horsemen, containing the number of 1250. horses. The number of footmen, more then 6000. The chiefe gouernors of which armie were these: The lord Grey of Wilton lieutenant Generall, sir Iames Croft assistant with him in that charge, the lord Seord lord Marshall, sir George Howard, generall of the men at armes and demulances, maister Barnaby fier Patricke his lieutenant, sir Henry Percie generall of the light horsemen: Thomas Huggens squire, prouost marshall, Thomas Goner maister of the ordnance, maister William Pelham captaine of the Pioners, Edward Randell squire sergeant maior, maister Thomas Barrough, maister Cuthbert Vaughan, maister Williams, and maister Cornewall corporals, this day at night the armie encamped at Dunglas, and thereabout.

The last of March, the army marching by Dunbar, there issued out of the towne certaine horsemen and footmen, offering to skirmish, towards whom certaine of the English lawnces and pistolets, with certaine harquebusiers made forwards, but they kept themselves within their strength, two of the enemies horsemen, and one footman were slaine. This done the army marched on to Linton bigges, where the footmen encamped that night. The horsemen lay at Hadington and in diuerse other small townes, sir Iames Croft lay at Clarkington west of Hadington, at the lord of Cockburnes house. The first of Apill, the camp remoued to Salt Preston, and there encamped: this evening, sir Iames Croft, with diuerse of the captaines in his company, met with the earle of Arraine, the lord Iames prioz of Saint Andrez, the maister of Marwell, sir William Kirklaudy lord of Gange, and diuerse other of the Scottish nobilitie with three hundred horsemen their traine.

After they had saluted each other, they rode together to Salt Preston, where the lord Grey lord lieutenant met them, where they entered into communication, and and after departed. The 2. of Aprill, the lord Grey, sir James Croft, sir George Howard, with other capitaines rode to Muskellborough church, whither came to them the duke Chateau le Reault, with his sonne the earle of Araine, the earles of Arguile, Glenearne, Southerland, Wentithe, and Rothus, the lord James prior of Saint Andrews, the lord Ruythuen alias Riuen, the lord Oglesce, the lord Boyde, the maister of Marwell, the L. of Dunsstone, the maister of Lindsey, the bishop of Saliswary, the abbot of Saint Colmes Inch, the abbot of Culros, the lord of Pettitrow, the lord of Cunningham head, sir lord of Gange and other, about 200. hobyers, there they late in counsell and departed for that night.

On the 3. of Aprill, the lord Grey, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, sir George Howard, sir Henrie Percy, and diuerse other capitaines and gentlemen, rode into Pinkey, a house of the abbot of Dumfries, where the earle of Araine, and the lord James Steward, with diuerse other noble men of Scotland meeting them, did conuoke them into the said house, where they had long conference together, and after dinner they returned with the lord lieutenant vnto Salt Preston.

The fourth of Aprill, five young gentlemen appointed to passe into England for plidges, their names were, lord Claude Hamilton, fourth sonne to the duke Chateau le Reault, Robert Dowglas, Archibald Cambell, lord of Longhennel, George Gream second sonne to the earle of Wentithe, James Coningham, sonne to the earle of Glenearne.

The sixt of Aprill, the campe raised from Salt Preston and marched forwards, halfe a mile from Westricke, beneath a Cragge called Arhurs seate, the duke of Chateau le Reault, the earle of Araine, the earle of Arguile, the lord James prior of Saint Andrews, and the rest of the noble men of Scotland, accompanied with two hundred horsemen, and five hundred footmen, staid for the coming of the English armie, whereupon the lord Grey, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, sir George Howard, and sir Henry Percy repaired to them, & had conference with the duke, and other the Scottish lords that were in his company.

In the meane while the army staid, but yet at length the horsemen, the bartgard and battell, were commaunded to march forth, who accordingly passed along by the place where the duke and Scottish lords staid, untill they approached neare to Westricke: There came Trombull, the Queene Regents trumpet, to the lord lieutenant, and brought with him a safeconduitt, given vnder the hand and seale, for the safe repaire of sir James Croft, sir George Howard, and sir other to accompany them. Whereupon, they preparing themselves, departed towards Edenborough, where the said Queene as then lay within the castle. There went with them maister Sommerlet, maister Pelham, and foure other gentlemen. Whilst they were in conference with the Queene, the Frenchmen to the number of nine hundred or a thousand shot, backed with five hundred crossers and pikes, and about fiftie horsemen, were come forth of Lieth, vnder conuocation of maister Doylell, and the countie Martignes colonell of the French footmen. The Lord Grey vnderstanding thereof, came by to the hill, appointed an officer at armes called Rouge Crosse: to go vnto them, with commaundement from him, that they should retire their forces forth of the field into the towne of Lieth: for if it were not for the promise which he had made to the queene Dowager, he would cause them to depart. The herault doing his message, receiued answer, that they were vpon their maister and mistresse ground, and therefore meant not to remove from it. Rouge Crosse returning with this answer, was sent againe, to commaund them eftsoons to go their way backe to Lieth, for if they did not, they should be sent away with a mischief. But vniuers had the herault done this second message, when the French men stepping forth, discharged a whole bolle of their shot into the field against the Lord Grey and his companie. Whereupon, the Englishmen and they fell in skirmish, which continued for the space of foure houres and more, to hot and earnestly maintained on both parts, that the like had not lightly bene scene long time before: yet at the length the Englishmen drove the French footmen ouer the hill, and won the Crag from them, and put them from a Chappell, where they had stood a great while, vsing it for a court from the Englishmens shot. Then the enemies that were in Lieth shot off diuers peeces of their great attillerie out of the Towne against the Englishmen, who on the other part brought forth two field peeces, and covered them with a troupe of horsemen, and hauing planted them to some aduantage, discharged the same among the enemies, who perceiuing that, gaue place, and sodainly the English demulances gaue a charge on them, brake in amongst them, and slue diuerse of them, whereby they were forced to retire backe into Lieth, being followed vnderneath to the gates of the Towne. There were slaine in this skirmish of the French about 140. beside them that remained prisoners. Of the Englishmen there were also diuerse slaine, and many hurt. The same day sir James Croft and sir George Howard returned from the D. Regent, after they had spent a long time in talke with her.

The seventh of Aprill, a new trench was cast beside the Crag, and thereon two peeces of ordinance planted. The eight of Aprill, the Frenchmen shot at the English campe very sore out of Saint Nicholas steeple, where were planted two great peeces of ordinance, although they did no great hurt: but the same night the Englishmen cast a trench beyond the Crag, and placed in the same trench certaine small peeces of attillerie, which went off the next day against the enemies, and they likewise shot off against the English. The twelfth of Aprill, a bullet of a great peece of ordinance, being shot out of Lieth, did light in the campe and slue three men: but they were answered againe with our Canons. The thirtieth day of Aprill, being Easter day, the Englishmen shot off their great Ordinance, and the Frenchmen answered them againe all that day. The footmen also skirmished, so that diuerse were hurt on both parties. The same day the pile of Blackencle was surrendered to maister Winter. The same day, 9. French men apperelled like woomen came forth of Lieth, and counterfeiting some light demaiois, trained one of the English footmen within their danger, whom they took, and chopped off his head, which they set vpon the toppes of one of their Church steeples. The fifteenth day of Aprill, a fiftie horsemen, and about five hundred barquebusiers, who making to the new trenches, were vpon the Englishmen that warred vpon such a sodaine, that they slue and wounded no small number, and possessing the trenches awhile, stopped the touch holes of their peeces of the attillerie, tooke maister Maurice Berkeley prisoner, and his ensigne:

to the English.

Brian Fitz Williams was sore wounded, &c. The alarme being brought to the campe, sir James Croft and other repaired towards the trench with all expedition, and perceiving the French men to be maisters of one of the trenches, he commanded captain Vaughan with his band to enter the trench, and to releue that that were hardly befit of the Frenchmen, which was done with such manhood, that the enemies were repulsed, and sundrie of them slaine: captain Somerle and captain Reade with their bands followed them as they retired, and master Arthur Grey with certaine demuliers, and charging them with great courage, drave them into the towne, and made of them great slaughter, but Arthur Grey was shot through the shoulder. The 16. of Aprill, a supply of 2000. footmen came to the campe, over whom was captain sir Andrew Corbet, sir Rowland Stanley, sir Thomas Hesketh, sir Arthur Manwering, sir Laurence Smith, master Francis Tunstall, master Edward Littleton, captain Carvell, Philip Shurley, and David Morris. They were garded with 500. horsemen, sir Ralph Sadler, sir Francis Leake, sir John Folter, and sir Nicholas Strange, having charge to see them safely conducted. Who after they had brought the pass all danger of enemies, left the in safety by the way, and were come a day or two before them to the campe.

The 17. of Aprill, Master Winter caused diuers of the ship-boats being well manned, to give a great alarme at the side of the towne towards the water, discharging many balles and harquebusers of croke into the towne, during which time there was a pitious cry made by the women and children within the towne. The 20. of Aprill, many peeces were shot off out of the trenches into the towne. There issued out at the gates one hundred shot, to haile such of the Englishmen as came forth to offer skirmish, the pioneers both Scots and English were occupied in making of a new trench neare to the towne.

The twentieth of Aprill, the Bishop of Calance, accompanied with sir Henry Percy, and three hundred horsemen, came to Kestericke, the Lord Lieutenant, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, and sir Raffe Sadler, met him at the further end of the ward. After they had received him with salutations, he was conducted by Rouge croffe from the campe vnto Edenborough, and so up to the castle to confer with the Queene Dowager. He was no sooner in the castle, but there issued forth of Litch the number of two hundred Frenchmen, and began a hot skirmish, which continued two hours, at which diuers were slaine on both parts. The same night, nine peeces of ordnance were planted in the new trench, so that the next day the same peeces were shot off toward the steeple of St. Anthonies Church, whereby the peeces of ordnance that lay in the same steeple, were dismounted by them, and likewise those that lay in the steeple of Saint Nicholas Church, where a Gunner was slaine that stood at one of them, the pece and the gunner tumbling downe both together: a great pece of this church was beare downe, and the steeple defaced. The Bishop of Calance after he had talked with the Queene, returned to commune with the Lords of the congregation.

The 23. of Aprill, the Pioneers Scottish and English, were busied in calling of trenches.

On the 24. of Aprill, there issued out of Litch seauenteen horsemen, who offered the skirmish, and under the place called little London, 300. or 400. of their shot were were placed, at length certaine of the English Lancers gaue a charge vpon their host, who therewith retiring betw the Englishmen within danger of their shot, but the French were forced to retire, without any great hurt done to the Englishmen.

The 25. of Aprill, the Pioneers finished the new fort, named Mount Pelham, to the gard wherof Captain Vaughan was appointed gouernor with 1200. soldiers. This fort was raised on the south side of the towne, the plot wherof was call square with foure bulwarkes at euerie corner, and 12. battering peeces planted in places conuenient. This day, there issued out of Litch on the East side, 70. or 80. horsemen, and 200. harquebusers offering the skirmish, towards whom certaine of the English light horsemen made, and charging them, drave the backe to their footmen, who with their shot received the light horsemen so sharply, that they were forced to retire: in the which retire James Hamilton a Scottish man was taken prisoner. This day captain Perith, and captain Hayes, having charge of a troupe of light horsemen, under sir Henry Percy, and the lord of Brange, were taken prisoners before Dunbar, and to the number of 20. or 30. other were likewise taken of slaine. The same night also 2000. footmen with the pioneers, were sent to the other side of the towne, beyond the Canon milles, where the pioneers cast a trench for the safe lodging of the army, which removed the next day from Kestericke downe into the valley by the said Canon milles, called the red Brades. As the army was incamping, certaine of the enemies horsemen and footmen skirmished with the English Lancers and light horsemen a long time, there were two Frenchmen slaine with their horses also. In time of this skirmish, two Canons were conveyed and planted in the new trench, which discharged diuers shot at the enemies.

The seven and twentieth of Aprill, the great artillerie was planted aloft on the hill aboue the campe, within lesse than a curious shot of the towne walls, and the pioneers were let a worke to call new trenches, from the place where the same ordnance was lodged vnto Mountpelham, draving to weere vnto Litch, as the harquebule might reach them that watched and warded within the great bulwark. The French kept the same day a trench which they had made without the towne, continually shooting at the English men in the campe, but the same night the English men won that trench from them, slue diuers of them therein with their shot, which being done, they gaue a great alarme to the towne both by land and water, the ship-boates shooting off against the towne very hotly, and they within the towne likewise at the English men. The same night was the great ordnance planted, and master Markham hurt. The 28. the said great ordnance went off, and shot continually the more part of the day. The bishop of Calance departed the same day towards Barwicke, and this night sir George Howard, that had bene sent backe to Barwicke, to signifye to the D. of Norfolk the estate of the siege, returned with sir Richard Lee, being conducted with 500. horsemen.

The 30. of Aprill, the great artillerie were shot off very hotly, and the French likewise shot off theirs, and continuing forth of the towne, skirmished with the Englishmen: this night the pioneers made new trenches towards the South bulwark. The last of Aprill, a sodaine fire was raised within the towne, which hugely increased and continued the most part of the night following: at the beginning when it first appeared, the English ordinance was shot off to the place where the fire was, which shot together with help of the wind that was very great, did marvellously augment the same fire: nevertheless the French at that present time offered a skirmish, & continued the same neare the space of two houres. It was appointed, that certaine bands should make alarme to the towne, in so much that capitaine Vaughan, with diuerse other souldiers of Mountpelham entered the ditch, and approached the walls, but retired without receiving any great hurt. The first of May, the Frenchmen early in the morning let by their may-poles in certaine bulwarkes and 14. ensignes, the which being discovered of them in the campe, they saluted them with a peale of great ordinance, and likewise the French answered them againe, and so continued the most part of that day.

The second of May, the pioneers made the trenches for the artillery to be planted in battery. The night following they placed the artillery in the new trench, and the next morning, the same battery went off, and continued all that day. The night ensuing, the pioneers made a trench by the Citadell, wherein they might lodge some shot, and capitaine Vaughan with diuerse of the bands in Mountpelham gave two fierce assaults to the towne, entered the ditches and victored the flankers: whereupon the French shot off the same flankers and munning their walls, shot off two or three volies of their final artillery, slaying and hurting to the number of twenty Englishmen, among other little Norton was one.

The fourth of May, there were three ensignes appointed to gard the new trenches, and towards night the Frenchmen that were in the trench under the Citadell, made a fallie upon the Englishmen that garded the layd trench, but could not preuaile. The same night the Englishmen conveyed two culverings over the water to scoure the mills, and before the breake of the day they had bent one of the same mills. The sixt of May, 4. souldiers belonging to our great ordinance set fire & bent the other mill. This day also, as French gentlemen came forth to discover the English trenches, capitaine Reade commanded one of his souldiers to shoot at them, but through mislapp his peece burst, and a hurt therof brake the arme of the layd capitaine.

The first of May, the English ordinance on the further side the water began to shoot off against the enemies very hotely. This day the earle of Arguile, and diuerse other noble men of Scotland, came to Edenborough with two thousand horsemen and footemen, who shewed themselves in order of a muster on the hill underneath the castle, which being perceived of the French within Lieth, they shot of three great peeces of artillery at them, but hurt them not. The night ensuing the great ordinance in the English mens trenches and bulwarkes, continued shooting on every side: and herewith commandement was given by the lord lieutenant and the councill, that the whole army should be ready armed by midnight. In the morning by two of the clocke, diuerse bands passed forth towards the towne, and entering the ditches offered to scale, other capitaines with their men approached the bulwarkes, and other were appointed to enter beside the milles. Beside the English bands, there were a thousand Scots ioynd with them, whereof five hundred with capitaine Vaughan and other were commanded to attempt the bulwark next to Mountpelham, and other five hundred went with such English capitaines as were commanded to assault the breach.

Moreover, as well the lances as light horsemen, were assigned to gard the fields: Sir George Howard with the lances keeping betwixt the fort of Mountpelham and the sea westward, and Sir Henry Percy with the light horsemen, betwixt the campe and the sea eastward. The rest of the footmen that went not to the assault, were also appointed to gard the trenches and field, in such wise as was thought expedient, and upon warning given by capitaine Randall sergent major, such as had bin commanded to give the assault in their severall appointed places, pressed with courage, & boldly adventured to climb the walls, and enter at the breaches, but yet their attempt wanted the wished successe: for what through the policy of the french, in stopping the currat of the river that night, & what by reason of the bitterness of the ladders, being too short, the assailants were repulsed, & were forced to retire with the losse of 7. or 8. score englishmen, or more, which were slaine outright, besides those that were wounded, being at the least two or three hundred.

The 8. of May, Sir George Howard and Sir Richard Lee departed toward Bartwike with certaine companies of horsemen for their safe conduction.

The ninth of May, the Frenchmen wrought within the towne to fortifie and repaire the breaches. The same day also the French had manned to the sea-wards a bote fraught with fifty harquebussiers, meaning to compe them out to Inket, but the English ships discouraging them, prepared certaine botes to encounter the, whereof they being aware, returned.

The 10. of May, maister Ingleby, capitaine Pickman, and capitaine Browne came to the campe from Bartwike with a supply of foure hundred & fifty souldiers.

The twelfth of May about midnight, the Frenchmen to the number of two hundred sallied forth of the towne, intending to give a carnado to the Englishmen that kept watch in the trenches at the west side of Mountpelham, but they were detected and repulsed.

The fifteenth of May, Sir Francis Leake came to the campe with a supply of five hundred men from Bartwike.

The one and twentieth of May about seven of the clocke at night, there issued forth of Lieth six horsemen and a hundred footemen harquebussiers, marching toward Mountpelham to offer skirmish: whereupon capitaine Vaughan went forth to them very orderly, and skirmished with them a petty while, in the end the frenchmen were driven to retire. The same night maister Francis Sommeres and other capitaines were appointed to keepe a fort built about the campe, and took the name of him being capitaine thereof, & was called Sommeres mount. The 22. Sir Peter Carew came to the campe, being sent from the court. The 24. of May at night about seven of the clocke, the french sallied forth to the number of 300. footmen and 20. horsemen, meaning, as it appeared, to have worne the trenches from the Englishmen, whereupon a fore skirmish followed, diuers slaine, and many hurt on both parts: yet in the end the french were driven home by force. The same day the Frenchmen of Dunbarre tooke an English hoy laden with beere, hefe and bacon.

The eight of June Sir John Newill with three hundred men, capitaine Bridges, and capitaine Drewry, with other three hundred, set from Bartwike towards the campe, camp, where they arrived on the 10. of June, on which day the queene Dowager departed this life.

The thirteenth of June, Sir William Cicill principall secretary to the queenes maiesty, with Sir William Cordall, and doctor Worton deane of Canterbury and Pope came to Barwicke, appointed commissioners on her said maiesties behalfe to treat of an accord with the countie de Randon, and the bishop of Valence commissioners sent for that purpose from the French king and his wife Mary queene of Scots.

The fourteenth of June a certaine number of Frenchmen came forth of Lieth to gather cockles on the sands towards Mountpelham, whereof the Englishmen preceiuing, set upon them, slue 70. and tooke 16. of them prisoners.

The sixteenth of June, the forsworned commissioners came to Edenborough, and as maister Secretary and the other passed the English forts and campe, they were saluted with a gallant peale of harquebushers.

The seventeenth of June about eight of the clocke, an abstinence of warre was concluded, warning being given by the discharging of two peeces of ordinance out of the castle, and then the Frenchmen shewed themselves upon their rampiers.

The 22. of June, the abstinence of warre was broken off.

The 4. of July about 3. of the clocke in the afternoone, the French came out of Lieth to gather cockles, whereupon the lord lieutenant bring at that present in Mountpelham, sent a drum unto monsieur Doyell, to signifie unto him, that his souldiers had gone further without their bounds then they might do by the order taken by the commissioners of both parts: Doyell answered, that they were no souldiers, but poore people which went to gather cockles for their reliefe and subsistence. The drum layd, that if they kept not themselves within their appointed limits, the lord lieutenant meant to send them backe not greatly to their ease: whereunto Doyell replied, that if he so did, he would do the best he could to ayde the: hereupon the English horsemen and footmen of Mountpelham gave a charge upon them, and slue of them to the number of 50. and tooke certaine prisoners.

The first of July issued put of Lieth fouretene horsemen, and a hundred footmen, which offered themselves, but upon the shooting of the great artillery from Mountpelham, they retired home againe into the towne. The night following about twelue of the clocke, one Scarragood an English man that was a gunner, and had faired himself to flicke from the English campe for manslaughter into Lieth, and was received of the frenchmen, believing that he had meant no deceit, came out of the towne, after he had remained there about seven dayes, in which meane while he had understood fully the state of the towne, and now upon his returne, made relation thereof as he knew.

The first of July, the lord Grey lord lieutenant, Sir William Cicill secretary, and Sir Ralph Sadler, about three of the clocke in the after noone, gave order, that there shold no pece be shot, nor shew of hostility made until seven of the clocke the same night: and herewith sent Gerueys Clifton unto all the souldiers that were in the frenches and bulwarkes on the west side of Lieth, to command them to observe the like order, and Sir John Neuill was sent with like order unto the souldiers that lay in Somerset moune.

The peace now being concluded on the seventh of July, Sir Francis Leake, and Peace concluded in Scotland. Sir Gerueys Clifton, accompanied with two French gentlemen were sent to the towne of Lieth, to signifie unto monsieur Doyell, the bishop of Amiens, Labrosse, Martignes, and other the French lords and captains, that they were comethither by commaundement from the commissioners to cause the peace already concluded, to be proclaimed, which accordingly was done in manner following:

The most mightie princeesse, Elizabeth by the grace of God, Queene of England, Fraunce, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. And the most christian king Francis and Mary, by the same grace of God king & queene of Fraunce and Scotland, haue accorded vpon a reconciliation of a peace and amitie to be inuolably kept betwixt them, their subiects, kingdomes and countries, and therefore in their names it is straitly commaunded to all manner of persons borne under their obediencies, or bring in their seruice, to forbear all hostilitie either by sea or land, and to keepe good peace each with other from this time forwards, as they will answer thereto at their bittermost perils. Immediately after this proclamation was ended Sir Francis Leake, and Sir Gerueys Clifton were brought to monsieur Doyells lodging, where was prepared for them a banquet of thirtie or forty dishes, & yet not one either of flesh or fish, saving one of a powdered horse, as was aduouced by one that auouched himselfe to haue tasted thereof.

Articles of the peace, thirteene in number, were to this effect.

1. First, the French king and queene do not onely relinquish the stile, title and armes of England and Ireland, but do also bind themselves from henceforth to forsake any more to vse or beare the same, and shall forbid their subiects the vying of the same title, in what sort soeuer it be, within any of their countries or dominions, forbidding also as much as in them lieth, the toyning or quartering any manner of waies the armes of England with those of Scotland or France.

2. All such letters patents, or other writings as haue bene heretofore made, wherein the said title is mentioned, or whereunto any stile concerning the said armes is annexed, shall be reformed, and new made, without putting to them the title of armes of England or Ireland, and that all manner of writings or instruments concerning the said title, and being sealed with the said armes, not being renewed or reformed within sixe monthes after the publication of this treatie, shall be void and of none effect.

3. After that this peace was then fully established, the French men were embarked at Litch in English vessels, whole onely excepted that were appointed to remaine as pledges with the English men till the Ships came backe againe, and a few other that were permitted to passe through England into their country.

The sixt of July, through shooting of a gunne which brake in the houle of one named Adrian Arden a Dutch man in Crooked lane, and letting fire on a sicken & barrell of gun powder, foure houses were blowne bp, and diuerse other foue shattered, nine men and women were slaine, and diuers other foue wounded.

On Michaellmas euen before noone, was published by proclamation, that the tesson coyned for twelve pence, and in the raigne of king Edward the first called downe to fire pence, should now forthwith (of the best sort marked with the portcullis) be taken for foure pence halfe peny, the second, marked with the greghound for two pence farthing, the third and worst sort, not marked as aforesaid, not to be taken for any value: the greates should be taken for two pence, the two peny pence for a peny, &c. And shortly after, her grace restored to her subiects fine sterling money, for their corrupt and base coin, calling the same to her maiesties mints, according to the rate before mentioned.

The 9. of October the French crowne that went current for 6. Shillings four pence was proclaimed to be fire shillings.

The quenes maiestie made great preparation of armor, munition, and powder, to be in a readinesse to defend her realme, if need should happen.

The one and twentieth of March, a notable grammar schoole was founded by the maister, wardens, and assistants of the worshipfull compaignie of the merchant Tailors of London, in the parish of Saint Laurence Pountney in the same city: Richard Hills late maister of that compaignie having given five hundred pound toward the purchase of an house, called the Hamoy of the Roke sometime the duke of Buckingham, wherein the schoole is kept.

The 10. of April was one William Geffrey whipped from the Wardhalles in Southwarke to Bedlem without Bishops gate of London, for that he professed one John Moore to be Christ our Saviour: on his head was let a paper wherein was writte as followeth, William Geffrey a most blasphemous hereick, denying Christ our Saviour in heaven. The sayd Geffrey being stayed at Bedlem gate, John Moore was brought forth, before whom William Geffrey was whipped till he confessed Christ to be in heaven. Then the sayd John Moore being examined, and answering ouerthwartly, was commanded to put off his coat, doublet and shirt, which he seemed to do very willingly, and after being tied to the cart, was whipped an arrowes woote from Bedlem, where at the last he also confessed Christ to be in heaven, and himselfe to be a sinful man: then was John Moore sent againe unto Bedlem, and William Geffrey to the Wardhalles, where they had laine prisoners nigh a yeare and a halfe, the one for professing himselfe to be Christ, the other a disciple of the same Christ.

This yeare was such a scarcity of wheate and other graine, that Sir Wilham Chesler maior of London, and other the principall magistrats of the city, were byed to make provision for wheate & rie from beyond the seas, to a great quantity, which was a releefe, not only to the citizens, but also to the countries neare adioyning.

On Wednesday the fourth of June, betwene foure and five of the clocke in the afternoone, the steeple of Pauls in London, being fired by lightning, byall forth (as it seemed to the beholders) two or three yards beneath the foote of the crosse, and from thence bent downe the sphere to the stone worke and bels, so terribly, that within the space of foure hours, the same steeple, with the roofes of the church so much as was timber, or otherwise combustible, were consumed, which was a lamentable sight, and pittifull remembrance to the beholders thereof.

The length of Pauls church in London is twelue score Taylors paces, which is seven hundred and twentie foote: the breadth thereof is one hundred and thirty foote: the height of the steeple was five hundred and twentie foote, wherof the stone worke is two hundred and thirtie foote: and the spere which now is burnt, was likewise two hundred and thirtie foote: the height of the body of that church is one hundred and thirtie foote.

After this mischaunce, the Q. maiestie being much grieved for the losse of so beautifull a monument, directed her highnesse letters to the Maior of London, willing him to assemble the citizens, to take some order for speciall ayde & helpe for the repairing againe of the same and the of her most gracious disposition, to giue a comfort unto other, for the furtherance thereof, did presently giue and deliuer in gold 1000. marks, & a warrant for 1000. load of timber to be taken out of her maiesties woods or elsewhere. And the citizens of London granted one beneuolence, & three shillings to be forthwith paid. And the cleargie of England under the prouince of Canterbury granted to giue the fortieth part of the value of their benefices, being charged with first fruits, & not being charged with first fruits, to pay the thirtieth part. And the cleargie of the diocesse of London granted to giue the thirtieth part of their benefices, being in first fruits and the 20. part being out of first fruits. And immediately by the commandment of her maiestie, her priuie counsell took order, that six citizens of London, and two of the cleargie of the church of Pauls, had charge to oversee, and set forward this worke, who made such expedition, that within one month next following the burning thereof, the same was covered with boords and lead, after the manner of a false roofe: and the grates of the worke dispatched in so short time could scarcely be credited of any but such as saw the same. And the cause of this great hall, was for feare of raine, which might haue perished the waits, to the destruction of the whole church: and before the said yeare was fully ended, all the side fles of the said Church were framed of new and maine timber, and covered with lead, and fully finished. And the same yeare also the great roofoe of the west end was framed and made of new and great timber in Poykeshire, and brought to London by sea, and set up and covered with lead, and fully finished. And in like manner within the said yeere, the whole roofoe and frame of the east end of the said church was made in Poykeshire, and brought by sea to London, and after set up as the rest of the roofoes, but the roofoes of the north and south endes of the same church remained covered with boordes till 1564. that the bishop as I am informed tooke upon him the charge of repaying them, and for the same laid out 720. pound, and so that woork ceased to proceed any further.

New coines. The fifteenth of November, the Queenes maiestie published a proclamation by divers finall peeres of silver money to be current, as the six pence, foure pence, thre pence, two pence, and a penny, three half pence, and three farthings: & also forbad all foraine coines to be current within the same realme, as will gould as silver, calling them into her maiesties mints, except two sorts of crowns of gold, the one the French crowne, the other the Flemish crowne: whereupon for the space of half a yeere, was weekly brought into the Tower of London 8000. 10000. 12000. 16000. 20000. 22000. pound of silver plates: & as much or more in pistolets, and other gold of Spanish coines, & one weeke in pistolets and other Spanish gold 26000 pound, all these to be coined with the queenes stamps.

This yeare in England were many monstrous birthes: in March a mare brought forth a foale with one body, and two heads, and as it were a long taile growing out betwene the two heads. Also a sow farrowed a pigge with foure legges like to the armes of a man child, with hands and fingers, &c. In April a sow farrowed a pigge with two bodies, eight feete, and but one head, many calves and lambes were monstrous, some with collers of skin growing about their neckes, like to the double ruffes of Whirs and necker-thicks then bred. The foure and twentieth day of May, a man child was borne at Chichester in Suffe, the head, armes, and legges whereof, were like an Anatomie, the breast and belly monstrous bigge from the nauill, as it were a long string hanging: about the necke a great collar of flesh and skin growing like to the ruffe of a shirt or neckerchief, conuining up about the eares pleyting and folding, &c.

Declaration
stie, causes
why to arme her subiects
into France.

The realme of France being in great trouble about this season, by means of civil dissension and waerres that rose amongst themselves, the queenes maiestie and her honorable privy counsell being enquired thereof, first published a booke entitled, A declaration of the Queenes Maiestie, containing the causes which have constrained her to arme certaine of her subiects for defence both of her owne estate and of the most christian king Charles the ninth her good brother, and his subiects. The booke followeth thus:

Although the miserable and afflicted estate of the realme of France is to be lamented of all christian princes and nations, and requirith some good remedy, not only for preservation of the king there, with the queene his mother, and the subiects of that realme from danger and ruine: but also for the stay of the rest of christendome in peace, and to be free from the like civil waerre, into the which, as it appeareth by these strange dealings in the said realme, it is meant the same shall fall: yet there is no prince that hath more iust cause to haue regard hereunto, nor that hath more indifferently and earnestly intended the recovery of quietnesse: and accord therein, then the queenes maiestie of this realme of England, both by her owne gracious disposition and by aduise of her counsell. For as the matter is now plainly discovered to the world, and as her maiestie hath proued the same sufficiently by her owne late experience, she is not only touched as other princes ought to be, with great compassion and commiseration for the unnatural abusing of the french king her good brother, by certaine of his subiects, the danger of his person and his blood, the lamentable and barbarous destruction, hauocke and spoile of so many christian innocent people beyond all measure: but her maiestie also euidently seeth before her eyes, that if some good remedy be not by Gods godnesse provided in season, the very fire that is now kindled and dispersed there, is purposely meant and intended to be conveyed and blowne out to inflame this her crowne and her realme. Which great perill, although it be so plainly seene to all wise and prudent men both at home and abroad, that they cannot mislike her care and prouidence to remedy the same in time, yet hath her maiestie thought not butt to notify some part of her dealings herein, so as it shall well appeare how sincerely her maiestie hath both hitherto proceeded with her neighbours, and how plainly and upright she is determined to continue.

First, it hath bene well seene to the world how well disposed her maiestie was men at the beginning of her raigue, to the restitution of peace to christendome, that for loue thereof, was contented to forbear for certaine yeeres the restitution of a portion of her ancient dominion, when all other parties to the same peace, with whom and by whole alliance her crowne sustained losse, were immediately reddey to the most part of their owne in possession: and yet it cannot be forgotten within how short a space, or rather no space after, and by whom, and upon how great evident and iust causes, as well by means of force and armes first taken, as by other open attempts against her selfe, she was constrained to prepare like armes of defence onely, euen for her whole crowne and kingdome, and ioynly therewith by the lastie of her next neyghbors from a plaine tyrannie. And also how sincerely her maiestie proceeded therein: first by sundrie requestes and means made, to forbear their attempts: next, by open declaration of her intent to be onely for defence of her selfe, and by the whole handling of the matter: and lastly, by the euent and issue of the cause, all the world hath cleerely understood.

After which dangerous troubles pacified the M. of Scots at her returne to her country, feeling the great commouitment hereof following, both to her selfe and her realme, & understanding the sincere dealing of the M. maiestie in all her former actions, did by diuers means give signification to her maiestie of a great desire to enter with with her into a straighter kind of amitie: whereunto her maiestie being of her owne nature much inclined, readily accorded. And how far and prosperously they both proceeded therein by many and sundrie mutuall offices of friendship, aswell the good will shewed by her maiestie to the Queene of Scots brides, the Guisles, and to all her friends and ministers passing and repassing through this her realme, as also the accord of the interview intended betwixt them both this last summer, hath well declared.

But in the midst of these her M. quiet and peaceable determinations, she hath bene to her great griefe bitterly disappointed, and constrained for her owne interest to attend and intermeddle in the pacification of these great troubles in France nere to her realme, the same being stirred up by such as both were her last manifest great enemies, and have also (they know how) continued the cause of mistrust till this day, by manifest arguments of iniustice, which her maiestie is content to conceale, for the great affection that she beareth to the Scottish M. First her maiestie at the beginning, doubting by the increase of these French troubles, that not onely that realme should fall into danger of ruine by division, as it now is, but also, that the rest of Christendome, and specially her owne realme, both for the necessity thereto, and for the respects of them to which were the principall authors and parties in these troubles, should be also disturbed and brought to danger: used all the means that might be by messagers, by solicitations, by advice, yea by a speciall ambassade of a person of good credit, to have some mediation made betwixt these parties being at controuersie. But such was the policy and violence of the one party in hasty proceeding even at the first, as no mediation could be heard of or allowed. And yet could not her M. discontinue her good intent, but seeing the cruelties increase, the bloodshedding and murders continued: yea, which was most perilous, the young king and the M. his mother being sodainly assailed, and found without force, were directed & drayone altogether by the very authors of the troubles, to suffer their name & authority to be abused, even to the killing of the kings owne unarm'd innocent people, the spoiling of his rich townes, the breaking of his best advised Councils, the persecuting of his own blood and his nobilitie, the destroying of his faithfull appoynted servants, with many such other heapes of mischiefs: and all these for no other cause, but for the particular appetites of some, and to break with violence the ordinances of the realme, specially those which were lately devised by the long and great counsell of the realme, both for quietnesse in matters of religion, and for the reliefe of the Kings estate others waies.

And finally her M. understanding very certainly of an open destruction & subuersion there put already in oye, & likewise intended against all states and persons professing the gospell abroad, her maiestie thought it very needfull to thinke of some other means of more efficacy, to induce the authors of those troubles, to give earre to some reasonable motions of accord, & not to adventure the ruine of a realme for their particular appetites: and therefore determined to send a Solemne ambassade of a certain number of personages of her counsell, being of great authority, experience, & indifference to repaire into France, to assay how some way might be reasonably devised for these extremities, by preserving of both parts indifferently, to the service of the K. their soveraigne, according to their estate of birth and calling.

But this manner of proceeding also could no wise be liked nor allowed, neither

could answer be had hereunto from the good young king, nor the timorous queene his good mother, without the only direction of that part, which both began and continued the troubles from the beginning.

And whilst her Maiestie was thus well occupied, meaning principally the weale and honour of the king her good brother, and secondly, well towards both the parties being at division, without the prejudice of either: a plaine contrary course and proceeding was bid against her Maiestie, by the which was made manifest what was further meant and intended by them that had so oftentimes refused to heare her Maiestie speake for mediation and accord. All her Maiesties subjects and marchants as well of her cities of London and Exeter, as of other port townes in the west parts of the realme, being at that very time in diuers parts of the countrey of Britaine, restoring thither only for trade of marchandises, and ready to returne to their owne ports, were in the same time apprehended, spoiled, unjustly imprisoned: yea, such as sought to defend themselves, cruelly killed, their ships taken, their goods and marchandise sealed, and nothing sayd nor deuised to charge them, but onely furiously calling them all Hugonots, a word though very strange and foolishly to many of the honest marchants and poore mariners: yet fully sufficient to declare from whence these commandments came, and what their intent is to prosecute, when their time shall serue them: neither were these spoiles small of few, but in value and number great and many: neither done by private fury, but by publike officers, who were also maintained by gouernours of the countrey: yea none of her maiesties subjects were spared that could be taken, though some escaped with great hazard. Well, hercof complaint was made where it ought to be, but therein hath bene as small regard had, as was before for robbing of her maiesties owne messengers with her letters from her ambado, and yet the fact unpunished without any satisfaction for the same: wherein her maiestie surely noteth and pitieth the lacke rather of authority, then of good will in the K. or the queene his mother, or the king of Nauarre his lieutenant: but seeth manifestly by this and by all other proceedings, in what hard termes the estate of the young king is set, that can neither be permitted to preferue his owne people and seruants, his owne lawes and ordinances, neither to answer to other princes and people in foyme of iustice, that which he ought to do.

Upon these and other former dangerous enterprises against her maiestie and her crowne, may it well appeare to all persons of indifferent iudgement, how these violent proceedings in France, conducted at this time by the duke of Guise and his adherents, do touch the queenes maiestie, much nearer for her state and realme then any other prince of Christendome. Wherefore seeing the authority of the king & the queene his mother, with their quiet good counsellors, cannot at this time haue place to direct their affaires neither towards their owne people, nor towards their neighbours, neither can any mediation sought by her maiestie for concord be allowed: but contrariwise, the tender persons of the king and the queene his mother be manifestly abused, and dangerously caried about for the particular pleasures onely of a few persons, and specially those of Guise, to wall the kings countrey, to sacke and spoile his rich and great townes, to kill and murder the multitude of his good and true subjects: and seeing also the quarrell manifestly manifestly published and persecuted both by writing and otherwise by them, is to subuert the whole possession of true religion through Christendome by force, without mercy, and thereby to stir up a civil bloody lamentable war in all Christendome. Lastly, seeing they which be the authors and maintainers of all these diuisions, are well knowne to the world to be the same, that when time serued them, bent their whole endeouours to offend and diminish the crowne and dignity of this realme of England, and of late time for the exaltation of their particular house, deuised vniuersally to assaile the whole crowne of England by sundry waies, though by Gods goodnesse their practises and counsels turned for that time to their owne confusion: As by the same goodnesse they shall at all times hereafter.

How may her maiestie, without note of manifest unkindnesse to her deare young brother and confederate, of immortallnesse to her next neighbours his subiects, of uncharitablenesse to the common quiet of Christendome: and lastly, which is nearest to her selfe, of inexcusable negligence to the surety of her owne estate, her country and people, suffer these few troublesome men first to despoil and shed the blood of a number of Christian people, whose blood by nearnesse of place to her maiesties realme may be stopped, or some waies saved, next to purpose take such townes and hauens, whereby their former long intended and manifest practises against the crowne of this realme, may be most easily for them, and dangerously for this realme, put in use and execution? Wherefore for these reasonable, evident, urgent, and necessarie considerations, and not without the lamentable and continuall request of the French kings subiects her maiesties next neighbours, crying to her maiestie onely for defence of themselves, their ports and townes from tyrannye and subuersion, during this their kings minority, or at the least during this his inability to pacifie these troubles: Her maiestie hath put certaine numbers of her subiects in order both by sea and land, to saue some part of her good brothers innocent people from this tyranny, slaughter and ruine, and to preserve some speciall townes and ports of importance, for the king her good brother, that they come not into the possession of them: who if they had them, might more easily thereby prosecute their old particular practises against this realme, as in times lately past they did manifestly attempt, whereby of necessitie they must needs endanger the perpetuity of the peace betwixt the French king and her maiestie, and so consequently, though against the meaning of the king, depriue her maiestie of her good right to her towne of Calcis and the members thereof: Whereof it behooueth her maiestie, as things be handled to gaue good regard. And in this sort her maiestie doubteth not, but the sincerity of her doings, tending onely to procure Christian quietnesse by sauing of Christian blood, shall well please almighty God, content the king her good brother, when he shall be in estate and libertie to ponder the same indifferently, and serue also for the iust and naturall defence of her selfe, her peoples and countries: and finally by Gods grace shall establish the continuance of some more assured peace and concord betwixt both their maiesties and countries, so as either of them may quietly enioy and rule their owne. And in the incense time, her maiestie assurcth the sayd king, the queene his mother, the king of Nauarre, and all his good counsellours and subiects, that whatsoeuer any malicious malicious or discontented person shall sinisterly report of her intent and doings: her M<sup>ty</sup> meaneth nothing herein, but sincerely, & as y<sup>e</sup> necessitie of the time & cause requireth, without blushing any thing, or doing wrong or violence towards any of the French kings subiects, protesting before God and all the world, that her meaning is for a necessarie defence onely of the true and good subiects of the French king, which otherwise apparantly in this troublesome time should be violently killed or destroyed: and so consequently her M<sup>ty</sup> intenseth by all manner of means possible, to keepe and continue good peace with the said king and all his countries, and to neglect no reasonable meanes that may procure libertie to himselfe, & quietnesse betwixt his subiects, which then shall succede when it shall please almighty God to giue to the selfe and chiefe authors of these troubles, grace to content themselves with their owne estates, and to haue within the compasse of their degrees like quiet subiects and sauourers of the common peace and tranquillitie of Christendome. A matter more necessarie at this time to be sought for, rather by consultation of Christian princes and states in briefe of mind and loue of peace and concord, then in this sort by word and fire, by pilate deuises and ferret factions to stir a diuision and ciuill warre in Christendome, vnder the cloke and pretence of religion.

These causes thus published at the request of the French themselves, namely, monieur de Vidame then capitaine of Brethauen, the bailie of Roane, the treasurer of Diepe and other, protesting the foresaid townes whereof they had charge, into her maiestie (if it would please her to further their proceedings of the Gospel, for that her maiestie was true inheritor not onely to those townes, but to all the whole kingdom of Fraunce, as they themselves confessed. In the month of September, her maiestie sent a band of her subiects to the towne of Brethauen in Normandy: who were embarked at Portsmouth, because that haue is most apt by transportation to that place, vpon whose arrivall the townes-men and inhabitants loyally surrendered themselves and their towne into the possession of the Queenes maiestie, which was kept by Englishmen from this month of September in Anno 1562. vnto the 29. of July then next following in the yeare 1563, as moxe at large shall be shewed. For the conduction of such forces as were to be sent over, her maiestie ordained the lord Ambrose Dudley earle of Warwick to be her principall lieutenant, capitaine generall, chiefe leader and gouernour of her said subiects, that should in such wise passe over into Normandy. Whereupon the said earle the 17. of October, tooke shipping at Portsmouth in the haue there, being aboard himselfe in the Queenes ship called the Acton barke, and setting forward sailed all that afternoone, and the night following directly towards Brethauen: but in the morning when he was within twentie miles of the towne of Brethauen, the wind suddenly changed contrarie to his course, so that being driuen to returne, about the next midnight he arrived in the Downs, and there remained at anchor till the next morning, and then was let on land by boate at Sandon castle betwixt Deal, and the same day at night came to Dover, and there lay till the 28. of October, and then taking ship againe sailed forth, but finding the wind nothing prosperous to his course, after he had lien all that night and day following, being on the seas, he was constrained backe againe to the haue of Dover, where he

He remained till the 28. of October, and on the 29. he landed at Prewbawen, where he was most hospitably received with a great peale of artillerie. The 30. of October, there came to Prewbawen from Dupe 50. light horsemen Scots, brought by one of maister Killigrewes servants. The last of October, the earle of Warwikes commission was proclaimed in Latin, English, and French, by Blew Manell pursuant to attenes, which being ended, his lordship went unto the church, & there sir Adrian Poinings knight Marshall, gave him his oth, and then my lord gave the estate for Adrian his oth, and after him were sworn Cuthbert Vaughan controller, John Fisher knight porter, William Bromfield master of the ordnance, William Robinson, Walker Bailiffe, and capitaine T. Wood Clarke of the counsell. The second of November, the earle of Warwike with the knight marshall and the controller, rode out of Prewbawen to Hautcuille, and so towards Mondcuille accompanied with all the horsemen English and Scottish, and a thousand footmen. The Scottish men and Montgomeries band passed forth and skirmished with them of Mondcuille, and the Scots brought away with them a boote of 300. sheepe, but in the morning they were returned backe againe by commandement of the earle of Warwike. Maister Controllers souldiers went as far as Warflew, and there skirmished with them of the garrison, but without any hurt to either part. The 4. of November, a barke of Prewbawen belonging to Francis Clarke, brought into the haven of the same towne 4. Buttains laden with Calcoine wine to the quantitie of 200. tuns, which they meant to have brought to the enemies, but was discharged in Prewbawen, and stood the English in good stead. The 6. of November, a great alarme was raised in the towne of Prewbawen, for upon the hills on the north side of the towne, the Keingraue & other showed themselves with 2000. footmen, & 500. horsemen: and therewith the Keingraue sent a trumpet to the towne, to advertise the L. lieutenant, that he was there on the hills, & that if it would please him to promise upon his honour & by the faith of a gentleman that he might come and go safe, he would be glad to come and see him, and talke with him. Whereupon the lord lieutenant taking with him certaine captains and gentlemen, rode forth of the towne, and sent before him sir Adrian Poinings the marshall with Stephen Medcalf her maisties trumpeter, unto the Keingraue, who talking with him, returned and met with the lord lieutenant, who therewith passed forward, and meeting with the Keingraue, they embraced each other, and conferred together: and the Keingraue told the lord lieutenant, that he was come to be his neighbour, with such other merry speech, and after taking leave each of other, they returned. The countie Montgomerie and monsieur Beauvoys had some talke also with the Keingraue, casting out bitter words in reproofe of the duke of Guise, and other whom they hated. The Keingraue coming backe to his army, forsooke all the countrie, and dyue away the more part of all the cattell that they could find, and coming to the church of Hautcuille, where an hundred and fiftie of Montgomeries band lay, they skirmished with them, and in the end Montgomeries souldiers were forced to retire, and abandon the place, & came to Prewbawen: but the next morning they returned, tooke the church, and kept it against the enemies as afoze.

The 11. of November, a proclamation was made in the name of the lord lieutenant, lieutenant, as well for good orders to be kept by the soldiers against the French inhabitants of the towne, & reforming of certaine greivances wherof the French had made complaint, as also for their coming to church to heare common prayer and preaching at due times, for the avoiding of unlawfull games, &c. The 12. of November, there went out of Prewbawen towards Warflew three bands of French men, containing about five hundred footmen, and suddenly they were beset by the Almains & French men of the garrison of Warflew, so that the French men of Prewbawen were driven to take the village of Graule, where they maintained the skirmish for the space of two howers, till the lord lieutenant sent forth with the controller the number of one thousand footmen, and all the English and Scottish horsemen, and maister Beauvoys with diverse French horsemen, who coming before Warflew, fell in skirmish with the enemies, to whose succour there issued forth of Warflew a great number of the Almains both horsemen and footmen: but the Englishmen behaved themselves so valiantly, that they beat them out of the field into the towne: and the Englishmen returned to Prewbawen with honor, having not lost past right of their soldiers, that were slain, and fire hurt.

The 13. of November, a pinnelle of the French men that belonged to Prewbawen, being gone forth the night before, brought into the haven a ship laden with Rochell wine five and twentie tuns, that was bound to the enemies. The 14. of November, another ship brought with twentie tuns of Calcoine wine was brought in as a prise, taken by a barke of Prewbawen. The 17. of November, a proclamation was made concerning orders taken by the lord lieutenant, that no English man nor French man should shoot off any harquebut within the towne, nor that any French man, except monsieur Beauvoys, or monsieur Briquevaule, or their companies should be out of their lodgings after nine of the clocke at night till the next morning on paine of death, except in alarmes.

The 23. of November, the Keingraue was leine on the north hills of the towne with fower score horsemen, whereupon the Scottish horsemen and three bands of footmen issued out, marched up towards the same hills in hope to meete with the enemies, but they were retired towards Mondcuille, and so nothing was done. The 25. of November, a soldier was hanged in the market place in Prewbawen, and therewith proclamation made that none should take any thing forcibly from the French, on paine of death. The same day came into the haven hopes and boats laden with wine, cider, perrie, wheate, becke, biscet, meale, &c. The same day also there landed at Prewbawen five hundred soldiers under the leading of Aeric Darcie, Reignald Higate, and William Twedie. The same day the Queenes ship called the Hare coming from Portsmouth, arrived at Prewbawen, and in her came sir John Portinorie, a man of great experience in fortification, they were by the way assailed by a French ship of nine tuns and better, but they that were aboard the Hare banquished the enemies, tooke the same ship, and brought her with them, being laden with wines. The same day sir John Moore landed at Prewbawen, bringing out with him five hundred soldiers for amply of the garrison.

captaine Edward Horley, with diuers other captaines and gentlemen, rode to the Reingraue, lying at a faire house not far from Wondeuille, where they dined with him, had great cheere, and returned to Petowhaen. The Reingraue sent for a present to the earle of Warwicke a great horse, very faire, with saddle and bridle, esteemed to be well woorth an hundred pound. The same day at night, the double Rose with other boats passed out of the haven, Edward Dudley and captaine Iohn Warde, being aboard with other to the number of an hundred good soldiers, sailing downe the river, landed besides Tankerville, and lay close all that night in a wood: in the morning monsieur Bimarre ensigne-brer to the countie Montgomerie, with six or seven French men brained went to the castle gate, & there fell in talke with monsieur Dimece, that was captaine of that fortresse, hauing about him ten soldiers. Whilst they were thus in talke, the English men and French men comming forth of the wood that was there at hand, reared by their ladders at the breach, which was made the summer before, and entering by the same, came downe into the baste court. Whilst thing when the French soldiers that kept talke at the castell gate perceived, the captaine beholding as good as three score armed men within the castell at his backe, he suddenly yielded himselfe, and in this sort was the castell taken, and the captaine brought prisoner to Petowhaen.

The 12. of December, the earle of Warwicke, monsieur de Beauuois & monsieur de Bricquemault, with all the horsemen, and 3000. footmen, passed forth of Petowhaen vnto Harflew, out of which towne issued 700. Reisters of the countie Reingraue, & 300. footmen, who fell in skemish with the French & English very hotly, but the English drave them to the gates of Harflew, & slew them there, and upon the waies of the towne: yet was there not slaine past leuen of the English part. The 17. of December, the countie Montgomerie and sir Hugh Paulet arrived at Petowhaen in one of the Duchesse ships called the Aïde.

Whilst things passed thus in Normandy, there ended his life at home the honourable baron and famous captaine, William lord Grey of Wilton, knight of the most noble order of the garter, at that present gouernor of Warwicke, & warden of the East marches against Scotland, he deceased the 25. of December at Cheshunt in Hertfordshire.

The 26. of December, the county de Montgomerie tooke shipping at Petowhaen rode, accompanied with fower hundred harquebusiers Frenchmen, and sailed to Diepe there to be gouernor of that towne.

The sixt of January, were apprehended captaine Blondell, captaine Moucobel, monsieur de Mainie, and Viraueu, with others, for some conspiracy or traiterous practise which they went about and had contriued.

The same day captaine Edward Horley with 200. souldiers, and captaine Francis Blunt with 100. tooke shipping at Petowhaen rode, and sailed to Diepe, there to remaine with the county Montgomerie.

The ninth of January, a great tempest of wind and thunder happened in the towne of Reister, which brouched 411. baires of houses, and ouerthrew many.

The sixteenth of January, the castle of Tankerville was surrendered to the Reingraue, after he had laie about it eight dayes, with two thousand horsemen and footmen. The 19. of Ianuarie, there landed at Petowhaen captaine Tremaine with sixtie horsemen very well appointed to serue there. The 24. of Ianuarie, Francis Clarke Frenchman arrived at Petowhaen with two tall ships of his owne, right well appointed for the wars, bringing with him three rich prizes.

The sixt of February, two ships of Britaines laden with Calcoine wine, butter, bacon, salt, and other victuals, were brought into Petowhaen by a shalop of Ballebeuf, that was resiant with other Frenchmen in Petowhaen, and had taken these two vessels as they were going to victual the enemies. The first of February, three mightie ships of war belonging to Francis Clarke, brought into Petowhaen three rich prizes laden with leeks, ballards, sugar, oranges, graines, and other marchandises. This Clarke had not bene forth past six weekes at this time, and yet he had got about 18. prizes well woorth the summe of 50000. pounds. The 7. of February, was Hunsford summoned by an herault sent from the French admirall, monsieur de Chacillon, The 8. of that month, the said admirall came before Hunsford with 6000. horsemen Reisters, and other of his own retinues, beside footmen, and 1000. horsemen of the countries thereabout, and about five of the clocke at night, there was a great peale of ordinance shot off at Petowhaen for a welcome to the said admirall.

The 12. of February, the French galliase of Petowhaen passing forth and waiting about Hunsford to seeke adventures in hope of succie, by reason the lord admirall of France lay thereby at Tonque, roade at an anchor, whilst some that were aboard in her went a land to gaine somewhat of the enemies, but they within Hunsford perceiuing this, made out their great galliase with 50. mariners and soldiers, who comming vpon the galliase of Petowhaen, put her in great danger of taking, but waiping anchor dyed toward the shore, took in the rest of their companie, and stood at their defence, behauing themselves so well, that continuing in fight about a long towre, at length they ouercame their enemies, slew 7. of them, wounded 37. tooke their galliase, and brought her to Petowhaen with thirtene bels, diuers coapes and church ornaments, sterpe, and other spoiles which they had got abroad in the countie, together with 43. prisoners, and the artillerie of the galliase. The fourteenth of February, there came from the lord admirall of France lying then at Tonque, monsieur de Rohen and monsieur de Grandemont a knight of the order, monsieur Telegnie the admirals sonne in law, & diuers other French gentlemen to confer with the lord lieutenant, who received them right gladly, and made them great cheere: they remained there till the 18. and then departed and went to Cane, whither the said lord admirall was remooued, and had entred the towne, preparing to besiege the castell. The same day monsieur Brique-mault and sir Nicholas Throckmorton knight arrived at Petowhaen. The admirall Chacillon kept the castell of Cane besieged, within the which was the marques Dalbeuf, there were sent vnto him from Petowhaen the sixe and twentieth of February, seuen canons, two deny culuerings, and one minion. The sixe and twentieth sir Nicholas Throckmorton, monsieur Brique-mault and monsieur Beauuoys with a thousand souldiers French, and as many English: to wit, captaine Zouch, captaine Twedic, captaine Higate, each of them two hundred, captaine Iohn Warde, captaine Parkenson, captaine Saule, and mar-

Mr Wheeler, capitaine Fisher lieutenant with his band, each of the with his hundred, and capitaine Pelham with the laborers, were embarked in the roade of Strohauen, and sailed forth towards Cane to come to the siege, which the Admirall of Fraunce had layd to the castle there. The same day, as county Montgomerie had embarked at the haven of Dipe in an English vessel and was coming towards Strohauen, there came from his campe three shalops, by the appointment of the Ringraue, which made towards Montgomerie, whose meaning when he perceived, he set upon the strongest of the same shalops so that there followed a sharpe conflict betwixt them, but in the end the victory fell to Montgomerie, the shalops being taken, the capitaine and maister slaine, and three English victualers rescued, which the said shalops had taken. Montgomerie here with arriving at Strohauen, and bringing with him his wife was ioyfully received, & went aboard againe, and sailed to Cane there to conferre with the admirall. The first of March, they began to batter Cane in such wise, that about foure of the clocke in the after noone they within the towne began to parley, but it tooke none effect. And then went off the artillery againe till night, and in the morning, the battery closenes began, and before that two times of the sayd artillery had gone off, they within offered againe to parley, and finally agreed by composition to yeeld, and so that same day the castle was surrendered vnto the French admirall, and the marques Daibeuse and other that had kept that place departed.

The third of March, the towne of Bayeule was yeelded to the admirall, and on the morrow following Falaise, and after Saint Lo, with diuerse other townes and castles yeelded vnto him.

The 10. of March, the great galley and the fopples were sent from Strohauen with a canon, and shot powder, &c. to Hundes, where they met with Monsieur de Mouy, that came thither with a faire company of horsemen, and diuerse footmen, French: and of the Englishmen, capitaine Turcie with his two hundred, and capitaine Fisher with his hundred. The canon was immediately planted, and shot off a fire times. Whereupon they within began to parley, and in the end agreed to yeeld vnto the castle vnto Monsieur de Mouy with condition: and so left the castle vnto Monsieur de Mouy, whereby his souldiers as well English as others gained greatly by the spoile: whereas Monsieur de Beauuoys had by the admirall Chastillon commandement, charged by proclamation all strangers, foreigners, and French souldiers to depart the towne of Strohauen by the 23. of March last past: and that all other, having their wives and families, should depart with them, or within foure dayes after, to giue ayde for the keeping of the townes of Hundes, Cane, Bayeule, Falaise, Saint Lo, and other places, lately brought vnder the obedience and authority of the prince of Conoy, vnder paine for making default, to be taken as good prisoners of warre, to those that should apprehend them. Proclamation was also thereupon made in the lord lieutenants name, the 25. of March, that it should be lawfull to the quieries maistries subiects to apprehend and take as their good and lawfull prisoners, all such as contrarie to the former proclamation should remaine in the towne of Strohauen after five of the clocke after noone of the day next following: those persons only excepted whose names were enrolled, remaining with the lord lieutenants Secretarie.

The 5. of April the Ringraue with 400. horsemen, and about 500. footmen, came downe the hill, betwixt Saint Adresses and Englefield, where Sir Hugh Pawler knight met with him, by appointment of the lord lieutenant, accompanied with 40. horsemen, and 1000. English footmen, and after they had talked together, Sir Hugh Pawler returned into Strohauen, and the Ringraue to Houdouille.

On Easter euen, two souldiers that sturied vnder capitaine Parkenson were hanged in Strohauen, for running away to the Ringraue.

The first of May, Gascar king at armes, arrived at Strohauen, bringing with him the garter to Ambrose earle of Marlborne the lord lieutenant, chosen on Saint Georges day last past, to be one of that most noble order.

The 17. of May, proclamation was made, that all manner of furniture and apparell appertaining to ships, within the garrison, haven, or roade of the towne of Strohauen, should be brought in, or a note to be giuen thereof in writing to the lord lieutenant and counsell there.

The 22. of May, about one of the clocke in the morning, the Ringraue with 500. horsemen, and 22. ensignes of footmen, came downe to a village called Zheure, neare vnto the new fort, which by order of the lord lieutenant was lately before begun to be built. The enemies meaning was, to haue taken the same fort by a sudden assault, but the English souldiers gaue intelligence to the lord lieutenant thereof, who incontinently going to the bulwarke Ryall, set out by the postern capitaine Ward with his 100. souldiers, and capitaine Parkenson with his 100. to passe to the fort, there to be an ayde and defence to them that lay in the same. About three of the clocke in the morning the Ringraue suddenly with his bands of horse and footmen, gaue them in the fort a hot alarme, and immediately the earle of Marlborne gaue in charge to capitaines Read, Appleyard, Tutty, Souche, Antwisell, Warde, Morton, and Parkenson, having with them 1000. footmen and 200. horsemen, to set upon the enemies in the village of Zheure, neare adioyning vnto the said new fort, where the English souldiers beat backe their enemies, slue and tooke of them to the number of an hundred, besides thirty faire horses, and an ensigne, and set fire on the towne, because the enemies should not come to encampe therein as their purpose was.

The 26. of May, the Frenchmen in number about three thousand horsemen and footmen, came downe towards the wind-mills, neare to the bulwarke called Saint Adresses, against whom the English horsemen and footmen issued forth of the towne, giuing them a hot skirmish, where were slaine two hundred of the French, besides two hundred and about that were hurt. Amongst the English, capitaine Tremayne and about some twelue persons more were slaine: but the French were driuen to retire. The first of June, at seven of the clocke at night, the Ringraue having layd in the village of Zheure an ambush of six hundred horsemen, and sixteen hundred footmen, there came downe also betwixt the abbey and the village called Englefield towards the towne, the number of a thousand footmen, which began a very hot skirmish, first at the new fort, continuing euen hard to the ditches: where the Englishmen manfully encountered them. Here with also, the Ringraue appointed other to come downe and approach the bulwarkes of Saint Annes, Saint Francis, Michael and other, round about the towne, so that there were of them the number of five thousand, that were employed in this skirmish, which was maintained right fiercely, for the space of two houres, till in the end the enemies were forced to giue place, with the losse of five hundred of their men, Almains, Frenchmen and other. Of English men there were hurt, capitaine Ielbere, and capitaine Pelham, and about fiftene other hurt and slaine.

Sir Thomas

The 7. of June, the first canon-shot fight within the towne of Newhaun, neare to the bulwarke of Saint Annes. The ninth of June, arrived at Newhaun three Captaines with their bands of an hundred the peece, being of the garrison of Bartwike. Also the same day landed there Edward Randoll, appointed to be knight Marshall. For you must understand that sir Adrian Poinings being knight Marshall, upon his returne into England went not backe againe: and then was sir Thomas Finch of Kent appointed to go over to supply the roomth of knight Marshall, who making his provision ready, sent over his brother Erasmus Finch to haue charge of his band, and his kinsman Thomas Finch to be prouost marshal, whilst he staying till he had euer thing in a readinesse to passe over himselfe, at length imbarqued in one of the Quenes Shippes, called the Grephound, hauing there aboard with him besides three shope and firt of his owne retinue, foure and fortie other Gentlemen, two of them being brethren to the Lord Wentworth, to wit, James Wentworth, and Iohn Wentworth with diuers other, who in the whole (accounting the mariners) amounted to the number of two hundred persons and byword: and as they were on the further coast towards Newhaun, they were by contrarie wind and foule weather driven backe againe toward the coast of England, and plying towards Rie, they forced the capitaine of the shippe a very good sea-man, named William Maline, and also the maister and mariners, to thrust into the haven before the tyde, and so they all perished, seuen of the manner lost onely excepted, whereof three dyed shortly after they came on land. After this mischaunce, Edmond Randoll was appointed knight Marshall.

The 15. of June, the captaines Richard Saunders, and William Saul, with their bands of an hundred souldiers a peece, and capitaine Drurie with two hundred arrived at Newhaun, and the morning after arrived capitaine Roberts with an other hundred souldiers. On the seuenteenth day sir Francis Knowles, chamberlaine to the Quenes maiesties house, landing at Newhaun, sent to vnto the state of the towne.

The 18. of June, two souldiers were executed for beating weapon against their capitaine.

The 28. of June, the French men came downe to the village of Thure, and there very neare to the fort, beganne a skirmish with the English men: there were of them tenne calliges of footmen, and two hundredy horsemen, this skirmish lasted three houres, and yet not past foure persons slaine. The night following, they placed five canons betwixt the Towne and the hill, and likewise other peece of Artillerie at the foresaid Village of

of Thure, so that they shot both into the towne and fort. The first of July about midnight, they filled thirty of their trenches, and skirmished with the English souldiers, drove them vnder the bulwarke of Saint Annes, and there perceiving that the Englishmen had provided to sally out, after a long skirmish they retired. About the third of July, there landed nine hundred souldiers well appointed all in yellow clokes, and blew, Capitaine Sanders was hurt in the legge whereof he dyed. The twelfth of July, about foure of the clocke in the morning, the French laid batterie to the Bulwarke of Saint Annes, continuing the same all that day. They also dismounted the Rime day the Ordnance in the steeple of Newhaun, and beat downe the great bell, cleane defacing the steeple: the same evening, was William Robinson squire, bayliffe of Newhaun, slaine with a shot, and William Bromfield, maister of the ordnance hurt, whereof he died shortly after.

The 14. of July, sir Hugh Pawlet knight landed at Newhaun, bringing with him eight hundred souldiers. The same day came downe the Frenchmen to the number of 3000. euen hard to the gates of the towne, beating the English men out of their trenches, but in the end they were forced to retire, and not past twenty English men slaine, and about an hundred hurt: but the French lost (as was thought) about foure hundred horsemen and footmen. The same day, the little Gallie called the Forc, went out of Newhaun, fraught with sixte men, to flanke alongt the shore, and to beate the French men with her shot, but a linc-broke fell into a barrrell of powder and set it on fire together with the bevell, so that she suddenly sunke, and all that were aboard in her were lost, causing fiftene that saved themselves by swimming.

The 21. of July, the Constable of France, and many other lords of France came to the abbey of Grauille, where the marshall Brisac was lodged, who had the generall charge in the army, before the coming of the said Constable.

France came to the siege of Newhaun.

The 23. of July, the Constable came to the trench that was cast over against the bulwarke of Saint Annes, alongt by the sea side, and sent his trumpet to summon the towne. The Lord lieutenant appointed sir Hugh Pawlet to go forth and make the answer in his name, which was in effect, that the Quenes maiestie had appointed him and others to keepe the Towne, and therefore they meant not to deliuer it to any other person, without her Graces commaundement. The English men were no sooner departed, but that the enemies having planted eight canons in batterie against the castle and bulwarke of the haven, caused the same to be shot off, continuing the batterie till the eight and twentieth of July.

The 28. of July, the prince of Condy, and the duke of Montpensier, came to the campe and alighted at the Constables lodging, went from thence to the trenches to relieue the marshall Montmorancie, and to supplie his roomth, whilst he might in the meane time goe to suppe with his father, and so to take his rest: Monsieur Deslree, and the other that had charge about the planting and ordering of the artillerie, used such diligence, and were so earnestly called upon and encouraged by the prince of Condy, continually remaining in the trenches, that on the 27. in the morning, the artillerie beganne to batter the bulwarke of Saint Adressle and other places. This was not done without great daunger of the pionsers and men of warre that guarded them: for as the French desperately made these approaches, they were made by the English gunners to cast the bitter fruit thereof: but such was the multitude of the French men that were now assailed in hope to recover that towne, (which being possessed by the English, cut off all traffique from Rome, Paris and other places) that with their generall ayde, and draving the water downe to the sea, the marshes were made passable and firme ground, which to men of great experience was thought a thing impossible. The Castle, the walls, and other defenses of the Towne, were battered, breaches made, and the trench, which before the coming of the Constable, was but brought to the point over against the bulwarks of Saint Adressle, was now within fower daies advanced nere hand the space of two miles, upon the cauley or breach which was all of stone, without any earth to cover them, so that they were driven to make the best shift they could with wood-ladders, land-bags, baskets, and sagots. Yet all this had never come to passe, without infinite slaughter, and farre more losse of French blood, if the great mortalitie of pestilence (which entered the Towne about the beginning of Sommer) through a venomous infection, had not so greatly increased, that it slue daily great numbers of men, so that the streets lay even full of dead corpses, not able to be remooved, by reason of the multitude that perished. And next the flote of the canon, lying within a fure an twentie paces of the Towne, was so terrible as the like had not bene lightly heard of, and sundrie breaches there were, which were already made, namely, two very great and easie to be entered: All these dangers and miseries notwithstanding the Earle of Warwicke with his Captaines and souldiers, in couragious order, stood at those severall breaches, ready to defend the same, if the enemies had perswaded to have given the assault, which when the Constable perceived, he caused a trumpet to sound the blast of imparley, that talke might be had for the concluding of a composition betwixt both the parties, to avoyd the imminent slaughter and effusion of blood: which offer seeming not unmeet, both parties concluded that parley should be had. The eight and twentieth of July therefore, the Constable came to the end of the trenches next to the towne, where Sir Mawrice Denis, treasurer of the towne, Sir Hugh Pawler, capitaine Horley, capitaine Pelham, capitaine John Shute pponett marshall, and Nicholas Malby Secretary to the lord Lieutenant, came forth and passed over the haven to communicate with him, and during the parley betwixt them, a truce was accorded, and assented to by both parties. But the Constable tooke upon him to have only authority to accept or refuse such conditions as should be offered or agreed upon by the English commissioners in this treatie: and so at length they passed certaine articles in forme as followeth. First, that the earle of Warwicke should render the Towne of Berghaem into the hands of the Constable of France, with all the artillerie and munitions of warre then being in the Towne, belonging to the French king and his subiects. Item, he should leave the ships that were in the Towne at that present, belonging to the king or his subiects, with all their furniture, and generally all such marchandise and other things, being at that present within that Towne, as either belonged to the king or his subiects. Item, the said Earle should presently deliver into the hands of the Constable, the great Tower of the said haven, so that the souldiers thereof enter not into the Towne: and that the said Earle should deliver fower such hostages as the said Constable should name. Item, that the next day by eight of the clocke in the morning, the said Earle should withdraw his souldiers from the fort, to deliver it immediately into the hands of the said Constable, or his deputies, at the said houre. Item, that all prisoners should be delivered on either side, without paying any ransom. Item, that the Constable should for his part suffer the said Earle of Warwicke and all those that were in garrison in the said Berghaem to depart, with all things whatsoever that belonged to the queene of England or her subiects. Item, that for the departure atwell of the said Earle, as the remooving of his souldiers and other things: the said Constable agreed to give them six dayes, to begin the twentieth nine of July, during the which they might frankly take and carie away the said things. Item, the said Constable did likewise permit, that all the ships and English vessels appointed for the portage and conveying away of the said things, should safely and freely passe in, to, and fro the said haven, without any stay or impeachment, either by the French or other. The fower hostages were appointed to be maister Oliver Maners, brother to the Earle of Rutland, Capitaine Pelham, Capitaine Horley, and Capitaine Leighton. In witness whereof, the said Lords, the Constable of France, and Earle of Warwicke signed these articles, the eight and twentieth of July. The last of July, the most part of the Englishmen tooke ship and departed homewards: so glad was he that could get soonest out of that unholsome ayre: manye fine persons yet were left behinde, impotent, and not able to helpe themselves a shippe boorde, the miserie whereof Edward Randolph esquier, high marshall of the Towne (who was appointed to tarric and see the uttermost of the composition accomplished) perceiving, moved with naturall pittie of his countreyemen, relinquished without comfort, caused the said sick persons to be caried aboard, not sparing his owne shoulders, at that time feeble and full of the plague, himselfe and his men still bearing and helping the poore creatures on ship boorde: a rare fact, worthy reward, and no doubt in remembrance with God, the true recorder of merittfull deeds. Beside the manner sort of those that died at Berghaem of the pestilence, during the siege, I finde noted as chiefe, Cuthbert Vaughan Comptroller of the Towne, Francis Somerset cousin to the Earle of Worcester, Auerie Darcie brother to the Lord Darcie, John Zouche, brother to the Lord Zouche, Edward Omesby, Thomas Drurie alias Poignard, Richard Croker, John Cockson, Thomas Kemiish, John Prowde, William Saule, Wilfride Antwilell, these of the plague. There were diverse also that were slaine in the fieelde, as both the Iremaynes brethren, Nicholas and Andrew, Capitaine Richard Saunders, with maister Robinson and maister Bromfield, also one Leighton agentman, and divers other.

As yee haue heard the plague of pestilence being in the Towne of Petowham, through the number of soldiers that returned from thence into England, the infection thereof spread into diuers parts of this realme, but especially the cite of London was so infected, that in the same whole yere, that is to say, from the first of Ianuarie, 1562. till the last of December, 1563. there died in the City and liberties thereof containing, 108. parishes of all diseases, 20. And in other parishes adioyning to the same cite, being 11. parishes, died of all diseases in the whole yere, 3. M. 2. C. 88. persons, and of them, of the plague, 2. M. 7. C. 32. persons so that the whole number of all that died of all diseases, as well within the Cite and liberties, as in the out parishes, was 23. M. 6. Tempest at London.

The 8. of July, in the morning, hapned a great tempest of lightning & thunder, wherethrough a woman and three kine were slaine in the Couent garden nere to Charing crosse. At the same time in Essex a man was torne to peeces as he was carrying hay, his barne was boync downe, and his hay bent: both houses and trees were rent in many places.

The counsell of king Philip at Burels commanded proclamation to be made in Antwerp and other places, that no English ship with clothes should come into any places of their low countries: their colour was (as they said) the danger of the plague, which was that time in London, and other places of England: notwithstanding, they would gladly haue gotten our wools: other causes they alleged, as the raising of impostes as well upon goods inwards as outwards, as well upon Englishmen as upon strangers, &c. Also for that in the first parliament of the Quenees maiestie, by a statute therein made, diuers waies and commodities were forbidden to be brought into this Realme out of Flaunders or other places being bought there, which was done to the end to let our subiects a worke here, as by the statute doth appeare, for that no man English or stranger might ship out any white clothes without, being of the price above fower pound, without licence, &c. but the Quenees maiestie through sute of our marchant aduenterers, caused the wools to be discharged, and our cloth trade was sent to Cunden in east Frisland about Easter next following, in Ann. 1564.

Threefold plague to the poore Citizens of London.

Forasmuch as the plague of pestilence was so hot in the cite of London, there was no Terme kept at Michaelmasse: to be short, the poore Citizens of London, were this yere plagued with a threefold plague, pestilence, scarcity of money and dearth of victuals: the miserie whereof were too long here to write, no doubt the poore remember it, the rich by flight into the countries made shift for themselves.

Also the same peace was proclaimed at London on the 13. day of April. And shortly after the Quenees maiestie sent the right Honorable sir Henrie Carie lord Hunsdon, accompanied with the lord Strange, besides diuers knights and gentlemen unto the French king, with the noble order of the Garter, who lying then at Lyons, he there presented unto him the said order, and Garter king at armes unckled him therewith, observing the ceremonies in that behalfe due, &c.

Through the earnest sute of the Admouers there was on the vigile of S. Misfortune at Oxford.

Palemon and Arcet, made by maister Edwards of the Quenes chappell, had such tragicall successe as was lamentable: for at that time by the fall of a wall and a paire of stairs, and great peales of the multitude, three men were slaine.

The fifte of September, after disputations, the Quene at the humble sute of certaine of her nobilitie, and the king of Spaines Ambassadors, made a briefe oration in Latine to the Universitie, but so wise and pithie, as England may reioyce that it hath so learned a prince, and the Universitie may triumph, that they haue to noble a patronesse.

The first of September after dinner, her grace coming from Chills Church over Carfax, and so to Saint Maries, the scholars standing in order according to their degrees, euen to the east gate, certaine doctors of the Universitie did ride before in their scarlet gowns and hoores, and masters of Art in blacke gowns and hoores. The Maioz also named maister Williams with certaine of his brethren, to the number of fourteene or fifteene, did ride before her in scarlet to the ende of Wapdalen hydge, where their liberties ended: but the doctors and masters went forward still to Shot-over, a mile and more out of Oxford, because their liberties extended so farre, and thereafter Orations made, her highnesse with thanks to the whole Universitie, bade them farewell, and rode to Ricote to maister Norrice house an eight miles from Oxford.

Two long streets with great riches of that towne were burnt in Anno 1542. And likewise of worse in Anno 1544.

But Neil Mackeuer his secretary, who had incited him to this rebellion perswaded him first to trie and treat the friendship of certaine wild Scots that they had incamped in Clan Joby, under the conducting of Alexander Oge and Mec Gilliam Burke, whose father and uncle Shane O'neale had lately killed in raiderthie given by the Scots: neuertheless, he well liking this perswasion, went to the sayd campe the second of June, where after a dissembled entertainment, and quaffing of wine, Gilliam Buske burning with desire of revenge of his fathers and uncles death, and ministring quarrelling talke, issued out of the tent, and made a fray upon O'neales men, & then gathering together his Scots in a throng, suddenly entered the tent againe, who there with their slaughter swords, behead in pieces Shane O'neale, his secretary, and all his company, except a very few which escaped by flight.

The 8. of June, Sir Thomas Sackville knight was created baron of Buckhurst at Westminster in the quenes palace.

On good Friday, the 27. of March, Simon Digby of Alketot, Iohn Fulthorpe of Fielbecke in the Countie of Yorke Esquires, Robert Peneman of Stokeſley, Thomas Biſhop the younger of Pockinton in the ſame Countie of Yorke Gentlemen, were drauone from the Caſtell of Yorke to the place of execution, called Knaues-acre, halfe a mile without the Citie of Yorke, & there hanged, beheaded, and quartered, their foure heads were ſet on the foure principall gates of the Citie, with foure of their quarters: the other quarters were ſet in diuerſe places of the countrey: Oſolph Glesby was with them drauone to the gallows, and returned againe to the caſtell.

William Harbart Earle of Pembroke, baron of Cardif, knight of the Garter, one of the priuie counſell, and lord ſteward of the Queenes maiesties houſhold, deceased at Hampton Court on the ſixteenth of March, he gaue great gifts to the Queene, to the Earle of Leiceſter, to the houſhold, and diuers other, and was buried in Saint Pauls Church at London the 18. of Aprill: the blacks giuen at his buriall came to the value of 2000. l. and a ſumptuous monument was raiſed for him on the North ſide the quire in Pauls, at the foote of Iohn of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter.

The 17. of Aprill, the Earle of Suſſer Lieutenant generall in the North, with the Lord Hunſdon Lord gouernor of Barwicke, and Warden of the eaſt marches, and maſter William Drewy high maſtall of Barwicke, with all the garriſon and power of the ſame, began a iourney into Scotland, & the ſame night came to Wlmarke, twelue miles from Barwicke, and ſo the next morning entered into Tindale, and marching in warlike order, they bent, ouerthrew, raiſed and ſpoyled all the Caſtles, Townes, and villages of their enemies, till they came to the caſtell of Hoſle, ſtanding in a ſtrong marſh belonging to the lord of Bucklugh, which likewiſe was raiſed, ouerthrowne and bent, and ſo marched forward and bent the whole countrey before them, till they came to Craling. The ſame day, ſir Iohn Folter Warden of the middle marches, with the garriſon and force of the ſame, entered likewiſe into Tindale upon Expreſſe gate, 16. miles from Wlmarke, where in like order they bent, raiſed, and ſpoyled the countrey before them, till they came to a ſtrong caſtell called Craling, in the poſſeſſion of the mother of the lord Fernherſt, which likewiſe they ouerthrew, raiſed, and bent. There both the armies met, and ſo marched by the riuer of Twite, raiſing, burning, and ſpoyling Caſtles and pyles along the riuer, till they came to Gedwoorth, where they both lodged, and were courteouſly receiued. The next day the lord Cheſford Warden of the middle marches of Scotland, came in with all the principall men of his, kintred to the lord Lieutenant, and did ſubmit themſelves, and were aſſured, for that they had not receiued the Engliſh rebels, ayding or aſſiſting them, neither had made any inuaſion into England. The nineteenth the armie deuided into two parts, the one part wherof paſſed the riuer of Twite, and bent the Caſtell of Fernherſt, and all other Caſtles and Townes belonging to the Lord of Fernherſt, Hunſtall, and Bedrell, and ſo paſſed to Mint, where both the armies met againe, and ſo bent on both ſides the riuer, till they came to a great towne called Batwicke, where they intended to haue lodged, but the Scots had unhatched the houſes, and bent the thatch in the ſtreets, and themſelves fled with moſt part of their goods, but by the induſtrie of the Engliſhmen, the timber was alſo burned with the thatch, ſaving one little houſe of ſtone of Dunlamikes, wherein my lord lay that night. The 20. day, the armie marched forwards to a houſe of the lord of Bucklugh, which they ouerthrew with powder, and then marched Northward to the riuer of Twite, where they bent and ſpoyled ſuch Caſtles, pyles and townes, as belonged to the lords of Fernherſt and Bucklugh, their kindmen and adherents, and that night returned to Gedwoorth. The one and twentieth day, part of the armie went to the riuer of Botwont, under the leading of the ſaid maſtall, where maſter George Heron, keeper of Tindale and Widdale, with them of that countrey, met with him, and ioyning together, rode on, burning and ſpoyling all on both ſides of the riuer, and the other part marched to the riuer of Twite, where they waſhed and bent all on both ſides the riuer, and returned to Bilſey, where the lord Lieutenant lodged of purpoſe to beſiege Wyborne Caſtell in the night, and the Lord Gouernor with his companie went to Wlmarke, to bring the ordinance from thence in the morning, which was diſappointed by the negligence of ſuch as were put in truſt for thoſe matters, who ſuffered the carriage hoſtes to returne to Barwicke the day before, which ſhould haue drauone the ſame, the lacke wherof cauſed the Lord Lieutenant with the whole armie, to returne to Barwicke the two and twentieth of Aprill, in which time there was neuer any ſhew by the Scots made, to reſiſt or defend their countrey.

The lord Scrope Warden of the weſt marches, entered Scotland the eighteenth of Aprill, bent and ſpoyled thoſe parts almoſt to Donſtices, he had diuers conſiſtes, gaue ſundry ouerthrowes, tooke many priſoners, and returned ſafely. During all theſe inuaſions, the marches of England in all places were guarded by the Lord Evers, ſir George Bowes, and other of the Biſhopps, as the Scots durſt not once offer to enter into England, ſo that not one houſe was burned, nor one cowe taken out of England. There were raiſed, ouerthrowne, and bent in this iourney, about ſixtie ſtrong Caſtles and pyles, and about three hundred Townes and Villages, ſo that there be verie few in the countrey, that either haue receiued our Engliſh Rebels, or inuaſed England, that either haue caſtell, pile, or houſe for themſelves or their tenants, beſides the loſſe of their goods. The 26. the lord Lieutenant accompanied with the lord gouernor, the maſtall and diuers luſtie gentlemen, captaines and ſouldiers, to the number of three thouſand, ſet forward to Wlmarke, and ſo to Wyborne Caſtell, which Caſtell they beſieged till the ſame was yeelded, the lord Gouernor, the Maſtall, and diuers other, tooke poſſeſſion for our ſoueraigne Ladie the Queenes maiestie, and expelled the Scots that were therein, to the number of 168. perſons, in their apparell on their backs onely without armor, weapon, bagge or baggage, among whom there were two Engliſhmen, one Hillard the Earle of Northumberland's man, and a bagarant perſon named William Goddſher, which both were carried to Barwicke and there executed the 24. of May. The Lord Lieutenant placed in the caſtell Captaine Wood, and Captaine Pikeman, with 200. ſouldiers, and ſo returned to Barwicke the 29. of Aprill, where he reſted

The fourth of May, he sent maister Drewry Marshall with the number of fupp thousand, to take Faulst Castell, which at the first coming was delivered to the Marshall, who expelled the Scots in number ten, and placed 14. of our Englishmen against all Scotland, it is so strong a place, and so returned to Barwick. The eleventh of May, the lord Lieutenant made foure knights, viz. Sir William Drewry, Sir Thomas Manners, Sir George Care, Sir Robert Constable. And the same day, Sir William Drewry bring Generall, set forward toward Edinburgh with divers footebands with shot armed pikes, and pieces of great ordnance, to joyne with the earles of Leinor, Hoxton, Glencarne, and Hare, and other of the kings power of Scotland, in pursuing of the English rebels, and such of the Scots as supported them as the Duke Hamilton, and other who were in armes at Lithco, twelve miles from Edinburgh, to defend their cause. The foresaid new knights with their bands came to Edinburgh, the thirtieth of May, and there rested three nights, and departed from thence to Lithco, where the Regent was slain. The 17. the footemen marched to Faulkirk, six miles from Sterling, and Sir William Drewry with the horsemen, marched to Starling to see the King, whom they found so perfect in all things as age and nature could permit. The 18. they departed to the footebands, and so together marched to Glasco, where the lord Hamilton had besieged a house of the kings, but hearing of their coming, he fled with dishonor, and the losse of nine or twentie of his men. The 19. the generall with other horsemen and some shot, passed to Dunbarton, to hit the straites of the castell there, being kept by the lord Fleming, the bishop of Saint Andrews, and other his adherents, to the Queene of Scots use. Our generall sent his trumpet to requite a parley with assurance safely to returne, whereunto the lord Fleming subtilly consented, and minding so to wind him into his danger, conceived certaine shot, and armed men into a secret place, so that our generall coming alone to haue parled, his trumpet returned, they shot at him, meaning to haue slain him, but he bestowed his pistolets as freely at them as they at him, and returned to his companie and so to Glasco: from whence Sir George Care, being marvellous offended with the subtil dealing of the lord Fleming, wrote a letter of challenge to combat with him body for body, which the lord Fleming by his letter of answer refused, whereupon Sir George Care wrote a sharp and pittie reply, &c.

The one and twentieth day, our generall accompanied with the gentlemen and horsemen, went to Dunbarton againe to parley with the lord Fleming, upon his promise that he would meet him three miles from the said castell, but the place of parley being betwixt, was found to be subiect to the shot of the castell, & therefore our generall required another place, which would not be feared by the Fleming.

The 22. the lord of Leinor, the lord Glencarne, & the Lord Simple, with their friends and tenants, came to our generall, & mustered before Glasco, to the number of foure thousand horsemen and footmen.

Sir in ambassade for the Queenes maistie to Charles the ninth French king, as well to congratulate for his marriage with the daughter of the emperor Maximilian, as for other weighty affaires. And as his ambassage was great, so was his charge no lesse in furnishing himselfe and his traine accordingly, being both in number and furniture, such in every point as did appertaine: and his receiving and entertainment in France by the king and others, was agreeable thereto, for he was receiued vpon the coast by the gouernours of the fortified townes right honourably, by order from the king. Among other, the Tournouell was one, who being very well mounted and appointed, left not his lordship before he came to the court, and from thence accompanied him backe vntill his embarkement homeward. fort. At the lord ambassadors first audience, which was at the castle of Maraild-therwise called Boloigne near Paris, where the 15. the lay, the queenes Anne coaches very bravelly furnished, were sent to Paris for him, in one of the which his lordship with the marquess of France rode toward the court, very narrowly escaping from a shrewd turne, by reason the same coach was overthwarted, by the Dutch waggoners their negligence, who in a braverie galloping the said, made an ouer short turne, wherewith the marquis was sore brused. The lord ambassador at his arrivall, was very honorably received, he was banqueted by diuerse, and that very sumptuously, which by him was not inquired, but his reward at the kings hand was onely a chaine, waping one thousand French crownes. At this place, the river of Sayne, that runneth through the city of Paris, was not passable with vessels, by reason of the great frosts, and therby not onely all kind of viuals but also hay and wood was hard to come by, and not to be had but at excessive prices, the countrie therabouts having bene sore harried and spoiled by the civil tumults: by reason wherof, not onely the lord of Buckhurst for the space he remained there, but also Sir Henry Norrice, and maister Francis Wallingham her excellent Ambassadors, sitters successively, were driven to an increase of expences, paying for every thing they bought an higher price then had bene accustomed. After that my lord Buckhurst had bene stalked and banqueted by the king, and others of the French nobilitie, and had accomplished the points of his ambassage, he tooke leave of the king, and departed homewards, arriving here in England a little before Easter.

Juries at Westminster The first, second, and third of May, was holden at Westminster before the Queenes maiesly, a sollemne Just, at the tilt, turney, and barriers. The challenges were Edward earle of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton esquier, who all did very valiantly, but the chiefe honour was given to the earle of Oxford.

Doctor Storie executed. The first of June, John Storie a doctour of the cannon law, who before had bene condemned of high treason, was dyawne from the tower of London to Tbyorne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered, his head set on London bridge, and his quarters on the gates of the city.

A combate appointed at Tushill. The 18. of June, in Trinity searime, there was a combate appointed to have bene fought for a certaine Honour and domaine lands belonging therunto, in the Isle of Warrie, adioyning to the Isle of Sheppey in Kent, Simon Low and John Kyme were plaintiffs, and had brought a writ of right against Thomas Paramore, who offered to defend his right by battell, wherupon the plaintiffs after layd, accepted to answer his challenge, offering likewise to defend their right to the same Honour and lands, and to prove by battell that Paramore had no right nor no good title to have the same.

Wherupon the layd Thomas Paramore brought before the Judges of the common place at Westminster, one George Thorne, a bigge, broad, strong set fellow, and the plaintiffs brought Henry Nailor master of defence, and servant to the right honorable the earle of Leicester, a proper slender man, and not so tall as the other. Thorne cast downe a gauntlet, which Nailor took up. Upon the Sunday before the battell should be tried on the next morrow, the matter was stayed, and the parties agreed, that Paramore being in possession should have the land, and was bound in 500. pound to consider the plaintiffs, as upon hearing the matter the Judges should award. The Queenes maiesly was the taker up of the matter, in this will: It was thought good, that for Paramores assurance, the matter should be kept touching the combate, and that the plaintiffs Low and Kyme should make default of appearance, but that yet such as were sureties of Nailor, their champions appearance, should bring him in, and likewise those that were sureties for Thorne, should bring in the same Thorne in discharge of their band, & that the court should sit in Tushill fields, where was prepared one plot of ground one and twenty yeards square, double railed for the combate, without the west square, a stage being set up for the Judges, representing the court of the common pleas. All the compass without the iusts, was set with scaffolds one above another, for people to stand and behold. There were behind the square where the Judges sat, two tents, the one for Nailor, the other for Thorne. Thorne was there in the morning tinely. Nailor about 7. of the clocke came through London, apparelled in a dublet and galeys galloway breeches, of a cloke crimson latten cut and faced, a hat of blacke velvet with a red feather and band, before him drums and six playing: the gauntlet that was cast downe by George Thorne, was borne before the layd Nailor upon a sword point, and his halson (a staffe of an elle long, made Taper-wile, tipt with horne) with his shield of hard leather, was borne after him, by Askam a yeoman of the Queenes garde: he came into the pallace of Westminster, and staying not long before the hall doore, came backe into the kings Spectre, and so along through the landuay, and Tushill streete, into the field, where he stayed till past nine of the clocke, and then Sir Ierome Bowes brought him to his tent, Thorne being in the tent with Sir Henry Cheiney long before. About ten of the clocke, the court of common pleas remoued, and came to the place prepared: when the Lord chiefe Justice with two other his associates were set, then Low was called sollemnly to come in, or else he to lose his writ of right. Then after a certaine time the sureties of Henry Nailor were called to bring in the layd Nailor champion for Simon Low, and shortly thereupon Sir Ierome Bowes leading Nailor by the hand, entred with him the lists, bringing him downe that square by which he entred, being on the left hand of the Judges, and he about till he came to the next square iust against the Judges, and there making curtelle, first with one leg, and then with the other, passed forth till he came to the middle of the place, and then made the like obersance and so passing till they came to the barre, there he made the like curtelle, and his shield was held up aloft over his head: Nailor put off his neather lockes, and so bare foot and bare legged, having like scamilions on the ankles and his doublet sleeves tied up above the elbows, and bare headed, came in as is aforesayd. Then were the sureties of George Thorne called to bring in the same Thorne, and immediately Sir Henry Cheiney entred at the upper end on the right hand of the Judges, with the like order in coming about by his side, as Nailor had before on that other side, and so continuing to the barre with like obediſaunce, held up his shield, proclamation was made in ſoyne a followeth: The Juſtices command in the Queenes maiesties name, that no perſon of what eſtate, degree, or condition that he be being preſent, to be ſo hardy to give any token or ſigne by countenance, ſpeech, or language, either to the proouer or to the defender, whereby the one of them may take advantage of the other: and no perſon remove, but ſtill keepe his place: and that every perſon and perſons keepe their ſlaves and their weapons to themſelves: and ſuffer neither the ſayd proouer nor defender to take any of their weapons or any other thing, that may ſtand either to the ſayd proouer or defender any awaile, upon paine of forfeiture of lands, tenements, goods, chattels, and impriſonment of their bodies, and making fine and ransome at the Queenes pleaſure.

Then was the proouer to be ſwoyne in ſoyne as followeth: This heare, you Juſtices, that I have this day neither eate, drinke, nor have upon me either bone, ſtone, ne graſſe, or any incontinuit, loyterrie, or witchcraft, where-through the power of the word of God might be leaked or diminiſhed, and the diuels power increased: and that my appeale is true, ſo helpe me God and his ſaints, and by this booke.

After all this ſolemne order was finiſhed, the lord chiefe Juſtice rehearſing the manner of bringing the wit of right by Simon Low, of the anſwere made thereunto by Paramore, of the proceeding therein, and how Paramore had challenged to defend his right to the land by battell, by his champion George Thorne, and of the accepting the triall that was by Lowe, with his champion Henry Nailor, and then for default in appearance in Lowe, he adiudged the land to Paramore, and diſmiſſed the champions, acquitting the ſureties of their bands. He alſo willed Henry Nailor to render againe to George Thorne his gantlett, wherewith to the ſaid Nailor anſwered, that his lordſhip might command him any thing, but willingly he would not render the ſaid gantlett to Thorne except he could win it: and further, he challenged the ſaid Thorne to play with him halfe a ſcore blowes, to ſhew ſome paſſime to the lord chiefe Juſtice and the other there aſſembled: but Thorne answered, that he came to fight, and would not play. Then the lord chiefe Juſtice commending Nailor for his valiant courage, commanded them both quietly to depart the field, &c.

The four and twentieth of May, Martin Bullocke was hanged on a gibbet by the well with two buckets in Billpops gate Street of London, for robbing and most shamefully murdering of a merchant named Arthur Hall, in the parsonage of Saint Martine by the said well. This Martin had procured the said Arthur Hall to come to the said parsonage, to buy of him certaine plate: but after the said Arthur had well viewed the same, he said, this is none of your plate, it hath doctour Gardeners marke, and I know it to be his: that is true said Martin Bullocke, but he hath appointed me to sell it, &c. After this talke, whiles the said Arthur was weighing the plate, the same Martin fetcht out of the kitchen a thicke walling beetle, and coming behind him, strake the said Arthur on the head, that he felled him with the first stroke, and then strake him againe, and after tooke the said Arthurs dagger, and slicked him, and with his knife cut his throat, and after would haue trussed him in a Spanish chell, but the same was too short: wherupon he tumbled him downe a paire of staires, and after thinking to haue buried him in the cellar, his legges being broken with the first fall, and stiffe, he could not draw him downe the cellar staires being winding, wherfore he cut off his legges with an hatchet, and in the end, trussed him with straw in a dyg fat, and saying it was his apparell and bookes, caused the same to be carried to the waters side, and so shipped to Rie. But as God would haue it, there was suspicion gathered against the murderer, wherby he was examined before Alderman Branch one of the Sherifes of London, but seemed so innocent and guiltlesse in that case, that one Robert Gee a cloth-worker, being of good credit, undertooke for his forth-coming: wherupon Bullocke slipt away, first to Westminster, wher taking boat, he was rowed by the riuer westward till he came to Dodingham in the forest 8. miles beyond the towne of Windsoze: from whence (by Gods prouidence) he came backe againe into London, where he lodged at the red lion in Holborne. In the meane time Robert Gee, upon knowledge had that Bullocke was slipt alide, was not only had in suspicion, but also committed to ward, albeit so, as he had libertie to send abroad such as should make sure after Bullocke, & amongst other one of his seruants was sent to Rie, after the dyg fat, & coming thither, the same dyg fat was opened, where the mangled corps of Hall was found, wherby the truth of the matter came to light, & by the will of God, Bullocke was at the very same time discouered at the place in Holborne afore mentioned, & there apprehended, receiued, as ye haue heard, due punishment for his wicked fall.

Five daies after, they went to the king at a house called Madyll, where the king with his two brethren, the admirall, and the most part of the nobles of France met them a distance from the place, and brought them into the house, where they dined, and remained till Sunday following, from whence the king and his nobles, with the nobles of England came to Paris: the king, his two brethren, & our ambassadoys riding in one coach together, and the Nobles of England and France being so placed, also in coaches came to the said Castell of Loure, and there dined. After dinner, the king, our Ambassadors, with the Nobilitie of both realmes, went to a Church named Saint Germaine, where the French king, his brethren, and nobilitie heard euen-song, the noble men of England withdrawing them into a chappell, till euen-song was done, where they fetched thence by the nobles of France, to the king and his brethren: and at awarded their coming, where was confirmed the League (which had bene concluded at Blois the nineteenth of April, deputies being there for the French party, Francis Memorency, Reigould Biragne, Sebastian de Lanbespine and Paul de Foix. And for the Queene of England, sir Thomas Smith, and maister Wallingham ambassadoys. This being done, they departed without the walls of Paris, to a garden of pleasure, where they supped: after supper the king departed to his place of Madyll, and the nobles of England to the castell of Loure. On Monday the admirall frasted the Nobles of England. On tuesday the Duke of Anjou the kings brother: and on wednesday the Duke of Brandon his younger brother and so passed in banquetting and frasting, with rich gifts on both parties.

On Friday, the nobles of England tooke leave of the king: and on Sunday came to S. Dennis, and after to Boloigne, where they tooke ship, and returned into England the fourth of July.

The second of June in the morning, betwene the houres of seven and eight of the clocke Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolkke was beheaded on a scaffold upon the Tower hill.

About the ninth of June, Francis Duke of Memorency chiefe Marshall of France gouernor and lieutenant of the Isle of France, generall unto Charles the ninth king of France, and Paule de Foix of the prime counsell to the said king, and Bertrand de Salgencers, lord de la Methesnelon, knights of the order of Saint Michael, ambassadoys for the same king, arrived at Dover.

The 14. day they shor London bridge towards Sunmerst house at the Strand, where they were lodged.

The 15. day being Sunday, the said ambassadoys repaired to the White hall, where they were honorably received of the Quenes maiestie, with her nobilitie, and there in her graces chappell, about one of the clocke in the after noone, the articles of treatie, League, or confederacie and sure friendship (concluded at Blois the nineteenth of April, as is aforesaid) betwixt the Quenes maiestie, and the French king being read, the same was by her maiestie and his ambassadoys confirmed, to be observed and kept, without inuasion or violation, &c. of that day with great part of the night following was spent in great triumph, with sumptuous banquets.

The 18. of June, the feast of Saint George was holden at Wiltindon, where S. Georges the French ambassadoys were royally frasted, and Francis Duke of Memorency feast at Windsor.

The 28. day of June, the aforesaid ambassadoys departed from London to wards France.

The 14. of June, Thom. L. Wharton deceased in his house of Chanon roto at Westminster. 2. baron of his name leaving behind him 2. Philip, his eldest son.

The 12. of July, the Quenes maiestie at White hall made sir William Cecil lord of Burgiley, lord high treasurer of England: lord William Howard baron of Effingham. late lord chamberlaine, lord prime seale: the earle of Suffex lord chamberlaine: sir Thomas Smith principall secretarie: and Christopher Hatton elquire capitaine of the guard. &c.

Thomas Percie earle of Northumberland, late of Copcliffe, who had bene before attainted by parliament of high treason, as being one of the principall conspirators in the late rebellion, since fled into Scotland, as is aforesaid, being there taken, was sent to Warwick in the month of July, and delivered to the lord Hunsdon then capitaine of gouernor of that towne, and was now on the two and twentieth day of August beheaded at Poike, about two of the clocke in the afternoone, on a new scaffold set up for that purpose in the market place.

In this month of August sir Thomas Smith one of the Quenes maiesties prime counsell, carefully tending the reformation of Ireland, sent his sonne Thomas Smith elquire thither, with a colonic of Englishmen, to inhabit the Ires in Ulster.

About the beginning of the month of October, the quenes maiestie sent down to the towne of Portsmouth, the honorable Robert Dudley earle of Leicester, & sir Francis Knowles knight, treasurer of her household, to set in hand with fortifications of that towne and countie neare adioyning, against the inuasion of the French or other, if the same should happen to be attempted by armuall there.

The 18. of Nouember in the morning, was seene a starre northward very bright and cleare in the constellation of Cassiopeia at the backe of her chaire, which with three chiefe fixed stars of the said constellation, made a Geometrical figure lozeng-volce, of the learned men called Rombus: this star in vignette at the first appearing seemed bigger then Iupiter, and not much lesse then Venus when she seemeth greatest: also the said starre neuer changing his place, was carried about with the daily motion of heauen, as all fixed starres commonly are, and so continued (by little and little, to the eye appearing lesse) for the space of almost fixtene moneths, at what time it was so small, that rather thought by exercise of our vision might imagine the place, than any eye could iudge the presence of the same: and one thing is herein chiefly to be noted, that by the learned skill and consent of the best and most expert Mathematicians, which observed the state, proprietie, and other circumstances belonging to the same starre, it was found to haue bene in place celestiall starre above the moon, eitherwise then euer any comet hath bene seene, or naturally can appeare. Therefore it is supposed, that

The 24. of Nouember, Edward earle of Darby, lord Stanley, and Strange, of Knocking, Lord and gouernor of the ile of Man, knight of the noble order of the garter, and one of the Quenes maiesties priuie counsell, deceased at his house called Latham in Lancashire. His life and death deserving commendation, & craving memorie to be imitated, was such as followeth: His fidelitie vnto 2. kings and 2. quenes in dangerous times, and great rebellions, in which time, and aduoyces, as cause serued, he was lieutenant of Lancashire and Cheshire, & lately offered 10000. men to the quenes maiestie of his own charge for the suppression of the last rebellion. His godly disposition to his tenants, neuer forcing any seruice at their hands, but but payment of their rent: his liberalitie to strangers, and such as serued themselves gratefull to him: his famous house-keeping, & 20. in checkroll neuer discontinuing the space of 42. yeares: his feeding especially of aged persons twice a day 60. and 60. besides all comers, thrice a weeke appointed for his dealing dayes, & every Good-friday thre 35. yeares one with another, 2700. with meate, drinke, money, and money worth. There was neuer gentleman of other that waited in his seruice, but had allowance from him to haue as well wages as otherwile for horse and man. His yearly portion for the dispences of his house 4000. pounds: his eunning in letting bones dislocated or broke: his delicacy of his George and scale to the lord Strange, with exhortation that he might keepe it so vnspotted in fidelitie to his priuie as he had: and his ioy, that he dyed in the quenes fauour: his ioyfull parting this world, his taking leaue of all his seruants, by shaking of hands, and his remembrance to the last day. He was buried at Dymchurch on the fourth of December, in most honorable manner.

The 28. of Nouember, John Hall gentleman, and Oswald Wilkinson late of Poike, and gailor of Poike castell (being before arraigned & condemned of treason) were drawn from the tower of London to Tiboyne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered.

This yeare a great and sharpe frost almost continually lasted from before the feast of all Saints, till after the feast of Epiphany of our Lord, with sometimes great and deepe snowes, and sometimes rains, which freezed as fast as the same fell to the ground, wherewithough at Wrotham in Kent, and many other places, the acmes and boughs of trees, being ouercharged with ice, brake off and fell from the stocks of the same trees: also the wind continued north and east, till after the Ascension day, with sharpe frosts and snowes, whereby followed a late spring.

The twelfth of Januarie, William lord Howard baron of Effingham, lord priuie scale, knight of the noble order of the garter, and one of the priuie counsell, deceased at Hampton court.

The eighteenth of Januarie, William lord Sommer set earle of Worcester, began his journey towards France to the christening of the kings daughter there in head of the Quenes maiestie of England, who sent with him a font of gold for that purpose, weighing 326. ounces. slaine. In France he and his traine were honorably received. At the christening he gave the child to name Elizabeth, & returned into England the 27. of February.

In the moneth of February, through sundry haynous complaints, brought to the Quenes maiestie and her counsell, of pirates that kept the narrow seas doing many robberies, as also the robbing of the earle of Worcester (as is aforesaid) her highnesse, by the aduise of her honourable counsell, tooke order with the lord admirall of England, that he should send to the seas ships and men to scoure the narrow seas, and to apprehend so many pyrats ships as might be met with: and for the better doing thereof, it pleased her maiestie to send one of her owne ships named the Swallow, to be the admirall, vnder the charge of William Holstocke of London esquire, controller of her highnesse ships, who had with him the Gillian, the bark Garet, and the bark of Farnmouth, and 360. able mariners, gunners and souldiers in the sayd thre ships, and one bark which forerode the narrow seas, from the northfoze land as farre northwards as Falmouth in Cornwell, and tooke twenty ships and barks of sundry nations, viz. English, French, and Flemings: but all pirates and in fashion of war. He apprehended in those ships and barks to the number of 900. men of all nations, and sent them to ward, to Sandwith, Dover, Wight, and Portsmouth, whereof thre of them that robbed the earle of Worcester, were shortly after executed at Wight: also the sayd William Holstocke did retire and take from the aboutsayd pirates ships fifteen of sundry marchants ships, laden with merchandise, that were their prizes, being of sundry nations, & let at liberty the sayd fifteen marchants ships & goods, which done, he returned to Portsmouth, and there ended his voyage in March.

Peter Ramus in his commentaries of the wars of Fraunce writeth thus. The earle of Worcester passing into France, certaine Frenchmen and Flemings set vpon him, tooke from him one of his ships, and killed certaine of his men: wherevpon the Quene of England taking displeasure, sent the lord Admirall (saith he) wherein he mislooke the matter, for master William Holstocke was sent (as is aforesaid) who set vpon all the ships French and Flemings, took and caried away what so came to hand, so that twenty of Montgomeries ships were lost, who was going to Rochell with the number of sixtie ships well furnished out of England, with money there borrowed (but neuer repayed) thus his naule being diminished of those twentie ships, when he saw the kings naue nere to Rochell, he directed his course another way, landed at Bel Isle, and tooke both the Isle and Castle.

The fourth of March, a man was hanged in chaines in Saint Georges field beyond Southwarke of London, for murdering the gailor of Northam in the same field.

The 17. of March deceased Reinold Grey of Ruthen, earle of Kent at Hertsmey, and was buried at Saint Giles without Cripple gate.

About the same time died Edmond lord Chandois.

The 25. of March being Wednesday in Easter weeke, and the feast of the Annunciation of our Lady, George Browne cruelly murdered two honest men nere into Shooters hill in Kent, the one of them was a wealthy marchant of London, named George Sanders, the other John Beane of Woolwich: which murder was committed in manner as followeth.

On Tuesday in Easter weeke (the foure and twentieth of March) the layd George Browne receiving secret intelligence by letter from mistresse Anne Drewry, that maister Sanders should lodge the same night at the house of one maister Barnes in Woolwich, and from thence go on foote to Saint Mary Cray the next morning, lay in waite for him by the way, a little from Shooters hill, and there slue both him and John Beane, servant to maister Barnes: but John Beane having ten or eleven wounds, and being left for dead, by Gods providence recovered againe and creeping away on all foure, was found by an old man and his maiden, & conveyed to Woolwich, where he gave evident markes of the murder.

Immediately upon the deed doing, Browne sent mistresse Drewry word thereof by Roger Clement (among them called trusty Roger) he himselfe repaired forthwith to the court at Greenwich, and anon after him came thither the report of the murder also. Then departed he thence unto London, and came to the house of mistresse Drewry, where, though he spake not personally with her, after conference had with her servant trusty Roger, he provided him twenty pounds that same day, for the which she layd certaine plate of her owne, and of mistresse Sanders to gage. On the next morrow being Thursday (having intelligence what Browne was sought for) they sent him five pounds more by the same Roger, warning him to shift for himselfe by flight, which thing he foresawed not to do: nevertheless the lords of the queenes maiesties council, caused so speedy and narrow search to be made for him, that upon the eight and twentieth of the same month, he was apprehended in a mans house of his owne name at Rochester, and being brought backe againe to the court, was examined by the counsell, to whom he confessed the deed, as you have heard; and that he had oftentimes before pretended and sought to do the same, by the instigation of the layd mistresse Drewry, who had promised to make a marriage betwene him and mistresse Sanders (whom he seemed to love exceedingly), nevertheless he protested (though untruly) that mistresse Sanders was not privy nor consenting thereunto. Upon his confession he was arraigned at the the kings bench in Oldchamber hall the eighteenth of Aprill, where he acknowledged himselfe guilty, and was condemned as principall of the murder, according to which sentence, he had judgement, and was executed in Smithfield on Monday the 20 of Aprill, at which time also untruly as she herselfe confessed afterward, he laboured with all means to clear mistresse Sanders of committing euill of her body with him, as also of procuring or consenting to the murder of her husband, and then beginning to sing a Psalm, O Lord turne not away thy face, &c. he flung himselfe besides the ladder, and so shoynd his owne life: he was after hanged by in chains neare unto the place where he had done the fact.

In the meane time mistresse Drewrie an her man being examined, as well by their owne confessions, as by falling out of the matter (and also by Brownes apprehendment thought culpable) were committed to ward. And after mistresse Sanders being delivered of child, and churched (for at the time of her husbands death she looked presently to lye downe) was upon mistresse Drewries mans confession, and other great likelihoods, likewise committed to the Tower, and on on Wednesday the six of May arraigned with mistresse Drewrie at the Guild hall, the effect of whose indictment was; that they by a letter written had bene procurers of the layd murder, and knowing the murder done, had by money and otherwise released the murderer: whereunto they pleaded not guilty, howbeit, they were both condemned as accessaries to maister Sanders death, and executed in Smithfield the thirtieth of May, being Wednesday in Whitsun weeke, at which time they both confessed themselves guilty of the fact. Trustie Roger mistresse Drewries man was arraigned on Friday the eight of May, and being there condemned as accessary, was executed with his mistress: at the time and place aforesaid. Not long after, Anthony Browne, brother to the fornamed George Browne, was for notable felonies conveyed from Newgate to Poole, and there hanged.

The tenth of Aprill, seven pirates, which (among other) had bene taken on the north seas, were led from Southwarke to Wapping, and six of them were there hanged: the other two had their pardon at the gallows.

The 17. of Aprill, a chandlers wife without Aldersgate of London, who had passed her husbands death by poisoning and other wayes, was set on the pillory in Cheape, with three other women, who had bene of her counsell, two of them were with her there whipped.

This yeare the Queenes maiesty of England, being moved by the Regent of Scotland, in the behalfe of the young king of Scots her cousin, sent a power of 1500. Englishmen to the siege of Edenborough castle, sir William Drewry knight marshall of Barwicke, to be general of her forces there, with capitaines as followeth, sir Francis Russell knight, capitaine Reade of Barwicke, and these following, also, capitaine Yaxley, capitaine Wood, capitaine Brickwell, capitaine Pike-man, capitaine Gamore, capitaine Cace, capitaine Carew, capitaine Erington, promost marshall, capitaine A Hall, capitaine Serlees capitaine of the pioneers, and capitaine Barton also of the pioneers. Divers other gentlemen also went thither to seeve of their owne free wills, as sir George Care knight, sir Henry Lea knight, maister Thomas Cecil, maister Michaelle Care, maister Henrie Care, maister William Knolles, maister Thomas Sutton, maister Corton, maister Kelway, maister Dier, maister Tiney, maister William Killigrew, maister William Selby, and other. Sir William Drewry with the capitaines, gentlemen, and number of soldiers before mentioned, passed from Barwicke to Litch, from whence on the 25. of Aprill they marched on to Edenborough, entered the towne, and the same day summoned the castell in forme as followeth:

Sir William Kirkauldie, sometime of Change knight, for as much as the Queenes maiesty my soueraine lady; upon the earnest request of her deare cousin the king of Scots, your soueraine lord, made to her highnesse by his regent, nobility, & states of this realme, after all good means used to haue reduced you to dutifull obedience of his authority by treaty, which hitherto you have not duly backed and wits, to the only hindrance of the braverall peace in this realme; by withholding that his highnesse castle, meaning as it seemeth, to reserve the same for a receptacle of foraine forces, to the manifest dangers both of this realme and of my souerainnesse, and therefore necessarie to remove so perillous a daunger to both the realmes, for which consideration her maiesty hath sent her aide & factors of men ordnance and munition, vnder my charge & leauing for the repugnation & recouery of the sayd castles, to the said kings use and behalfe, and therefore according to her maiesties commandement and commission, this shall be in due manner to waite, requite, and comfort you, that you render & deliuer the sayd castle, with the whole ordnance artillery, munitions, icicles household stuffe, and such other implements within the same, to me & the use and behalfe of the king your soveraigne, & his regent in his name, immediately after this my letter of commissions, or knowledge of the same, shall come to you: which if you obey, as of duty you ought, then shall I in her maiesties name interpose my selfe to traueile with the regent, counsell, and nobility here for the safety of your liues, &c. Otherwise if you continue in your former obduracy, abiding the canon, then no further to looke for grace or fauor, but you and the rest within that castle to be pursued to the uttermost, and holden as enemies to her maiesty, your owne soveraigne and country. Given at Emdenburgh by me Sir William Drewry knight, generall of her maiesties forces now in Scotland, this 25. of April, 1573.

The Lord Grange captaine of the castle, notwithstanding this summons, refused utterly to yeeld the castle, who thereupon receiued such answer from the generall, as stood not to his contentation. Hereupon were the pioneers set in hand to cast trenches, and to raise mounts in places conuenient to plant the ordnance vpon. And then began the siege of the castle in due places, where were erected six mounts. The first was for the regent, called the kings mount. The second for Sir William Drewry generall there. The third was gouerned by Sir George Carie. The fourth by Sir Henry Lea. The fifth by master Thomas Sutton master of the ordnance in the north part of England. There was at this siege as is reported 1500. Englishmen, and of Scots five hundred, or rather 1500. there was also one with another peeces of artillery 30. to wit, 6. canons nine halfe canons, nine culuerings, sixe sakers. They within spared not to bestow such as they had, as well at the pioneers as souldiers, in so much that diuerse were hurt, and some slaine, before the trenches and mounts might be brought to perfection, but they within escaped not free, especially after that the trenches & mounts were brought in state to defend the assailants, who watching and warding in the trenches, answered them within the castle very roughly. On the 17. of May began the battery of the castle, so that there were thirty canons shot off against the same, and so well bestowed at Davids tower, that by the ruines thereof then and after, the force of the English canons were calke to be seene. The 18. 19. and 20. of May, the canons and demy canons were not idle, but the one and twenty the whole battery began on each side the castle from the trenches and mounts very hotly, & still they within ceased not to make answer againe with their artillery, killing and hurting diuers both English and Scots, but such was the diligence of the English gunners, that they displaced the ordnance in the castle, and broke one of their chiefe canons iust in the mouth, whereby the same was broken in peeces. The 26. of May, the assault was giuen at seven of the clocke in the morning to the Spurre, which by the hardy manhood of the assailants was won, and was no sooner entered by the Englishmen, but that the generals ensigne was shewed and spred vpon the front and top thereof, to the great discomfort of them within the castle. In the meantime noblest these were appointed to giue the assault thus to the Spurre, there were certaine English men and Scots commaunded to make a countenance of an assault at the well side of the castle, whereby those that assaulted the Spurre might the more easily obtaine their purpose, but they rashly aduenturing further then they had in commaundement, were beaten backe and repulsed, with 28. or 30. of their company slaine and hurt. The same day toward night, they within the assault at the well side of the castle, which being graunted, with assurance of all hostilitie from that houre vnto the 28. of May, the lord Petteroe was let downe by a rope from the castle, and afterward the lord Grange himselfe captaine of the castle, and Robert Meluin came likewise downe to talke with the Generall, and such other as were appointed to accompanie him: hereupon at length to wit, the said 28. of May, the castle was surrendered into the hands of Sir William Drewry, and so it rested in his possession for the time, and his ensigne was set vp and spread during the same time in sundry places of the castle, and afterwards to the great honour of England, by him it was deliuered vnto the use of the king of Scots, and part of the spoile of the castle was giuen to the souldiers, the canons and artillery, with certaine other instruments, left to the king. If the English men by force had taken it, it was decreed that they should haue had the whole spoile except the artillery, & so should haue enioyed it by the space of three daies.

Causes of deliuerie of the castle were these:

1 Lacke of water: the well within the castle was stopped and defiled by the ruines of the castle: the other well without the castle could not serue them, for that there was a mount made to hinder them. Another water there was which was unknowne to them which were without, and was taken from them when the Spurr of the castle was taken, out of the which they were wont to haue a pint a day for every souldier.

2 Diuerse sickes.

3 Diuerse hurt.

4 Not many to maintaine the castle, which had no space to take any rest they were so pilled and overwaried.

5 Diuerse diuided in opinion.

6 Some were no souldiers.

7 No aide was to be looked for.

The 16. of June, the prisoners were deliuered by the said Sir William Drewry in presence of sundry Scots and Englishmen, vnto the regent, and that done, the same day the said Sir William Drewry with his power departed toward Warwick. The names of the prisoners were these, Sir William Kerkaudie lord of Grange, and Captaine of the castle of Emdenburgh, the lord Hume, the lord Ledington Secretarie, the Lord of Petteroe constable of the castle, the counsellor of Arguile, the laird of Redington, the laird of Changer, with others: in all to the number of men, one hundred thirty foure, women thirty foure, boys ten.

as at heretike was ready to haue bene pronounced against him on the fourth of November: but through the earnest pectuations of diuers learned men, who tooke great paines in that matter, it was said he renounced, forsooke, and abjured his opin on for erroneous and damnable, promising neuer to returne to them, and also willingly to do and performe all such penance as the bishop his Ordinarie should iudge him, but nothing was done, wherefore on the ninth of November by commandement of the Counsell, the said Peter Burchet was removed from the Zollardes tower to the Tower of London, where on the next morrow about noone, whilst one of the turniers that had by appointment kept him company was going downe, and locked the doore after him, leaving the other with him, called Hugh Longworth, who stood at a window reading in the Bible, the said Burchet walking by and downe in the chamber, tooke a billets end out of the fire, and knocked the said Longworth on the head, and left not till he had stricken him stark dead, and then drawing him behinde the chamber doore, he awaited the coming by of the other, likewise to haue dispatched him, but the other opening the doore, and murthering his fellow from the window where he left him; taking good regard, espied him lying behinde the doore, which he clapped to; ran downe for more helpe, and returning found his fellow murdered as is afore shewed. For the which fact on the next morrow, he was arraigned and condemned at Westminster, and from thence returned to Somersets house at the Strand, where he remained that night. And the next morrow being the 12. of November, he was brought out to a gibbet, set up for that purpose, nigh the place where he wounded maister Hawkins, he had no speech, nor shewed signe of repentance, but was by force and strength of men partly drawn, partly borne and thrust vp to the gibbet, where after his right hand being stricken off, and nayled to the gibbet, he was hanged.

This price about Lammas, wheate was sold at London for three shillings the bushell, but shortly after it was raised to foure shillings, five shillings, sixe shillings, and beside Christmas to a noble and seven shillings, which so continued long after: becke was sold for twenty pence, and two and twentie pence the stone, and all other flesh and white meats at an excessive price, all kinde of salt fish very deere, as sixe herrings two pence, &c. yet great plentie of fresh fish, and oft times the same very cheape: bay salt at three shillings the bushell, &c. All this deartly notwithstanding (thanks be giuen to God) there was no want of any thing to him that wanted no money.

The fourth of Apill being Palme Sunday, there was taken laying of masse in the lord Morleies house within Abgate of London, one Albon Dolman priest, and the lady Morley with her children and diuers others, were also taken hearing the said masse. There was also taken the same day and howe for laying masse at the lady Giffords in Trinitie lane, one Oliver Heywood priest, and for hearing of the said masse the said lady Gifford, with diuers other gentwomen. There was also taken at the same instant in the lady Brownes house in Cow lane for laying masse, one Thomas Heywood priest, and one John Cooper priest, with the lady Browne: and diuers other were likewise taken, being hearers of the said masse. A monstrous fish.

The ninth of July, at six of the clocke at night, in the isle of Chanet besides Ramegate in the parish of Saint Peter under the clift, a monstrous fish, or whale of the sea did shoot himselfe on shore, where for want of water, beating himselfe on the sands, he died about six of the clocke in the next morning, before which time he roied, and was heard more then a mile on the land. The length of this fish was two and twentieth paces, the neather iaw twelue foote the opening, one of his eyes being taken out of his head, was more then sixe hoies in a cart could drayn, a man stood upright in the place from whence the eye was taken, the thickness from the backe whereon he lay, to the top of his belly (which was upward) was fourtenc foote, his taile of the same breadth, betwene his eyes twelue foote, three men stood upright in his mouth, some of the ribs were sixtenc foot long, his tounge was sixtens foot long, his liver two cart loades, into his nostrils any man might haue crept: the oile being boyled out of the head was parmacetic, the oile of his body was whitish, and sweet of tast.

Peter Ramus Agnes Bridges and Rachel Pinder at Pauls crosse for counterfeiting to be punished.

The sixtenth of August, a solenne obsequie was kept in Saint Pauls church at London for Charles the ninth king of France, who being poisoned, deceased on the thirtieth of May last before passed.

The sixtenth of August being Sunday, Agnes Bridges a maid about the age of twenty yeares, and Rachel Pinder a wench about the age of 11. or 12. yeares, who both of them had counterfeited to be possessed by the diuell, (whereby they had not onely miraculously deluded many people, both men and women, but also diuerse such persons as otherwise seemed to be of good wit and understanding) stood before the preacher at Pauls crosse, where they acknowledged their hypocriticall counterfeiting, with penitent behauiours, requiring forgiveness of God and the world, and the people to pray for them. Also their severall examinations and confessions were there openly read by the preacher, and afterwards published in print, for the further posteritie hereafter to beware of the like deceivers.

The fourth of September in the afternoone, such a storme of raime happened at London, as the like of long time could not be remembered, wherethrough the channells of the citie suddenly rising, ranne with such forcible course towards the common Hoies, that a lad of the age of 18. yeares, minding to haue leapt ouer the channell neare unto Downegate, was borne ouer with the streame, and by the same carried from the conduit thre towards the Chamis, with such a swiftnesse, that no man with slaues or otherwaies could stay him, till he came against a cart wheeles flood in the water gate, afoze which time he was drowned & stark dead.

Michaelmas terme, which had bene adiourned by proclamation, began at Wellminster on the first of Nouember. The same first day in the morning there happened two great tides at London in the Chamis, the first by course, the other within one houre after, which overflowed the marshes, with many baulkes and sellers neare adioyning.

The fourtenth of Nouember being Sunday, about midnight following, diuine strange impressions of fire and smoke were seene in the aire, to pcedde forth of a blacke cloud in the north towards the South, which so continued till the next morning that it was day light. The next night following, the heauens from all parts did seeme to burne maruclouslly ragingly, and ouer our heads the flames from the boyizon round about rising did meete, and these double and roll one in another, as if it had bene in a cleare furnace.

The eighteenth day at night, were very stormie and tempestuous winde out of the south (I haue not knowne the like out of that quarter) especially after midnight till the next morning that it was day light. These are to be recited as tokens of Gods wrath tradic bent against the world for sinne now abounding, and also of his great mercie, who doth but onely shew the rod wherewith he daily picture to be beaten.

This yeare at London after harvest, the price of wheate began by little and little to fall from seuen shillings to three shillings the bushell, at which price it stayed (little or nothing rising or falling all the yeare after, but bay salt was raised from three shillings to foure, flue, and sixe shillings the bushell, the like wherof had neuer bene seene or heard within this realme.

The foure and twentieth of February, the feast of St. Marchie, on which day the faire was kept at Crockelburie, a strange thing happened there, for after a flood which was not great, but such as thereby the medowes neare adioyning were couered with water, in the afternoone there came downe the river of Tuon great numbers of flies and beetles, such as in summer euings use to strike men in the face, in great heapes, a foot thicke about the water, so that to credible mens iudgement, there were seene within a paire of but-lengths of those flies about an hundred quarters. The muls therabouts were dammed by with them for the space of foure daies after, and then were cleared by digging them out with shovels: from whence they came is yet unknowne, but the day was cold and a hard frost.

1575 Flies in February, the number strange.

The 26. of Februarie, betwene foure and sixe of the clocke in the afternoone, great earthquakes happened in the cities of York, Worcester, Gloucester, Bilston, Hereford, and in the countries about, which caused the people to run out of their houses for feare they should haue fallen on their heads. In Crockelburie, Bredon, and other places the houses fell from the cupboards, and the bookes in mens studies from the shelves. In Boxton chappell the people being on their knees at evening prayer, the ground moouing, caused them to runne away in great feare that the dead bodies would haue risen, or the chappell to haue fallen: part of Bisham castle fell downe, with certaine bricke chimnies in gentlemens houses. The bell in the Ware hall of Denbigh was caused to toll twice by shaking of the hall, &c.

On Easter day, which was the thirde of April, about nine of the clocke in the afternoone, was disclosed a congregation of Anabaptists Dutchmen, in a house without the barres of Algate at London, wherof fuent and twentieth were taken and sent to prison, and foure of them bearing fagots recanted at Pauls crosse on the sixtenth day of May, in forme as followeth:

- 1 That Christ tooke not flesh of the substance of the blessed virgine Mary.
- 2 That infants of the faithfull ought not to be baptized.
- 3 That a christian man may be a magistrate, or beare the sword or office of authority.
- 4 That it is not lawfull for a christian to take an oath.

Now by the grace of God, and through conference with good and learned ministers of Christ his Church, I do understand and acknowledge the same to be most damnable and detestable heresies, and do aske God here before his church, merre for my said former errors, and do forsake them, repent and renounce them, and abjure them from the bottom of my heart, professing that I certainly beleue,

- 1 That Christ tooke flesh of the substance of the blessed virgine Mary.
- 2 That infants of the faithfull ought to be baptized.
- 3 That a christian man may be a magistrate, or beare the sword and office of authority.
- 4 That it is lawfull for a christian to take an oath.

And further I confesse, that the whole doctrine and religion established & published in this realme of England, as also that which is received and preached in the Church here in the city, is sound, true, and according to the word of God, whereunto in all things I submit my selfe, and will most gladly be a member of the said Church, from henceforth utterly abandoning and forsaking all and every Anabaptistical error.

The 17. day of May, about midnight following the right reuerend father in God Matthew Parker, doctour of divinity, archbishop of Canterbury, deceased at Lambeth, and was there honorably buried.

This reuerend father examined thoroughly the English translation of the holy Bibles, wherein he partly used the help of his brethren bishops, and other doctours, and caused the same to be newly printed in the largest volume, for the furniture of many churches then wanting. Also making diligent search for the antiquities of the Britons, and English Barons, to the end those monuments might be carefully kept, he caused them to be well bound and trimly covered, and such whereof he knew very few examples to be extant (among the which was Matthew Paris, Matthew Floribus, Thomas Walsingham & other, all which he received of my hands, he caused to be printed. The 22. of July, two Dutchmen Anabaptists were burnt in Smithfield who died in great heere with roaring and crying. The 20. of July in the afternoon was a great tempest of lightning & thunder, wherethrough both men and beasts miners places were stricken dead. The fourth of September being Sunday about leuen of the clocke in the morning, a certaine glasse house which sometime had bene the Crossed friers hall, near to the tower of London, burst out on a terrible fire, whereunto the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs with all expedition repaired, and practised there all means possible by bucket-buckets, hookes, and otherwise to beat quench it, all which notwithstanding, whereas the same house in a litle time before had consumed great quantity of wood by making of fine drinking glasses, now it selfe having within it more than thousand billets of wood, was all consumed.

The 26. of September, a Poulsters wife in the parish of Christs church within the Prewgate of London, was delivred and brought to bed of four children at one burden, all females, or maiden children, which were christened by the names Elizabeth, Mary, Margaret, and Dorothy, and the same day moneth the mother was buried, but all the four children living and in good liking were borne to church after her.

The 11. of February, Anne Aueries widow, forswearing her selfe for a little money that she should have paid for five pound of towne, at a shop in Duloodstreet of London, fell immediately downe speechelesse, calling by at her mouth in great abundance, and with horrible sinke, the same matter which by natures course should have bene voided downewards, till she died. a terrible example of Gods iust iudgement upon such as make no conscience of falsly swearing against their brother.

The 15. of Februarie, Edmond Grindale sometime bishop of London, late archbishop of Yorke, was in the Chapter house of S. Paules church at London, elected archbishop of Canterbury.

The 5. of March in the night, through a great stau of wind then in the north-west, a tiltboate with about the number of 31. persons men and women, coming from Grauesend toward London, were all drowned, one boy excepted.

The 30. of May, Thomas Greene goldsmith was taken from Prewgate of London to Tideside, and there hanged, headed and quartered, for clipping of coine both gold and silver.

The 15. of June, Martin Frobisher, being furnished of adventures, with two small barkes and one pinnell departed from Blacke mall, upon his voyage for the discouerie of a passage to Cataya, by the Northwell seas. Upon the 1. of July he had sight (as he iudged) of Friland, but durst not approach the same, by reason of the great ice that lay along the coast: not far from thence he lost his pinnell, & one of his barkes, who mistrusting the danger of tempests returned home, with report that their Generall Martin Frobisher was cast away, which captaine notwithstanding continued his course Northwell beyond any man that heretofore discovered, & the 20. of July had sight of a high land, which he named Q. Elizabeths Foreland: and after that another Foreland with a great passage, deuiding (as it were) the two maine lands asunder, this place he named Frobishers Seanes. After he had passed thre leagues further, he went on shoare, found the same to be inhabited with savage people, caught one of them into his barke, and returned into England in the moneth of August following: one of his company brought from thence a peece of blacke stone, much like to a sea-rolle in colour, which being brought to certaine goldsmiths in London, to make assay thereof, found it to hold gold, and that very richly for the quantity as they affirmed, but other sayd the contrary, and so it is pproved.

The 29. of July, a woman was bent at Tunbridge in Kent, for poisoning of her husband: and two dayes before, a man named Oxley, was hanged at Wadlstone for being accessarie to the same fact.

A strang.

A strange peece of worke, and almost incredible, was brought to passe by an Englishman borne within the city of London, and a cleare of the Chancery named Peter Bales, who by his industry and practise of his pen continued and writ within the compasse of a penny, in Latine, the Lords prayer, the Crede, the ten Commandments, a prayer to God, a prayer for the queene, his polie, his name, the day of the moneth, the yeare of our Lord, and the raigne of the queene: And at Hampton court he presented the same to the queenes maistie in the head of a ring of gold, couered with a Christall, and presented therewith an excellent spectacle by him deuised for the rather reading thereof, wherewith her maistie read all that was written therein, and did weare the same vpon her finger.

Also about the same time Marke Scalior black-smith borne in London, for triall of workmanship, made one hanging locke of yron, Steele, and brasse, a pipe key filed three square, with a pot vpon the shaft, and the beu with two ellcs, all cleane wrought, which weighed but one graine of gold or wheate coine: he made also a chaine of gold of 43. linkes, to the which chaine the locke and key being fastned and put about a bras necke she drew the same, all which locke, key, chaine and flea, weighed but one graine and a halfe, as is yet to be seene vpon Coyne-hill by Leaden hall, at the sayd Marks house.

The moneth of August, many complaints being brought to the Queenes maistie and her counsell vpon the fluslingers, for great spoiles and robberies by them daily committed vpon her highnesse subiects, her maistie gaue order to put four good ships, and two barkes of her owne to the seas, vnder the charge of maister William Ho stocke esquire, comptroller of all her highnesse ships, with 1100. men, victualled for five weekes, in which time was by them taken eight fluslingers ships and barkes, prizes, and 220. sea rourers in them, who were sent on land to sundry prisons.

The 10. of Nouember, in the city of Worcester, a cruell and unnatural homicide as another Caine, murdered his owne naturall and louing brother, he first smote out his baines with an are, then cut his throte, and after buried him vnder the hart of a chimney, thinking thereby (though wrongly) yet quietly to haue emoyed his brothers goods long before in his possession, but not long after this secret murder coming to light, the murderer was rewarded according to his deserts.

The 17. of March, through a strange tempest which hapned in the North neare to a towne called Richmon, not onely cottages, trees, barnes, and haystackes, but also the most part of a church called Patrick Brumton, was ouerthrowne, with most strange lights in the ayre both terrible and fearful.

The 26. of March, the new Conduit neare vnto Oldborne, and a handball with one cocke at Oldborne bridge, were begun to be founded by William Lamb, sometime gentleman of the chappell to king Henry the eight, now citizen and clothworker of London, the water wherof is conueyed in pipes of lead from

This yeare in the moneth of April, the decayed ſtone houſe, called the tower upon London bridge, was begun to be taken downe, and the heads of traitors being remooued thence, were ſet on the gate at the bidge foot towards Southwacke. And on the 28. of Auguſt next following, ſir Iohn Langley lord Mayor of the citie of London, laid the firſt ſtone of a new foundation of a tower in the ſame place, which tower was moſt beautifully finiſhed in the moneth of September, in the yeare of Chriſt 1579.

On ſonday the 4. of Auguſt, betwene the houres of 9. and 10. of the clocke in the forenoone, whileſt the miniſter was reading of the ſecond leſſon in the pariſh church of Blithborough a towne in Suffolke a ſtrange and terrible tempeſt of lightning and thunder ſtrake through the wall of the ſame church into the ground almoſt a yard deepe, brane downe all the people on that ſide about twenty perſons, then renting the wall by to the Keneſtrie, clef the doore, and returning to the ſteeple, rent the timber, brake the chimes, and ſed toward Worgey ſixe miles off. The people that were ſtricken downe, were found groueling more then halfe an houre after, whereof a man more then forty yeares, & a boy of ſixtene yeares old were found ſharke dead, the other were ſcathed. And here I thinke good to ſet downe a declaration ſent by the Queene's maieſtie of England vnto the King of Spaine, containing a iuſtification of her proceedings with the States of the low countries.

The Queene's maieſtie being giuen to underſtand of diuerſe moſt ſlaunders and falſe brutes giuen out touching her proceedings and dealings with the States of the low countries, tending as it were to make her the author and principall nourisher of the ciuill troubles in the ſaid countries: and doubting that the ſetters and ſpreaders abroad of the ſaid brutes, to ſeek by all means they may to induce her good brother the king of Spaine to beleue the ſaid falſe and malicious ſurmises to be true, with meaning thereby to breed a breach & interruption of the good amitie betwene them: her Maieſtie hauing therefore nothing more in recommendation then her honour, and to be reputed a Prince that deſireth to maintaine and continue good amitie with the Princes her neighbours (whatſoeuer hath bene giuen out maliciously to the contrarie) being able to iuſtifie her whole actions before God and the world, aduocall towards him as other Princes her neighbours, hath thought it very expedient for the earneſt deſire he hath to ſatiſſie the ſaid king, to ſet downe in writing a declaration (ſuch as the will maintaine to be true in the word of a Prince) of her proceedings with the States, to the end the ſaid King bring truly inſoigned therein, ſuch cauſes and ſcruples of ſuſpition, as might any way hinder the good amitie betwene them, might be remooued, and the ſame reſtoꝝed to as great perfection and integritie as hath bene heretofore betwene any their progenitors, which ſaid declaration, tending to that good end aboue mentioned, her Maieſtie alſo hath thought meete to accompany it well with an aduile vnto the ſaid king, what way in her opinion were moſt fit for him to take for the continuance of the ſaid countries vnder his obedience, and the reſtoꝝing of the ſame vnto their former quietneſſe and repoſe, as alſo with her reſolution in thoſe caſes of the ſaid countries, in caſe the ſaid king ſhall not condeſcend to take ſome way of pacification, according to her Maieſties moſt ſincere and friendly aduile.

And firſt touching her proceedings with the States, ſhe doubteth not but that if the king ſhall reſoꝝt to his owne knowledge, and call to remembrance how often ſince the firſt breaking out of the ciuill diſſention in thoſe countries, her Maieſtie hath mooued him by ſumme miniſters, ſent as well vnto himſelfe as vnto his vnder-gouernours in the ſaid countries, for warning both him and them of the miſchiefs preſently then fallen out, and aduiled him to take ſome ſpedie way for the preuention of the ſame, he cannot but in honour and conſcience confeſſe, that her Highneſſe hath therein diſcharged the dutie of a faithfull friend, and good alie in that beſaiſe. Of which aduile if it might pleaſe him to haue taken proſite, thoſe his countries being preſently in a moſt perplext ſtate, had bene ſaved from the ruine and deſtruction they are now apparantly running into, his people and ſubiects preſerued from ſlaughter and bloodſhed, his rich towneſſes continued unpoyſoned, and the whole gouernement kept from perill of alienation: and if herein for her

Maieslies iustificacion, neither these friendly offices, nor the word and faith of a Prince may suffice, yet her owne accounts themselves may serue to iustifie her in the eyes and sight of all the world: That she hath sought to continue those countreys vnder the Kings obedience, and hath not at any time intended to impatronize her selfe of any part of them, a matter which perhaps other Princes hauing like aduantages offered by some part of his people, would not haue refused, and therefore may thinke her selfe euill dealt withall, in case to rare an example should be so hardly or vnfriendlyly interpreted. And as her Maieslie hath not left any good office vndone towards the King and his ministers tending to pacification, and the perturbations of those countreys vnder his obedience: so on the other side, she hath not omitted by sundrie messengers sent both to the Prince of Orange and the States, aswell to perswade them to cease their ciuill warres, and to take some way of peace and agreement amongst themselves, as also to continue their auncient obedience vnder the said King their naturall Lord and soueraign, being prouoked thereto vpon secret, but yet verie true and certaine aduertisements giuen her of great offers made vnto them by some (whom she forbearth to name for good respects) to haue withdrawen them from their obedience. And herein it becometh many perturbations beset by messengers sent of purpose to aduise them to continue their obedience to the King, her Maieslie had not furnished them in the time of their necessitie with a portion of money, aswell to serue them for the speedy execution of the pacification therin in Tractate betwene Don Iohn and them, as for the keeping of them from a desperate putting off themselves into the hands of other princes, it did manifestly appeare that the pacification and accord had not bene to soone made, and that they for lacke thereof should haue bene diuicid for their defence, to haue deliuered some part of those countreys, to the possession of such as would not haue bene remooued without the spending of many millions, and the losse of many thousand mens liues. Of the true cause of this support, her Maieslie is the more willing to make mention, for that she is informed, that notwithstanding her good and sincere meaning in that behalfe, other wrong and sinister interpretations haue bene made of the same, as the like also hath bene done of other her proceedings. Amongst the rest, her Maieslie hath thought it expedient to answer one calumnie contained in a letter fethered on Don Iohn, and published in a booke lately set out by the States in their Iustificacion, by the which her Maieslie is charged to haue encouraged the Prince of Orange not to stand to the pacification, and withall did for his better encouragement, offer vnto him any assistance she could yeeld (a matter most slanderous and vntrue) for that her Maieslie being giuen to vnderstand by the Viscount of Gaunt, sent vnto her from Don Iohn, how he found himselfe greued with the Prince of Orange, for that (as he affirmed) the said Prince did not obferue the said pacification, her Maieslie did immediatlie dispatch an expresse messenger vnto the said Prince, both to charge him with Don Iohns accusation, as also to aduise (and that most effectually) to obserue duely the said pacification, vnto towards him some threats in case he should seeke to violate the same, wherein she could find no other

other disposition, but that he was most desirous to keepe all the parts of the said pacification, as the onely meane of the ending of the long ciuill warre: The like aduise did she also giue to the States, requiring no lesse continuance of the pacification, being raised first by Don Iohn, and then afterwards by the King, then they to whom the benefit thereof did most properly and peculiarly appertaine. Her Maieslies proceedings and dealings with the Prince and States hauing bene such as hath bene before alleaged, and reduced, she both appeals to the King himselfe, who she thinketh will truly and fully looke into the truth of the matter, and also to all others that shall not be transported with passion, whether the said proceedings are not to be maintained to be both iust and honourable, whatsoever hath bene maliciously giuen out to the contrarie. And herein her Maieslie is perswaded, that hardly any other Prince that hath some waies bene so vnfriendlyly dealt withall, and found so little account made of her abuses giuen both to the King and to his gouernours of those countreys, would haue dealt in such friendly sort as she hath done: notwithstanding the said discouragements, her Maieslie thinketh it honourable for her, and meete for the place she holdeth, being the auncient allye that the Kings progenitors as Dukes of Burgundy haue, to continue still her former course in giuing friendly counsell vnto the King, can not but proceede to the second point aboue mentioned, which is to yeeld her aduise, what way in her opinion, is to be taken for the appeasing of the present troubles, and the continuing of them vnder his obedience.

First, it is apparant that the pacification is broken, and as great hostilitie increased on both sides as may be, wherof she is heartily loyke: the end, if it go on, will be an utter desolation of the countreys, or the losse or alteration of them from the Kings obedience, for helpe wherof her Maieslie thinketh the best and expedient remedies to be, that it would please him to reuere his subjects to his grace and fauour, that he would permit them to continue in their auncient liberties & charters, that he would commaund the due and iust execution of the pacification, and that he would appoint such a gouernour of his owne blood, as might like him and be grateful to them, whereby they with great contentation might yeeld to him all due obedience, continue in their religion according to his pleasure, and do all things accorded in the pacification: which by reason of the great distrust growne on both sides, betwene Don Iohn and them, can neuer take effect, so long as Don Iohn shall remaine gouernour, for it seemeth they haue put on a determination, that rather then they will endure a hard dealing which they think themselves assured they shall receiue by his gouernment, they will throw themselves into the protection of any other prince. They charge him with the breach of the pacification: he on the other side offereth to stand to his iustificacion, charging them with the said breach. Her Maieslie hauing heard the allegations of the ministers sent by her, both from Don Iohn, and the States, meaneth not to be a iudge betwene them, hauing rather a greater desire to reconcile them if she could, & to do them both good, than to discouise the faults & blamings of either party. To reconcile them she findeth it impossible, and therefore for the stay of the troubles and of those mischiefs that otherwise are like to ensue, the onely way of remedie will be to make choise of some other tied to him by promise of blood to be substituted under him in that government, by which temperate counsels the troubles may well be appeased, the great effusion of blood avoided, and the countries continued under his obedience, which otherwise are like to be alienated from him. If he shall like to follow this advice, we see no disposition in the people to change their king, being dutifully inclined towards him, with intention (in this behalf they may be reckoned) to inuade nothing, but to maintaine, and duly observe the late pacification made at Caunt.

And like as for the contentment of the States and the appeasing of the troubles we wisheth Don Johns restoration: so considering how cruel afflicted he sheweth himselfe towards her, as well by letters intercepted, as by secret practices and dealings with the Queene of Scots, a matter very dangerous to the good quiet of her state, as the bearer can more amply informe him touching diuerse particularities in this behalf: We can not but in respect of the continuance of the good amitie which we wisheth to be betwene the King and her Maiestie, be the more earnest to presse the King therein, looking for no continuance of good amitie and good neighborhood, so long as a minister so cruel afflicted towards her shall reside there, and being desirous that such ministers might be employed on both sides, as would desire rather to increase the amitie than to hinder it.

This her abuse tending to none other end, but to perswade those countries under her obedience, and the continuance of good amitie betwene them, she hopeth the King will accept in no lesse friendly part then it is by her sinceritie meant. And in the meane time untill his minde be knowne in this behalf, her maiestie fearing the great forces prepared by Don Iohn, with the assistance of the French already marching towards him, will drive her ancient friends the states of the low countries, to the one of these two extremities: either to be overcome by foraine forces, and so endangered to foraine seruitude: or else constrained for the withstanding thereof to give themselves out to some other prince, both which can not but be perillous to the king presently, dangerous to her Maiestie hereafter, and an utter destruction to the whole country. Her highnes therefore for the benefit of the said King, & the avoiding of her owne perill (upon promises and assurance given by the said states, to yield the king his due obedience, & make no further innovation in matters of religion, but to observe the pacification of Caunt) hath promised for the causes & respects above mentioned, to yield them a support of money and men, onely to stay them from further danger of alienation, or else their ruine.

Which proceedings of hers, if the King shall not be induced to like of, whereby her Maiestie shall discover that his intention is by force of armes to alter and dissolve the ancient forme of government, and by taking away their ancient lawes and liberties, to make it a land of conquest, and to people it with garrisons of men of warre. And that the end and scope of his intention should tend to that which is disowned by Escobedo's letters, wherein he writeth that the enterprise of England is of more facility then the enterprise of the Isles, whereby her Maiestie shall perceive the disposition of so ill a neighbor to her and her royall estate, then her Maiesties resolution is to employ all the power she shall be able to make for the defence of her neighbors, and preservation of her owne estate.

As on the contrary side, if he shall incline to their reasonable demands, in giving them such a governor as they can better like of, then of Don Iohn, and they notwithstanding shall go on in disobedience against him, & make other innovations contrary to the promises they have given and professed to her, she will turne her force against them, and in assistance of the king yield him the best ayde she can to bring them to reason and conspurate. And in the meane season, untill she may be thoroughly informed hereof, she hath thought good, for avoiding of effusion of christian blood, and for many other good and necessary respects, to deale both with Don Iohn and the States for a surtrance of armes, which if he shall refuse to yield unto, and the States shall be willing, because she seeth it manifestly, that it concerneth the Kings honor, and profite of his country, she will not cease to go on with like offices towards them, as she hath begun. Thereby onely to defend them from foraine tyrannie, to keepe them in the kings obedience from aliening themselves to any other potentate, and to defend her selfe and her dominions from the perils that thereby she seeth manifestly to ensue.

The seventeenth day of Januarie, Simon Pembroke dwelling in Southwarke, being a figure dinger, and vehemently suspected to be a conuicer, by commandment of the ordinarie Judge of those parts, appeared in the parish Church of Saint Saviour, at a court holden there, which Simon being bailed in entering a Proctor, and having money in his hand, leaped his head upon a pew, wherein the proctor stood: which after he had done a certaine space, the proctor began to lift up his head, to see what he ayled, and found him departing out of life, and straightway the said Simon fell downe railing a little in the throat, and next spake words after: this was done even as the Judge came into the church, who said it was the iust iudgement of God towards those that used sorcerie, and a great example to admonish other to feare the iudice of God. After his clothes being opened, there were found about him five diuine Books of conurbation and most abhominable practices, with a picture of time of a man having three dice in his hand, with this writing. Chance Dice fortunately, and diuine papers of such like matters, as he had dealt in for men, such as are mentioned in Leuiticus the twentieth Chapter and the first verse: If any soule turne himselfe after such as worke with spirits, and after soothsayers, to go a whooping after them (saith the Lord,) I will put my face against that soule, and will cut him off from among my people.

The third of Februarie, early in the morning Iohn Nelson, for denying the Quenes Supremacie, and such other traitorous words against her maiestie, was taken from Newgate to Tiborne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered.

The 7. of Februarie, one named Sherewood was taken from the Tower of London to Tyburne, & there hanged, bowelled & quartered for the like treason.

The ninth of March, leauen Pyrates were hanged at Walsapping.

The sixteenth of Februarie, Iohn de Loy a Frenchman, and six English Gentlemen, were conveyed from the Tower of London towards Norwich, there to be arraigned and executed, for copying of money counterfeit.

The tenth of March deceased the Lady Margaret countesse of Lennox, and was honorably buried at Walsminster the thirde of April.

And on the 31. of July, after many attempts, & sundry times being put backe by Islands of ice in his streights, he recovered his long wished port, & came to anchor in the Harow, newly by her maiesly named Mera In-cognita, where (as in the yeare before) they brought their ships with the like pictured Gold ore out of the mines; & then on the last of August returning thence, arrived safely in England about the first of October, but their Gold ore after great charges proved worse then good stone, whereby many men were deceived, to their bitter bindings.

received.

The 22. of January, about 7. of the clocke at night, John Cassimere Count Palatine of Rhenish, duke of Barre, landed at the Tower of London, was there by diuerse noblemen and others honourably received, and conveyed by candle light and torch light to Sir Thomas Greshams house in Bishops gate street, where he was received with sounding of trumpets, drums, fifes and other instruments of musike, and three both lodged and feasted till Sunday next, that he was by the nobility fetched to the court at Whitehall, where he talked with her maiesly, and after lodged in Sommer set house. In the weeke following, he hunted at Hampton court. On Sunday the first of February, he beheld a valiant Jussling and running at the tilt at Whitehall; on the next morrow he saw them fight at barriers with swords on horsebacke. On Tuesday he dined with the Lord Maior of London: On Wednesday with the Dutches of Suffolke, at her house called the Burgokeing of Barbicane, by the crose streete: On Thursday at the Stillyard, &c. On the 8. of February, the queene made him knight of the garter, by deliuering to him the collar, and putting the garter on his leg at White hall: and on the 14. of February, he departed from London homewards, with great rewards giuen by the queenes maiesly, the nobility, men of honor, the maior, of London and the citizens of that city.

The 4. of February, and in the night following, fell such abundance of snow, that on the first in the morning the same was found at London to lye two fote deepe in the Shallowell, and otherwell, being return by the wind, very boisterous in the North east, on banks, an ell or yard and halfe deepe, in the which drifts of snow in the countries, many cattell, and some men and women were overwhelmed and lost: it snowed till the 8. day, and frezed till the tenth. Then followed a thaw with continuall rain a long time after, which caused such high floods, that the marshes & low grounds being drowned for the time, the water rose to high in Whitehall ball, & after the fall thereof, some fishes were found there to remaine.

He also in his life time gave for 8. scholars, to be found in Bennet Colledge at Cambridge, to each of them: £ 6. 3. and 8. 8. the yeare for ever.

The 25. of April, Sir Thomas Bromley, knight, was made lord Chancellor of England.

The 26. of April, William Kympton Alderman of London was by the lord Chancellor sent to the fleete, about a letter late by him received, from the Clerk of Hables in Huddesford beside Barne. This letter amongst other matters mentioned of a pale pulled downe at Northall, by the commons there, &c. for concealing of which letter the said Alderman was committed as aforesaid. And on the 15. of May, was in the Starred chamber condemned to pay 500. marks fine, and to remaine prisoner at the pleasure of her maieslie.

The 4. of May, were arraigned at Barne in Hartfordshire, certaine men of Northall, Wyms, and the parts thereto adjoining, for pulling downe a pale at Northall, late let up (on the common ground) by the Earle of Arundel, right of them were condemned, two were dyed in the hand, two were hanged betwixt Barne & Whitehall, the other four continued remained prisoners in Hartford. Soe long after many were bound to appeare at the next sise, & such as could not get in baile for their appearing were committed, &c. Mathew Hamond of Northall, by his trade a pilotage bought, three milles from Northall, was concerned before the bishop of Norwich, for he denied Christ to be our Saviour. At the time of his appearance it was objected, that he had published these heresies following.

That the new Testament and Gospel of Christ are but merer foolshewe, a fable of men, or rather a merer fable.

Item, that man is rebeld to grace by the merer merrie of God, without the meane of Christs blood, death and passion.

Item, that Christ is not God, nor the Saviour of the world; but a merer man, a full man, and an abominable Idoll.

Item, that all they that worship him are abominable Idolaters: And, that Christ did not rise againe from death to life by the power of his Godhead, neither that he did ascend into heauen.

Item, that the holy ghost is not God, neither that there is any such holy ghost.

Item, that heptiline is not necessarie in the Church of God, neither the use of the Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. For the which heresies, he was condemned in the consilorie, and sentence was read against him by the bishop of Norwich, the 14. of April, and thereupon deliuered to the Sherifes of Norwich, and hereafter he spake words of blasphemie against the Queenes maieslie, and others of her counsell, he was by the Hierorder master Sergeant Windham, and the Maior Sir Robert Wood of Norwich, condemned to lose both his eares, which were cut off the thirteenth of May in the market place of Norwich, where he confirmed his blasphemous speeches against our Saviour Iesus Christ, for the which on the twentieth of May he was burnt in the castell ditch of Norwich.

The first of June, deceased Robert Horne Doctor of Divinitie, Bishop of Winchester, at Winchester place in Southwark, & was buried at Winchester.

The 17. of July, the Queenes maieslie, being on the riuer of Thames, betwixt her highnesse Hamour of Greenwich and Wexford, in her private barge, accompanied with the French Ambassadors, the Earle of Lincoln, & maiister Elizabeth, &c. with whom she entered discourse about twaighten affairs: it chaunced, that one Thomas Appletree a young man and seruant to maister Henry Cary, with two or three children of her Maisties chappell, and one other being in a boate on the Thames, rowing by and downe betwixt the places afore named, the aforesayd Thomas Appletree had a caluier or harquebuse, which he had thre or foure times discharged with bullet, shooting at random very rashly, who by great misfortune shot one of the watermen, being the second man next unto the bales of the sayd barge, laboring with his oare (which late within fife foot of her highnesse) cleane through both his armes: the blow was so great and grievous, that it moued him out of his place, and forced him to cry and scritch out piteously, supposing himselfe to be slaine, and saying he was shot through the body. The man bleeding abundantly, the queenes maistie shewed such noble courage as is most wonderfull to be heard and spoken of, for beholding him so maimed, she neuer dashed therat, but had him be of good cheere, and sayd he should want nothing that might be for his ease, &c. For the which fact the sayd Thomas being apprehended, and condemned to death: was on the 11. of July brought to the water side, where was a gibbet set up, directly placed betwixt Detford and Greenwich, & when the hangman had put the rope about his necke, he was by the queenes most gracious pardon deliuered from execution.

This yeare John Fox of Widdowbury, William Wickney of Portsmouth, and Robert More of Harwich Englishmen, having bene prisoners in Turkey about the space of thirteene or fourteene yeares with more then two hundred and fiftie other Christians of diuerse nations, by killing their keeper, maruellously escaped, and returned to their native countries.

In September and October fell great winds and raging foulds in summy places of this realme, wherethrough many men, cattell, and houses were drowned. In the towne of Heston the cottages were bozne downe, the coye lost, pasture ground ouerwhelmed, and cattell drowned. In the towne of Sedolp the water came vp to the market place, where cupboards, chests, stools and founnes swam about the houses, their fwell, coye and hay was wrackt and bozne away. Also the towne of Saint Edes in Huntingdonshire was ouerflowne suddenly in the night, when all men were at rest, the waters brake in with such a force, that the towne was almost all defaced, the swans swam downe the market place, and all the towne about, the boats did float. Soymancheller was suddenly suppressed, their houses flouen full of water when men were at their rest, their cattell were destroyed: about the 14. of October, the sea did swell, the marchants lost their goods, many were drowned, which were after found in great numbers.

The 6. of Aprill being Wednesday in Easter weeke, about 6. of the clocke toward evening, a suddē earthquake hapning in London, & almost generally throughout England, caused such amazement of the people as was wonderfull for the time, & caused them to make their earnest prayers vnto almighty God. The great clocke bell in the palace at Westminster, strake of it selfe against the hammer with shaking, as diuers clockes & bells in the city & elsewhere did the like: the gentlemen of the Temple being at supper, ran from the tables, & out of their hall with their knives in their hands, a peece of the Temple church fell downe, some stones fell fro Pauls church: And at Christs church in the sermon while a stone fell from the top of the church, which killed out of hand one Thomas Grey an apprentice, & another stone also brused his fellow seruant named Mabel Eueret, so that she liued but 4. dayes after: diuerse other were sore hurt with running out of the church: diuerse chimnies in the city, part of the fell downe, the houses were so shaken. The earthquake continued, in or about London not passing one minute of an houre, & was no more felt: but eastward in Kent and on the sea coast it was felt thre times: as at Sandwiche at fire of the clocke, the land not onely quaked, but the sea so foamed, that the ships tottered. At Dover also at the same houre was the like, so that a peece of the cliffe fell into the sea, with also a peece of a cliffe wall there: a peece of Saltwood castle in Kent fell downe, and in the Church of Hode the bells were heard to sound. A peece of Sutfren church in Kent fell downe, the earthquake being there both heard and felt. And in all these places and other in east Kent, the same was felt thre times to mowse, to wit, at Urre, at mine, and at cleun of the clocke.

The 19. of Aprill, the ferry at Lambeth was drowned with five men & foure horses, other two men and five horses swam to land, and were saued.

Francis Drake his voyage vnto about the

Alſo this yeare maſter Francis Drake returned into England, hauing ſailed round about the world (as is affirmed) thus it was begun: on the 12. of December, in the yeare of Chriſt 1577. he ſet ſaile from Plymouth with a ſtreet of 5. ſhips, to wit, the Pellicane admirall, the Marigold, the Elizabeth, barke Boubliſh, and a pinnace; he ſell with the cape Canbine on the coaſt of Barbary the 25. of ſame moneth, and ſo coaſting along, the 27. of December found an Iſland called Hoghador, lying one mile diſtant from the maine: in this Iſland the generall erected a pinnace, which he had with three other brought ready framed out of England, which being finiſhed he departed the laſt of Decſber. On the 17. of January he arrived at cape Blank, & left the ſame on the 22. of that moneth, & on the 27. fell with cape de Verde: on the 30. of January he fell with an Iſland called Saint Jago: hauing put off cape de Verde in the beginning of February, they ſaw no more land vntill the ſir of April 1578. that they fell with the coaſt of Brazill, in the latitude of 33. degrees beyond the line, and with much ado entered the riuer of Plate: from whence departing he fell with the ſtrait of Magellan the 20. of Auguſt, and paſſed through with three ſhips onely, hauing caſt off the other two as improuident, where after they had bene toiled many daies to and fro, in the night the ſir of October the Marigold, wherein maſter Iohn Thomas was captaine, parted from the generall, and was no more heard of. And ſhortly after, the other wherein maſter Iohn Winter was captaine parted alſo, who hauing loſt his company, came home againe through the ſtraites. The golden Hinde / or Pellicane I thinke held on her courſe to Chily, Lima, Coquimbo, Africa, Panama, & ſo all along the backe ſide of America to the line-ward, and paſſed the line the ſir day of March, and the ſirteenth of March being on land at the Ile of Caones, he paſſed forth north-ward till he came to the latitude of forty ſeuen, thinking to haue come that way home: but being conſtrained by fogges and cold winds to forſake his purpoſe, came backward to the line-ward the tenth of Iune 1579. and ſtayed in the latitude of thirty eight to graue and trim his ſhip, vntill the ſir and twentieth of July: and from thence ſetting his courſe ſouthweſt, he fell the third of October with an Ile 8. degrees from the line northward, and the 4. of November he fell with Ternate one of the Iles of Molucca, where being curteouſly entertained of the king, he took in certaine tun of ſpices, and came homeward to a little Iſland, where he ſtayed to trim his ſhip 20. daies, where he ſupplied himſelfe with wood, and erected a ſmiths forge for to make ſuch yron worke as was needfull for the repairing of his ſhip: and from thence the 12. of December he went toward Malacca, but not able to continue his courſe weſtward for the wind, was conſtrained to recouer towards the north of the Iles of Celebes: after this the ninth of January comming towards Iava maior they ran themſelues vpon ground, and ſtarke all twenty houres, not looking but for death, but eſcaping that danger, they continued their courſe ſill weſt, & came to Iava maior aſo named, and there touching they bent their courſe ſouthweſt to the cape of Sona Sperance, the after they kept their courſe northweſt, and ſell with the coaſt of China, from thence bending their courſe north northweſt, they came to the line, and then ſwaping their courſe north and by weſt, they came to the height of 30. degrees, where finding the wind weſterly, they came home into England in the yeare 1580. And in the yeare next following, to wit, 1581. on the fourth of April, her maieſty dining at Deptford in Kent, after dinner entered the ſhip which captaine Drake had ſo happily guided round about the world, and being there, a bridge that her maieſty had paſſed over, broke, being vpon the ſame more then 200. perſons, and no man hurt by the fall, and there ſhe did make captaine Drake knight in the ſame ſhip, for reward of his ſervice his armes were given him, the world in a ſhip, which ſhip by her maieſties commandement is lodged in a docke at Deptford, for a monument to all poſterity of that famous and worthy exploit, whereof a worſhipfull gentleman maſter William Borough in his preface to a booke entituled, A diſcourſe of the variation of the compaſſe, or magnetick Needle, hath theſe words: So now at length (ſaith he) our countreyman ſir Francis Drake, for valourous attempt, prudent proceeding, and fortunate performing his voyage about the world, is not onely become equal to any of them that liue, but in ſame farre ſurpaſſing.

On the tenth of October (ſomelay on the ſeventh) appeared a blazing ſtar in the ſouth, buſhing toward the eaſt, which was nightly ſcene diminiſhing of his brightneſſe vntill the 21. of the ſame moneth.

About the twelfth of Januarie, proclamation was published at London, for the excoication of sundry the Quenes maiesties subsidies remaining beyond the seas, vnder colour of study, and yet living contrarie to the lawes of God and of the realme. And also against the retaining of felons and murtherers, sowers of sedition, and other unreasonable attempts, &c.

Parliament
ster.

The 16. day of Januarie, the lords & barons of this realme began to sit in the parliament house at Westminster: and on the twentieth day of Januarie the Quenes maiestie went from White hall to the parliament house by water. Whereas a great challenge of iustice was signified by way of doubt before her maiestie on Twelfth night last past, to haue bene performed the fifteenth day of Januarie, her maiesties pleasure was, for diuers considerations the same should be deferred vntill the two and twentieth day of the same moneth: on the which day the same was most courageously accomplished in the accustomed place at Westminster, where many slaues were broken, but through the great concourse of people thither repairing, many of the beholders, as well men as women, were hurt: some maimed, and some killed by falling of the scaffolds overcharged.

Dancelcy.

About Shaltonide last past, in the marshes of Dancelcy hundred, in a place called Southminster in the countie of Essex, a strange thing hapned: there suddenly appeared an infinite multitude of mice, which overwhelming the whole earth in the said marshes, did scarce and gnaw the grasse by the rootes, spoiling and rading the same with their venomous teeth, in such sort, that the cattell which grazed thereon were snitten with a murther, and died thereof, which vermine by policie of man could not be destroyed, till at the last it came to passe that there flocked together all about the same marshes, such a number of owles, as all the fliue was not able to prey: whereby the marsh-holders were shortly deliuered from the vocation of the said mice.

Banqueting

This yere (against the coming of certaine ambassadors out of France) by her maiesties appointment, on the five and twentieth day of March in the morning being Easter day) a banquetting house was begun at Westminster, on the south-west side of her maiesties palace of White hall, made in manner and forme of a long square, 322. in measure about, 30. principals made of great masts, being 40. foor in length a peece, standing by right, betwene every one of the masts, ten foor asunder and more, the waile of this house were clost with canuas, and painted all the outsidies of the same most artificially, with a worke called ruslike much like stone. This house had two hundred, ninetie and two lights of glasse. The sides within the same house was made with 1. heights of degrees for people to stand vpon: and the top of this house was wrought most cunningly vpon canuas woorks of iule and holly, with pendants made of wickeat rodde, and garnished with with Bay, Rue, & all maner of strange flowers garnished with spangles of gold, as also beautified with hanging tofians made of hollic and iule. With all maner of strange fruits, as pomegranates, oranges, pompons, cucumbers, grapes, with such like spangled with gold and most richly hanged: betwixt these woorks of baies and iule were great spaces of canuas, which was most cunningly painted, the clouds with starres, the sunne and sun-beames, with diuers other coats of sundry sorts belonging to the quenes maiesty, most richly garnished with gold. There were of all maner of persons working on this house, to the number of 75. two men had mischances, the one broke his legge and so did the other. This house was made in three weekes and thre dayes, and was ended the 18. of April, and cost 1744. l. 19. s. &c.

On the 16. day of April, arrived at Douer these noblemen of France (some Noblemen of France arrived in England, millioners from the French king to her maiesty) Francis Burbon prince D'Alphine of Auergne, Arthur Collas marshall of France, Lodowic Lusignan lord of Lancor, Trauergins Caercongin county of Tillir, Bertrand Salangueros lord Motheselon, monsieur Manaisour, Barnabie Brisler president of the parliament of Paris, Claude Pinart, monsieur Marchemont, monsieur Verac, these came from Chaucend by water to London, where they were honourably received and entertained, and shortly after being accompanied of the nobility of England, they repaired to the court, and banquetting house prepared for them at Westminster as is aforesayd, where her maiesty received them, and afterward in that place most royally feasted and banqueted them. Also the nobles and gentlemen of the court desirous to shew them all curtesie possible, prepared a triumph in most sumptuous order, vpon Whitson monday and tuesday: the chiefe challengers of which attempts were, the earle of Arundell, Frederike Lord Windesore, Philip Sidney, Foulke Girell, and other: the defendants to the number of one and twenty, all which of them ranne fire courts against the former challengers, who performed their parts valiantly. On the tuesday they went to the tourney, where they did very nobly, and after that to the barriers, where they fought courageously, &c. as more at large I haue set downe, in the continuance of Reine Woolles Chronicle.

The one and twenty of June in the night, certaine young men, drawing ropes throught the streete, on both sides the cross in Chape, to stop the passage, did then fallen ropes about the lowest Images of the sayd cross, attempting by force to haue plucked them downe, which when they could not do, they plucked the picture of Christ out of his mothers lap, whereto he late, and otherwise defaced her, and the other Images by striking off their armes. Whereupon proclamation was made, that who so would betray the doers should haue forty crownes. But nothing came to light, for every one of them kept others counsell, till their dying dayes.

Thomas Butcher before (for that he & others on the 27. of June had congregated themselves in west Smithfield of London, and in other places in matter of rebellion) was on the 30. of June whipped from Newgate to west Smithfield, and was there rescued, taken from the broles, and sent away to shift for himselfe:

for the which fast on the 21. of July, other foure, to wit, three shomakers and a brewer, were whipped from Newgate to the middell of west Smithfield, and there set on the pillorie, whercon they stood from ten till twelue of the clocke.

The thirtieth of July, Richard Coxo Doctor of Diuinitie, some time schoole-maister to king Edward the first, drane of Welsminster, and of Chills collidge in Oxford, and since bishop of Elic, deceased and was buried at Elic.

This yeare were to be seene in London, two Duchmen of strange flatures, the one in height seven foot and seven inches, in breadth betwixt the shoulders three quarters of a yard and an inch, the compass of his breast one yard and halfe, and two inches: and about the waist, one yard, quarter, and one inch, the length of his arme to the hand a full yard: a comely man of person, but lame of his legges (for he had broken them with lifting of a barrill of beere.) The other was in height but thye foot, had neuer a good foot, nor any knee at all, and yet could he daunce a galliard, he had no arme, but a flumpe to the elbow or little more on the right side, on the which singing, he would daunce a cup, and after tolle it about three or foure times, and every time receive the same on the said flumpe: he would shoote an arrow neare to the marke, flourish with a rapier, throw a bowle, beate with a hammer, blew with an axe, sound a trumpet, and drinke every day ten quarts of the best beere if he could get it. I my selfe on the seuenteenth of July sawe the taller man sitting on a bench bareheaded, and the lesser standing on the same bench, and having on his head a hat with a feather, was yet the lower. Also the taller man standing on his feete, the lesser (with his hat and feather on his head) went vpight betwixt his legs and touched him not.

The eighteenth of July, Euerard Haunce a seminarie priest, was in the sessions hall in the old Baile arraigned, where he affirmed that himselfe was subiect to the Pope in ecclesiasticall causes, and that the Pope hath now y same authoritie here in England that he had an hundred yeres past, with other trayterous speeches, for the which he was condemned to be drawne, hanged, bowelled and quartered, and was executed accordingly on the last of July.

At the same sessions were brought from the Fleet, the Gate-houle at Welsminster, Newgate of London, and the Counters, sundrie prisoners indicted for refusing to come to the church, all which being convicted by their owne confession, had iudgement accordingly to pay twentie pounds for every moneth of such their wilfull absence from the church.

The thirtieth of October were arraigned at Welsminster hall Iohn Stubbes, Hugh Singleton, and William Page, these were all three condemned to lose their right hands, for writing, printing, and dispersing a libell, which they entituled, the Gaping Gulph, against monsieur Francis Duke of Anio, the French kings brother. And on the thir day of November they were all led to Welsminster, where Iohn Stubbes, and William Page lost their hands by chopping off, but Hugh Singleton had his pardon.

The first of November, monsieur Francis Duke of Anio, the French kings brother, and other nobles of France (having lately arrived in Kent) came to London, and were honorably received, and remained at the court with banqueting and diuers pleasant pleasures and pastimes, &c.

An. reg. 24.

On the 20. of November, Edmond Campion Jesuit, Ralle Sherwine, Lucas Kerbie, Edward Rishon, Thomas Coelwyn, Henrie Orton, Robert Johnson & Campion James Bosgraue, were brought to the high bar at Welsminster, where they were lawfully and all together indicted upon high treason, for that contrary both to love & duty, they lookede their native country to live beyond the seas under the Popes obedience, as at Rome, Rhyms, and diuers other places, where (the Pope having with other princes practised the death and depriuation of our most gracious prince, and better subversion of her state and kingdome, to advance his most abominable religion) these men having bowed their allegiance to the Pope, to obey him in all causes whatsoever, being there, gave their consent, to aide him in this most traitorous determination. And for this intent & purpose they were sent over to scour the hearts of her maiesties loving subiects, and to conspire and practise her graces death, as much as in them lay against a great day, let and appointed when the generall hauocke should be made, those onely reserved that loyned with them. This laid to their charge, they boldly denied, but by a iurie they were appoynded guilty, and had iudgement to be hanged, bowelled and quartered.

The first of December, Edmond Campion Jesuit, Ralle Sherwine, and Alexander Brian seminarie priests, were drawne from the Tower of London to the boie, and there hanged, bowelled, & quartered. Looke more in my continuation executed.

Sherley, sir T. Perot, sir Will. Russell, sir Will. Drury and sir George Bowler knights, & a great number of Gentlemen, so as the whole traine that attended on the earle was 100. gentlemen and more than 300. serving men. The lord Hunston had of gentlemen and other to the number of 150. and the lord Howard had as many, all which sailed in sixtie ships to Flushing in Zealand where the prince of Orange, & the States of the low countries received the Duke, and our English nobilitie with great ioy, conducing them from thence to Middleborough, & then to Antwerpe, where before the twentieth day of the same month, the States with great splendour created the said Monsieur Duke of Anio, Duke of Lothar, Brabant, and marquisse of the sacred empire, and prince of the low countries, &c. And our nobilitie returned into England.

Iohn Paine priest, being indicted of high treason for words by him spoken to one Elloe, was arraigned and condemned at Chelmsford on the last of March, and was there executed on the second day of April.

be read.

This yeare was first founded a publicke lecture in Surgerie to begin to be read in the colledge of Physicians in Knightriders streete of London, in Anno 1584. on the first of May, and so to be continued twice every weeke, to wit, wednesday and friday for ever, by the honorable John lord Loimley, and Richard Caldwell doctors of Physicke: the reader wherof to be Richard Forster doctor of Physicke.

Misfortune
der.

The nineteenth of July, certaine serkins of gunpowder (to the number of fifteen) and as many or more serkins of surgeon, laden in a carre upon Gally way, neare unto the tower of London, some small portion of the same powder being shed on the ground, the horse in the said carre strooke fire with his foote, and fiered all together, wherethrough the surgeon was blowne out of the carre, some into the Charnis, some elsewhere, one serkin was driven through a loamed wall that was boorded ouer, into a house there by. The Crane on the wharfe with the houses neare adioyning were soe broken, many men and horses soe blacked, so that three men and seven horses died thereof.

Norfolke.

The twelfth of August there rose a great tempest of lightning, thunder, whirlwind and raine, with hailstones fashioned like to the rotuels of spurs, two or three inches about in the countie of Dorsetshire, betwene y<sup>e</sup> townes of north Walsham and Aldeburgh, the towne wherem the making of woyled, commonly called Dorsetch woyled, was first practised and tooke there beginning: which tempest beat the coyne flat to the ground, rent up many great trees, and shivered them in peeces, or wound them like withs. At Hemming, more then a mile from Wolshe, the west doore of the church, weighing more then 300. pound weight, was lifted off the hooks, and throwne ouer the font within one pease of the chancel doore, the top of the church was rinen bp, and the lead as it were blowne cleane away, sixe tobes of lead were ruffled up together, like as they had bene cloths of linnen cloth, and blowne into the skyd without the churchyard. Also at call Kuten were many barnes blowne downe, and houses brouered.

An. reg. 25.
Termes kept at Hartford.

This yeare Michaelmas terme was returned from the Vias thereof, until the fourth returne of the same called Meale Michaelis, & from the said returne until the

the returne commonly called Crastino animarum next ensuing, and then returned from Aldeburgh to the castle of Hartford in Hartfordshire, there to begin in the said Crastino animarum, and to be continued till the end of the said terme, which was done accordingly.

This yeare Peter Morris a Dutch man, but a free denison, having made an engine for that purpose, conveyed Thames water in pipes oiled out the steeple of St Magnus church, at the north end of London bridge, and so into divers mens houses in Charnis streete, into Fish streete, and Fasse streete by unto the north west corner of Leaden hall (the highest ground of the cite of London, where the wall of the first maine pipe ran first this yeare 1582. on Christmase euen: which maine pipe being since at the charges of the cite brought by into a standarde three made for that purpose, and divided into foure seuerall spouters, ranne foure waies plentifully serving to the vse of the inhabitants neare adioyning that will fetch it, and also cleansed the channels of the streets north toward Bishops gate, east towards Abgate, south towards the bridge, and west towards the Stocks market: no doubt a great commoditie to that part of the cite, and would be far greater, if the said water were maintained to run continually, or at the least at euery ffor some reasonable quantitie, as at the first it did.

Now to retorne to Monsieur his successe after the great dignities, authoritties, and titles bestowed on him, as ye haue partly heard (but is set downe at large in a particular treatise thereof, which I haue placed in Reine Woolfes chronicle.) Francis de Valois, the kings onely brother, Duke of Nothere, Brabant, Limbourg, Gelbers, Anio, Brandon, &c. earle of Flanders, Holland, Zeland, &c. maquerle of the sacred empire, lord of Frisland, &c. having now indifferently well (with his good succelles had in the battailing and conuoying the flagges of Cambrey and Lochem, and winning the townes of Alast and Endonan) gotten the hearts of the people, and by that means placed his frenchmen in Dunkerke, Alimerburgh, Wirmide, Wermoud, Alimord, and other places, thought now (being young and small counsell) to make himselfe a more absolute Prince, according to the titles given him, and not to rule with the auides of the States of the countie. Wherefore having come to him out of Francke the Marshall Byron, with great troups of Swissers, and frenchmen, he now causeth them all at one time, to wit, on the seventh of Januarie, to invade so many townes as they might make themselves masters of, which with them tooke effect in the above named townes, but at Bruggelle they were put out. And at Antwerpe on the said lasten day, under the pretence to mulster his army without the towne, bp on the very moone time of the day when the Citizens were at dinner, he causeth two gates (as uncertaine by which he would go) to be opened for him, and the chains ouerthrowt the streets to be unchained, which (for some suspicion had of theutchmen without) were locked: then he issued out with all his Court and a great number of gentlemen, very brare, mounted on great horses about 200. many of them being secretly armed under their garments, and comming to St. James gate, at the bridge without met him certain of his companies of horsemen, and women, who laid themselves on both sides the way, making as if were a lane for the Duke to passe by with a few of his: who being past them, made token to the with his cap, to invade y<sup>e</sup> city: whereup his men killed y<sup>e</sup> watch, with y<sup>e</sup> Council Viereendell y<sup>e</sup> stood bare headed, to see their prince passe. Then entered y<sup>e</sup> gate 17. ensignes of footmen, & four coynels of horsemen, the Drummers following, & the duke crying to the march, march, La vie est gaignee, mais ne pillons point, being thus strongly entered they tried, Vallé gaignee, vive la messe, and tooke in on both sides the Bulwarks, turned the ordinance towards the city, and came by vicaric streets almost to the midst of the city. The citizens at their dinners hearing the alarm, very furiously issued out, with such weapons as fell came to their hands, and set upon them, first by the by lanes, and other lane charyed by the streets, and so barred them from going any further. They turned all against the soldiers that were entered the city with most violent shot. In the meane space the citizens nere, and about the gate with their harquebuses belkew their small shot as thicke as hail out of windowes upon the gate, where first they killed a hoyle, and then diuers men cutting, which troubled the other following, y<sup>e</sup> a great number was cut in the very gate killed, & so heaped one vpon another that the gate was stopped, whereby all that were entered within the city, in lesse then in one houres space were killed, or taken prisoners. Wherein the citizens behaved themselves so valiantly, & so manly, that many for lacke of lead pellets tooke their money out of their purses, bowed it with their teeth, and put it in stead of pellets in their harquebuses. In this skirmish of so little space, were slaine about 1530. French hoysmen, and footmen, told at the burying, and more then 1000. prisoners taken, amongst the which were the earle of Armaugus, the bishop of Constance, and many other notable personages. And amongst the dead were the earle of St. Agnes his son, the earle of Chastcaurouille, the son of the marshall of France Biron, monsieur de Sailonnall gouernor of Alenon, the son of the L. Mirabeau, and others. A marvellous ad of citizens in their defence without any soldiers against old soldiers & tried men of armes, and number of so great nobility. The prince of Orange with others had refused to go forth, and his danger was not small, with other gentlemen more, and lords of the religion. The prince Dolphyn, the earle of Lurall and others were with the duke lookers on, and intercessours for their friends, whom they reckened dead. After that fact, the duke with his campe was forced for lacke of victuals and necessaries, to retire him with his army toward Aquelin, and from thence with great difficulty, passing great waters, with losse of many a man, got to Dornond, where he was kept in by the generall Noris, with 23. ensignes Englishmen and Scots, so that he lacked victuals, and necessaries, whereby he was forced, as also to haue his prisoners released, to enter into a treaty with the states, to surrender all the townes by his men possessed, and to retire him to Dunkirke: where further with the states, by intercession of princes was hoped a reconciliation to be made. But he seeing the country vn-willing, and smiting himselfe sick (through melancholie as was thought) retired from Dunkirke toward France. And so, soone as he was retired, the Prince of Spaine for King Philip, caused Dunkirke to be besieged, his Frenchmen left within it. And as the states generall, and the prince of Orange would haue sent thither to reduce the towne, the marshall Biron with his Frenchmen and Drummers, the Flemings, chiefly they of Gaunt, partly for hatred of the French,

French, and partly that many now were become Spanissh, would not suffer him to come ouer into Flaunders, whereby Dunkirke was forced to surrender: and this losse being imputed to the Duke, increased his sicknesse, so that he died at Chastreau Thierie the 10. of July, Anno 1583. and was royally buried at Paris, and now to our matters at home.

The thirteenth day of Januarie, in the parish of Armitage, in a place called Blackmoor in Dorsetshire, a peece of ground containing three acres, remooued from the place where it was first planted, and was carried cleane ouer another close, where Alder and Willow trees grew, the space of fortye goads (every goad containing 15. fote) and hath slopt vp a high way that directed towards the market towne of Cerne, and yet notwithstanding the hedges wherewith it was inclosed, inuironed it still, and the trees stand thereon bolt upright, lauing one Cake that is well nigh twenty goads remooued: the place where this ground had been, is left like vnto a great pit.

The same 13. day of Januarie being sonday, about foure of the clocke in the afternoone, the old and underpropped scaffolds round about the Beare garden, commonly called Paris garden, on the Southside of the riuer of Chamis ouer against the citie of London, ouercharged with people, fell suddenly downe, whereby to the number of eight persons men and women were slaine, and many others sore hurt and bruised to the shortening of their liues. The third of February being sonday, William Bruiſter Haberdasher (a man of more then 60. yeares old) being lodged ouer the southwell porch of Saint Brides church in Fleetstreete, with a woman named Mary Breame (whome the same Bruiſter had bailed out of Bridewell) were both found smothered to death, in manner as shall be shewed. On the same sonday in the morning a wedding being celebrated in that church, a strong saour was smelt, which was thought to be the burning of old shooes, or such like in some gentlemans chamber neere thereabouts, but in the afternoone before euening prayer, the parishioners clipt a smoke to issue out of Bruiſters chamber, and thereupon made hast to his doore, which they found fast locked on the inside, and were forced to breake it open, and yet could not enter till they had ripped vp the lead and rooffe of the chamber, to let out the smothering stench: which being done, they found Bruiſter dead, sitting on a settle by the beds side (in his apparell and close trussed) his right thigh and right arme vp to the elbow bent with the fire of a small pan of coales that stood before him. The woman also lay dead ouer the pan, so that her armes were bent, with the neather part of her bodie before to the brest, and behind to the shoulders, and nothing else in the chamber bent but the bottom of the settle whereon Bruiſter late. Marie Breame had bene accused by her husband to be a nice woman of her bodie, but her husband being a bad man, and having spent faire and large possessions and all whatsoeuer, hauing but two pence left in his purse, hung himselfe on a tree, against a stone wall at Marten abbey in Surrey about Whitsontide, in Anno 1592.

From thence his lordſhip was ſcayped to the queene regents chamber, at the entrance whereof he was receiued by the countie de Fieſque knight of the holy ghoſt, and her knight of honor, finding her accompanied with the duchieſſes of Montpenſier & Joieulx, who ſtood at her beds fete, the lady of Roinden her lady of honor, and other ladies & gentlewomen in great number, & then returned to ſe ſoyeſaid hoſtel de Longueuille. On monday the 15. of February, the R. by Monſieur le Moſchenelon told the lord ambadoꝝ his niſp, touching the receit of 5000. that he intended to receiue it on Thursday following in the after noone, at 5000. guine ſtricks, which was done accordingly, with a mantle of blew velvet, and a hood, a collar of the order, with a booke of the ſtatutes of the order, which all were inueſted vpon the king, in a place called Maſon de nautalles, but 5000. was miniſtered vnto the king in 5000. ſtricks church, 10000. being ſung. On the 28. of February, the ambadoꝝ with his traine tooke their leave, at whole returne ſeo 5000. court to his lodging, he was preſented 5000. night with a rich cupbord of plate, worth 1200. £. at the leaſt: & vnto maſter Clarenceaux was giue a chaſne of gold, worth 120. £. & better, of 236. linkes, to maſter Somerſet a chaſne of 150. linkes, worth 100. marks, & to Thomas Mill's a chaſne of the ſame value. On Thursday next, the earle with his traine ſet forward homewards from Paris vnto S. Denies, & ſo were lodged all the way, in the ſame lodgings that before they had bene receiued in, and arrived proſperouſly in England, from Boloigne to Douce the thirtieth of March, & on the Thursday following were brought to the queenes maiſties preſence at Greenwich, who graciously welcomed them home.

The 1. day of March William Parry, was dratone from the tower through the city of London to Weſtmiſter, and there in the palace court, hanged, bodelled and quartered for high treaſon, as may appeare by a booke extant, intituled, A true & plaine declaration of the horrible treaſons praſtised by W. Parry, &c. & I haue ſet downe the ſame booke in the continuance of Reine Woolfes Chronicle.

The 29. of March, the parliament was diſſolved, at the breaking vp whereof, the Queenes maiſtie made an Oration in the Parliament houſe, to ſuch effect as followeth. My Lordes and ye of the lower houſe, my ſilence muſt not inuirt. the owner ſo much, as to ſuppoſe a ſubſtitute ſufficient to reſider you the thanks that my hart yeeldeth you: not ſo much for the ſafe keeping of my life (for which your care appeareth ſo maniſt) as for the negliſhing your priuie future weill, not regarding other way then my preſent ſtate, no prince herein (I couſell) can be ſuſtained or ſafer bound than I am, with the linke of your good will, and cauſe that but yeild a hart and head to ſeeke for euer all your beſt: yet one matter toucheth me ſo neere as I may not ouer ſkip: religion, the ground on which all other matters ought to take roote, and being corrupted may mar all the tree: and that there be ſome fault ſinners with the order of the clergie, which ſo may make a ſcandall to my ſelfe & the Church, whole ouer-looker God hath made me, whole negliſſance cannot be excuſed, if any ſchilines or errors hereticall were ſuffered. Thus much I muſt ſay, that ſome faultes & negliſſances may grow & be, as in all other great charges it happeneth: & what vocation without & all which of your lordes of the clergie do not amend, I muſt depole you, looke you therefore well to your charges, this may be amended without herſies or open clamoratio. I am ſuppoſed to haue many ſtudies, but moſt philoſophicall: I muſt yeild this to be true, I ſuppoſe ſeo 5000. I be no proſtitors haue read more. ynimate mens exposition, God defend you from such a Ruler that to ruill would guide you. Now I conclude, that your love & care neither is nor shall be bestowed upon a carcellle Prince, but such as for your good will passeth as little for this world as who careth least, with thanks for your free libidie: a manifest shew of the abundance of your good wills, the which I assure you, but to be employed to your weale. I could be better pleased to returne then receive. Thus much her Maesties Nation. In this parliament a libidie of 2. s. 8. goods, and 4. s. lands was granted, and two fifteenes by the laitie.

In the month of Aprill about the 14. day, by commandement of her Maestie, the citizens of London appointed out of their companies of the same citie, to the number of 4000. men, with armor, ensignes, drums, fises, and other furniture for the wars, the greater part whereof were shot, the other were pikes, and halberds in faire coslecks: all those to be trayned by under expert capitaines, with sergeants of the bands, misters, and other necessary officers, mustered, and skirmished dayly at the Miles end, and in Saint Georges field: and on the 18. of May (having our night set forward out of St. Georges field) mustered in the park at Greenwich, and skirmished before the Quene's maiestie, who gaue to them great thanks for their assiduitie and paines.

The 15. of Aprill, Philip Howard earle of Arundell was brought prisoner into the tower of London for attempting to have passed y<sup>e</sup> seas without licence, &c.

The 21. of June, Henrie Percy earle of Northumberland, prisoner in the Tower of London, upon vehement suspicion of high treason, was there found dead, and also of his owne diuelish intent, and of his malice before pretended, to have murdered himselfe, as more at large may appere, by inquisition made by a substantiall Jurie, taken before the crowne of London, as followeth verbatim with the record.

An inquisition taken at the cite of London, that is, within the Tower of London, in the parish of Alhallowes Barking, in the wards of the Tower of London, on Monday being the 21. day of June, in the yere of the reigne of our Soueraigne Lady Elizabeth by the grace of God, Queene of England, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. the 27. before William Squire Gentleman, Copier to our said Soueraigne Lady the Quene within the Cite of London and the liberties of the same, upon the view of the body of Henrie Percy knight, late earle of Northumberland, late prisoner there within the Tower of London aforesaid, for suspicion of high treason by him supposed to be done, there lying dead, and slaine: by the othes of Nicholas Wheeler, Simon Horlepoole, T. Gardener, William Lesmeson, Owen Morgan, Henry Lodge, William Abraham, William Horne, Thomas Russell, Iohn Porter, Robert Dowe, Anthony Hall, William Curtis, Thomas Wood, Matthew Dolman, Thomas Martin, Richard Slesford, Iohn Trot, Philip Smith, Thomas Talbot, and Henrie Bowdler, of good & lawfull men of the same wards, and of three other wards to the same ward next aforesaid, as the manner and custom is in the cite aforesaid, to inquire how, in what manner, and when the said Henrie Percy late earle of Northumberland came to this death. Whiche Jurie do say upon their othes, that on the 21. day of this instant moneth of June, in y<sup>e</sup> yere of the reigne of our Soueraigne Lady Elizabeth by the

The 27. aforesaid, and long before the aforesaid Henrie late earle of Northumberland prisoner in the tower of London aforesaid in the parish of Alhallowes Barking aforesaid, in the ward of the tower of London aforesaid, for suspicion of high treason aforesaid, by him against our Soueraigne Lady the Quene supposed to be committed, and the aforesaid earle so remaining prisoner, and being placed in a certain chamber within the tower of London aforesaid, there prisoner remaining imagining and intending himselfe diuelishly and feloniously to kill a maner before the aforesaid 21. day of June: that is to say, the 16. day of June in the 27. yere aforesaid, did prepare a certaine bag of iron & Steele of the value of 10. s. with certaine bullets of lead, & a certaine quantity of gunpowder, contained in a small box, & caused the aforesaid gun, the bullets of lead, and the gunpowder to be brought into the aforesaid chamber unto him the said earle of Northumberland, & to be delivered to the same earle then and there by the hands of James a Price proman to execute his diuelish and felonious purpose and intention, which bag aforesaid, the aforesaid earle caused secretly to be hidden in a certaine matresse under the bolster of his bed in the chamber aforesaid, and then and there, the aforesaid 21. day of June in the 27. yere aforesaid, betweene the houses of twelve and one in the night of the aforesaid 21. day of June, thinking and intending to prosecute and follow his diuelish intention and purpose aforesaid, did bolt the doore of the aforesaid chamber, and the inner part of his said chamber towards himselfe, lest any man should force or withstand his diuelish, felonious, and malicious intent: and the said doore of his aforesaid chamber being so bolted, the same earle then and there into his bed himselfe did lay, and upon this afterward, that is to say, the aforesaid one and twentieth of June, in the seven and twentieth yere aforesaid, about the houses aforesaid, within the tower of London aforesaid, situate and being in the parish of Alhallowes Barking aforesaid, in the ward of the tower of London aforesaid, not having the almighty God or his fear before his eyes, but being moued and seduced by the instigation of the diuell, of his malice aforesaid pretended, did take up into his handes the aforesaid bagge of yron and Steele, then and there made ready, charged with gunpowder, and three bullets of lead, and the aforesaid bagge to the left part of his brest heart unto the pappe of the same part of his brest, then and there feloniously and diuelishly did put, and upon the same part of his brest the aforesaid bagge did discharge, by reason of the violence of which gunpowder, and of the aforesaid three bullets of lead, the aforesaid earle into his body and heart, and through his chine bone, even into his right shoulder, himselfe then and there with the aforesaid bullets of lead, feloniously and voluntarily did strike, giuing unto himselfe then and there one mortall wound of the depth of twelve inches, and of the breadth of two inches: of which mortall wound aforesaid, the aforesaid earle within the tower of London aforesaid, the day and yere parish and ward aforesaid, instantly died. And so the Jurie doth say upon their othes aforesaid, that the aforesaid earle, the day and yere, and place above written, of his diuelish intent aforesaid, and of his malice before pretended, feloniously and voluntarily himselfe did kill, and murder in manner and

This was the verdict of the Jurors, whereby it remained to provide for the bestowing of his wretched carcase, which on the 23. day of June was buried in St. Peters church within the sayd towne of London. This was the end of that earle, the manner of whose murder, and part of his treasons articulated, as the same was publicly delivered in the Star-chamber, and after published in a booke intituled: A true and summarie report of the declaration of some part of the earle of Northumberlands treasons, deluded, &c. Entertainment of the deputies for the States of the Low countries.

On the 26. of June arrived at London, deputies for the States of the Netherlands, of Low countries, who were lodged about the tower streete, and had their diet for the time of their abode here very worshipfully appointed (all at the charges of her maiesty) in the clothworkers hall in Wyndhouse lane, neare to the sayd tower streete. Thise on the 29. of June, being the feast of the Apostlic Peter and Paul, repaired to the court, then at Greenwich, where by vertues of their commissions from the united countries, they presented to her maiesty the sovereignty of those countries, to wit, of Brabant, but the commission (for the siege of Antwerpe not full authorized, of Guelder, of Flandres, of Holland, of Zeland, of Utrecht, and of Friseland; for Brabant, Jacques de Grise great baillie of Bruges, counsellor of the Franckes; for Guelder Roger of Barlow gentleman; for Flandres, Noël de Garlie lord of Spounewalle; for Holland, John Wandersdoel, lord of Houtwike; Josse de Menin pensionarie of Woerden, John of old Bamevelt, pensionarie of Rotterdam, and W. Francis Maello: for Zeland, Jacob Dales counsellor and pensionarie of Tergoest; for Utrecht, Paulus Buis, W. of the latines; for Friseland, J. Fritzmans gentleman, H. Ansons president of Friseland, and Lads Jangema gentleman. All these falling on their knees before her maiesty, and so remaining for a long space, one of them, to wit, Josse de Menin counsellor and pensionary of Woerden, one of the commissioners for Holland, made to her maiesty this oration in french: Madame, les Estares des Provinces Unies des pais, &c. as I have set downe in Reine Woolfe, with also the same in English thus: Madam, the States of the united provinces of the Low countries, most humbly thanks your maiesty for the good affection and favour, which it hath pleased you to shew to the sayd countries in their necessity, and to confirme the same with so many testimonies, and that lastly after the execrable assault committed upon the person of the late prince of Orange, at what time it pleased your maiesty to let the sayd States understand by your Ambassadors master Davison, what care you had of our defence and preservation, and also by Seigneur de Cnif, the great displeasure which your maiesty conceived, to see the States frustrated of the hope which they had founded upon the treaty of France. But since the care which your maiesty hath alwayes had our good and conservation is not thereby any whit diminished, but hath more plentifully increased according as the necessity the necessity of our affaires required, for which the said countrie in generall, and every of us in particular remaine perpetually bound to your Maiesty, and acknowledge the same with all fidelitie and obedience. And as the said States (Madame) did consider that since the decease of the Prince of Orange, they have sustained the losse of divers of their holdes and good towres, and that for the preservation of the sayde Countrie it is needfull for them to have a Prince and soveraigne ruler, which may warrant and defend them against the tyrannie and uniuersall oppression of the Spaniards and their adherents, which daily more and more inforce themselves, by their sinistre power, and all other means to destroy and overthrow the sayde Countries, and reduce this poore people into perpetuall seruitude, worse then that of the Indians, under the importable yoke of the detestable Inquisition of Spaine. Considering also that the bodie of the Townes and Communalties of the aforesaid Countries have a firme hope that your Maiesty will not see them perish, according to the desire of their enemies, which make this long and cruell warre, all which outrages, the States of the sayd Low countries (following the diligence and band which they owe to the Burgeses and citizens) are to sustaine, repell, and to turne from them, by reason of the manifest tyrannie and seruitude, which the Spaniards attempt to bring in and to lay upon the poore people, thereby to preserve their liberties, rights, priuiledges, and franchises, with the exercise of the true Christian Religion, whereof your Maiesty by good right carrieth the title of Protectrice and Defendresse, against which the said enemies, and their associates already haue and still do make many leagues, devise many subtilties, treasons, and ambushes, not ceasing daily to practise and imagine them against the person of your Maiesty, and to the priuidge of the rest of your realmes and states, whom the good God hath preserved untill this present, for the wealth of the Christians, and sustentation of their Churches. Wherefore (Madame) it is so, that for causes, reasons, and other considerations, the said States haue assembled and concluded vpon a good and firme resolution, to haue recourse vnto your Maiesty, sith it is an ordinarie matter amongst all people, and oppressed nations, in their calamities and oppressions to craue support, and fauour against their enemies, of Kings and Princes neare vnto them, but especially of those who be endued with magnanimity, pietie, iustice, and other princely vertues, to which effect the States haue appointed vs to come vnto your Maiesty, to present vnto the same, the Principallitie, Soueraignty, and iust government of the said Provinces, under certaine good and equal conditions, chiefly concerning the preservation of the exercise of the reformed Religion, and of the ancient priuiledges, liberties, franchises and customes, and next of the administration of the affaires, pollicie, and iustice of the warres in the said countrie. And although that these countries haue sustained much hurt by these long and continuall warres, and that the charge hath taken diuers strong places and fortres in the same countries: yet there is besides the same in the countries of Brabant, Gelderland, Flandres, Halines, and Dueret, many good towres and places, which defend themselves against the force of the enemy, and the countries, of Holland, Zeland, Utrecht, and Frise, be yet thanks be to God, entire

and whole: in which there be many great and strong towtines and places, faire riuers, and deepe Ports and hauens of the sea, out of which your maiestie and your succellours may receiue diuerse good seruices, fruites and commodities, wherof it is needlesse here to make any long recitall. Onely this amongst other matters deserveth good and especiall consideration, that the uniting of those countries, of Holland, Zeland, Frisie, and the towines of Sluze, and Ostend in Flaunders, into the Realmes of your Maiestie, importeth so much as the absolute government of the great Ocean sea, and by consequence, and assurance, and perpetuall felicitie for the subiects of your worthie Maiestie: which we most humbly beseech, that it will please the same to condescend unto vs in the said pointes and conditions, and in that which followeth, which is, that you will for you and your lawfull succellours in the crowne of England, be protectours of the reformed religion, as the principall iusticer and soueraigne gouernour of the said countries: and consequently to receiue the people of the same as your most obedient subiects vnder the protection and continuall safeguard of your Maiestie, they being a people assuredly so faithfull and louing to their princes and lords (be it spoken without vaunting) as any other nation is throughout Christendome. In doing wherof, Madame) you shall preserve many goodly churches, which it hath pleased God to assemble in these latter times in the same countries, at this present in many places grievously afflicted, and you shall deliuer the same countrie and people (of late before the brutish deeds of the houle of Spaine) very rich and flourishing, through the great commoditie of the sea, ports, hauens, riuers, traffique, and marchandise, wherof they be naturally endued: you shall I say (Madame) deliuer them from ruine and perpetuall bondage of bodie and soule, being a wofull right royall and most magnificient, acceptable to God, profitable to all Christianitie, worthie immortall commendation, amenable to the magnanimitie and heroicall vertues of your Maiestie, and ioyned with the assurance and prosperitie of your dominions and subiects. Whereupon we present vnto your Maiestie the said articles and conditions, reuerently praying the King of kings to preserve your maiestie from your enemies, to increase your glorie and felicitie, and for euer to keepe you in his holy protection.

This oration ended, and the summe thereof considered, it pleased the Queenes maiestie, by direction of her wise and politicke Counsell, to incline her heart to the ease and reliefe of the said oppressed people. And because her owne subiects should not be utterly vnacquainted with her highnesse doings in that case, there was published by authoritie a booke intituled, A declaration of the causes moouing the Queene of England to giue aide to the defence of the people afflicted and oppressed in the Low countries. Dated at Richmond the first of October 1585, and the 27. yeare of the reigne of our soueraigne ladie the Queene. This booke was printed in the Latine, Italian, and English tongue. And I haue let downe the same in Reigne Woolles chronicle.

The fift of July, Thomas Awfield a lemnarie priest, and Thomas Welley aulfield and Welley executed. were arraigned at the sessions hall in the Old baile, found guilty, condemned, and had iudgement as felons to be hanged: for publishing of bookes containing false, seditious, and slanderous matter, to the defamacion of our soueraigne lady the Queene. these were on the next morrow executed at Tiborn accordingly.

On the 16. of July, by the sudden fall of a bricke wall in Charus street of London neare vnto Downgate, five persons were overwhelmed and slaine, to wit, a man and his wife (the wife being great with child) and two children, the one their owne, the other a nurse child, and a poore man that liued by charitie, having no knowne dwelling place.

On the same sixteenth day of July, was sir Francis Russell knight, lord Russell, third sonne to Francis Russell earle of Bedford, slaine with a dag in the borders of Scotland before Barwik, by a Scot borne in those parts, as they met upon a truce day. And on the next morrow, to wit, the 17. of July, Francis Russell earle of Bedford, knight of the garter, and one of her Maiesties privie counsell (father to the late named sir Francis lord Russell slaine on the borders of Scotland) deceased, and was honorably buried at Chieines in Bedfordshire, on the eight of September next following.

On the thier and twentieth of July, certaine souldiers were pressed in the several wards of the cite of London, which souldiers being furnished for the wars, and clothed in red coates, all at the charges of the companies and citizens, set forth toward the seas on the thirtieth of August, and were transported over into Holland, Zeland, &c. as other the like souldiers out of other parts of the realme, before had bene transported to serve for the defence of the Low countries vnder general Norris, and other approued captaines.

On the 4. of August, betwixt the houres of four and five of the clocke in the morning, at the end of the towne called Pottingham in Kent, eight miles from London, in a lane not farre from the houlles, the ground began to sinke, thre great clines being swallowed by, the tops falling downward into a hole with the roots byward, turning round in the falling, and diuen into the earth past mans sight: and before ten of the clocke that present day, the ground and trees were sunke so low that neither the one or other might be discerned, the hole being sometimes filled with water, and other whiles neither bottome, trees, or water may be perceived. The compasse of this hole was then about fourescore paces, and being sounded with a lead and line of silke sadumers, cannot therewith find of little any bottome.

This yeare on the fourteenth of September, sir Francis Drake knight, General, Edward Winkar, Martine Frobisher, Francis Knowles, with diuerse other gentlemen, captaines, and two thousand three hundred souldiers and sailers in five and twentie ships and pinnesses departed from Plimmouth, and passing by the Isles of Bayon and the Canaries, arrived at Saint Iago, which city they took and burned: after they sailed to Saint Domingo, which they spoiled and ransomed: from thence to Carthage, which they also with great valour and especiall daunger took, spoiled, and ransomed: and retiring homewards

On the 15. day of September, to the number of two and thirtie Semina-rics, massing priests, and others late prisoners in the Tower of London, Har-malles, Kings bench, and other places, were embarked in the Marie Martine of Colchester, on the southside of the Thames right over against S. Katherines, to be transported over into the coastes of Ffomandie, to be banished this realme for ever, by vertue of a commission from her maiestie before specified. These being safely transported over to Boloigne, wrote their certificate thereof as followeth:

Certificate returned by the banished men.

Wherreas upon your Honours commission directed unto Anthonie Hall, and Thomas Stocker, for the transporting of vs whose names are under written, into the coastes of Ffomandie, who accordingly tooke vs into a barke called the Marie Martine of Colchester, on the southside of the Thames, right over against that part of Saint Katherines next to London bridge, the fifteenth day of September 1585, according to the computation of England: our will is to testifie unto your good honours, that they the said Anthonie Hall and Thomas Stocker have generally to well used vs in all respects, that we cannot but acknowledge our selues much beholding to so courteous and loving officers: neuertheless communing along the sea, and meeting with her Maiesties Admirall in the Dotonnes, who promising that we should not be disturbed in our course into the Ffomance of Ffomandie, according to your Honours sayde commission, we had not from him departed two leagues, when as a fluslinger with his people suddenly entered upon vs, being peaceably stowed under hatches, and in our quiet rest, with their drawne swords, their calivers and their matches fired in their hands, to our great terrour and discomfort, the most of vs being very sore sea-sicke, expecting at that instant nothing but either the rigorous dint of the sword, or bullet of the caliver. Howbeit, perceiving being had by our commissioners with them, they departed, after which time, we considering the generall danger on the seas, besought with one consent your Honours commissioners to let vs on land at Calice: but they in no wise yielding thereunto, at last by reason of our importunitie in such danger and weakenesse, yielded to let vs on shore at Boloigne, partly by reason of the feare we werethen put in, and partly for that we feared afterward more unreasonable measure, but specially the greatest number of vs so sore sicke, that very tedious unto vs it seemed to beare so long and dangerous a passage. In witness whereof to this our certificate we have all subscribed our names, the nineteenth of September, 1585. William Gimlet, R. Fen, John Nele, Christopher Small, &c.

Fredericke lord Windsor died at Westminster upon the second of December.

In the moneths of November and December, many helles and men were hipped at the tower wharfe, to be transported over into the Low countries.
And on the first of December, the right honorable Robert Dudley earle of Leicester, lord Lieutenant generall (after he had taken his leave of her Maiestie and the court) with his traine (which was great) entered the towne of Colchester in Essex, where the bailiffs and brethren in scarlet gounes
and

and multitudes of people met him, & so with great solemnitie entered the towne, where he lodged that night, and on the next morning set forward to Harwich into the which towne he was accordingly received and entertained. On the eight of December, the said earle accompanied with the earle of Essex, the lord North, the lord Audley, sir William Russell, sir Thomas Sherley, sir Arthur Bassett, sir Robert earle of Leicester transported over sea to Flushing.
Walser Waller, sir Geruais Chiscon, & other knights, squires and gentlemen, to the number of five or six hundred horse bravely appointed, all voluntaries and of his friends, followers and servants, Captaines and souldiers, with his traine, to the number of fiftie sailes of ships and busses, set forward towards Flushing, with sound of trumpets and drummes, shoutes and prayers of the people for happie and fortunate successe. On the tenth day he arrived at Flushing, where with his whole traine guarded in his owne person by fiftie archers with bowes and arrows, fiftie halbarders, and fiftie gunners, he was with the intertainment of souldiers, and shot of the Towne and his noble com-panie before him, entertained by sir Philip Sidney gouvernor under her Maiestie of the same towne, by Graue Maurice second sonne to the deceased prince of Orange, by her Maiesties ambassadoe lighter there, and by the Statues of the towne, passing honourably entertained, with ringing of bells, and making of bon-fires after their manner, which is to fire greates pitch barrels on the tops of high poles, and then to fire them. He was there feasted and lodged in the Ambassadors house, where according to his accustomed disposition he demeaned himselfe so humbly, that he purchased to himselfe no lesse love and good liking than among the English. The next day after a Sermon had, and dinner ended, he tooke shipping, and sailed toward Middleborough: in the and way betwixt Flushing and Middleborough standeth a strong fence of Ramkens, furnished with English men, at the which he with some of his speciall traine landed, and viewed the same, who returning againe to their ships, were presented on the top of the walls in the front of the sea with fiftie pike men very bravely furnished, having their English ensignes displayed, with triumph of shot, sound of trumpets and drums nere two houres together.

In the which honorable triumphes, the whole flocke having good winde and faire weather, sailed along to Middleborough, where on the shore close at the landing place, were, under nine ensignes displaid with great show of shot, the best Statues of the countrie attending my lords landing: Over the gates by the port was painted the red Crosse of England, her maiesties armes, & the Statues, through which gates the earle and his traine entering, he was thus from his landing to his lodging garded through a lane of musket shot with the ensignes borne before him, with trumpets and drums very royally, almost a quarter of a myle. In the middle of the market place were the English ensignes advanced, and belouered unto him, with the which and the rest borne before him he came to his lodging, where at the intreatie of the Statues, he staid more than two houres at the gate to see the souldiers marching and their strengthes: after which, because it was nere night, he entered and made his dinner and supper all one. Three of those nine ensignes were new: In the first were her maiesties and the Emperors armes quartered: In the second the earle of Leicesters and the prince of Oranges armies together : In the third were the seven provinces yedded unto her maiesty, all very excellently embleasoned. In a large table hangd over the gate of the English house in Spidelsborough, were embleasoned the armies of her maiesty along about the rest, next under that the lord lieutenants armies on the one side at large, hard by the which was set out the armies of the States and their houses : all which artificially by a chaine were linked together, and fastened to the English armies, under which was written at the foot of this frame, Quos Deus conuincit, homo non separat. Thus with great joy a continuall triumph was he entertained on their Christmas eue, after the Romish computation, which they in Zealand and Holland observe in that order.

On Christmas eue, the States of the towne in the States house, which standeth in the midst of the towne of market place, feasted him sumptuously : In the first course of which feast throughout the table was nothing but boiled meates, all flesh most excellent dainty : In the second course was all roast meates that could be thought, pigs served on their feete, and wild foule part in the feathers : In the third course was all kind of baked meates, as fowles in pies with their heads and tails unplucked all beset with pendants of her maiesties, the lord lieutenants, the countries, and diuerse English mens armies on the same. The fourth and last course was a rare banquet of incredible workmanship, as a castle of cristall founded on a rocke of pearle, about the which flowed silver streames, in which lay foules, fishes, and beasts of all kinds, some hurt, some slaine, and some gasping for breath, on the top of the which was a faire virgin lady leaning, and giuing her hands ouer the castle to succour them, very wonderfully wrought. There was wine in abundance, musike of all sorts, variety of all things, and wonderfull welcomes. This feast began at eleven of the clocke before noone, and continued till five in the after noone.

The Lord lieutenant feasted the States on Christmas day.

The next day being Christmas day, the earle to requite the States coll, invited them all, whom he feasted very royally after the English fashion. On Saint Stephens day he feasted the widowe pynesse of Orange, with her second sonne countie Maurice, and their traines so sumptuously as befecmed his and their honours. Here dispatching his weighty affaires he continued seven dayes, after which he determined to saile towards Dort, which by iudgement of the countie is not past ten houres sailing at the most. On the 17. of December after the account of England) with faire wind and weather, the whole fleet of Dutch hoies hoised vp saile toward Dort, but on the sudden, being onward on their iourney, the ayre was so ouercast with mists, that they knew not how to saile for succour, neither backward nor forward : the reason was this : The river they had to saile through, was none other then an ouerflowing country, full of old foundations of houses, churches, and castles, so that the clearest aire did no more then safegard the hoies from daunger. The 20. day, my lord with some other landed at Williamstede of Hag on hill, where he dined, and went aboard againe. On the one and twentieth of December, diuers ships of men of war and others, with the States of Dort in them, met our fleet on the water, where betwixt their ships and ours was at the meeting of the earle great triumphs with shot, in which came many small scouts of succour to hasten the traines to shore, where in good time they entered

Dort

Dort very royally and triumphantly. On the port to gard his person was set his own guard of archers, shot and halbards. And ouer the gate of entrance was her maiesties, the earles and the States armies embleasoned. When he was landed, & conducted by the States, he passed from the port through a lane of musket shot, all Dutch, brave and well appointed, with 8. ensignes displayed before him in the midst whereof was the English ensigne advanced, whence with 300. li of he was brought to his lodging. After whole entrance they & the great shot continued triumphing an hour and more : here he continued a day and two nights with singular entertainment, and verses which I ouerpasse. On the 23. of December, the earle tooke scouts to passe to Rotherdame by a riuer of fresh water very narrow, where the boats or scouts are come by men, some by hoies dragged along the riuer : but in his passage the night being cleere, suddenly there arose so great a tempest, that it put the small vessels in great daunger, but after an hour the weather waned calme, and the night cleere, only a Dutch captaine and three or foure of his men were drowned : toward night he dyed neare to the towne of Rotherdame, where on the water he was met with three barges of pleasure, in euery of which was 12. sailers, the first all in blew ierkins and bennetians, with red caps and whole cyppes white satire like. In the second 12. all in buffe. In the third 12. all in flag thymmed silke very braue, with their oares red and white : in these boats were great store of fire workes and rockets to cast into the aier, and at the same of euery one were cressets, which towards night were lighted, and on the water made an excellent shew. Thus with trumpets sounding all the way, was he brought to Rotherdame by water to his lodging in the middle of the towne. On the other side of them, on the banks stood rankes of soldiers all with musket shot betwixt euery foure of them was placed a torch or cresset burning : & thus he entered his lodging, where the States accompanied him to supper that night. Here the inhabitants were ioyfull of the English mens coming, making much of the traine. The townes men had made very memorably in the middle of the market place, the whole proposition of Erasmus in a pulpit as though he were preaching, holding a booke of the paraphrasis on the Gospels in his hand, under whom was written Erasmus Rotherodame. The earle made halt towards Delph, being from thence accompanied with the States, his barges of pleasure, & whatsoever was thought honorable. They came late to Delph, somewhat dark, but lighted by cressets along the narrow riuer, on the which many rockets & fire workes were shed. On the landing port stood great store of musket shot, with many new ensignes like a lane for him to passe through, all which brought him to his lodging, which was the house wherein the prince of Orange was slaine, ouer the gate of which house were beets which I ouerpasse. On the 25. of December, the earle was feasted of the States very royally, and on the next morrow the earle feasted them amongst whom was the pynesse of Wes, with a company of honorable ladies and gentlewomen : at the table was dutch muske of all kinds. And it is to be noted, that the further the earle went up into Holland, the blamer the countrey was, and the better was his lordship welcommed, as appeared by his excellent entertainment : from thence he remooued on the 27. of December to Donoyge, where he determined to keepe his standing court. In the evening the carle by crested light, torches, and deuises of fire worke, entered into the towne of Dunboge with his traine of English men, besides the states of Rothesdame and Delph, with those of Dunboge that met him on the water, with musket shot very many. At the entrance of my lord by water on the river met him certaine fisher men, which presented Peter, James, and John at their harborow: by them Christ walking on the water, who commaunding them to cast out their nets the second time, they dyed in abundance, wherewith they made shew of presentment to the carle. for the which with thanks he passed by. Further on the river late the representation of Mars and Bellona, who uttered speeches vnto him as he passed. At his landing met him a troupe of horsemen, furnished and trapped antike in colours, before whom hauing fetched many courses, they rode away. At the entrance of the fairest streets, there were on each side of the same galleries, raised a mans height each against other, all hung with blacke baies, on both which galleries on each side stood sixene virgins all clad in white, with branches of palme or bare wreathed about, wore candles light in their hands, every of which did reverence vnto the carle, these stood a space of length distant each from other. Betwixt every one hung a looking glasse, and betwixt every glasse vpon a pretty antike perch stood a ware candle burning, and at each end of the galleries stood a champion, and a blacke Moore, the one supporting the armes of England, and the other the armes of Holland. This shew was very proper: all the way as the carle passed through were artificially made gates raised of ragged staves, and vpon every shagge stood a small ware candle burning, by which hung the armes of diuerse craftes men of the towne. The streets all the way were hangd with broad clothes, vpon the which were placed store of red robes on sheets of paper painted. At the next turning he was entertained with this shew. Over a gate vpon a very high scaffold was a conceiued battell fought betwene the English souldiers and the Spaniards, the English men still prevailing: vnder which were written verses to that effect. Passing forward, was a lofty scaffold very faire builded, with her maiesties armes at large placed: on the top stood seven virgins, representing the seven provinces, every virgin holding a spere, and the armes at large embellished, which promise she did signify, in the midst of them stood Minerva armed, incompassed about the body with the armes of England, vpon whom all the rest seemed to relie. All which were represented vnto her maistie by necessity, an old Champion. The next was on the like scaffold, seven persons representing the seven liberal sciences in their kinds, yeelded to the carle by defect: out of every window hung lanterns and candles, and every street was furnished with crested torches, and linkes light: one deuice that hung in the midst of the street contained eight and thirty lanterns and seuerall lights burning. Besides these, against my lords gate, a bar-bar had on a wall placed thre score or more basons of bright copper, and in the midst of every one a ware candle burning was placed, in the midst of all was painted a Rose and a Crowne, this made a faire shew. At the entrance of the court gate was placed aloft vpon a scaffold, as if it had bene in a cloud, Arthur of Britaine, whom they compared to the carle, vnto were hobbys, cornes, and diuers kinds of muske: And thus they brought him to his lodging, and after he was entered in a great hall of that house, they discharged such bolies of shot as was woodfull to hear. In y night they used fire works of rockets, squibs, whistles, and balls of fire, with a dragon that continued calling out fire an houre, murtherfull artificially made. The next day, on the river aduoyning to my lords lodging, they deuised a running as it were at the tilt in boats, which was thus: From each end of the river came aboate running, with fire oares, in the stern of which on the top stood a man armed in a red wallcoate, with a blasse in his rest, having a but end of crooke: now each meeting other with these flames both fell into the water, where spere boates were ready to succour them, for away went these hopes: this sport with fresh men they continued till the carle was weary of it.

On the third day of January, the carle with three hundred heltes in thier furniture very brauely with his retinue entered Leiden, where by the way he was met by the bell of the towne, first by twelue Burgomasters clad in long blacke gownes, and on their shoulders was the towne name in large letters of silver: next then twelue of the chiefe of the city, and then many on horsebacke, all in blacke velvet. At his entrance into the city, all over his head and about to the ground on each side, was hangd with bagges of diuers colours to his lodging, himself with a canopy caried over his head was brought to his state, against the which was a stage, on the which stood two men like poets, who presented seuerall speeches as first a woman representing the towne, then famine assailling her then sickness, then Spanish seruitude, then hope to be succoured by her promise, and at the last, liberty, victory, and triumph, besides yet. And after the lord lieutenant had bene there feasted and banqueted, on the 5. of January he came from Leiden to Dunboge. The 10. he mustered part of his household, to the number of 500. more, then pointed them into seuerall companies, to seuerall gouernours the carle of Essex was y day made generall of the hostes. The 11. day, the lord lieutenant came from Dunboge to Leiden. The 12. a generall fast was proclaimed through Holland, Seiberland, and Friesland, which was kept with great zeale, the lord lieutenant spent that day till night with hearing of psalms, reading, and singing of psalms: neither he nor his earing any thing till night. The 19. of January, he came from Leiden to Dunboge.

The 24. of January, the prince of Portingale came to Dunboge. The day after the lord lieutenant was installed and sworn, a list of all the States (come to the gouerne. The manner of y installing was thus: At Dunboge is a marvellous faire hall, at the upper end wherof are five or six large steps descending, next to a faire chamber, at the upper end wherof on high was placed a colody of state, in the midst wherof were the armes of England; and against them my lord was seated, on each side of him two steps descending, late sheweth the principal States, and below them late the residue, to the number of twenty might be my lord, but foure of five steps descending. On the right hand of my lord did stand the prince of Portingale, next him the lord Morley, next another Nobis gouernour of Munster, next William Russell, and Sir Robert Gifford, with diuerse men of great account. On the left hand of my lord did stand the Duke Maurice, next the carle of Essex, Sir William Stanley, Sir Robert Stapleton, Sir Parr, with diuerse other of great account. Thus being placed, a watchman made a large oration in Dutch, declaring the causes of the matter in hand, with thanks to the Queenes Maiestie, and the lord lieutenant. Then was read in Latine the covenants betwene the States, the Queene and my Lord: this done, the covenants were delivered to my Lord, which he delivered to the States, and the States delivered an other unto him: then was my Lord demanded to bothe the same by oath, who holding his hand to heaven did sweare to the covenants. The like did the States, holding up their hands bothe to performe. Then againe were the States sworne to the Queene and my L. her lieutenant in those affaires. This done my Lord gave to them severall thanks, and they severally did give him the like, which being done, my Lord passed through to his chamber, the trumpets all sounding before him. This day my Lord feasted all the States most sumptuously, so that they had their fill both in their bellies, and heads. This day after dinner the soldiers of the Towne, which were three companies, came into the court furnished, and did there shew themselves with drum and fife: at night were about an hundred fets burnt about my Lords house. The eight and twentieth of Januarie, companies mustred by T. Digs, master maister generall in Guelder, Friseland, and Holland, were as followeth: Master Norris colonell gentleman, 256. colonell Morgan, three hundred & ninete, Captaine Wotton a hundredth thirtie five, Captaine Powle a hundredth and fawentye, Captaine Baskenfeld fourscore, Captaine Yorke fourscore and six, Captaine Hunninges a hundredth and eleven, Captaine Vdall fourtie seven, Captaine Powell ninetie four, Captaine Hart threescore and eight, Captaine Price a hundredth twentie three, Captaine Wilson, a hundredth forty five, Captaine Blunt a hundredth twentie seven, Captaine Burrowes a hundredth and ten, Captaine Harlow, a hundredth twentie four, Captaine Shawe, fourscore & four, Captaine Enge threescore and nine, Captaine Sir Walker Wallar a hundredth thirtie seven.

The second of Februarie, Captaine Willowby died at Hage, and was three honorable buried: On the third of Februarie, all the yeomen of the guard, took their oath, whom committing to the conscience of their charge, we purpose now to touch the preceptible authoritie committed to the said Lord lieutenant, by common consent of the States, and so by degrees to descend to other occurrences concerning these Nether-lands.

A placard containing the authoritie given by the States of the Lowe Countries, unto the mightie prince, Robert Earle of Leicester, Baron of Denbigh, &c. for the government of the said Lowe Countries: translated out of Dutch into English as followeth.

Euen as it hath pleased her Maiestie of England mercifully to lead ouer into these Countries the high and mightie prince and Lord, Robert Earle of Leicester, Baron of Denbigh, and one of the privie counsell, knight of the noble order of the Garter, and not onely to admit and institute his Excellencie, as episc head above all militarie souldiers, on horse or foote, which her Maiestie hath sent, or shall send ouer hereafter into these Countries, and to the end to assist us with counsell and aduise, according to his great experience, police and wisdom, in the direction of publike affaires of the land, as well touching the feates of warre, as otherwise, in conseruation of all that which most tendeth to the prosperitie of the foresaid land, to bringe backe and reduce the same into such good order and rule as it hath bene in times past, to the ende that so much the better and orderly, he may resist the force and tyrannie of our enimie, and to frustrate all his practises: but also beside this, to honor and enrich his foresaid Excellencie, with greater authoritie, might and commandement, above all her maiesties Admirals and Viceadmirals, and ships of warre, to command them all, and to employ them to the service of these Countries, and in such order as his Excellencie shall finde needfull for the same Countrie: and that his Excellencie following her Maiesties commandement, delicious to them the effect of the good will and affection which he beareth to these affaires, and to the preservation of the same, and also of the true Christian Religion, and hath employed himselfe to willingly in the foresaid matters, that his Excellencie for that onely cause hath left and abandoned his native Countries and goods, and transported himselfe hitherward amongst vs: so that her Maiestie and his Excellencie could neuer have done or effected vnto vs a greater benefite than this. Therefore are we resolved with good and ripe deliberation, to certifie all men by these presents, that we haue desired, accepted, and authorized the foresaid mightie and honorable Prince Lord Robert Earle of Leicester, &c. to be our gouernor and generall Captaine ouer all the united Provinces, and associate Cities and members of the same. And we giue vnto his Excellencie, besides the authoritie of his Maiestie giuen vnto him, the highest and supreme commandement, and absolute authoritie above and in all matters of warfare by sea and by land, to execute and administrate the same to the resistance of the enimie, euen as his Excellencie shall thinke most commodious to the preservation of those Countries: and so further, to do all such things as appertaine to the office of a generall Captaine. And furthermore, we commit the administration and yle of policie and iustice ouer the foresaid united Provinces, and associate Cities and members of the same into his hands, to execute and administrate the same with such power and authoritie, as haue had in times past all the other gouernors of these Lowe Countries before him, and especially, as haue bene exercised, and lawfully administrated in the time of Charles the first, vnto onely the Lawes and priuiledges of the foresaid Countries: also with speciall power to collect profits, and rectiue, and administrate all the contributions, which are agreed and condescended, or shall hereafter be consented or agreed, to the maintenance of the warres: and also, that which is or shall be delivered hereafter into his Excellencies hands: and this all according to the vertue of other letters and writings written more at large touching the same agreement. All which former charge and commission, his Excellencie through our earnest desire hath accepted, and hath delivered solemnly to the same hands: first of all, for the preservation of the true Christian Religion, and maintenance of the priuiledges and rights of these lands and Provinces, members, and Cities of the same. And to the end that no body should pretend ignorance, we command expresse to make knowne these ordinances, to proclaime and publish them, where as men are accustomed to proclaime all publications, proceeding, and commaunding to proceede with rigor against all disobedients and neglectors of the same, according to the order of punishment before mentioned, without any fauour or dissimulation to the contrary, because we haue thought the same to be expedient for the preservation of the Countie. Given in our congregation and assemble in the Hage, the 6. day of Februarie, 1586. by ordinance of the foresaid generall States.

This placard thus passed, the Lord lieutenant did appoint certaine special men naturs borne, of the counsell, to the intent that such affaires as regarded to occur, might by them be conveniently managed: the names of which counsellors with the places of their charge I ouerlasse.

Having thus far discoursed of the lord lieutenant's passing from place to place, and the manner of his entertainment: the obseruation of time doth byge us we proceede any further, to deliuer a peece of seruice done by cornell Skinke, and then to proceede in the commemoration of the lord lieutenant's entertainment in other places.

On the 21. day of Februarie, Skinke not lying still from indomnaying the enemy, did take the towne of Warle, and the castle thereto belonging, the manner wherof was thus: himselfe lying in Wendelo, a towne in part belleged, left his men with the Graue Maurice, charging the not to depart till such time as they heard from him, whiche they fulfilled: he came with two or three men from Wendelo to his men, no man knowing his enterprise, caused them in the morning to be ready, and so passed on till mid day, at whiche time they were not far from Warle: Skinke slipping a thirtie wagons, clad certaine of his men in the houses apparent, sent them into the towne to sell the victuals, which they followed, and one of them brake his wagon in the gate, so that the gate could not be closed: One of them shooting off a bagge gave Skinke warning, and he suddenly entered the towne without resistance, and took both it and the Castell. This towne is thought not so strong as profitable, yet beie strong. In it are diuers saltpits which do make great store of salt, which salt doth serue a great part of the countie to Cullen, and further altogether serued the enemy of salt, which now he wanteth. About the first of March he left the Towne, burning it and spoiling the Countrey, the cause was this. There was an armie comming to stay his passage, whiche he hauing 300. horses did assaile, slue 1000. souldiers, tooke fine ensignes and sent to the lord lieutenant. Thus did ballaunt Skinke, whom we will leave and returne to matter of delight.

On the first of March, the lord lieutenant came from Hage to Leiden, and the third of March from Leiden to Harlem, whose entertainment there was with orations, representations, verses, shewes, &c. not inferior to those of other totnes. On the fourth of March the Lord lieutenant, saw the Earle of Essex coronell, and sir William Russell coronell muster and trayne by Harlem, to the number of two hundred horse. He was there feasted and banketted. And on the tenth of March he came from Harlem to Amsterdam, and by the way was met with diuers men of warre well shipped, which brought him by a long riuer that went into the Towne, ouer the which riuer were three strong bridges, placed full of armed souldiers, on the first bridge was planted ten or twelue peeces of ordinance, which after his honor was past, were shot off, the souldiers on euery bridge discharging by volles in braye manner: being past these bridges, he was met with two great pageants in this manner: two boates were made in monstrous greatnesse, on the one the Image of a horse swimming, on the other the likeness of a fish, on each of them a man riding, signifying the god Neptune: both these, one on the one side, and the other one the other side, did accompanie him to his landing, which was at the market place, where were planted great numbers of armed men with shot. Right before him where he landed was a scaffold, wheron was placed diuers shewes and representations, with verses, &c. The day and night following fire works, and afterward banketting, &c. The 20. of March, the Lord lieutenant came from Amsterdam to a castle called Mullen, 4. miles from Sporden, and there did dine, and from thence he came to Sporden to supper and to bed. On the 22. he came from Sporden to Utrecht, where his receiving was nothing inferior to most of the rest.

On the 25. of March, the Earle of Essex went to Leger with his hostmen, where he began a new worke. The 28. the Earle was feasted by Graue Maurice, on the which day in the morning there was charge giuen to all the English souldiers in the towne, that they should march from thence to Hage, which for that they wanted pay they refused, and raised a mutinie, for the which one of capitaine Polles men was taken and put in wards, whereupon the rest of his followers seeing this, came to the gaole, burst the locks of the doores, and tooke out the prisoner, for the which there was fine apprehended, and three of them were hanged. On the same day was hanged the secretarie to the Countie Hollooke, which secretarie was a counsellor to the betraying of the Towne of Graue. The 30. of March, the Earle feasted the Nobilitie and Bourgeses of Utrecht, where there wanted nothing that might fill their bellies or their heads.

About the first of April, Generall Norris tooke the sence called Lte. On the fourth of April, was a fore combat betweene the Male-contents & the English, the enimies being foure thousand were vanquished by Generall Norris with one thousand men, wherof he lost a great number. And slue 1200. Spaniards. The letter of Generall Norris to the Lieutenant I haue set it downe in maister Reine Woolfe and Holinshed.

W. Scager.

The three and twentieth of Aprill, the Earle of Leicester lieutenant, and gouernour generall of her maiesties forces in the Low countries of the united provinces, making his residence at that time in Vtrecht (a great and goodly towne upon the frontiers of Holland) kept most honourably the feast of Saint George therein, the proceedings whereof being so princely performed to the honour of our nation in the view of so many thousand strangers, I could not chuse (having gotten the true and faithfull description, by one William Scager alias Porteloise, an officer at armes in that seruice) to make some briefe remembrance of the manner thereof, to wit: The streets of Vtrecht being large and faire, were tankt and set with eight ensignes of Burgesses, richly appointed, wearing scarfes knit like roses white and red upon their armes, betwene whom from the court of my Lord unto the cathedrall Church called the Dome, the proceeding was in hoyle backe. First rode the trumpetters appaerled in scarlet, layd with silver lace, sounding their trumpets most royally, their banner roles being displayed, and richly lined with my Lords armes: then followed the Gentlemen, Captaines, Colonels, and her Maiesties twoyne men to the number of forty horse, richly adorned in cloth of gold, silver, and likes of all colours. After came five Knights, foure Barons, with the counsell of Estates, the earle of Essex accompanied with the Bishop of Cullen Prince Bishop, and the Prince of Portingale rode by himselfe: next proceeded the Captaine of the garr, the treasurer, and controller of the house hold, bearing their white staves: after whom followed two Gentlemen officers, and Porteloise herault in rich coate of the armes of England: then came my Lord most princelike, inuested in his robes of the order, guarded by the principall Burgers of the towne, which offered themselves to that seruice, besides his owne garr, which were a fiftie halbarders in scarlet clothes, guarded with purple and white velvet. He being thus honourable brought vnto the Church, after due reuerence done vnto the Quenees Maiesties state, which was there erected on the right hand, he tooke his owne stall on the left, by certaine degrees lower: then began prayers, and a Sermon made by maister Knowstubs my Lords chaplaine, after which, my Lord proceeded to the offering, first, for her Maiestie, and then for himselfe, the which he performed with such reuerence and princely behaviour, that all generally spake most honourably of him. These solemnities being done, his Lordship returned as he came, leaving behind him the Earle of Essex, and certaine Gentlemen to accompany the Princes and the Ladies of the court. His court was a faire and large house, belonging in times past to the knights of the Rhodes, in which was a very great hall, richly hung with tapistrie: at the upper end whereof was a most sumptuous cloth and chaire of estate for the Quenees Maiestie, with her armes and shies thereon, and before it a table covered with all things so requisite, as if in person she had bene there: on the left hand, almost at the tables end, was my Lords trencher and booke, for he would haue no chaire. The tables being covered, and all degrees assembled, my Lord before the state of her Maiestie, knighted a Dutch Gentleman, called Martin Skinke, for his manifold seruices done to his countrie, the which

done, the officers marshalled the feast. At the table on the right side of the hall sat the young Prince of Portingall, the Prince eldest, and his wife, the Princes Simeie, the Earle of Essex, the Graue Mures and his Lady, and betwixt euerie Lady was an English Lord, or knight placed. On the left side sat the States and chiefe Bourgers of the towne, and the graund prior of Amsterdame, (who came to see the feast) was by my Lords appointment placed uppermost at that table. Then began the trumpets to sound in the seruice which was most prince-like and abundant, serued on the knee, carued and tasted to her Maiesties trencher. The side tables being furnished all in silver plate, and attended on by Gentlemen, sundrie sorts of newes, continued the miring of the first course, which done and aduoyded, the trumpets sounded in for the second, which was all baked meates of beasts, and fowles, the beasts, as lions, dragons, leopards, and such like, bearing plaines of armes, and the fowles, as peacocks, swans, pheasants, turkie cocks and others in their naturall feathers spread as in their greatest pride, which sight was both rare and magnificent. This seruice being placed on her Maiesties boord, the bealls on the one side, a fowles on the other, the lion lying couchant at her highnes trencher, the officers cried, a hall, which being made, with much a doo (by reason of the multitude) they brought vp betwene them, with three reuerences to the state, Porteloise herault, inuested with the armes of England, who in Latine, French, and English, pronounced the Quenees Maiesties vsuall Aile of England, France, and Ireland, defendesse of the faith, &c. crying three times, largesse. Then began the trumpets to sound, and the Dutch men to carouse to the health of her Maiestie, the welfare of my Lord, and to the prosperities of the united provinces, and nothing wanted wherewith either estate, magnificence, or ioy might be expressed. To be briefe the feast ended, and tables voyded, there was dauncing, vaulting, and tumbling, with the forces of Hercules, which gaue great delight to the strangers, for they had not seene it before, and thus they passed the time, till morning and then departed. At supper being all assembled againe, great was the feast, and plentifull the cheere: and after supper began the barriers betwene challengers & defendants men of armes, wherein the Earle of Essex behaued himselfe so valiantly, that he gaue all men great hope of his noble prowess in armes. The barriers done, and either part retyred with equall praise, (though not with equall blowes) there was a most sumptuous banquet prepared of sugar meates for the men of armes, and the Ladies: which banquet being finished, my Lord wishing them all good rest, tooke his leaue, and so this honourable feast brooke vp about twelue of the clocke at midnight.

On the 24. of Aprill our English men that were in the enterpryse before Graue H. Archer, retired, having let Graue in sufficient both of victuals and munition, and in their retreat let vpon a sconce called Knols sconce, which was yerled vpon command. The next day our men of some part of them came before Canple sconce, and presently towe it without the losse of any man.

The 4. of May, his Excellency did biete all his hoysmen being in number about thirtie of fourtine hundred by Newburke, on a great heath betwene Newburke & Amersford. And this day his Excellencies gard being sent to Newburke to keepe the towne, took a fowenty booges, that were purposed to have spoiled Newburke. The fowenty of May, his Excellencie remoued from Amersford to Arname, and passed through Reine, and Wagonet. Reine is a papper strong towne, situate on the riuer of Reine, pleasant and defensible, roundly compassed together. Wagonet standeth by a creek of water comming to the Reine, and within twentie sepe years of it: Reine, this towne is a strong towne, and stands most pleasant, wanting nothing but peace. Arname is a faire towne, strongly enuironed with wals, rampiers, and other matter of strenght, it also standeth on the riuer of Reine, on the one side of the towne the ground is most fertile and pleasant, on the other side is a great heath most barren, all the countrey is spoiled, abbeyes, faire houses, and doypes are all wasted, neither any house standing, nor any man there dwelling. Out the Reine against this towne is a foote, onely by defence of the booges, if the enemy come to destroy and take from them their cattell, to which fownt both the booges runne, and also buye their cattell. Within one mile of this towne is the fownt of Arname, which our Englysh men won the last yeare, this fownt is wondrous strong, being compassed with such rampiered wals, and deepe ditches, that it is almost inuincible. It standeth on the one side of the Reine. At this fownt was capitaine Henings, a hyane gentleman slaine at the winning of it, and there is buried: of other towne I leaue farther to describe, and turne to the accidents. The 9. of May, the Prince of Parma with others, came to view the towne of Graue, which a canonier saw, and discharged his canon, wherewith he took away the hinder part of his hoys, and missed the prince but a little, so that he hurted him sore. The same day they of Graue shot fire bales into the greatest fownt of the enemy, and by good lucke one of them lighted among the powder in the fownt, set it on fire, which with such violence brake forth, that it blew up the Spaniards most terribly, and layd the fownt flat. About this time the enemy battered the balle towne of Graue, and presently upon the battery entered, which the souldiers of the towne suffered, but in fine they set on them, slue 400. and purged the towne againe.

The 12. of May, sir Martin Skoike obtained a little peece of ground enuironed with water, neare unto Penegan, where he intrenched himselfe, so that the towne could not hurt him, and his ships of warre comming downe to him, nothing could passe by the riuer of Reine to the towne but he commanded it. The 14. of May, our men lying at Penegan fownt, there revolted to them out of the towne two boyes. The fowteenth his excellency passed from Arname to the campe at Penegan: this day the castle of Leuon was yeilded him, and the same day came fowre boyes to our men from Penegan. The eighteenth of May, the enemies entring Graue, lost 50. men.

Herman, for his yeilding of Graue, comming to Bomell was there apprehended and caried to Utrecht, adiudged to dye, and was executed with two o- ther captiues.

The 20. of May, early in the morning the strong foyt of Penegan was yeilded to his Excellencie in this foyt, to depart like souldiers, which was granted, and they to the number of 150. souldiers very hyane passed by his Excellencies lodging at Wynterpart: there was in all at the siege of this fownt of Penegan slaine about fowre souldiers and pioniers, and twenty hurt. Now to returne to o- ther accidents, such as in the meane time happened in England.

This yeare the Quenes maiestie tooke order for the peopling and inhabiting of the countries, late belonging to the earle of Desmond and his rebellious companions, to which end diuerse honorable and worshipfull gentlemen provided to be undertakers of signories there, whercof some went into the said countrey, others according to order taken, sent their people, amongst which were sir Christopher Hatton, sir Walter Rawlie, sir William Courtney, sir Richard Molinux, sir George Bourcher, sir Edward Fitton, sir Valentine Browne, sir Walter Lulon, John Popham, her maiesties attorney generall and other.

The 19. of Iamurie, Nicholas Deuorox was condemned for treason, in being made a Seminarie priest at Rhemes in France, since the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, in Anno primo of her Maiesties reigne, and in remaining here after the terme of fowrte daies after the session of the last Parliament.

Nilo Edmond Barbar being made priest as aforesaid, and comming into this realme after the said terme of fowrte daies, was likewise condemned of treason, and both dyatone to Woborne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered on the 21. of Iamurie. And on the same day a woman was buried in Smithfield for poisoning of her Aunt, and mistresse, and attempting the like to her uncle.

On the feast day of the purification of our blessed Lady, Doctor Iohn Whitegilt archbishop of Canterbury, William lord Cobham, warden of the flue Ports, and Thomas lord Buckhurst, were chosen and taken to be of her Maiesties privie counsell.

The 11. of Februarie, Thomas Louelace was brought prisoner from the Towert of London to the starre chamber, against whom her Maiesties attorney do informe, that the same Louelace, upon malice conceived against Leonard Louelace, and Richard Louelace his cousin germanes, had falsely and diuellishly contrived and counterfitted a very trayterous letter in the name of Thom. Louelace (another brother of the said Leonard and Richard then resident beyond the seas) purporting, that the same Thomas should thereby incite and provoke the said Leonard to persure the said Richard to execute her Highnesse destruction with other circumstances of treason. This letter he call in an open high way, pretending thereby, that upon the discouerie thereof, his said kinsmen Leonard and Richard should be dyatone in question for the treasonable matter against her Maiesties attorney prayed, that the said Thomas then prisoner, might receive condign punishment. Whereupon the court adiudged that he should be carried on horsebacke about Welschmunder hall, with his face to the horse taile, and a paper on his backe wherein to be written: For counterfetting of false and treacherous letters against his owne kinred, containing most trayterous matter against her Maiesties person. *Straunge
at Excester through stench
prison.*

The 14. of March, at the assises kept at the citie of Excester in Devonshire before sir Edmond Anderlon, lord chiefe Justice of the common pleas, sergeant Floriday, one of the barons of the exchequer, and other Justices, there happened a strange sickness, first amongst the prisoners, and then amongst other persons, and besides the prisoners, many of all degrees died thereof, namely sergeant Floriday, sir John Chichester, sir Arthur Bailer, and sir Barnard Drake knights, Thomas Carew, R. Carie, John Fortescue, John Waldren, and Thomas Rildone squires, and Justices of peace: of the common people died very many, Constables, Rues, Tithingmen, and Jurors, and namely of one Jude, they being twelve in number, there died 11. of them. This sickness was imputed to certaine Doytingals then prisoners in the said goale. For not long before, one Barnard Drake equire had bene at the seas, and meeting with certaine Doytingals come from new found land, and laden with fish, he took them as a good prise, and brought them into Doythmouth haven, and from thence they were sent, being in number about 38. persons, unto the goale of the castle of Exon, and there were cast into the drepe pit and sinking dungeon. These men had bene before long time at the seas, having no change of apparell, nor lpen in bed, and now lying on the ground without succour or reliefe, were loone infected, and all for the most part were sick, and some of them died, and this sickness very loone after dispersed it selfe among all the residue of the prisoners in the goale, of which disease many of them died, but all brought to great extremities and very hardly escaped. These men when they were to be brought before the foresaid Justices for their triall, many of them were looke weak and sick, that they were not able to go nor stand, but were carried from the goale to the place of indgement, some upon handbarrowes, and some between men leading them, and so brought to the place of iustice. The sight of these miserable cases, being thought to be hunger starved, rather then otherwise diseased, moved many to pite them, &c.

in the heart
of an horse.*

The seventeenth of March, a strange thing happened, the like whereof before hath not bene heard of in our time. Master Dorington of Spaldwicke in the countie of Huntingdon equire, one of her maiesties gentlemen pensioners, had a horse which died suddenly, and being ripped, to see the cause of his death, there was found in the hole of the heart of the same horse a strange worme, which lay on a round heape in a hall of skinn of the likenesse of a toade, which being taken out, and layed abrode, was in forme and fashion not easie to be described, the length of which worme divided into many graines to the number of fiftie (spced from the body like the branches of a tree) was from the snout to the end of the longest graine 17. inches, having foure issues in the graines, from the which dropped forth a red water: the bodie in bignesse round about was fyer inches and an halfe, the colour wherof was very like a makarell. This monstrous worme found in manner aforesaid, crawling to have got away, was killed in with a dagger and died, which after being dyed, was shewed to many honorable persons of the realme.

The eighteenth of April, in the assises holden at London in the Justice hall, William Thomlon alias Blackborne made priest at Rhemes, and Richard Lea alias Long made priest at Lions in Fraunce, and remaining here contrarie to the statute, were both condemned, and on the 20. day of April dyatone to Tyborne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered.

The first of May, deceased sir Henry Sidney knight of the garter, lord president of Wales, and was honorably buried at Penhurst in Kent on the one and twentieth of June.

The eight of May being Monday, in the afternoon, Henry Ramelius chancelor for Germanie, ambassadoz from Fredericke the second king of Denmarke, unto the Queene maiedtie of England, came into the riuer of Chamis with his ships so farre as blacke wall, where he was received by Gilbert lord Talbot, and by him conveyed by water along to Greenwich, and so to the tower wharfe, where he arrived and was honorably received of the lord Cobham, and other great Estates, and by them conveyed through the Tower streete, Fanchurch streete, and Grace streete into Bisshopsgate streete, to Crobby place, where he was lodged, and remained till he had finished his ambassade at the Queenes charges, and returned on the 30. of May towards Denmarke.

The seventeenth of May, Philip earle of Arundell was conveyed from the Tower of London to Wellminster, and there in the Starre chamber, by the counsell condemned to pay 10000. pound fine for his contempt, and to remaine in prison at the Queenes pleasure.

A commission was directed from her Maiestie, tending to the ratifying of a league league of amitie betwene her Maiestie and James king of Scots, which league being articulated, commissioners were appointed, Edward earle of Rutland, William lord Evers, and Thomas Randolph equire, who with their traine came to Berwicke on the 19. of June, where the ambassadoz of Scotland being present, they accomplished the matter according to the commission, the articles of the said league in all and every part sufficiently confirmed on the first of July: which being done, the said earle of Rutland with his traine returned home, master Randolph went into Scotland to take his leave of the king, and returned into England about the 15. of August.

The 18. of June, Henry Elks clearks and batchelor of art, for counterfeiting a sign manual to the presentatio of the parsonage of Allaints in Haddings, binded to the archbishop of Canterburie, or to his commissarie generall (the diocess of Chichester being void) that he might be instituted parson there, was dyatone to Tyborne and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered.

sir Richard Bingham against the Burkes.

This yeare (as in the last proceeding) full great troubles in Ireland in Connaght, which because they are memorizable, and no lesse happily then valiantly appealed, I will set downe the causes and foundations thereof, with all the particular services and successes, as I have received them. concerned under the hands and testimonies of ourse capitaines and gentlemen employed in the said service.

In the moneth of September, in Anno 1585. at a sessions holden at Doonemony in the county of Mayo, within the province of Connaght by sir Richard Bing. knight, chiefe commissioner and gouernour of the said province (sir Nichol. White Maister of the robes then being present, and employed with him for the perfecting of the last composition made within y<sup>e</sup> said province) the countie of Mayo, and the whole countie stood then in generalitie, through the good and politike gouernment, and the iust and vpright dealing of the said sir Richard Bingham on peaceable and quiet termes, without any face of alteration. And the most part of y<sup>e</sup> gentlemen and freeholders of that countie resorted to the said sessions before: neuertheless, when now by means of this composition & agreement betwene her M<sup>ty</sup>. and them, they perceived y<sup>e</sup> names, titles and superiorities of their chiefe L<sup>ds</sup>. and specially of M<sup>rs</sup>. W. the chiefe of the septes of that countie should cease, continuing, & for euer after be determined: it did not a little grieve them, although some of them not long before had expostulated y<sup>e</sup> like reformation. The plot of this composition was deuised by sir R. of purpose, to take away the greatnesse of the Irish lords, with their names of Macs & Ocs, that the inferiour subiect might be freed from their Irish customes, cuttings and unreasonable exactions, & (by knowing what was their owne) be able to depend euer after vpon the state, & not on those Irish lords or gentlemen: which also might not only much auail her Ma<sup>ty</sup> in fine of any stirs or reuolts: by drawing the common people from following the great & chiefe lords, but also bring a more certaine yearly rent or reuenuer into her highnes coffers then formerly was accustomed. When the people perceived these their old customes & vlags like to take end, they deuised with themselves for the preventing thereof, and according to their old custome manner, euer by them vsed in all their discontentments, they tooke by their weapons, armed them against the state, thinking by stirs and broyles to winne the reuocation of this leied and determined resolution, and so to be left againe in their old customes and vlags.

This their purpose appeared in one Thomas Roe Burke, a chiefe gentleman of Thomas that sept, who at this very instant, during the sayd sessions at Doonemonie, kept himselfe within a strong castle of his, standing in an Island on Loghe make, euen within the sight of the gouernour and the other commissioners, refusing to come at them, albeit they had severall times sent for him. Sir Richard Bingham perceiving that the coales of troubles were now layd together, and would shortly after kindle and become an angry fire, if the same were not politikelly and warily prevented; dissimbling the matter as if it were of no moment, he beihought him of the best and last remedie to meete with this inconuenience. And knowing well that those Burkes had euer bene very bad and loose people, such as very hardly continued themselves two yeares together with, in a due course of compasse of obedience, he saw that the onely way to stop this gap, was either to cut off or to apprehend and lay vp in durance as pledges two or three of the best of that sept, such as were most dangerous for the inciting of stirs, and the drawing of others into action. And therefore vpon his returne out of that countie to Roscomon, he dealt with the sherie of the county of Mayo for the apprehension of the sayd Thomas Roe. The sherie not long after sent his subsherie to put this matter in execution, who being resisted and hurt by the sayd Thomas Roe, and not otherwise able to apprehend him, wounded him in such sort as he thereof died. This Thomas Roe, being thus slaine was not much lamented, no not euen of his owne kindred, for he was an oppressor of them, and doubtlesse it was thought by wile men that the death of this man, and the hanging of two others of that surname at Roscomon, which had deuised for the drawing of Scots into the province, had prevented the stirs and troubles that after ensued, and at that time seemed to haue a be- giuning, had not some men depending on the state through enuy and malice to sir Richard Bingham & his good and happy gouernment, persuaded diuers others of that sept of the Burkes to haue a care of themselves to be vpon their keeping, & to trust no officer, nor to come to any such till their pardons should be by them procured from the lord Deputy. These mens names I forgoare to remember, because they haue since that time made it knowne before the lord Deputy and counsell of the realme, that in giving such cautes to y<sup>e</sup> Burkes, they meant nothing lesse then to hartten them into rebellion against the state, and to attempt such bad actions as afterwards they did. Of this counsell y<sup>e</sup> Burkes, which of themselves were scititious enough, in whose minds did sit sicke the abolishing & taking away of their M. W. with their old Irish customes & cuttings, tooke hold and converted the same to an apt & conuonious occasion offered them, for their better assembling together into a conuenient number. And more effectually to win the hearts of many men to follow this their intended enterprise, they made the Clandonnells, the loies, & most of the countie beleue, that sir R. Bingham hauing already taken from them their ancient customes & liberties, would also deliuer the like measure to them, & take from them also their liues, if they did not well looke vnto themselves. By this means they drew many vnto them, persuading themselves that they might safely assemble together in companies without feare of interruption for by the friends of their forsayd counsellors which were in Dublin, their assemblies should be thought as a thing by the done for their defence & safety. They also knew that that sir Richard Bingham being restrained from following them in this or other their actions without direction from Dublin could not stop or prevent them in their first beginning, by reason whereof they would in short time draw together & ioyne to them the greatest part of the country, whereof some should be drawn to assist them in open hostility, and some others in secret and under-hand dealing, of which sort the latter should still seeme subsidies & iove as neare as they could in y<sup>e</sup> bolome of the state. And to make themselves the stronger, and to draw the whole province into action with them, they gaue it forth, y<sup>e</sup> their case was every mans case within the same. And that as their ancient customes & liberties were infringed, and their liues fought to be taken away, so should it also fare with the rest of the said province. And here for an entrance into this rebellion, the sons of Edmona Burke of castle Barry being many (which Edmond was an old man, one of the competitors of y<sup>e</sup> M. Whelaniship, & a most bad affected member to the state, and his wife as bad as himselfe, together with Edmond Kerragh Burke, Riccard Burke y<sup>e</sup> Duels Hookes sonne, Moyler Oge Burke, Walter M. Danie Bane, Cahir M. Connell, and diuers others, associating unto them many idle persons, entered into a castle in Logg-maske called castle Pecalley, and manured the same together with Thomas Roes castle, whereof mention is made before, which castle after Thomas Roes death, was now in the possession of his brother Riccard Burke called the Pall of Ireland: which castles they kept in rebellious manner against the state, refusing to come at any of her maiesties officers. About this time sir Richard Bingham lay at the siege of Clanowen in Thomond, a strong pile, manned and kept against her mainly by Mahowne Obrian a most dangerous enemy to the state, a chiefe champion of the popes, and a great practiser with foreign powers, for the invasion of this realme of Ireland. At this siege sir Richard Bingham had but 100. English souldiers, and some few kerne of the country, by reason whereof he was diuident to no small paine in skirmishing, watching, and warding with so few men: nevertheless, within seven dayes after he won the castle and slue the sayd Mahowne Obrian & the ward within, and raised the said castle, without the furtherance of any great ordinance. After y<sup>e</sup> sir R. marched from this castle to castle Pecalley, within the which the traytors were and inclosed themselves. At his first coming thither he parled with them, aduising them to remember the obedience which they owed to her maiesty, and to yield themselves to her maiesties mercie, assuring them that in so doing they should find that fauour in all respects that other her highnesse subsidies did. But they (numbing nothing lesse then to submit themselves, on any such conditions) sayd they would not do any hurt, but keepe themselves there in safety, for that they were fearfull to trust any Englishman, alledging many frivolous and impertinent causes moouing them to stand vpon their guard. Hereupon sir Richard proceeded to besiege them in the sayd castle, which was a strong round battelle crested farre within the Loghie, vpon a small compass of ground, so faunted by the wall, that leaue a fauouring place was left vnto it. The siege was all by water in boates, and could not otherwise be attempted. Insomuch that sir Richard going about to burne a boate of two of theirs that they had docted and layd by vnder the castle wall, to the end they might not escape away, and that also he might watch and ward them with few men, having but a small company there, and those also sore wearied, busied with stones and galled with shot at the siege of Clanowen: he was forced by the sudden rising of contrary weather, which much fauoured the enemy, to leaue the assault with the losse of his boates, and two of three of his souldiers, himselfe and others being in the sayd boate, hardly escaped by the helpe of other boates, which other boates came not in time to his succour, through the negligence of such as he had put in trust with them and appointed to come, and ioyne with him. The boate which he lost the enemies got, in which and in another boate of their owne (before sir Richard could returne to charge them with a fresh supply from his camp lying on the shoare) they shipped themselves, and with great celerity escaped into the woods, fearing that at the next charge, sir Richard would haue won the castle. Captaine Mordant and others had the chase of them by water. These traytors being thus escaped to the woods and mountaines out of the castle Pecalley, their accomplices also fled out of the other castle. Both which and one strong pile of farrowe M. Donnels, sir Richard raised to the ground, so that they were not fit or stood seruicable to be kept by the English, and were very dangerous to be in the possession of the Irish. Richard Burke alias the Pall of Ireland a man of no small account among his sect, and all the ill affected Irish repaired to sir Richard at his first coming to castle Pecalley, bringing in deed the chiefe of their confederacy. This man vnder colour of dutifull subiection, intended to haue betrayed sir Richard and all his company: but (intelligence hereof being giuen, and many apparant proofes had of his treperous intentions and designs) this Pall of Ireland was soone executed by marshall law: this man was assuredly the most dangerous member in all the county of Mayo, especially for the drawing in of Scots, a thing which sir Richard euer doubted, and which the Burkes undoubtedly intended.

After this the gouernour sir Richard Bingham tooke order for the following of those Burkes to the woods and mountaines, which were now growne to be some fourscore twoodes he leuied some forces on the country, and with them and his owne company of an hundred souldiers, he so hunted them from bush to bush, and hill to hill, that in short time no newes was to be heard where any of them were. After this the gentlemen of the country which had not combined with them, seeing the rebels to be diuident to their holes and fastnesse in hiding manner, by means whereof the souldiers could do nothing vpon them, offered to sir Richard that if he would draw his forces out of the country, they would undertake the service against the rebels, and either kill them, or banish them at their owne cost and charge, without abating any penny of the composition rents due to her maiesty by them in lew thereof: hereunto sir Richard assented, finding it a good policy to let one of them against another. But here, hauing these bad Burks at a great advantage, & in a hard distressed case, when they were thus at y<sup>e</sup> lowest able, sir Richard receiued speciall and strait charge and commaundment from the lord Deputy to protect them, & he receiued also a protection ready signed by the lord Deputy to that end, which thing, though the matter and manner of it much grieued him, he handled it in the best sort he could to saue the credit of the state, and wrought deuises to diuine them to seek their protections, which when they did, he granted it vnder his owne hand, and the scale of the prouince, as formerly was accustomed, and in such caules ought to be done. But although this was closely handled by the gouernour sir Richard Bingham, yet the Burks had intelligence that the lord Deputy had protected them, and commaunded the gouernour to perforce it, which, as is to be gathered, they had learned from some wel-willers of theirs out of Dublin: this made the gentlemen very high and haughty minded, and was to them a soueraigne preparatiue, for to vnderstande new and greater stirres and boyles then before they had begun. For the peace being such as the state offered it, and they sought it not, continued but a small time, although they had giuen in a simple pledge for the performance thereof. After the Burks were thus protected, sir Richard Bingham repaired to his dwelling house and from thence, vpon occasions to Dublin, where he had not long staid when the Burks revolted againe now the second time, ioyning vnto them the Clangibbons, the Clandonnells, and the loyes in farre greater number then before, which sayd loyes, the more to manifest their bad and trayterous intentions, and the better to assure their complices of their fast dealing in this combination, murdered certaine of the officers of Yrconnaght and their men, to the number of fiftene or sixtene. About this time order came from the lord Deputy for the leuying of me within this prouince for the seruice in the Low countries. The burse thereof and the repaire hither of Francis Barckley sent by the lord Deputy for the leuying of the sayd men, caused many idle men who had no zeale to serue beyond the seas, to ioyne themselves with the sayd Burks then in action against her maiesty. And thus these Burks hauing had an interuall of peace and a pausing time to gather head againe and increase their forces, stood on very lofty termes, and sayd they would haue a M. William, or else they would go into Spaine for one: also they would haue no sherie within that countie, nor be subiect to answer in apparance at any assise or sessions. These points and termes they stood on, and articulated the same accordingly, with many other vnrasonable demands which they would haue to be granted, or otherwise they would in no wise yeld to haue peace with the state. At the beginning of this second revolt, for that the gouernour was willing to haue drawne them to peace (if by any reasonable meanes he might haue done the same without any indignity to the state) he sent vnto the commissioners, viz. the L. archbishop of Tuam, the L. Bremingham baron of Athlery, T. Dillon esquire chiefe iustice of the prouince, Gerald Comerford esquire attorney of the same, & others to parley with them, and to examine the cause of those their insolent attempts: vnto whom they answered in effect, as is aforesaid, declining them the sayd articles in waiting. And euen during the time of the commissioners abode in the countrey, they did not forbear to burne and spoyle the same. All which notwithstanding a time of peace was granted vpon conditions in a list to their liking for eight dayes by the sayd commissioners, that in the meane time the lord Deputys pleasure might be signified to the gouernour how he would haue them to be proceeded withall, and direction sent accordingly. But (after this also was granted them) the commissioners were no sooner departed out of those parts, then they began to breake downe diuers castles, and to burne many towines in the plaine and champagne baronies. And the more to make knowne their trayterous and wicked purposes purposes, they proceeded against her maiesty in most obious and vndisfull speeches, saying: What haue we to do with that Calaghe, how butwise are we, being so mighty a nation, to haue bene so long subiect to a woman? the Pope and the king of Spaine shall haue the rule of vs, and none other Sir Richard (notwithstanding all this) did forbear to raise forces, and to serue vpon them generally to his disadvantage) for that he had receiued many and earnest cautions from the lord Deputy to forbear the beginning of any warre against them. But in the meane time the rebely grew to be very strong, and were now increased to the number of seuen or eight hundred men, and had also sent Edmond Keragh Burke, and Iohn Ickleau brother to Walter Kiragh Burke to practise with the Scots, and to draw them into the prouince to their succour and aide, aduertising the Scots by the sayd messengers, that the time was then to subdue Connaght, for the queene had few or no souldiers in the realme, they were all imploied into the Low countries. This fire kindled and flamed in such sort that now it was high time to take in hand the quenching thereof: neuertheless sir Richard of humilitie durst do nothing against them for that he was awaked and willed by the lord Deputy to do nothing in that case without his lordships aduise & direction, which (when he had long looked for) at length he receiued, although somewhat late, the effect whereof was, that the sayd lord Deputy & the counsell concurred in opinion with sir Richard, that the conditions which the Burks required were so vnrasonable, as neither subiect ought to demand them, yet the state without great indignity, could yeld vnto them, and therefore resolved and willed sir Richard to prosecute them with such forces as he had or could leaue, except he could find them to stand on more butfull termes then aforesaid. Whereupon the gouernour leuiued such forces as he thought might suffice to answer the seruice both effectually and speedily, for he found and saw that lingering seruice could not but greatly charge her maiesty, and inuch encourage the enemy: (a lost kind of warre that hath bene too too long vsed in this realme.) First, hauing taken order for the assurance of the countrey behind him, he marched towards the countie of Mayo, the 12 of July 1586. with his owne garrison forces which were 100. footemen and 50. horsemen, and came to Ballinroba the 14. day of the said moneth: here he spent sir Richard's sauen daies, as well in parling with the said Burks, as also in gathering of his whole forces together, hither came to him the earle of Clarickard with 30. horsemen and one hundred kearne, also many gentlemen of the countrey came hither, namely the L. Bremingham lord baron of Athlery, sir Hubbert M. Dany knight, Teig Okelley, and diuers others: hither also came in the supply of forces which he had leuiued within the prouince, viz. a hundred footemen of captaine Morclanes, a hundred footmen vnder captaine Merriman, and a hundred footmen vnder captaine Mollean, besides diuers companies of light kearne to the number of six or seuen hundred: & then hauing imploied the earle of Clarickard, the archbishop of Tuam, the bishop of Balinore, the lord Bremingham, Thomas Dillon iustice of the prouince and others in parling with the Burks one day, and finding that no reasons nor perswasions might win them to peace, he executed certaine of their pledges, which they before had put in for their loyaltie and good behauiour (for it appeared to this politike and wise gentleman sir Richard Bingham,

Bingham, that the sparing of rebels pledges heretofore had done no small hurt in this realme, by encouraging the to ill actions, trusting upon the accustomed mercy shewed to the like pledges and then he marched to the Abbey of Ballinrubber, the two and twenty ieth of July : and from thence he sent his forces of footmen and kearne into the mountaines and woods to seek the rebels in their fastnesse, which aforesaid forces was led by Captaine John Bingham, who had the charge of the garrison band, which behaved himselfe so well therein, that within the space of five or seven weekes they all submitted themselves to the State : himselfe with the earle of Clanrickard, and the hoshmen kept the champaine and plaine country, as well for the defence of her maiesties good subiectes in those parts, as also to keepe the enemies from elapsing away from the forces sent into their said fastnesse. About this time there came anephiall out of Mountster, being sent, if it were as he said, as a messenger from those parts to Francis Berkeley prouost marshall of Connaght. This espiall the more to encourage the traitors, and to animate others to loyne with them, gaue it forth, that the earle of Leicester was slaine in the lowe Countries, and the most of the English forces ouerthrowne there : that there were 2. great armies of Spaniards landed in England, and that there was a great nauy of Spanissh ships in Baltimore, that the king of Scots was in armes against her maiesty, and that her highnesse was sicke, and in great danger of death : vpon which vniuice seditious rumour and report, sir Richard caused the Author and messenger therof being a bad ruminage to be executed by martiall law. And now the footmen within the mountaines, and himselfe in the champaine, so hunted the Burkes and their accomplices from place to place, that within the space of three weekes they began to be tamed and they had taken from them in that time the number of foure or five thousand head of cattell, wherof sir Richard Bingham referred towards the defraying of the extraordinary charges of the iourney the number of one thousand. All the rest were bestowed on the captaines and their companies, and the officers of the field as bootie, according to the custome in this country seruices. Of else giuen to the kearne and light footmen as a consideration of their entertainments, which thereupon were discharged and dismissed from that seruite. Besides the depauiing these rebels of their cattell, as aforesaid, there were slaine of them about the number of five or six score of all sorts. The rest in short time after diuided themselves, flying from caue to caue, and from one groue of wood to an other, where they might best hide themselves, sending in messengers to the gouernour to beseech him of mercie and pardon, and offering to submit themselves with all humblesse. Hereupon it was when they were thus broken, that the gouernour discharged the kearne he had, as aforesaid, together with all Irish hoshmen of severall parts of the prouince, contenting all of them, either with some portion of the praies and booties gotten, or else with his owne money, his owne hoshmen and footmen, and the three bandes of supplies aforesaid he laied from the seruite for a space, as well to refresh them, as also to giue time and leaue to the enemies to come in freely without feare, which otherwise would haue possessed them, had the forces bene still by and dooing in the woods. This being done they submitted themselves one after an other in sort following : Videlicet,

Ewster

Ewster M. Donnell chiefe of the Gallowglasses came in, submitted himselfe, & put in his sonne pledge for himselfe and his sept, the next Edmond Burke M. Richard Euerrine one of the strongest amongst them sonne to the last M. William saue one, came in and submitted himselfe, giuing in his sonne as pledge : after whom William Burke alias the Blind Abbot the chiefe of that surname, Edmond Burke of Castle Barry being dead, which claimed to be M. William, submitted himselfe very humbly, offering one of his sonnnes as pledge. But (for that sir Richard liked not the sonne that he offered, but demanded his eldest sonne whom he knew to be a good pledge) he departed againe, yet within two dayes after, when he saw the gouernour would haue sent in his forces amongst them againe, he came to him, submitted himselfe, and brought his eldest sonne for a pledge : Moyler Oge Burke submitted himselfe. The loies did in like maniere submit themselves, and also Riccard Burke alias the Duels Hookes sonne, all these gaue in good pledges for the obseruation of the peace. These men upon their submission were so pined away for want of foode, and so ghaisted with feare within leuall of eight weekes, by reason they were so roundly followed, that out any interine of rest that they looked rather like to gholles then men. Edmond Burkes sonnnes of castle Barry prestid still in the action. Their father was the man whom they sought to haue made M. William, till he was executed by course of the common law. This man was very old, yet was he put to death for these causes ensuing : he was a notable traitor, and the encourager of his sonnnes to this action, during whose life, both they, and he, had a hope he should be M. William. To the end therefore they should be carried away no longer with the deceitfull toying of this baire hope, and so the sooner by waye to submission, he was indicted, arraigned, condemned and executed, as in like cases is accustomed. The gouernour might haue hanged him by martiall law, but rather made choise to haue it orderly done, as aforesaid, to the end her maiesty might haue his lands by cheque upon his attainer (for he had a good quantitie of land.) After this the said sonnnes of Edmond Burke (seeing their father, and in him all their hope dead) offered to submit themselves, so as they might haue enjoyed their fathers lands. But herein the gouernour referred them to the resolution of the lord Deputie and counsell : to be further heard in that point, which they somewhat liked of, and then they offered the eldest brothers sonne as pledge : but the gouernour refused to take any child or other pledge, sauing one of those byethen, which were in number five or sixen : but that they utterly denied to do : whereby it was well perceived they caried very bad intentions. At this time, whilst these men stood thus vpon the pinch of submitting them, news came to the gouernour, that 2000. Scots came out of priuet of Kiarne toward Sligo with Edmond Kerragh Burke and so, Irelcaue, who were sent by the Burkes their kinsmen, as you haue heard before, to draw in those Scots for y better defence of their quarrell, which Scots were promised by the Burkes that they should inhabit the country, so as they would banish out the Englishmen, and dispo of the said traitors. These news hindered a thorough pacification within the countie of Mayo : neuertheless this prouident & circumspect gouernour sir Richard Bingham, hauing already reduced and brought things there to so good a state, as before is said, dispatched the earle of Clanrickard with thirtie or fortie horsemen, and two bands of footmen, sending also presently after them another band of footmen, all which ioynd with George Bingham, (squire, brother to the said Sir R. who was then shirfe of the countie of Sligo, and leuied there some shot, and horsemen before the coming of the said forces. These companies being thus united, stood upon guard and defence of the borders of the province, which caused the Scots not to make so much and so great hast to come forwards, as otherwise they would haue done. Sir Richard raised in the countie of Mayo a small time after the sending away of his said companies, of purpose to order things there more effectually for the defence of the countie, & for the prosecution of those few bad Burkes which yet continued in action against her Maiestie: which being done in such good sort as the danger and necessity of that time could afford, he then let forwards towards Sligo, with a hundred footmen and five and twentieth horsemen that were remaining with him: but upon his setting forth, he had newes brought him, that the Scots were drawn through O'Rowkes countie into the Hawghery of plaines by Roscomon to pray and spoyle the same, by means whereof he rode a great daies iourney, and came that night nere to Roscomon, and lay that night four miles from it, from whence (understanding contrarie that the Scots were betwene Sligo and Boudois) he rode the next day to the towne of Sligo, being well-nigh three score English miles, but the footmen he left to march away after him with as much convenient speed as they might. His highway was to passe by the abbey of Roile, where he found Sir Thomas Lettrange, and other the ridings out of the countie, whom he had appointed to lie there for the defence of the countie of Roscomon, he left them there for that time, and so came to Sligo the eight and twentieth of August. At his coming thither he was giuen to understand that the Scots lay still encamped at the Earne, some on the one side, and some on the other side, to the number of so many as he was before advertised, with some increase of horsemen and footmen, for Sir Arthure Oneale, and Hugh M. Gwyer had added them with some forces, so as their forces was now about 2000. as it was said, of able men, besides women, boyes, and churles, whereof they had great store. I take it nere as many more, with great store of carriages. The coming of Sir Richard soooke to Sligo, and the newes of the pacification within the countie of Mayo, made them stay long about the Earne and Boudois, either to expect more forces to come and ioyne with them, or some new boyles to be raised in the countie behind the gouernor, by their confederates, which might cause him to deuide his forces, which were then four hundred English and Irish, and about three score horsemen, besides the ridings out of the countie which were about a hundred horsemen and two hundred earne: A force far too weak to haue encountered with the Scots, except they might haue bene gotten in a champaigne ground. To which like place of disadvantage they had no intention to come. For of the 400. the Gouernor had 300. which were Irish, and for the most part men but newly trained. He wrote to the L. Deputie to send him 2. other bands of 50. horsemen, for that there was no trust in the Irish horsemen, which horsemen & footmen (if they had come sooner than they did) had either cleane discouraged or sufficiently withstood the Scots from coming into the province at all. Sir Richard lay at Sligo, & the looke of the Curlewes with his said forces fronting the Scots, and withstanding their entrie into the countrey (expecting still a supply from the Lord Deputy) the space of fourteene daies: the Scots drawing on by little and little through O'Rowkes countrey upon mountaines, woodes and bogs towards the Curlewes, with intention to passe that waies into Mayo, encamped euer in such fastness as he could not by any means come at them, without great disadvantage. At the length although Sir R. kept the passage straightly upon them (for the watching of which he was bound to diuide his companies into sundry places far distant from each other) yet in an exceeding foule, & pestilous & darke night, they deceiued him, for after he had watched & waited for their coming till 10. of the clocke at night, hearing before night & they had remooued their campe, & were rather going backe againe then coming towards him, he left to watch abroad any longer, & bestowed himselfe and his companies in places of succor, which he did, supposing that (by reason of the abundance of raine which fell that evening, their long absence till that time of the night, and the words of O'connor Sigo. which assured him that the said Scots had incamped themselves againe for that night. But shortly after this, when the Scots, by reason of some epials of their owne, or some traitorous intelligence out of the gouernors camp had understanding that Sir Richard and his companie had reposited themselves to rest, stole towards the bridge of Kilbowney, nere to which at a castell not far off Sir Richard for the defence thereof had placed his footmen, and some Irish horsemen, and so being come priuily to the bridge 3. or 4. hundred of them gate ouer the same before the English footmen came at them: who, as soone as they came in, beat the Scots backe and toan the bridge. But here the Irish horsemen did no seruice at all: when the alarm was, Sir Richard himselfe was at a place called Knockmulllyn about a mile from the bridge, being also an other passage, where it was thought the Scots would sooner haue passed ouer than at the bridge. At this place the bridge was the onely straight and passage that Sir R. knew the Scots could find to passe ouer into the countrey by: but they contrarily waded ouer at a foord not far from the bridge, neuer before knowne by any of the countrey that had or would confesse the same to the English: Sir Richard and the horsemen, upon the alarm hastened with great speed to the bridge, and rode ouer the same without danger both of the enemy and his owne companie; for the night was exceedingly darke: and the bullets and arrowes flew to and fro, without regard of any man that might march or ride betwixt them, and hauing passed the bridge (although the ground were ill for horsemen to serue on) yet he charged the Scots, and killed and drowned about 40. or 50. of them. The most part of his horsemen here failed him, some, because they were far off, and the said Irish forces he remooued with his owne ordinary companies into the baronie of Tyeragh, which he chose to do for to saue the pray of that countrey which was great: he left the great mountaines of Slowgany on the left hand, which were before on his right, and marched downe 8. miles into the said baronie consisting of plaine ground with some bog in it of twenty miles in length, lying all along by the sea. In the same he came to a towne or village called Ardglash, where he camped the second night, & hauing intelligence by epials that the enemy lay on y other side of the mountaines, not far from an Abbey called Baunodon

The Scots encampe in O'Rowkes countrey.

Sir Richard reposeth him and his company to rest in a fore pestilous night, the cause why.

The Scots come by Sleish to the bridge of Kilbowney. The English beate backe the Scots from the bridge. Sir Richard lay at an other straite or passage. The Scots find an unknown foord to passe ouer. Dangerous seruice. Sir Richard charged the Scots. Sir Richard doth remoue into Tyeragh to saue the pray of the countrey.

in marcellous fast and strong ground, he tooke with him good guidship, he passed the sayd mountaines with his forces, and encamped that night at Deconon a towne of the bishop of O Harres. At his being here he gaue it forth in policy, that the enemy was marching up through Gallen toward the inner and civile countries, as the lord Bretingham countrey, and the county of Roscommon. And thereupon he halled by great dayes march to a castle called Moygarry, which stood in a freight, and in a fit and apt place to answer the service upon them, if they had passed into the sayd countries. Sir Richard did this, to draw the Scots into an assured beleefe of their owne security, to win such advantage of ground of them, as afterwards was gotten, for upon the newes of Sir Richards returning backe, they grew somewhat carelesse, and perswaded themselves (as also they were informed) that he was returned home to Roscommon, and durst not by reason of his small forces encounter with them, as after shall appere well. Lying at Moygarry, the monday at three of the clocke afternoone, newes was brought him from his brother George Bingham, that an hundred footmen of maiester vicepresident, vnder the conduct of lieutenant Hunt, had passed the Courlews, whereupon the gouernour dispatched messengers to them: whereupon they came onto him the same night. The morrow after being tuesday, he remooued to a castle called Moye, in the barony of Cossellogh 5. miles from Moygarry, and a place as commodious to answer the service as the other was. Here came in to him 100. footmen of Sir William Scarsles, vnder the conduct of lieutenant Jaques, & 50. of Sir George Bow-shers footmen vnder the leading of lieutenant Day, with 25. horsemen of Sir Henry Haringtons, & 15. of maiester Wingfields. These men were brought in by captaine Gren Omoloy, whom he had sent forth for that purpose five of seuen dayes before. Lying here, Sir Richard & his company were in some distresse for want of victuals, but he was supplied by captaine Woodhouse, who brought him some beecus out of the plaine and champion countries. At this place Sir R. B. with his companies lay tuesday and wednesday till noone, for it was long before the beecus was killed and made ready to sustaine them. By that time the espials which were before sent forth to discover the enemy, returned, bringing newes that at their last re-mooue from Clamary, they tooke their way toward Ardnary, a castle neare to Tirawly, and standing on the river of Moine, thinking to passe that way into the barony of Tirawly. This being knowne, Sir Richard dealt with his guide to bring him the nearest way he could thither. At 12. of the clocke at noone vpon wednesday aforesaid, he remooued fro castle Moye, & marched towards the abbey of Baunoe, all vnder the high woods & mountaines, through a place called the Witter, in the barony of Cossellogh, & came to the sayd abbey two houres within night.
This abbey stands two miles from the woods in a plaine and open place: here the guide whose name was Edmond Mac Costellogh found out a priest which had that day broken from the Scots, with whom he had bene prisoner. The priest the sayd Edmond brought to the gouernour, of whom he learned most as-surably, that the Scots were all encamped at Ardnary, and had there proclaimed, that all the country was theirs, that Sir Richard was returned to Roscommon, and that all his forces had forsaken him, and therefore whosoever would willingly come into them, should be friendly receiued to their fauour, and haue no hurt.

Sir

Sir Richard dealt with this priest to be his guide to bring him where the Scots were: but the priest durst not undertake it, except a couple of horsemen of the O Harres which he named might be sent with him: the gouernour willed him to fetch those two gentlemen of the O Harres, which he did, and returned to him againe an houre after midnight. These two gentlemen sent away two espials to discouer the Scots more certainly, and about three of the clocke in the morning when the moone gaue light, Sir R. arose, and adorning himselfe and his company, marched towards Belclare 4. miles from the Abbey in the highway towards the enemy:
here one of the espials came in, bringing newes, that the Scots lay still encamped at Ardnary, which was 12. miles from the aforesaid Abbey of Baunoe, and 8. miles from the Abbey of Belclare. At his marching from hence the night forsooke him and his companie, and they forsooke the highway and marched ouer the mountaines both horsemen and footmen, with all their carriages, carrying themselves in a heate altogether, keeping the bottoms and low places by circumferent waies, with as great silence as was possible. This mountain was in breadth 4. or 5. miles, which Sir R. with his forces pass about nine of the clocke.
And after he had marched a mile into the hard ground, and were not about two miles from the enemy, he made alre to draw all his forces together, & there gaue order & direction for the fight. From whence himselfe with his horsemen rode towards the enemy, and left the footmen to come after, with a speedy march. Sir R. with his horsemen being now come within halfe a mile of the Scots campe, sent out halfe a dozen horsemen as scouts aforesaid to discouer them, & the manner of their campe, which horsemen came euen amongst their cabbins, & gaue them a so-daine & fearefull alarum, & so retired to Sir R. who that time came to the top of the hill neare to them, where he might take view of all the ground betwixt him & the castle where the Scots lay. Now he sent away post after post for the battell, and the loose shot to come in to him, for the enemy was risen and arrayed in battell, and made head towards him in their greatest haurence: Sir Richard entertained them with skirmishing to vaine time, and draw them by higher to the hard ground till the footmen might come in, who appoched with such silence that the Scots neuer suspected any such companies to be at hand: but when the shot began to appoach them, Sir Richard charged them roughly, and thoughtly with his horsemen, beate backe their loose wings to their battell, drave them to a little bogue, and killed many of them. After which he againe retired, and caused some of his shot on horse-backe to alight from their horses, and therewithall en-tained them with a second charge, about which time his loose shot, and the whole battell of footmen came in, and then the footmen charged them in the forward, and himselfe with his horsemen in the flanke, in such sort, that they sone discomfited and ouerthrew their whole force, and drave them to the riuer side, where he and his companie slue and beheaded them all saving 80. or thereabouts, which stripped themselves, and by swimming oer the river of Moine into Tirawly, saved themselves, leaving their weapons & apparell behind them.
There were no more saved of all their forces, and of all loots of them but these, and a 100. and od that went the day before into Tirawly for a pray with some of the Burkes. But such as swam oer the river, as aforesaid were afterwards killed in their returne and flying towards the north in the county of Sligo by George Bingham esquire brother to the gouernour, being then chiefe of the county of Sligo, together with the helpe of the gentlemen of the countrey, diuerse also of them which were absent for this last pray whilest the battell was fought, and certaine of their hostiemen, which were then also foraging abroad for housemate, were afterwards slain in their returne and flying homewards, euen by some such as when they came first towards and were strong. Were their great friends. The number of fighting men slain and dyed, as hath bene well knowen and tried out, were fourtente of sixtene hundred, besides horse and foote boyes, women, churles, and children were as many more, so as in the whole there died of them that day and the day after in their flying homewards, thre thousand persons, and of the English companies were not slain past two persons and those also through their owne folly in being too far towards for the people, but many men and horses were hurt and galled. This day the chieffest leaders of them, Iames Mac Connells son, 12. Daniel Gocum, 12. Alexander Carrogh were slain, together with all the rest of their leaders, and the chieffest burks which dyed them into the prouince. In this seruice was imployed vnder Sir R. Iohn Bingham capitaine of 100. footemen, Nicholas Mordant capitaine of the like number, capitaine Merryman of the like company, William Moitean capitaine of the like number, besides the lieutenants & souldiers rehearsed sent from the lord Deputy, and certaine leaders of hostiemen. And besides capitaine Woodhouse, capitaine Greene, which had no charge, and master Newton, and capitaine Betaghe, which had charge of some hostiemen, the whole company were in name about 600. footemen, and by poll about 500. besides 90. hostiemen, whereof fifty were of the garrison of the prouince, and the other forty were sent by the lord Deputy. This ouerthrow was great, and the paines and policies therein taken and vnder great, but the seruices in this, the watching & trauels at the streights before the Scots came into the countrey was much more greater: but the wonderfull care and industry of Sir Richard in those seruices, which continued out in it 13. or 14. weekes together, not once comming home to his house in that time, and fasting hardly, and lying on the ground and on straw a great part of the sayd time was to be noted, and in him highly commended. For our and about all this, although he rested thre seuerall companies of footemen, each of them consisting of a hundred men with their officers, and certaine hostiemen which continued in pay during all the sayd time, besides five or six hundred kearne, which also had pay our and about her maiesties allowance, yet he so handled the matter, with the goods of rebels, which by strong hand he got from them, and with 3. or 4. hundred pound of his money, he defraied the extraordinary expences of the sayd seruices, not charging her maiesty with any one groate thereof, or any of the subsidies of the countrey either for victuals or any other thing, other then some small matter, which the risings out brought, or which souldiers in comming to him or going from him ate, where they came for a night in a place: yea he charged himselfe in this case, that being granted of powder from her maiesties store in Dublin he was driuen to furnish himselfe thereof, for his ready money in Galway. Lastly, this seruice was such as dyed and cut off all the old beaten Scots which used to haunt Ireland, in somuch that now, (it is sayd) there are not forty such to beare such to beare by head in all that realme of Ireland to the great behoofe and comfort of the same, to the great ease and benefite of her Maiesty, and to the eternall commendations of this worthy gentleman Sir Richard Bingham for cure.

In the month of July diuerse traiterous persons were apprehended, and detected of a most wicked and detestable conspiracie against her Maiesty, and also of minding to haue stirred up a generall rebellion throughout the whole realme: for ioy of whose apprehension, the citizens of London on the 15. of the same month at night, and on the next morning caused the bells in the churches to be rung, and bonfires in their streets to be made, and also banquetted euery man according to his abilitie, some in their houses, some in the streets with singing of psalmes & praising God, for preserving her Maiesty and people of this land, which doings of the citizens were so well accepted of her Maiesty, as by her letters to them directed may appeare, the copie whereof being read openly in a great assembly of the commons in the Guild hall of that cite the 22. of August, before the reading whereof master James Dalton one of 5. Councillers of that cite, in the presence of the Recorder, made this speech hereafter following. But first her Maiesties letters.

Our right trustie and welbeloued, the lord Mayor of our cite of London and his brethren the aldermen of the same.

Right trustie and welbeloued, we greet you well, being giuen to vnderstand how greatly our good and most louing subjects of that cite did reioyce at the apprehension of certaine diuellish and wicked minded subjects of ours, that through the great and singular goodwille of God haue bene detected, to haue most wickedly and vnnaturally conspired, not onely the taking away of our owne life, but also to haue stirred up (as much as in them lay) a generall rebellion throughout our whole realme: we could not but by our owne letters witnesse vnto you the great and singular contentment we receiued vpon the knowledge thereof, assuring you, that we did not so much reioyce at the escape of the intended attempt against our owne person, as to see the great ioy our most louing subjects tooke at the apprehension of the contriuers thereof, which to make their loue more apparent, they haue (as we are to our great comfort informed) omitted no outward shew that by any externall act might witnesse to the world the inward loue and dutifull affection they beare towards vs. And as we haue as great cause with all thankfulness to acknowledge Gods great goodwille towards vs, through the infinite blessings he layeth vpon vs, as many as euer prince had, yea rather, as euer creature had: yet do we not for any worldly blessing receiued from his diuine maiesty so greatly acknowledge the same, as in that it hath pleased him to incline the hearts of our subjects euen from the first beginning of our reigne, to carrie as great loue towards vs as euer subjects caried toward prince, which ought to moue vs (as it doth in very dede) to seeke with all care, and by all good meanes that appertaine to a Christian prince, the conservation of so louing and dutifull affected subjects: assuring you that we desire no longer to liue, then while we may in y<sup>e</sup> whole course of our gouernment carpe our selfe in such sort, as may not onely moue and continue their loue and good will towards vs, but also increase y<sup>e</sup> same: we thinke meete, that these of our letters should be communicated in some generall assembly to our most louing subjects the commons of that city.

Great reioicing for apprehending of traitors.

By the Queene to the Lord Maior of London, her letters.

Given vnder our signet at our castell of Windsor the 18. of August 1586. in the 28. yeare of our raigne.

Maister
James Dalton his oration.

Right worshipfull, my good countrie men and citizens of this most noble citie of London: Since the late bruite and report of a most wicked and traitorous conspiracie, not onely to take away the life of our most gracious Soueraigne, (whome God graunt long to liue and raigne ouer vs) but also to stirre vp a generall rebellion throughout the whole realme: the great and vniuersall ioy of you all of this citie, vpon the apprehension of bluerie of that most wicked conspiracie of late declared and testified by many outward acts and shewes, hath wrought in the Quenees most excellent maiestie such a gracious contentment, that it hath moued her Highnesse by her letters signed with her owne hand, to signify vnto my lord maior of this citie and his brethren, her most noble and princely acceptation thereof, and that in such sort as thereby may appeare, that her Highnesse hath not more, no not so much reioiced at the most happie escape of the wicked mischiefe intended against her owne person, as at the ioy which her louing subiects, and namely you of this citie of London tooke at the apprehension of the practisers of that intended treason. By occasion whereof her highnesse brought to a thankfull remembrance and acknowledging of Gods infinite blessings bestowed on her, comparable with any prince or creature in the world, no worldly thing more or like accounteth of, then of the heartie loue of her louing and faithfull subiects many waies and many times before now, but especially by this our great ioy in this sort at this time, and vpon this occasion shewed.

And that her exceeding great loue and acceptation of our reioicing may the more appeare vnto you, it hath pleased her Highnesse in the same letters to declare, that the desierth not longer to liue among vs, then she shall maintaine, continue, nourish and increase the loue and good will of her subiects towards her. And this her Highnesse hath willed to be made knowne vnto you all, with this, that she will not faile with all care, and by all good means that appertaine to a Christian prince, to seeke the conseruation of you all so louing and dutifully affected subiects. This her maiesties pleasure in part now declared, and more to be made knowne to you by her owne letters, which you shall heare read: my lord maior and his brethren haue required me to declare vnto you all, that they do highly reioice and thanke God for the happy day of the good acceptation of this your great ioy, and my lord himselfe hath willed me to giue you all heartie thanks in his name, for that in the time of his seruice your dutifull behauiours haue gotten to the citie so noble and worthy a testimony of dutie and loyaltie of so noble and worthy a Quene. Now for as much as Gods blessings wonderfully abound, and one ioy comes vpon another, let vs not be vnthankfull to God, but acknowledge his goodnesse, and attribute the same (as indeede we ought) to the sincere religion of Almighty God, most goodly established by the Quenees most excellent Maiestie, which hath taught vs to know God aright, our dutie to our Soueraigne, and to loue our countrie, and hath made vs dutifull and obedient subiects, reioicing at all good things happening to her Maiestie, her realme, or to any in her noble service, the true effects of a true and good religion: whereas the contentment thereof, and immoderate affects of the Romish religion, and superstitions, tions, being bodie of the true knowledge of God, haue declined from God, their allegiance to their prince, their loue to their countrie, and haue become inuents of mischiefs, hunters and spreaders abode of false and seditious rumours, such as ioy at no good thing, but contrariwise reioyce at every euill successe, the badges and marks of their profession. who haue before this, in this realme and in other her highnesse dominions, stirred vp rebellion, foraine inuasion, and many times practised the very death and destruction of the Quene her selfe, the ruine and subuersion of the whole realme, the proper effects of their Romish religion. We haue beheld all these things, and seene in our daies the rutie and mischiefs inuented against others, fall vpon the inuentours themselves: and haue knowne the wicked and violent hands of diuels of them, diuellishly to kill and murder themselves, when most traitorously they would, and most happily they could not slay the Lords annointed. As we haue knowne all these things, so God be thanked, that by a better religion, hauing bene better taught, we haue bene no partakers of their wicked deuils, but haue put to our helping hands as occasion hath serued, and euer ready to ouerthrow the authours and deuilers thereof. And I haue no doubt, but we of this noble citie, who hitherto haue bene alwaies ready dutifully and faithfully to serue her Maiestie vpon all occasions (her Highnesse now so graciously accepting onely of our reioicing at the apprehension of her enemies, euen the least part of the dutie of a good subiect to so good a Quene) will be ready euerie one with all that he can make, and with the utmost adventure of all our liues, specially to be reuenged vpon all such as shall diuellishly and traitorously attempt or put in bye any mischiefe to her noble person, and in the meane time will haue a better eye and care to all suspicious and discontented persons, to their sayings and doings, to their fauours and reports, to the places and corners of their haunt and resort, to their hauboyers, companions, aiders and maintainers.

God uphold and continue his religion among vs, and increase our zeale therein, which hath made vs so louing and loyal, and so beloued and acceptable subiects to so worthy a prince, and roote out that wicked and Romish religion, that hath made so many dysloyall and traitorous subiects: to whom is both odious and irksome the long life and prosperous raigne of our most noble Quene Elizabeth. God conserue all such traitors, and preserve her Highnesse long to liue and raigne ouer vs.

The 7. of September, certaine of these diuellish and wicked subiects were indicted: first, for intending treason against the Quenees owne person: secondly, for stirring ciuill wars within the realme: and thirdly, for practising to bring in foraine power to inuade the realme: seven of them appeared at Walsingham on the 13. of September, who all pleaded guiltie and were condemned, but had indulgent on the next morning. On the 15. of September, other seven were likewise arraigned, who pleading not guiltie, were found guiltie by a Jury, and had judgment.

These traitors 14. in number, were executed in Wincolnes Anne steeles on a stage of scaffold of timber strongly made for that purpose, euen in the place where they had been to marte and to conserue of their traitorous practises, there were they hanged, hewed, and quartered, seven of them on the 20. of September, to wit,

J. Ballard yeuell, Anthony Babington esquire, J. Savage gentleman, Rob. Barnwell gentleman, Chidiock Tichborne esquire, Charles Tunney esquire, Ed. Abington esquire. The other seven were likewise executed on the 21. of September, to wit, Thomas Salisbury esquire, Henry Dun gentleman, Edward Jones esquire, John Trauerse gentleman, John Charnocke gentleman, R. Gage gentleman, Leonard Bellamie gentleman, &c. as I haue more at large set downe in Reign Wolls and Holinsheads chronicle.

The merchants of London being of the corporation for the Turtke trade, intending onely a merchants borage, provided and furnished with all things belonging to the seas, five tall and stout ships appertaining to London, to wit, p<sup>r</sup> Merchant Royall, the Tobie, the Edward Bonauenture, the Willem and John, the Sulan: these five departing from the coast of England in the moneth of Nouember, 1585, kept together as one fleet, till they came as high as the isle of Sicilie within the Neuant, where each ship tooke leaue of the rest, and separated themselves to particular ports, wherunto they were bound, one for Trepolis in Syria, and other for Constantinople, and the rest to other places: but before they departed themselves they agreed, after the lading of their goods at their severall ports, to meete at Zante an island neare to the maine continent of the west part of Africa. These accordingly (their businesse first performed, failed not to keepe promise, and arrived at Zante within the compass of the time afore limited, here they staid in this port till the necessities of each ship were supplied, and nothing wanted to let out for their returne. In this port the newes was first of two severall armies and fleets lying in await to intercept them, the one consisting of thirtie strong gallees, and that fleet hovered about y<sup>e</sup> straits of Gibraltar. The other army had in it twentie gallees, whereof some were of Sicily and some of the island of Malta, under the charge of Iohn Andreas Dorea a capitaine serving y<sup>e</sup> king of Spaine. The Merchant Royall was appointed admirall of the English fleet, & the Tobie vice-admirall, by whose orders the rest promised to be directed, and each ship vowed not to breake from the other. Thus in good order they left Zante, & committed themselves to the seas, and proceeded in their course without sight of any enemy, till they came neare to Pantalarea an island betwene Sicilie and y<sup>e</sup> coast of Affrike, into the sight wherof they came the 13. of July, and the same day they detected thirtie gallees, 11. gallees, and two frigates lying in wait for them. As soone as the English ships had espied them, they made themselves ready to fight, the gallees more, and more approached them, and in their banners the armes of Sicilia & Malta: they sent their frigates to our admirall, demanding of him whence they were: wherupon answered, of England: they asked why they delayed to send or come to Don Pedro de Luna their Generall, to acknowledge their dutie to him in the name of the Spanissh king lord of those seas: our men replyed, y<sup>e</sup> they ought no such dutie to him, nor would acknowledge any, &c. Wherupon in the end the fight began betwene them, and continued very hot for the space of sixe hours, what slaughter was made among the Spaniards the English men were uncertaine: but they supposed the same to be so great, y<sup>e</sup> they waited men to continue y<sup>e</sup> charging of their peeces: wherupon with shame they withdrew themselves, and the Englishmen contented in respect of their deepe lading, rather to continue their borage

borage then to follow the chase, cradled from further blowes, with the losse onely of two men slaine and one other hurt in the arme, whom maister Edward Wilkenon captaine of the admirall, with his good word did so comfort, that he nothing esteemed the smart of his wound in respect of the honore of such a victorie, and themselfe repulse of the enemy. The English ships proceeded in their navigation as high as Algier, a port towne upon the coast of Barbarie, where they refreshed themselves, and tooke such supply of fresh water and victuals as they needed, and put to the sea looking to meete with the second arme of the Spanissh king, which waited for them about the mouth of the streight of Gibraltar, which they were of necessity to passe: but coming neare to the said streight, it pleased God to raise a very darke fog, so that one ship could not discern another, by means wherof, together with the faire calmer time that then blew, they passed with great speede through the streight: but yet the Spanissh gallees had a sight of them when they were come within three English miles of the towne, & made after them in all hast possible, but in vaine: they shot off their ordinance in the sea, as if they had bene in the midst of them. But thus it pleased God to deride and delude all the forces that the king of Spaine had provided to distress the English, who notwithstanding passed through both his armies: in the one little hurt, and in the other nothing touched, and arrived at Cith the 18. of September, in the year of our lord, 1586.

Now to returne to the service in the Low countries done by his Excellencie & other under his charge, after the yielding of the strong fort of Pemegan, which was on the 20. of May, as ye haue heard before: it followeth, that on the 21. of May, his Excellency returned to Arnem, and there sojournd. On the 22. of May, there passed towards Barrikes hoofe 11. or 12. hundred men most bravely furnished of our English nation. The 25. of May, was brought before Barrikes hoofe thence two canons, which shot at the sconce that day, & on the next morning in the morning was the same sconce yielded to his Excellencie, the soldiers putting themselves to his mercie, who pardoned them, & let them passe with life onely. In this sconce were found alme about 50. persons, the rest were slaine in the siege. At the yielding of this sconce Count Hollocke found one of his colins, which when he beheld, he said, Ha villain, art thou become a traitor to thy country & his excellencie? I answer, y<sup>e</sup> thou art none of my blood, & with his capier thrust him in & slue him.

The 24. day of May, the enemy played before Graue with their ordinance, and presently assailed it, but they of the towne being led by the Count Embrigh did repulse them so sufficiently, that the enemy lost neare a thousand men.

On Whitsunday, Peregrine Barrie, lord Willoughby of Erdbie lying at Berganapome, understanding of a great conuoy that was coming to Antwerp, set upon it, and took it, there were of wagons 480. laden with victuals, oyle, salt, and wine taken, which had to draw those wagons a thousand mares and horses, there were 200. men slaine by our horsemen and footemen and 400. taken prisoners that were sent with the conuoy to haue the defence thereof. The Lord Willoughby took a threescore wagons into his towne of Berganapome, and burned the rest, and for the salt, oyle, and wine, he brake up the heads of the vessels, and let them be spoiled.

throwne.

The 30. of May, Sir John Norrie was sent to take order for the overthrowing of Bariks-hoofs sconce, which was done, for that it was thought not meete to be kept with men, his Excellency hauing the sconce at Spanegam that kept the riuer of Wall, and the sconce made by Skinke at Chelhoule kept both the riuer of Wall and the Reine, for that this sconce standeth at the entrance of these two great riuers: And for that his Excellency had Aniam sconce at the ioyning together of Hill Keyne and Dorelborough riuers. In this meane time, to wit, on the 26 of May, the enemy spared no kind of shot to annoy the towne of Graue, but thundered with canons at it as it had bene mulket of caluier. He had at it .8. canons, 20. smaller peeces, as culuerings, and deny canons, &c. The Graue of Embryckelseeing the assault to be so hot, and fearing the event (although he had written to his Excellency that he should not care for Graue, but go about his other business) on the 27. of May entred parley with the enemy, and presently let in his soldiers, which seeing certain English men and others more faithfull then the rest, straight tooke a place of strength, and kept without victuals three dayes in despite of the enemies, and after seeing no way to be releued, they departed by composition. And thus was the strong towne of Graue lost by the countie Embrough, who after came to Huldon, sent for foure of the burgesse of the towne, for what purpose was not knowne, but thought to perswade them to betray the towne, but 3. of them refused, the fourth not found, but thought to be with y<sup>e</sup> prince of Parma. As for the countie Embrough as he was walking with 3. or 4. other capitaines of Graue, he was with 4. other capitaines surprised by some of our sould, & brought to his Excellency on the 2. of June to Spunkhurst, & were committed to prison.

His Excellency remou-eth from Aremew to Nemegan.

The last of May, his Excellency with his whole companies of souldiers and gentlemen passed from Aremew to the campe before Spanegam, where his pavilion was pitched, and presently he sent a 2000. men toward Tille, to keepe the wa-ter from the enemies passage.

Tille and the Amon ther-of, his strange dealings with the ene-myes.

The fourth of June, his Excellency first hauing sent Skinke and captain Williams, with diuers other colonets of hoyle and gentlemen, towards Wendolo (for that the prince of Parma had begun to besiege it) came from the legat at Spanegam to Tille where he rested that night. The gouernour of Tille, called the Amon being a man of great courage, and a protestant, vsed the prince of Parma in this sort, the prince lending a trumpeter to parley with him, he straight wayes without any talke hangd him vp. The prince wondering he heard not of his trumpeter, sent a drumme to know what was become of him, vnto whom the Amon answered, your trumpeter is hangd, and thou shalt be drowned, so it was done without any more words. This towne is situate in the Betto, whose ground is the most fertile of any place of fertility in Guelderland. The towne is strong: the one side the Amon may at his pleasure drowne, the other is so strong with rampiers, walls, and fortres, that the Amon protesteth that he regardeth no prince or princes power in the world. He hath halfe a score ships of war at his appointment, whereby he commandeth all the waters about him, he hath alwayes liued a singular loue to our nation, especially to his Excellency, in such way that he desired to keepe the towne to his life, so long as he liued.

The 5th of June, his Excellency passed from Tille to Somell, there was the castle castle of the Warneborough, and for that he took part with the prince of Parma, his house was burnt and spoiled. The beauty of the towne of Somell is in two streets, crossing one the other, very large and faire, at the crossing of which streete, there is a very faire market place, the towne is strong though little, and sufficiently appointed with ordnance and munition. It standeth in an Island very fertile and sweete, hauing such store of orchards, gardens, and other pleasures, as it passeth all others: on the top of the steeple of the church in this towne, the country lieth so plaine about it, that one may see all these townes following, Spanegam, Wagening, Aniam, Keyne, Ulrick, Colindborough, Ulrick, Alana, Curcom, Huldon, Fatinghamballe, Graue, Tille, Paole castle, and Baryn castle.

The 9. of June, his Excellency came from Somell to Garcome to towne the riuer Wallle, leauing at Somell a garrison of three hundred Dutchmen, with those of the towne, who at the first could hardly brooke the garrison, till they were perswaded by countie Hollocke passing toward the towne. There was fire of seuen engines of his Excellencies souldiers on the banke of the riuer, which did discharge braue bolles of shot, then was there on each side the riuer a mightie sconce full of souldiers, which gaue their bolles of shot, then the ordnance of the towne went off: and entering the towne, he was entertained by the Burgesse, and passing through the towne, on both sides were placed souldiers in great number. On the next morrow his Excellency went into the castle of the towne, which is marvellous strong. This towne is very rich, for there are many rich merchants, which passe to all parts of the world vsuall. The riuer Wallle runneth through the midst of this towne, and the riuers of Reine and Haze on each side. The towne is very strong, for that round about the country may be drowned. His Excellency with his whole traine were here marvellously welcommed, and well used, for victuall, lodging, &c. There is by this towne, another towne of great force, called Worcome, by the castle of Zallen, this Worcome is in greatnesse but a village, but in situation and strength, a thing of great importance: it standeth in the same Island that Zallen standeth in. It is Graue Maurice his towne, and kept his garrison of souldiers.

The 10. of June, a post came to his Excellency, from colonell Skinke and captain Williams, with letters: the effect wherof were, that the sayd Sir Martin Skinke, and captain Williams, slaying not farre from Ulenlo (which the duke as then besieged) and longing to shew the zeale they had to the service of her maiesty of England, set out with their hostemen in the night, all the Dutch men for the most part forsaking them, so that with him was not about 160. hostes, with these he let forward, killed the kill watch, & passing farther killed also two courtiers of gard fully appointed, and entering by force the quarter that the prince of Parma was in, they killed a number of noblemen and gentlemen: but in the returne the enemy well appointed set on our men, and scattered them, to some losse, but the greater sort escaped: the skirmish being ended, and our men retiring. Captaine Williams was one of the hindmost of them all, and he cried (being yet in the enemies campe) to wher is Williams, wher is Williams, and another answered, he-fore, before, and thus he escaped.

The 13. of June, his Excellency went to Dort with a small traine, where being come about five of the clocke in the afternoon, the Burgers made him such great chere, as was thought to haue bene impossible for so short a time of prouision. The 14. he tooke ship towards Ulrike from Dort, being waisted with an hope full of souldiers of the towne.

The 22. of June, the enemy attained Venlo, a towne of great importance and strength: there was in this towne, not only the wife of Skinke, and his children, but also the treasure, horse, and (for the most part) the furniture that Skinke had, this towne had in it of souldiers, to the number of five or six hundred, all of Skinks men well appointed and braue souldiers.

The 23. of June, his Excellency passed to Colindborough about nine english miles from Ulrike, only to visite the Graue of Colingborough, where hee dined, viewed the towne, and returned to Ulrike, taking with him the laide Earle of Colingborough.

The 29. of June his Excellency passed from Ulrike to Dort. The 30. of June, he removed from Dort, to Williams state of Wagon hill. The same day Count Hollocke ouerthrow a cornet of horse belonging to Breda, with the helpe of Master Robert Sidneyes cornet, sir Philip Sidneyes cornet and other. The said Count Hollocke promised to haue a conuoy passe from out of Spabant, to Berganaplonie, which y enemy being warned of by spies, that this conuoy was guarded but with some sixteen or twenty horse, the gouernour of Breda sent out his cornet of strength of horse to this exploit: but some few of them, being either afraid to meddle with our men, or doubting the true occasion that happened, staid behind the rest. Captaine Welch an english man, which a great time had serued y enemy, had y leading of y horse at Breda, but passing to this exploit, count Hollocke with maister Robert Sidneye beset them round, which the enemy no sooner perceived, but yielded, so there was taken captaine Welch and a thirty horse, & as many men. The 31. of June his excellency early in the morning passed from Williams state to Berganaplonie, & about three of the clocke in the afternoon he arrived there, and presently passed to the strong castle of old Wlawa: this towne is in the entrance of Spabant, 20. english miles from Antwerpe, upon the same riuer that Antwerpe standeth. It is a towne now almost ruined, though before in the prosperity of it it was not much inferior to Antwerpe, there are few people but souldiers, the Burgers forsaking their goodly builded houses, are gone to other places. This towne is subiect in two places to hills of firme ground, which are the places that make this towne far stronger then otherwise it would be, yet wonderfully rased with bulwarks, wals, and flanders in all places. The X. Willoughby hath wonderfully enlarged the strength of this towne: further he hath made two very strong bulwarks in two places of the towne, at the haue of the towne, and from the towne a slight shot or more, are 2 mighty sconces, which stand by the riuer side, which indeed are of more strength then the towne, & they are to command the towne: a 2. english miles from the towne standeth a ruined towne in an Island, & by this riuer whole situation is such, as for strength it might be made a braue place, for fire & otherwise, this towne is called Roma: toward against the which standeth a strong sconce, and to along the riuer to the towne standeth diuerse the like, to command the riuer and passage to the towne: the castle before named, that his Excellency went to view at his arrivall at this towne, is also such as no reasonable force can win, alwayes once a yeare victualled and manned afresh, this castle regardeth not the canon shot, it is so rampered. The 1. of July, his Excellency passed from Berganaplonie to Suricksea, a towne in Zeland, and in an Island so called. In this Island also is another towne called Breders haue, a very strong towne, this Island is most fertile. The 2. of July his Excellency passed to Dort. And the same day passed from Berganaplonie 3000. men that were there newly arrived to Stenberg, a towne greatly noxious to the garrison of Berganaplonie, for when they passed into Spabant upon any exploits, they were letted by the souldiers of this towne: this iourney was so closely kept, that our men shot at the wals of Stenberg ere any of that towne knew for what cause so great a number of men were gathered.

The 3. of July, there entered into Flaunders, the Graue Maurice, the prince of Oranges sonne, and sir Philip Sidney, lord gouernour of Flushing, with other, to the number of foure thousand footemen, and three thousand horsemen. The fourth of July, Graue Maurice took on him to cut the bankes of the sea, to drowne the land of Wasse, hauing with him two thousand men, the rest of the army passed with sir Philip Sidney into Flaunders, and surprised the towne of Arell, there were slain of souldiers of that towne three hundred, besides the Bourgers that made resistance, which were likewise slain. This done, they came to Drope, or Drope, a towne of great importance, this they entered and took in it five hundred boozes, which were kept to do seruite, and to be ransomed. Graue Maurice with his two thousand men so plied the bankes, that in short time he had made it sufficient for the water, not onely to enter, but to drowne all the country, but the wind stood so contrary, that no water to the purpose entered at that time, onely the bankes lay open. In the meane time our men took five sconces, and put all to the sword that they found in them, and this was their entrance into Flaunders. The towne of Arell is not farre from Antwerpe, and about the same distance from Caunt, and not five english miles from either, the land of Wasse wherein this towne standeth, is the onely paradise of those lands, and most fertile place of all other. The eight of July, Graue Maurice returned to Middleborough, leauing all occasions to sir Philip Sidney gouernour of Flushing. The tenth of July, rodonell Yorke brought to his Excellency to Dunbage, five ensignes of the menims, all which were taken from the enemy in the towne of Arell, and the sconces.

In this meane time, to wit, on the ninth of July was Paulus Buce a great state and a politike man taken at Ulrike and put in prison, and very shortly after was taken another named Peter Fullistine, and likewise committed to prison. The 14. of July, his Excellency commanded the gates of Ulrike to be enclosed, and all the bridges to be drawne, all the men both English and Dutch souldiers to be in armes, and further proclaimed that all men that loued the queene of England, should presently be armed to the uttermost, which being done, the English souldiers were placed on the wals, with commandement, that no Burger whatsoeuer should come theron, but presently they should take from them their upper gar-garments, which if they refused, they should be straight slain. Also a straight search was made in the Towne for suspicious persons, and there were taken three which were committed to prison. The cause of this stir was this, it was reported, that there were come into the towne 500. of the enemies, in bootes appeared to betray the towne, but it was not so.

About this time, Sir Philip Sidneyes cornet at Houlbon, and certaine Dutch cornets, to the number of a hundred horse or more, with a two companies of footemen, entered into Brabant, taking booties, and spyinging the country, which being knowne to the enemies, they sought to intrap our men, and with a three hundred horse, and certaine companies of footemen, they set upon our horse, put them to retreat, and pursued them far: but our men, by swimming, and goodnesse of their horses, escaped for the most part, only a cornet of Dutch & one other officer of them were slain, our footemen brought their bootie into such straights and fears, that the enemies could not indamage them, so that they brought their booties safe to Houlbon.

The 15. of July, Sir Philip Sidney, Lord gouernor of Flushing, the Lord Willoughby, with those powers they had received from the garrison of Arel, considering the coming in of the water into the land of Waale, which might sufficiently defend that countrie, remooued the campe. The lord Willoughby to Bergenaploone, where he was gouernor, Sir Philip Sidney passed the sea with a three thousand men: whose enterprise shall be shewed hereafter. This Sir Philip Sidney, at or before the taking of Arel, within an English mule of the Towne, called to many of his souldiers together as could heare him, and there made a long Oration, wherein he declared what cause they had in hand, as Gods cause, and for whom they fought, for her Maiestie; whom they knew so well to be so good unto them, that he needed not to shew, against whom they fought, men of false religion, enemies to God and his Church: against Antichrist, and against a people whose unkindnesse both in nature and in life did so excell, that God would not leave them unpunished: further, he perswaded them that they were Englishmen, whose valour the world feared and commended, and that now they should not, either feare death or perill whatsoever, both for that their seruice, they ought to their Prince, and further, for the honor of their Countrey, and redde to themselves. Again, the people whom they fought for were their neighbors, allies friends, and well-willers to Englishmen. And further, that no man should do any seruice worthy the nothing, but he himselfe would speake to the bittermost to perswade him to his wished purpose. Which oration of his did so like the minds of the people, that they desired rather to dye in that seruice, then to live in the contrary.

The 14. of July, Sir William Pellam, lord marshall of the field, came to Dunhage. The 16. of July, his Excellency remooued from Dunhage to Brill, in which passage he took to crosse the water at the booke of Sluce to called, being passed the water, he entered the land betwene two sconces, a quarter of a mile or more from the towne, where he was entertained with all the sconces shot both of great ordinance and smaller shot, passing by land he came to the towne, where the gouernour Sir Thomas Ciffell entertained him both with cheere and otherwise, most honorably.

honorably. This towne is on the mouth of Haze, where the water is in breadth foure miles English. The Island of Brill is great, more than twentie miles out, in it are Dorps not so well built as rich. On the 19. his Excellency returned from the Brill to Dunhage.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 16. of July, the enemy entered Peuce, after a long assault, in which assault, he lost three thousand men. This Towne of Peuce was fourthly burned downe to the ground by the lackies and boyes belonging to our souldiers, there remained whole but eight houses.

The 22. of July, his Excellency made a banquet to diuers great personages of those Countreies, as the lady Bredo, lady of Wiana, the Pallgrauces wife, the countie Egimouns daughters, the prince of Oenges daughter, with a number more. In which banquet wanted not what might be had to augment their cheere, either in musike, dauncing, fire works or otherlike.

The 22. of July, the garrison of Surtin issued out, to the number of foure two hundred, and came to Arnam, tooke some cattell and other things, and returned, whereupon master Anthony Sherley came to captain Willon gouernor of Arnam, and required that he and his company might issue out and reuenge this iniurie, which at length was granted: then master Sherley chose out to the number of fourescore footemen, and 20. horsemen and sent them out, which the enemy seeing, to intice our men forward, let the bootie not far from Surtin, on a hill, and laide a fourescore of their men in an ambush, betwene Arnam and the bootie, the twenty horsemen came to them, which they let passe in a sleight, but no sooner past but they discharged on them and seeing no more thought to slay or take them all, but no sooner had they charged the horse, but master Sherley charging them behinde, the horsemen returned, and so what on the one side, and on the other, they slue of them the number of 80. & tooke 13. prisoners, which with the bootie, they brought againe to Arnam having lost but one man, and two men hurt.

About this time, master Butlers cornet, lying at Deuentrie, issued out and tooke from Suthfield or Surtin, of cattell to the number of foure hundred Cows, and sixtene Hares of great price, in this manner. Those of Suthfield had by the river side a great marish, all so ditched in, that no horse could passe over by any possible means: but they of Deuentrie and Campyn consulting together, did one night at a lowe water passe into the marish ouer by the doe of the Towne, and brought without losse of any man of our part, foure hundred and oppe Beastes, and sixtene Hares, most of them sold for foure pound a Hare, amongst the souldiers. This exploit with others did greatly pinch those of Suthfield, for that the milke of those beastes were to them a great reliefe.

The 28. of July, master Robert Sidneis cornet, lying at Bertrienberge passed with some of countie Hollockes horse, to the number of an hundred, and passed on purpose onely towards Breda, but being within sight thereof, they spied a number of cattell issuing forth of the Towne (for feare of our garrisons in those parts) by towards high Brabant, having to conuey them some 200. shot, and a 10. or 12. lances, our men seeing to fit a bootie overlooked of their part, charged and put to flight the shot and horse, cut betwene the Towne and the cattell, and and tooke from them five hundred oren, seauen hundred sheepe, & threescor mares, and some boares, all which they caried to Gertenberge, to the great reliefe of the souldiers there.

Mountford. The second of August his Excellencie passed from the Hage to Utrike, he dined at Tergowde, from thence he came by Den water, & from thence to Mountford, a strong towne, at night he came to Utrike, where by the Lord North he was received with great shew of shott.

Mewes yeelded to the enemie. In this meane time, to wit, on the 29 of July, the enemy lying part before Berke, the residue came before Skinke, which towne was no sooner summoned, then it yeelded to the enemie, and on the next day they tooke a little towne called Alpyne both these townes belonged to the Graue Maurice.

Berke. The second of August, the enemy having passed by Berke as before, diuerts of his company were cut off as straglers, and further a great sort of horse, the men that were taken were hanged: amongst whom a yong lad which was taken, confessed to Skinke that as the prince passed by Berke, on a hill made this speech, My souldiers (quoth he) you may see here this towne, neither great nor strong, but so manned, that assure your selues you shall receiue blowes enough, and no wealth, wherfore we may now passe with no dishonor, but if we stay here long, it will be dishonor to passe away, therefore say what you minde to do, and presently they were all contented to depart, and so they passed from the towne. The third of August, the prince seeing he could not passe any thing by water, but Berke letted it, besides he had a convey of vendon, wine, &c. which was by them of Berke taken away with sicke men that had the conveying thereof, the prince noting that the principall men that annoyed him, were there where the prince saw the towne wreake, he returned to it againe: for Skinke had no sooner taken the sicke men, and others, but asking them whole men they were, and they answering the prince, they were straight waies hanged, which doings of Skinke caused the prince to returne his army to Berke, on the said third of August, on which day he passed with three cohorts of horse from Alpyne where his munition lay, to Nyon, a towne of the Duke of Cleus, a small league from Berke, and came with certaine to besiege the towne of Berke, which Skinke perceiving, straight issued out of the towne with certaine horse and foote, and charged the prince which had three cohorts of horse, and five hundred footemen, yet Skinke put him to the retraite to Alpyne to his quarter there.

The fourth day he came with his maine battell, and passed on the south side of the towne, though often times he were charged, and lost many of his men, yet he abode there.

The Lord Marshall and other entered Brabant. On the third of August, the Lord Marshall, the General of the Horse, &c. with some thousand horse and footemen passed in the night farre into Brabant, and came early in the morning to the great Dorpe Dell Stilluoyngbank, let it on fire, and burned it to the ground: There was with the Lord Marshall two hundred kernes, who shewed their courages, for none were so ready to burne, nor so ready to kill all that came in their danger, so that few escaped them. Continuing further they came to a Dorpe more like a good towne, not not farre from Sattlingambulle, wherein is a castle, and a strong sconce, but the wild Irish kernes, neither fearing shot nor thecat, came by the sides of the sconce, took it presently, and put to the sword all in it, and took the provision to themselves. The hole of the towne had crossed the way with trees in such sort, as the horsemen could not passe to the towne but with great labour, but the Irish entered the towne onely, and burned it to the ground, leaving none that came to their hands, so our men returned to Gertenberge, not looking for of their Irish men.

he stayed till the seventh, being honorably entertained: this towne is very strong, situate so, that all the country round about may speedily be destroyed. About this towne is the greatest number of fruites that men there present had euer seen, and by them thought sufficient to serve many countries, with trees of all sorts, but pears specially. The ground about Tergowde of a 14. foye broad, is nought else but the most brave trees that can be seen. This towne hath the most faire market place that hath bene scene of many in the world wherof standeth a faire State house, in the which his Excellency did eate and was lodged. The 7. of August, his Excellency passed from Tergowde to Utrike, by the which he must passe through Odonwaters, by the Burgers of which towne, he was honorably received, all the towne throughout our head was hanged with garlands of flowers for his welcome. The 12. he passed from Utrike to Keyne, and there stayed all night.

The next day he passed to Arnam. About this time a ship was sent from the bishop of Cullen to the prince, laden with cannon shot, and powder, the master of which ship, either mistaking the bishop, the prince, or their religion, so soon as he came where he might well recover Berke, where Skinke and his force lay, he by one means or other, so opened the ship that the water entered, so that he and the rest were forced by that means to retire to Berke. In this ship was a commissary of good account with the Prince, whom the master of this ship did convey to Skinke, who was no sooner come, but Skinke entered judgement with him, and he desiring to be used like a gentleman, Skinke answered he should be hanged with his face toward the enemies campe, for sayth he, I know you desire to see your friends, and so it was done. This losse of provision made the prince want of his wall for battery of the towne, onely planting five canons in two places. Further, at the same time, there came newes to his Excellency, that the horse and footmen of Gelder had often put the enemy to losse, and had taken 150. horses from them, besides a number of them slaine.

The 17. of August, Sir John Norris passed over Wall by Arnam sconce (a bridge of boates being there made) with some 3000. english footmen, and 600. 7. hundred horse. And about the same time, the prince remooved some part from Berke to Alpyne, a Dutch mile from Berke. The 21. of August, the lord Marshall passed over the riuer by Arnam sconce, with 2000. footmen, and 600. horse toward the legat. The 23. of August, his Excellency passed over the water by Arnam sconce with 2000. or more footmen, and 100. or more lances. The Irish kernes were no sooner come to the campe, but that they passed neare the chiefe, and and brought from them a 120. colvres. The 24. of August, the leiger rose, and passed to Eltham: there is neather Eltham, and upper Eltham, both have bene houses of religious women, most sumptuously built: the neather standeth neare the Reyne: the upper standeth an English mile from the Reyne upon an high hill, and in such a place, as few the like for prospect: where a man standing may behold 100. parish churches. This cloister was of such credit and estimation, that none came there by the order of the place, but she was a barons daughter at the least. The lady Anne of Cleve was brought by in this cloister. The 27. of August, his Excellency passed from Arnam to the campe at Eltham. The 28. he caused all the English to be marshalled into squares, and two preachers made to them 2. sermons in the field by the hill side of Eltham cloister. The 30. of August his Excellency passed from Eltham to Dowdrough with all his army, except only those that the night before were sent to lye about the towne. On the north side was an Island, to the which was sent the Scots regiment, which by night with their pioneers did intrench within 80. yards of the north part: On the west side came the regiment of Sir T. Sherley. On the east side was the regiment of Sir William Scandley & Sir L. marshall: on the south side was his Excellency with the regiment of the L. Audley. All the residue, as Sir John Norris, Sir Digby, and diuers other regiments as well English as Dutch, were placed betwene these quarters, every one in part intending to intrench neare the ports, so that the same night, though with some alarmes from the towne, were the whole ports of the towne intrenched, so that none could issue without danger. The same night also that his Excellency came before Dowdrough, himselfe in person with the lord marshall in the night, with their gards, went from their tents to view the south trench, being neare the towne, there was a bafe shot at them, which though all were together, yet rebounding amongst them all, hit Sir lord marshall on the belly, pierced his buffe jerkin, his dublet, and hurt him somewhat: this shot missing his Excellency, made the returne. The last of August, there was nothing but intrenching, and some volleys of each side, for that the ordinance was not come. The first of September came our ordinance, which being landed, & drawn neare the places of battery, some of the demy canons discharged, to displace the ordinance of the towne, which was in part done, but againe in other places mounted. This day his Excellency remooved from the east of south side to the west side into an Island, the river Illall running by it. The 2. of September halfe an houre before sun-rising, began the battery of Dowdrough, & was so thoroughly plied, & with 9. battering peeces a marvellous breach was made. In time of which battery capitaine Williams was shot through the arme, yet in this siege not 20. men lost, and a 20. hurt. About one of the clocke they agreed to parley, all our battels being ranged in squares before the towne to assault. The souldiers had made the breach more strong then before with scather-bosses, dung, timber, &c. & made in the inside a great fight, but fearing an assault, which they knew would be furious, they (as was said) agreed to parley: the conditions were, that the souldiers should passe away with their lures onely, the Burghers should have all they had at his Excellencys mercy: these things being agreed, about foure of five of the clocke in the after noone, all the souldiers with their wives passed over the breach away. The women that passed with the souldiers, it was a grievous was thing to see how they were ransacked, till the earle of Essex and diuers other gentlemen came downe the breach, & by limiting & beating the souldiers, made them leave off rising them: his Excellencys expresse commandment was, that none should take ought from the towne, but that was not observed, for much of the goods was spoiled. Capitaine Borowes was appointed to keepe the towne, whose ensignes with capitaine Prides colors was set in the breach. The capitaines & souldiers that were sent to save the towne from spoile, did to the contrary, for they made havoc and most horrible spoile, where with his Excellency was greatly displeased. The first of September his Excellency went into the towne, and there dined, and after viewed the towne. The same day maister Anthony Sherley and other capitaines came to the campe, and declared that the enemye came to Well, and with a peece of ordinance brake backe our ships wherewith our men were, and killed some of them, & further beate them betwene the river. The towne of Dowdrough standeth by the river Well, an arme or issuing of the Reine by Arnam lconce, & runneth along through the country of Quar Well, it runneth also by Southfield, and is in the prouince of Southfield and five English miles from Southfield, and five miles or more from Arnam. It standeth in a most fertile soile, pleasant & fruitfull ground. It is of reasonable strength, having high walls, not rampired but in certaine places, having a water running round about it, it is about the bignesse of Arnam, nigh an English mile & a halfe compass. The order of the assault of this towne (as it was determined) Sir John Norris had the honor given him to enter the great breach, Sir William Stanley with his regiment had the sounding of Sir lo. Norris, county Hollocke had given him the small breach with his regiment. These ranged themselves in the most bravest manner, but his Excellency offered partly as ye haue heard. The 9. of September word came, that Sir Martine Skinke was gotten freed out of Berke, & the 11. the same Skinke, capitaine Thomas with some other braue souldiers lances came to the camp before Dowdrough. The 12. of September his Excellency with all his forces came from Dowdrough, & that same night incamped himselfe before Southfield, but he for want of a bidge could not go over the water, this night he intrenched himselfe very neare in diuers places, and on the morrow he made a bidge, which passed over to the other side. The 15. of September his Excellency, leaving Sir Martine Skinke in his absence passed to Deuentry, but shortly returned, for that he was informed that the prince with his whole force was marching towards Southfield. This towne of Southfield is very strong, being in diuers places parted, in all which places is such strength, as all must be woon ere the towne be woon. It standeth a good distance from the river Well, but hath a lconce on Well of incredible strength, for Hollocke with all his force, and our English men a two peeces since lay at it three quarters of a peece, but could not win it: but now his Excellency began to besiege it, and for that his forces were not sufficient to incampe it round about, he framed himselfe to do his best to win the lconce, for by that meanes he might the more easily win the towne. The first night our men intrenched at a Church beside the Towne, but for that they thought after it was not so commodious, they passed not for it, and therefore went on the other side of the water to inlconce the lconce, for that out of it there there issued both horse and footmen, which did greatly annoy our camp, for none could passe or repasse from Decentrie, or otherwise stir from the strength of the camp, but they were taken or in danger, if not rescued. The 18. of September, Skinke took on him to make a sconce neare the enemies sconce, which the same night he began, though the towne shot loze at him, & also the sconce, yet he followed his way, & so fortified it, that it was sufficient for great multitude to hold men to keepe it, and sufficient for strength to hold out what the enemies shot could do against it, & this sconce Skinke kept on y<sup>e</sup> side the water, that passage could not so well come to the sconce, but he did strike their boats. His Excellencie the next night caused another sconce to be made iust by the enemies sconce, so that y<sup>e</sup> enemy was by these two sconces to kepe in, that they were kept from issuing out for their pleasure. The 20. of September, the enemy lying not far off at Langham a towne of ours, distant from Southfield an 8. or 9. miles English, sent in the night into Southfield certaine companies of horse, which were suffered to enter by our men, and further to passe away againe to the enemies campe, they brought nothing into the towne to relieue it: moreover all the whole English camp lay on the other side of the towne ouer the water, so that readily a sufficient power could not be made.

The 22. of September, was the most brave fight performed of our side that could be. The enemy this night put into Southfield some hundred wagons with viuals, which being perceived, straightwaies sir William Stanley went with his owne compaign, which were some 200. to stand as a bulwark, sir John Norris overtook him being sent to the service, & said to sir W. Stanley: There hath bene said he, some words of displeasure betwixen you and me, but let all passe, for this day we both are employed to serue her Maiestie, let vs be friends, and let vs die together in her Maiesties cause. Anoth<sup>r</sup> sir William Stanley, if you see me not this day by Gods grace serue my prince with a valiant and faithfull courage, account me for ever a coward, and if needs be I will die by you in friendship. Thus the long quarrell begun in Ireland was here ended, with such friendship as made all men reioyce: both of them serued so forwardly this day, that the one could not tell how much to commend the other, onely the one serued with footmen, the other with horse: sir W. Stanley marched with his footmen, but the enemy was come to the Church where our men had at the first placed themselves, there was of the enemies 2200. muskets, and 800. pikes, which were in to ward the place of their refuge. (to wit, the intrenched Church.) The Lord Audley with some hundred and fiftie men, by great suite made to his Excellencie, attained at length to go, whom made so great haste, that he overtook sir William Stanley ere the skirmish began, which was hot, but the Lord Audley and sir William Stanley not liking the too vollics of musket shot, pressed neare the enemy, and themselves at the push of the pike with their men, put the whole compaign of the enemy to retreat to the holde, which done, they retyred a little backe out of the musket shot, and there made a stand: the Earle of Essex Lord generall of the horse, the lord Willoughby, sir William Russell, and sir John Norris with their regiments came to charge the enemy. There were of the enemy fiftie companies, of which five or six were Albanys, the rest were Spaniards or Italians. The Albanys issued, which our men charged so furiously, that it was thought at the first shewe there were a thirtie or forty of the enemies overthrowne, then our men went to the curtain, which they so furiously plyed, that the enemy after some three quarters of an houre retreated to their pikes, losing of foot and horsemen, as the prisoners since taken confesse, besides hurt, an hundred men of their bracke, amongst which was the countie Anceball, also captain George the commander of all the Albanys was taken prisoner, besides near twenty commanders some captaines, some ensigne bearers, lieutenants and other officers: but to sir John Norris he gave the first charge, who with his pistol in his hand offered to discharge it on a brave man, but his pistol would not go off, which he seeing, broke it on the head of his enemy and overthrow him. The lord Willoughby with his lance in his right hand captaine George and unhorsed him, so that he fell into a ditch, and cryed to the Lord Willoughby, I yield your prisoner, for that you be a seemely knight, (this he spake in French:) the lord Willoughby came not to take prisoners but passed on with his curtain in his hand, & his whole regiment after so furiously, that it was wonder to see, y<sup>e</sup> lord Willoughby was so forward, that oftentimes, but twice especially he was like to be taken prisoner, his halles were pulled off from him, but rescued by our side. When y<sup>e</sup> skirmish was done & all retreated, captaine George being in his Excellencies tent, would not graunt to be prisoner to any but to him who unhorsed him, whome he knewe if he saw him in his armor, the Lord Willoughby came in armed, this is the knight that I am prisoner to, & I yield to him said he, to the Lord Willoughby had y<sup>e</sup> prisoner adjudged to be his. The 3. the earle of Essex charged with his regiment, who so encouraged his men, for the honor of England said he, my fellows follow me, & with that he threwe his lance in his rest, and overthrow the first man, & with his curtain he behaved himselfe that it was wonder. Sir William Russell with his regiment charged so terribly, that after he had broke his lance, he with his curtain to playd his part, that the enemy reported him to be a dincell & not a man, for where he saw fire or shewen of the enemies together, thither would he, and so behave himselfe with his curtain, that he would separate their friendship. Among the rest sir Philip Sidney so behaved himselfe that it was wonder to see, for he charged the enemy thise in one skirmish, and in the last charge he was wounded with a musket shot through the thigh, to the great griefe of his Excellencie and of the whole campe, who being brought to my lord lieutenant, his Excellencie said: O Philip, I am sorry for thy hurt, and sir Philip answered: O my lord, thus haue I done to do your honor and her Maiesties service. Sir William Russell comming to him, kissed his hand, and said with tears: O noble sir Philip, there was neuer man attained hurt more honorably then ye haue done, nor any serued like unto you. He was conveyed to Trium, where he continued till his end in such kind of godly behaviour, that both the preacher did wonder at it, and the churche of godly admirers, the one seeing his wise godlinesse, the other his valiant courage with patience to abide all kind of paines. The regiment of sir Philip Sidney was at this time at Decentrie, upon this occasion, his Excellencie feared Decentrie, for that it had often bene in question of retreating, but the prince of Parma hauing occasion to be employed other waies, could not come that way: now (as is aforesaid) his Excellencie fearing that while he were winning one waye he might lose another, the prince being so neare, sent Sir Philip Sidneyes cornet, his owne cornet, and maister Robert Sidneyes cornet all into Deuentic, and offsoote folke captaine Flud with his souldiers, and captaine Ward with his: this was the cause Sir Philip Sidney was alone without his cornet at this seruice. Sir Thomas Parrar also was at this seruice, and serued most brauely. All the time this skirmish was with these cornets, so our footmen were in fight with the enemy, and by fine force made them once againe retire to their safetie. The enemy being retired to his strength, at our hoise made a stand by the mulker shot, which played on them long, and bawed the enemy, bidding him come softly if he durst, but he would not: which Sir I. Norris seeing, rode to his Excellencie, and bad him be merry, for said he, you haue had this day the honorablest day that euer you had, for a handfull of youemen haue driven the enemy three times to retreat this one day. Further he willed his Excellencie either to send for more strength, or else to sound the retreat, which last request he graunted, for that his strengths were otherwise employed, and so the retreat being sounded both by drum and trumpet, our capitaines came backe in good order, euerie man to his quarter with great praise and honour. Vale lost men of account at this fight, captaine Martine, and captaine Thomas Welch is thought to be dead, he came with Skinke from Berke in hope now to be in more safetie: we lost of foote and hoise, dead, about forty.

The 25. of September our men seeing þ great aduantage that a certaine ysland lying in the riuer betwene the sconce and the towne, would do them, and further that there was therein some souldiers of the enemy, which greatly annoyed them in shooting as they passed any way, our men therefore set upon it, skirmished with the souldiers, and put them to flight, many of them leaping into the riuer were drowned, some were killed, but in fine our men inforced there, and the towne shot at them, but did them little hurt.

The 28. of September, his Excellencie with a great part of his campe removed to the other side of the towne, and there began to intercity: leaving the sconces well manned, it was thought the towne was neuer so well victualled, for by his Excellencie the prouant was cut off, and euerie soldier had halfe a crowne a week, which greatly contented them, and this was paid to them truly, so that a souldier might by this means be able to pay the victualler, & that made many resort to the campe. Further, Deuentic was so neare, that by that means victuals were brought the more fully to the campe, for at Deuentic is great plenty of victuals. The hoysmen had foure shillings the weeke loane, to find them and their hoise, which was better then the prouant: his Excellencie knighted maister William Hatton and maister Henry Vmpton, who were then sent for to returne into England to their friends.

The 29. of September, our men set upon the lope sconce of the enemy, which with some difficultie they obtained, but after thinking to win another sconce, there were many of them slaine, as well as on the other side was the like of woyle: there were of our men slaine and hurt about an hundred. In this lope sconce as was reported, there were five fights, which were woon that night, and certaine trenches of the enemy, and further intrenched almost round about the great sconce, so as they of þ same could now hardly issue out, or any come in to th.

The second of October, in the night there passed into Zutphen five thousand of the princes folke, a foure thousand footmen and a thousand hoysmen, these passed into the towne all in order but troubled of our campe: these companies brought no carriages into the towne, but all the wagoners were to come after. The victuals which the princes power had gotten in Dent and Twent was conveyed into Zutphen permitted by his excellencie, for that his men were otherwise employed, those of Longham did cut off some straglers of the princes power as they passed by them. The fourth of October, they of the sconce at Zutphen called for a parley, which was graunted, and countie Hollocke for that he spake Dutch kept out of our sconce, and parlied with them, and after long talk, one of the souldiers shot a musket, which as countie Hollocke was speaking, shot into his mouth, and out by his eare, so that it smote away the ietwell hanging at his eare. The fifth of October came to Deuentic many of our hoises, and about midnight, taking all the garrison of hoises in the towne, passed from thence to Langham, where they also tooke the hoises of the garrison, and went about an exploit, which was, they hearing of a conuoy of victuals comming to Southfield, they determined to haue cut it off, but they could not meete with it. There was of our men at this exploit pretended a five or six hundred hoise, the leader whereof was Sir William Russell. The same fifth of October, early in the morning our canons being placed against the lesser sconce, they played at it till three or foure of the clocke, at which time maister Edward Stanley leader of Sir William Stanleyes companie came to assault the breach, but before he came to the breach, the enemy had a fight of trench full of souldiers placed there for to offend vs, and defend the sconce, which souldiers all at once discharged their muskets, killing onely one man. Edward Stanley entered the trench with all his men, killing some of the enemies, and the rest fled. In this trench he stayed till our canons had made the breach cleare, then maister Edward Stanley before his men, climbed by the breach, but a braue man of great stature captaine of the sconce stood alone in the breach with a pike, and thrust at him, which pike with the one hand he defended, and with the other caught hold to get by, till at the last he was throwne downe by a bullet throwne out of the sconce: the second time he assaulted the breach, but this captaine so defended it, and kept him downe as was wonderfull: and although our men with the canon did play on the breach, yet he still fought, and did not stirre till at the last a canon out of the Island stroke the ground from vnder him, so that he fell out of the breach into the sconce: but in fine this braue leader of our men led them by the breach, and first entered the same, then was the fight in the sconce, where at the first our men killed four or five, at the second the like, at the length, they hauing made a traine, three or foure of our men were bent, but the souldiers of the sconce fled out at a little wicket, which our souldiers chaunced to light on, and killed to the number of thirtie, so our men possessed the lesser sconce, with the losse of three or foure of our men, and five or six hurt. This seruice being done, his Excellencie seeing the valour of maister Edward Stanley, gave him thanks, and calling captaine Reade knighted them both. This taking of the lesser sconce greatly terrified them of the greater sence. The next night the countie Williams men lying neare them, they with a fore bolle of shot did discharge at them, and had them hance by, for said they, you will play but as countie Hollooke did, spend powder and shot, and lose your men, and hance by when you haue done. This sudden bolle of shot put Graue Williams men in doubt that they would issue, wherefore they had thought to haue given alarme, but finding them so quiet after, they stayed their enterprise, and listened what would follow, and hearing no noise of shot of souldiers, they passed neare the sence to see the event, at length they might see a fire in the sence which made them to peasse: neerer, and at length entered the sence, where they found a ten of twelve men, which fled (as was thought) into the water and were drowned. Thus had the cowardly praters made a fire, and ranne away by the light thereof. Thus was the great sence which was so well manned, so well provided of powder and shot, what they wanted none, yet without assault or charge, breach of any thing to dismay them, they ran away, to their utter infamy and reproch.

They of the great sence ran away in the night.

The fourth of October his Excellencie passed to Arnam, there to visite Sir Philip Sidney lying of his hurt received as is afore shewed, before whose going he made knights these captaines and gentlemen following: Sir Henry Gooderic captaine of the guard, Sir Henry Norris, Sir John Borowes, Sir John Winkfield, Sir Roger Williams, Sir Robert Sidney, Sir Philip Bauler. Those were knighted, Sir Henry North, Sir Thomas Dennis, Sir William Knowles, Sir George Farmer, Sir George Digby, Sir Steward, Sir Bewford: besides these, were made knights baronets these following: the earle of Essex, the lord Willoughby, the lord Audley, the lord North.

Knight's made.

A souldier throwne from an high tower into the river of Reine.

There was saith my cousin Henry Archer a strange thing happened at Berk in the time of Skinkes government there, which I thought good to impart. As the souldiers were repairing and working to make the towne strong, a souldier coming by said, you worke and worke, but the enemy will haue the towne within this week: which words being both noted and taken grievously that he should so discourage the souldiers, he was taken and carried to Skinke, who without any circumstances condemned him to be throwne off the great steeple of the towne into the Reine, which was accomplished. But he falling off from a monstrous height, light in the water, and rising againe, as the nature of the water is, to raise one up from of thize, he had both life and memorie, such as he offered to swim, and scrawling got out of the water: but Skinke had taken such an hatred against him, that he caused him to be bound hand and foote, to haue bene cast againe into the river of Reine, saving that colonell Morgan being there, so perswaded him, that the poore mans life was saved.

The ninth of October countie Hollookes cornet of horses lying at Langham, tooke a fire waggons, which had carried the convey before spoken of, into Southfield, and a fiftene of them being laden with hurt men that were wounded in the sence, he put them all to the sword, and tooke the wagons into Langham.

The 15. of October, his Excellencie passed from Deuentry to Arnam to visit

On the 17 of October, the said Sir Philip Sidney, knight, a most valliant and towardly gentleman, sonne and heire to Sir Henry Sidney (late afore deceased) of his hurt received at Zutphen in Gelderland deceased, upon whose departure he bestowed his mind and tooing, that the preacher that came to instruct him in his extreme, might rather learne of him than teach him his assurance in the premises of Christ. The 18. of October, his Excellencie passed with great sorow, for the losse of his nephew Sir Philip Sidney to Ulrike: and on the same 18. and 19. dayes of October, Sir William Scandley gaue in charge to his officers, chieftaines & commanders, as also to his souldiers, that they should go into Deuentry by 15. by tenne, by Marshall by fire and by thee, which commandment they did fulfill, so that for the most part they got them into the towne, being nothing mistrusted of the Burgers, they got into harbours and close places, that they were not espied. Also other captaines layd to their souldiers, if you will go fur of fire, or somewhat more of security to recreate your felices, take with you store of powder and shot, for feare of the enemy, which liberty they were ready to take and performed accordingly, so that there was by this means gotten into the towne well knowne 1200. english souldiers: on the 19. day in the morning came sir William Stanley with some troupe of his men, and in the afternoone sir William Pelham lord marshall, likewise with his troupe. The counsell of States with master Killegre, master Kiely, and other were debating of matters all this day with the Burgomasters, nothing mentioning of the garrison that there should be placed: further those of Southfield in disbaire, did tel those that passed by their towne to Dewent, that they should hie them, or the gates would be shut. The lord marshall being come to his lodging, sent for all the Burgomasters, which were in the counsell as before, who being come, he told them, that his Excellencie, both for their owne safety, and suppression of the enemy, was fully determined to put in a garrison of men there, and for that before time he had found them strange in granting, he had sent him thither, for that the campe was now ready to breake up, to knowe in their their determination, whether they would receive a garrison or not, and for that his haste required no long stay, they to give him answer on the next morning by 8. of the clocke, that he might send word to strike to his Excellencie, which the Burgomasters promised to answer according to his request: now all this night, did sir William Stanley and others, with the lord marshall take counsell what were best to do, which was agreed that all the souldiers secretly should on the morrow at 7. of the clocke, be in the market place with their furniture: this order being taken, all with quiet rest, but the Burgers which made that night a double watch, and chained all the streets, made fast all passages, and further did make and maine all the ports most strong.

In the morning early, by 6. of the clocke, all the Burgomasters were assembled in the state house, to agree of this purpose. About 7. of the clocke the Lord Marshall came to the state house, with divers gentlemen, and others, who knocked and were let in, straight sir W. Stanley also entered with his traine all appointed for the purpose, by this time were all our Englishmen assembled in the market place, which the townes men seeing were in pitious feare, the women crying out for feare to be spoiled. The lord Marshall asked them a direct answer, whether they would have a garrison or not, give me quoth he, a direct answer, for I must to have it. One of the principal Burgomasters rose softly, & stole away, which being told the lord Marshall, he said: fetch me presently him that is gone, or before the living God, before whom I stand, you shall all die for it, and delay not sayd he but do it, straight was he fetched againe. Then demanded he for what cause, that this night over all other, they had made so strong a watch, wherefore they had chained their streets, &c. but they answered not: well sayd he, curie one of you let his hand to this bill, and deliver our poore authority, to those whom his Excellencie hath set downe, or before God you shall all die, you have not to deale with a nation

simple, or foolish, or such as will be used in this or the like sort, consuming hither to spend their goods, toile their bodies and venture their lives, and now be accounted such as your subtilty should outreach. They forthwith at his command (being sore afraid) let their hands to the bill, and gave their authority over to others, all portellants, appointed by his Excellencie: well said he, send one of you straight to all those Burgers that are on the walls and rampiers, and command them to passe to their dwellings, and to let them forthwith be unarmed, which was presently done. Then he commanded them, to bring to him the keyes of all the ports or gates, upon the like paine before spoken of, which was also done, with swearing both the old and new officers to the queene of England. This being done, all that before were suspected to be enemies to the Englishmen, were turned out of their places of authority. There was a 4000. souldiers, all Burgers in this towne, which for the most part watched and warded, before a number others, as too rich for such paines, boozs, which are all counted to be a 1200. fighting men, wherefore it requirith great care and wisdom to deale in this sort. The campe at this time brake for the most part up, to the garrisons, and all those companies that were appointed to the sconce went from Utrecht on the 22. of October.

The 23. of October the States of those parts came from Drenth to Utrecht, where with his Excellencie they sat in counsell, of determining all the 24. day from morning till night. The 26. early in the morning, his Excellencie passed from Utrecht, and came that night late to Rotterdam: On the 29. his Excellencie passed from thence to the Hauge, where he staid some small time. The 8. of November he went to Delph, where he was banqueted, & went that night to Dunhage. On the 16. he passed from Hauge to Rotterdam: and on the 17. to Dort. On the 18. he took shipping to passe from Dort to Flushing, and being passed a seven English miles from Dort, the yee was so great, and so oppressed his ships that it indamaged the most strong ship in the fleet, so that perforce his Excellencie was forced to land at Dyppe, a poore village, and in a wagon to passe by land to Rotterdam, and there prepared ships, and when the wind served he passed towards Flushing, but calmness of the wind caused his ship against the Isles of Alcopo wherein Flushing standeth, but in the morning he landed at Camper, and thence in a wagon he passed to Middleborough, and from thence to Flushing, where he took shipping towards England.

The 23. of November, the honorable lord Robert earle of Leicester, lieutenant generall of all her maiesties forces in the united provinces of the Lowe countries, returning from thence, arrived at London, & went late that night to the Court at Richmond, where he was not so suddenly come, as forwarde welcome of her maiesty, and the rest: and thus leaving the service done in those united provinces, the Lowe countries of Netherlands (whereof thus far I had retreived adventures from my good friend, and neare kinsman Henry Archer, one of his Excellencies gard) I returne to matters at home.

The 8. of October last before passed, I. Low, T. Adams, and Richard Dildale, Seminary being before condemned for treason, in being made priests by authority of the bishop of Rome, were drawne to Cyboigne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered.

The earle of Leicester returned from the Low countries, and arrived in England.

Ludgate of London new builded.

Parliament at Westminster.

An. reg. 29.

Proclamation against the queene of Scots.

Douer haven repaired.

One of the best gates of the city of London, commonly called Ludgate, was this yeare new builded, at the charges of the citizens of the same city, amounting to sixtene hundred pound or more.

The 29. of October, the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord treasurer, and the earle of Darby, representing the queenes maiesties person, began the high court of parliament by prolocution, which session of parliament was at this time assembled, for trial of matters concerning Mary the queene of Scots, &c.

The 2. of December, the session of parliament brake up, and was proroged until the 15. of February, the substance of matter handled in the same session concerning the queene of Scots, is set downe at large in a letter learnedly penned, and published in print, directed to the honorable the earle of Leicester, and as I haue set downe in my continuation of H. Reigne Woolfe and Holmsheds Chronicle.

The 6. of December, the lord mayor of London, assisted with diuers earles, barons, the aldermen of London in their scarlet, the principall officers of the city, the greatest number of the gentlermen of the best account in and about the city, with the number of 80. of the most grauest and worshipfulllest citizens in coats of velvet, and chaines of gold, all on horsebacke, in most solenne and stately manner, by sound of foure trumpets, about ten of the clocke in the forenoonne, made open and publicke proclamation, and declaration of the sentence lately giuen by the nobility against the queene of Scots, under the great scale of England, bearing date at Richmond the fourth of December, being openly read by maister W. Sebrigh, Towne clerke of London, and with loud voyce sollemnly proclaimed by the sergeant at armes of the sayd city, in foure severall places, to wit, at the crosse in Cheape, at the end of Chancery lane in Fleet-streete ouer against the Temple, at Leaden-hall corner, and at St. Magnus corner neare London bridge, during which time, like solenne proclamations were made with great sollemnity in the county of Middlesex, namely in the palace at Westminster, without Temple bar, and in Bothwyl, by the sherikes of London and Middlesex, assisted with sundry noblemen and gentlemen of good account, and the Iustices of peace of the sayd county, to the great and wonderfull reioycing of the people of all sorts, as manifestly appeared by ringing of bells, making of bonfires, and singing of psalmes in every of the streets and lanes of the city.

The queenes maiesty granted to the towne of Douer toward the repairing of their haven, the free transportation of 30000. quarters of wheate, 10000. quarters of barley and malt, 4000. tun of beere, without paying custome or impost, this licence or pattennt was sold to a couple of marchants of London, named John Burd, and Thomas Wats, after the rate of thre shillings and foure pence the quarter of wheate, and 2. s. 8. d. for every quarter of barley or malt. And the licence for beere being sold to diuers, amounted to 4000. markes at the least: more there was granted by parliament Anno. 23. Elizabeth, that for every bellie or rayer whereof her subiects were owners or partners, being of burden twenty tuns or upward, loading or discharging within this realme, or passing too or fro any foreign countrey during the space of 7. yeares then next ensuing, there should be paid for every such voyage by the maister or owner of all such bellies, &c. thre pence for every tun of the burthen of such ship, which grew to 1000. pounds yearly at the least.

The queenes maiesty foreseeing the generall dearth of graine, and other victuals, growne partly through the vnseasonablenesse of yeeres past, partly through the bucharitable greedynesse of such as be great comie maisters, but especially through the vnlawfull and overmuch transporting of graine into foreign countreies, under colour of licence granted, by the aduile of her honorable counsell, published a proclamation and booke of orders to be taken by her iustices for relief of the poore, notwithstanding all which, the excreasue prices of graine still increased, so that wheate was sold at London for 8. s. the bushell, and in some other parts of the realme, for 10. s. 12. s. 13. s. &c.

The 8. of February, being wednesday (according to sentence lately giuen by nobility) Mary Steward queene of Scots, about ten of the clocke before noone, was executed, and suffered death, by beheading vpon a scaffold set vp for that purpose in the great hall of the castle of Fotheringhay, in presence of George Tabor, earle of Shrewsbury, Henry Grey earle of Kent, principall commissioners, and others the gentlermen of the countrey neare adioyning, to the number of about 300. He was as appertained to a queene) royally buried at Peterborough on the first of August next following.

The 15. of February, the parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to her maiesty towards her charges for the defence of this realme, a subsidy by the cleargy of 6. s. the P. and of the temporality 2. s. 8. d. goods, & 4. s. lands, with 2. shillings, &c. The 20. of February, a strange thing happened, a man hanged for felonie at St. Thomas Waterings, being begged by the Chirurgions of London, to haue made of him an Anatomy, after he was dead to all mens thinking, cut downe, stripped of his apparell, layd naked in a chest threfoote into a cart, and so brought from the place of execution through the Borough of Southwarke ouer the bridge, & through the city of London to the Chirurgions hall neare unto Crutchelegate: the chest being there opened, and the weather extreame cold, he was found to be aliue, and liued till the 23. of February, and then died.

The same 23. of February, a gun powder house at Radoise, was blowne up, about ten of the clocke before noone.

The 12. of Aprill, sir Thomas Bromley knight, lord Chaunceler of England deceased, and was honorably buried at Westminster on the second of May. About the same time deceased sir Ralphe Sadler, Chancelor of the Duchie of Lancaster, and one of her maiesties priuy counsell. Also on the 16. of Aprill, deceased the Dutches of Somerset, at Hanworth, and was buried at Westminster. Hoze, Edward earle of Rutland, baron Boes of Hamlake, lord of Trulbut and Beauvoire, knight of the honorable order of the garter, departed this life at London, on the 14. of Aprill, and according to his desire was honorably conueyed from thence to his castle of Beauvoire, and buried in the parish church at Bedford, the 5. of May, where many of his noble ancestors and parents are honorably interred.

The 29. of Aprill, sir Christopher Hatton knight, captain of the gard, vice-chamberlaine, and one of her maiesties priuy counsell, was made lord Chaunceler of England at Croydon, in the archbishop of Canterbury house, where he remained the great scale in the gallery there. And the third of May, being the 1. day of the terme, he rode from the place in Oldborne, to Westminster, there to take his oath, oath, before whom went about the number of forty his gentlemen in one lincie blew, and chaines of gold, diuers pensioners, and other gentlemen of the court, upon foot-clothes, the officers and clerks of the Chancery, and then the Lord Chancellor, having on his right hand the Lord Treasurer, and on the left hand the Earle of Leicester, after whose rode certaine of the Nobilitie, the Judges of the realme, many knights, and lastly a great troupe of their retinue.

In this meane time, the most fortunate seruite for England, performed by sir Francis Drake in Calis the 19. of Aprill with his latest exploits in Cape S. Vincent, and Cape-laker, done the 21. of May, written by a gentleman of his companie, was such as followeth.

We hauing discovered (by aduise of 2. Ships of Middleborough that came from Calis, with whom he met in 40. degrees the 16. of Aprill) and by them vnderstanding that there was great prouision in Calis, and thereabout, appointed to come for Lishborne, he with all speed possible did bend his force thither, to cut off their power and prouision: so as the 19. of Aprill, an houre before sun setting, he entered the harbour of Calis, & his fleet: there checked with him at the entering the harbour the towne, 6. galleies: but they in short time retired vnder their fortresses. There fled some 20. French ships to port Royall, & some Spaniards, which could not be hindered of the flight, by reason of the shields. There were sunke by sir Francis, at his coming in with shot, one argosie of 1000. tun, furnished with 30. peccers of brasse, & richly laden. There were to the number of 38. ships undertaken before night, & victors of the Rod: 30. hulks Hollanders confiscated to the king, and their goods sold to the kings vse, 24. of them were fired, the other 6. were at port Royall laden with wines & brack, & to be presently full laden for Lishborne. One carrike of 1400. tuns appertaining to the Marquis of S. Cruse, fired. Five great Biskies fired, 4. of them lading and taking in of victual for the kings prouision for Lishborne, the fifth a ship of 1000. tun, bound for Lishborne, hauing in hir great stoe of pipes, much yron nailes, spikes, yron hoops, and such like, fired. One Shatter laden with wines, of 250. tuns, for the kings prouision, which the English brought to sea, and discharged part of her wines for prouision of the fleet, and then fired her. These three boates of about 400. tuns laden with bisket, wherof they fired one, & kept the other two. Ten barks more laden with wines, raisins, figges, oyle, wheate & such like: they fired, by supposition 38. ships & barks fired, sunke & brought away, amounting in iudgement to 13000. tun of shipping, &c. this was for the first exploit. The second was as followeth, about the 21. of May, they assaulted the castle of Cape-laker, and three other strong holds, all which they tooke, some by force and some by submission. They tooke at several times of shipping, barks, & caruels about 100. laden with hoops, gaily oares, pipe stauces, timber, and other prouisions of the king of Spaines, for the furnishing of his forces intended against England, which they burned, and consumed all the better boats, and nets thereabouts, to their great hindrance. Thence they came before the haven of Lishborne, anckoring neare vnto call Calis, where the Marquess of S. Cruse was with his galleies, and seeing them chase his ships a shoie, to take and carry away his barks and caruels, was content to suffer them there quietly to tarrie, and likewise to depart and neuer charged them with Cannon shot.

The 18. of June Robert earle of Leicester, was made Viceroy of household, & R. Duercux earle of Essex, was made M. of her maiesties house. The 25. of June, Robert earle of Leicester tooke shipping at Margate in Kent towards the Low countries, where he remained not long, but returned. This yeare was a late spring and a cold summer so that at midsummer present in the coes at London: where they be most forward, were sold for 8. d. the pecke, yet afterward great plenty, & sold for 3. d. the bushell, or better cheape, no chieftie ripe till S. James tide, or Lammias, & then such plenty, that they were sold for a peny the p. and not above. The month of September becommen cold, white frosts, winds boisterous in y. north sometime hail, snow and fleete, and yet a reasonable good harvest for corne praised be God.

The 7. of September, sir Thomas Hineage was made vicechamberlain. The queenes maiesty hauing diuers waies vnderstood the great and diligent preparation of the king of Spaine, in diuers parts both by land and sea, nor onely of the strongest ships in all places within his dominions, but also of all sorts of prouision and munition necessarie for a mighty fleet, which was to come from Spaine and Portugal, for the furnishing & better direction wherof he had drawne together into the places aforesaid, the most principall and ancient captaynes and souldiers, aswell of the kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie, as of Lombardy and other parts of Italy, and the more remote parts of India, as by euery one was long before very evidently perceived, by reason that the preparation of these things together with the ships, mariners, and souldiers, the diuers sorts and quantities of victual, the great number and diuers kinds of artillery, with the summe of euery seuerall kind, were sufficiently specified vnto all countries by certaine pamphlets, laying forth at large the whole intent, the which pamphlets were printed and published in Spaine and Portugal, and other prouinces of Christendome, with this title: The most puissant and most happie Fleet of the King of Spaine, against the Realme of England: her Maiesty, I lay, hauing in this manner receiued so open and manifest information herof, as also certaine intelligence of hostemen, and footemen, sent in so great number, that they were sufficient for the furnishing of diuers rampes in the Low countries, vnder the gouernement of the duke of Parma his lieutenant generall for those prouinces, and withall knowing the multitude of the ships of war, and the possibility that the sayd king had, to transport his souldiers out of Flanders, & land them in England, not sparing to giue out thereupon open and free report, that all that prouision was for the inuasion & conquest of England: Her maiesty therefore furnished her selfe by sea with a mighty fleet, & by land with no lesse diligence to resist such great forces as by all nations were reported to come against her: for it was neuer knowne in the memory of man, that so great preparation was euer heretofore at one time made out, either by King Philip himselfe, or yet by the Emperour Charles the last his father, although his power were much more, and his occasions of warre farre greater. The diligence therefore of the Englishmen, auerorable vnto the care of the Prince, was such, and so great, that her Maiesty was provided of a mighty fleet to defend her by sea from the enemy, betwene the first of Nouemb. & in this yeare 1587. and the 20. of December next ensuing, a time very short for such a prouision, most excellently furnished of all things necessary for such a purpose. charge of which name was commended unto the right honorable Charles Lord Howard, baron of Effingham, lord high Admirall of England, who for his place and office, noble courage, experience in martiall affaires, and nobilitie of blood and descent, was thought most fit to be employed in that service: he had in his company a sufficient number of honorable, worshipfull, and valiant personages, desirous to serve their prince and countrey in such a cause as this: likewise of sea-faring men and private souldiers, so competent a number, as might be answerable unto the power of so great a prince in so weightie a cause. The lord high admirall therefore with those forces keeping for a season the narrow seas, & channell between England and Flaunders, Sir Francis Drake knight, was by the advise of the lords of the counsell, & his honor so commanding it, sent towards the west parts with certaine of the Quenees ships and others, from certaine ports of England thereabout, being in all about the number of sixtie saile of all sorts, there to attend the lord high admirall his coming with greater forces if occasion should require. In the meane season the lord admirall, with his viceadmirall the lord Henry Seyner, kept the narrow seas accompanied with 20. ships more, very well furnished at the charges of the citizens of London, besides many other from diuers parts on that side the realme, that lieth from the towne of Dover vp to the north-ward, which met altogether in good order, and well appointed for the wars.

The lord high Admirall with his forces keeping for a season the narrow seas & channell betwene England and Flanders, sir Fran. Drake knight, mentioned here also in honoz of his decess, was by the aduise of the lords of the councell, & his honoz so commanding it, sent towards the west parts, with certaine of the M. Ships, and others fro the ports of England (as is aforesaid) being about 54. or 56. saile of all sorts, there to attend the L. high Admirall his comming with greater forces, if occasion should so require. In the meane season the L. Admirall with his vice-admirall the Lord Henry Seimer kept the narrow seas, accompanied with twentie Ships more, very well furnished, at the charges of the citizens of London, besides many other from diuers parts on that side of the realme, that lieth from the towne of Douer vp to the northward, which met altogether in good order, and well appointed for the warres.

And here the L. high Admirall vnderstanding for a certaintie, that the fleet of the enemy was already lancht & at the sea, he voyed ankze, and leauing the lord Seimer with sufficient forces of the Quenes Ships, & other vessels to watch what the Duke of Parma would do, & was able to undertake by sea, and parting from thence the 21. of May to the westward with her maiesties navy, and 20. Ships of London, with some others, be arriued at Plimmouth the thre and twentieth of the same moneth, where sir Francis Drake with more than fifty saile which he had vnder his charge, met with the Lord Admirall in very good order. And then the two nauies being ioyned together into one, the Lord Admirall made for Francis Drake his viceadmirall: he that had seen these together, would haue commended it to haue bene a most royall fleet, about two hundred saile, adding nine voluntaries, of aduanciers, furnished by the gentlemen of Vendebare and fifteene victuallers from London, the least being of one hundred and twentie tun, all very well furnished for the fight, and a number of goodly men that were faine to returne home for lacke of entertainment, for there was choise both of mariners and souldiers.

Arriuing at Plimmouth (as is said) his lordship presently gaue order for provision of victuall for the whole navy, that it might want nothing that should tend to the necessary seruise ensuing.

This provision being complete, he resolved with himselfe to put forth to the sea againe about the 30. of May aforesaid, but the winde not seruing his turne, he kept kept himselfe aboard, sailing by and done within the streete betwene Wissant and Billy, attending some light or report of the enemies fleet: where hauing waited a certaine time, sometimes drawing neare to the coast of France, and sometimes to the coast of England, he returned, being thereto enforced by a great tempest with his whole navy into the port of Plimmouth about the sixt of June, to refresh his company there.

In the meane season there were discouered betwene Wissant and Billy certaine ships of the Spanishe fleet, not about the number of fourteene, which were knowne to be secured from the whole fleet by violence of the aforesaid tempest: but before they could be encountered withall by any of the English naue, the wind came about, wherby they had opportunitie to returne backe againe, saving themselves from all perils in their haven called the Groine, into the which also the rest of the Spanishe fleet was put to provide themselves a new of other things which they wanted, and specially of fresh water. Of this thing the Lord Admirall had intelligence and aduertisement from sundry parts, as also that the Spanishe fleet was by great fortune dispersed and secured into diuerse places, through penury of many and those necessarie things, through diseases and mortalitye of men, although the report hereof could not afterwards be verified, whereof the certaine truth was, that being troubled with tempest, they were commanded to come a Shore at the Groine.

The lord Admirall therefore seeing the coast of England and France cleare and free from all danger, as by diligent search it was understood, resolved by the aduice and opinion of his counsell, to take the advantage of the next winde that should blow from the South, that passing to the coast of Spaine he might find the enemies fleet so dispersed in the Groine, and in other parts of Galicia where they had dyuen by the storme.

This was put in execution betwene the 8. and 10. of the moneth of July, the winde being then at the South, which within a while changing vnto the South, after that he was come within 40. leagues or thereabout, of the coast of Spaine, made him to call a doubt of that which afterwards happened indeed. For laying this before him as his principall care, according to the charge laid vpon him by her maiestie, to be diligent and carefull for the defence of the coast of England, and considering considering that with the wind which was now changed & very good to make for England, the enemy might set out & passe for England without discouery of his fleet, he returned backe with the whole naue, & the 12. of the same month he arriued at Plimmouth there accordingly to provide himselfe of all that was necessarie.

The 19. of July, his honor had intelligence by a barke or pinnace, whose captaine was Thomas Fleming, amongst other beying in the streete for discouerie, that the Spanishe fleet in number by estimation 158. sailes, was discouered neare vnto the Lizard, the wind being then south & by west. And therefore albeit that by reason of the great number of English ships which were in Plimmouth, it was with that wind very hard to bring them forth from thence: as the militarie art of the sea, and the condition of their affaires required) yet was there such diligence used by the L. admirall and the rest by his example, as they induroured therein with such aduise and earnestnesse, that many of the ships at the length warped out of the haven, as if the wind had bene wholly favourable vnto them: which thing could not haue fallen out, but through the long and certaine skill which the English maisters generally haue in marine discipline. To the which reason this may be added, that they were all of one nation, of one tongue and touched with a grievous and equall hatred toward their enemies, being mightily perswaded of their forces. Wherupon we may in such cases assure our selues of what importance it is in seafaring matters, for a fleet of any prince whatsoever, inuading any soveraine state or kingdome, to encounter with a fleet ready for defence in such manner as the English naue was, for so much as the fleet inuading being provided diuersly of maisters and officers, differing one from another in custome, language & conceit, cannot in any measure giue any assured hope of certaine victorie how honorable soeuer the commander be: many of these ships therefore came forth, by reason that the men were moued in the foresaid respects to labor diligently, & so much the rather by how much the captains & chiefe officers both by counsell and hand, shewed themselves more diligent & industrious. By this means the 20. day of July the L. admirall accompanied with 54. ships, came forth with the same wind & the enemy had from the south west, which thing certainly was not esteemed a small thing to be done, in regard as well of the wind as of the narrownesse of the place it selfe. The Spanishe fleet being manifestly discouered about 140. miles from Eddison, & clearly seen & seuerely one toward the west, & so far off from Joy as the English fleet was, that is, 25. English miles. The next morning being the 21. of July, all the ships which were now come out of the haven, had got the wind of the Spaniards, & approaching somewhat nearer, found the their navy was placed in battell ray, after the manner of a moone crescent, being ready with her horns & her inward circumference to receive either all, or so many of the English navy as should giue her the assault, her horns being extended in widenesse about the distance of 8. miles as was informed. The reason of their arranging in this order, arose vpon the foresight of the D. of Medina Sidonia generall of the Spanishe fleet, who approaching the coast, sent out a small ship to spy somewhat concerning the English fleet, & hearing by certaine fishermen taken prisoners, the our fleet was in Plimmouth he prepared himselfe as aforesaid, for the auoyding of all such chances as might after befall: wherupon about 9. of the clock before noone, the L. Admirall commanded his pinnace called the Disbaine, to giue the defiance vnto the duke of Medina: after which he himselfe in the ship called the Arce went foremost, as was conuenient, & began hotly to fight with a great ship which was admirall of the Spanishe fleet, in which ship he thought by reason of certaine likely coniectures, the duke of Medina to be, considering also the ship was so well accompanied by others. The fight with her continued so long and so hot, that diuerse other ships, yea the most part of the Spanishe fleet came to her succour.

In the meane season the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake, with maister John Hawkens, & maister Martin Frobisher, fought with a galeon of Portugal, to whom they thought Don Martin de Ricaldes the vice-admirall to be. This fight was so well maintained for the time it continued, that the enemy was enforced to leaue his place, and to giue way gathering toward the east. In the which point of remooring, a great galeon wherein Don Pedro de Valdes went for captaine, falling foule with another ship of their fleet, was deuioured of her fore-mast, so that she could not follow the body of the fleet that forsooke her, to the great maruell of the Englishmen themselves, whereby Don Pedro became prisoner, as after shall be declared. Furthermore also there was at this time a great ship of Wiscape about 800. tuns in burthen sore battered in fight, by casualtie of their owne powder, was set on fire, part thereof blowne vp and their people slaine, and so left to aduantage with the people that remained, so that being utterly vnabie at night to helpe her selfe, she was recoured by y galliasses, & for y time laund in y body of the fleet.

But to returne to our purpose: This first skirmish continued not about two houres, because the lord Admirall considering that he wanted as yet for his ships, which could not so readily come forth of the haue, thought he should do better serue if he stayed their coming before he proceeded any further, beeing behind vpon the enemy, lest he should bring the rest too much in hazard, and therefore he thought it not profitable too much to embolden and pricke those forward that he had with him, in a matter that was not greatly conuenient, either for the honour of the realme, or his owne person, neither did the militarie discipline of the English nation purchased by long experience at the sea, giue him leaue to do it. And therefore he put forth his flag to call the other captaines to counsell who agreeing vnto his determination, received instructions concerning the order that they were to keepe in following the Spanishe fleet. Then hauing giuen libertie to euery man to returne to their charge, he gave order likewise to his vice-admirall sir Francis Drake to appoint the watch for that night, and to beare out the light.

The same night the Spanishe fleet lay about 14. miles off from the fleet.

The next day following early in the morning it was under the wind not so farre off as heretofore.

In the meane time the English fleet wanting light, because the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake leauing his place to follow five hulkes, which were discovered in the evening very late, it came to passe that all the other ships stayed behind, not knowing that they were to follow, or whither to direct themselves: so that there might haue followed some great inconuenience, had they had to do with an enemy more practised in our seas: but as it seemed by report, y said vice-admirall was moued to do this by means of a certaine curious diligence, and a

militarie suspicion, growing in his mind vpon certaine and very probable coniectures, grounded on circumstances of matter considered in his mind: and therefore he gaue them the chase, thinking that they had bene enemies. But being overtaken and their officers examined, and being knowne to be friends, or at the leastwise not enemies, he permitted them to go their way, returning himselfe vnto the fleet the day following.

The lord Admirall notwithstanding accompanied with the Beare, and the Marie Rose comming a little behind his fleet, by reason of the clearnesse of the aire, followed the enemy all y night within a Caluerin shot. By occasion whereof the rest of the fleet was cast so farre behind, that the morning after the nearest part thereof could hardly descrie the tops of the other ships, and many of them were cleane out of sight, so that with all the force of their saile they could hardly come al together the whole day following vntill the evening.

The next day the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake being in the Queenes shippe called the Revenge, hauing also the Roe-bucke, and a pinnace or two in his company, tooke Don Pedro de Valdes, who, as was said before, had lost the fore-mast of his ship: and hauing receiued the said Valdes as his prisoner, and certaine other gentlemen of most account that were therein, he sent the ship together with y prisoners vnto Dartmouth, vnder the conduct of the Roe-bucke, & he himselfe made toward the lord Admirall, vnder whose lee he came that night. This ship or galeon of 150. tuns, in which Don Pedro de Valdes Generall of the ships of the army of Andalusia was, had in it three hundred and foure souldiers, one hundred and eightene mariquers, yea ordinance fire and forsie peeces, shot and bullet 2. thousand and three hundred, powder one hundred and fourteene quintals, lead for the muskets two and twenty quintals, match nineteene quintals, and for euery ship in the fleet according to his burthen had the like provision, as is set downe in a booke extant in the Spanishe tongue, which booke I haue seene at the hands of the woodchipfull maister Anthony Radcliffe alderman of London.)

The same day being the 22. of July, a little before the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake was returned vnto the fleet, the Spaniards forsooke the ship which the day before was spoiled by fire: to the which ship the lord Admirall sent the L. Thomas Howard, and with him maister John Hawkens, who being in the cock-boat of the Discoie, went aboard her, and there found a lamentable sight, for all the uppermost deckes of her being torne and spoiled by the fire, there were in her fifty men miserably bent with the powder. The sunke in her was so great, and the ship it selfe so silitie, that the lord Howard departed presently from her: and returning with maister John Hawkens to the lord Admirall, they informed him of that they found and saw there: for which cause there was presently commaundement giuen, that the little pinnace of captaine Fleming should conduct her vnto some port of England, where they might most commodiously helpe themselves: whereupon it was carried to Weymouth the next day following. For all the mishap that befell this ship they understood that the Spaniards had taken out of her all the best things that they could, raising off the bulke of her, together with certaine grosse stuffe therein, as for that time altogether vnprofitable.

The night last before mentioned there befell a great calme and thereupon foure

Spaniſh gallies ſeuered themſelves from y<sup>e</sup> reſt of their fleet. This thing made the Engliſhmen to doubt, that that night they had reſolved to give the onſet upon ſome of their leſſer ſhips. imagining that they might annoy them the rather, for that they were the rearward of the fleet, but afterwards the gallies (whatſoever the occaſion was) entertained nothing, either for that they ſaw they could not ſafely do it, or elſe becauſe their minds were not thoroughly ſet upon that which before they thought to do.

The morning following being the 22. of July, the wind was at northweſt, whereupon the Spaniards came backe upon the Engliſhmen with the advantage of the wind, directing their courſe toward the land: the which courſe was not preſtable for the Engliſhmen. Therefore to take the advantage of the enemy, they call about towards the weſt with a reaſonable compaſſe, their ſhips being very good both of ſaile and ſtirrage, that they might bring about their purpoſe. Now y<sup>e</sup> Spaniards to hinder their intent after they perceived it, offered to come neere aboard to fight with them truſſing in the huge greatneſſe and height of their ſhips: the which offer of theirs the Engliſhmen ſkidd not, but began preſently to bring themſelves in battell aray, which the enemy perceiving, he alſo did the like. In this caſe the Arke, the Lion, the Beare, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Chitroie, and certaine other ſhips were content to follow the ſhip called the Pompangia.

In the mean ſeaſon the Triumph with other five ſhips of London, namely, the Mercant Royall, the Centurion, the Margerie Joan, the Mary Roſe, and the golden Lion were ſo far to the rearward, and ſo far ſeuered from the reſt of the fleet, that the gallies undertooke to give them an hard aſſault: but they were well entertained by the ſhips for the ſpace of an houre and an halfe, untill at the length ſome of the Queenes ſhips coming to ſuccour the Triumph and the Londoners, dealt ſo well in the matter, that the gallies were obliged to retire. The wind came about at this preſent to the ſouthweſt, and afterwards to the ſouthweſt and by ſouth, at which time a certaine number of ſquadron of the Queenes, together with other Merchants ſhips gave aſſault unto the Spaniſh fleet, and that ſo furiously to the weſtward of them, that the Spaniards were all enforced to give them way: for which cauſe the lord admirall conſidering both the diſcommoditie and danger whereinto the Triumph and the other 5. ſhips were come, he called other of the Queenes ſhips that were not far off, and gave them ſtraight commandment to follow him, and to charge the enemies which were to the weſtward with all their force, giving further order to them all, not to diſcharge any one peece of ordinance before they ſhould come within a muſket ſhot of the enemy, in as much as that was the onely way to ſuccour the ſhips of their friends with the great damage of the enemy. This was well performed by the Arke, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Galcon Lieutell, the golden Lion, the Chitroie, the Mary Roſe, the Bead nought, and the Swallow: which thing the duke of Medina perceiving, he alſo came ſooth with ſixtene of his beſt galcons, to hinder and inſperch the Engliſh men in the defence of the Triumph, ſeeming in this caſe to pretend that the reaſon of y<sup>e</sup> fight did ſo require, whereas the regard of his honor did moſt enforce him unto it becauſe it ſeemed inconvenient y<sup>e</sup> he ſhould in every thing be inferior to y<sup>e</sup> Engliſhmen, therefore he made large promiſes unto thoſe by whole meanes y<sup>e</sup> Chitroie

Chitroie could be gotten: ſo that the Spaniards in the end were enforced to give place and to retire unto their aray of battell. In this conflict our William Cox capitaine of a little pinnace called the Chitroie, belonging to ſir William Wimer, behaved himſelfe very valiantly againſt the enemy in the greateſt brate of this encounter: but within a little while after he loſt his delight, whereunto he was not very well acquainted, and his life, by a great peece of ordinance.

Now the evening ſcore of five Spaniſh ſhips came out from the reſt of the fleet from the ſouthweſtward, againſt whom certaine of the Engliſh ſhips came, and namely the Mary Roſe of London, which diſcharged certaine peeces upon the enemy with a very honorable declaration of the marine diſcipline, & being accompanied by other ſhips that were there found, they all behaved themſelves no leſſe diligently, which thing was not at y<sup>e</sup> firſt hoped for. ſhewing their deſire tempered with a touch of other company. The conflict continued from the morning unto the evening, the Lord Admirall being at all times ready and vigilant in all adventures that might fall out: and thereupon he was ſometimes moze, and ſometimes leſſe eager in the conflict, as neceſſitie required, giving thereby evident example how others ſhould behave themſelves. It might well be ſaid, that for the time, it was not poſſible to ſee before this battell in this ſea, ſo hard a conflict, nor ſo terrible a ſpoile of ſhips, by reaſon of the pellets that flew ſo thicke every way: to conclude there was never ſcene ſo vehement a fight, either ſide endmoying through an head ſtrong and deadly hatred the others ſpoile and deſtruction. For albeit the muſquetiers and harquebuziers were in either fleet many in number, yet could they not be diſcerned or heard, by reaſon of the moze violent and roaring ſhot of the greater ordinance, that followed ſo thicke one upon an other, & played ſo well that day on either ſide, that they were thought to be equall in number to common harquebuziers in an hot ſcramiſh. The battell was not onely long, but alſo neare at hand, within halfe a muſket ſhot, and that to the great advantage of the Engliſh men, who with their ſhips, being excellent of ſaile and ſtirrage, yet leſſe a great deal than the Spaniſh ſhips, and therefore moze light and nimble, fought not at all, (according unto their manner otherwiſe) to boord them, but keeping themſelves aloofe at a reaſonable diſtance, continually beat upon the hull and tacklings of their enemies ſhips, which being a great deal higher, could not ſo conveniently beate the Engliſh ſhippes with their ordinance.

This long conflict being finiſhed, and every one retiring unto his part, the next day following which was the 24. of July, was paſſed without any thing done, becauſe, by reaſon of the fight the day before, there was ſpent a great quantity of powder and ſhot: whereupon the lord Admirall ſent diuerſe barkes and pinnaces to the ſhoze for a new ſupplic of ſuch munition. For her Maieſtie providently foreſeeing each thing neceſſarie for her men, ordained that there ſhould be ſufficient proviſion made, according as ſhould be needfull, as well of victuals as of munition. It ſeemed moze courteous that day, that the Spaniſh fleet was nothing grieved with that dayes reſpite, but were all of them in diſcontent and glad of that breathing, in as much as thereby they had good opportunity to looke to their leaks, whereof, no doubt, they had a great number, for they had caried away many Spanish stripes from their enemies, their hurts being of great likelihood so much the more, in that the Spaniards were pent up in a narrow roome.

The English fleet divided into four squadrons.

This day the lord Admirall for certaine convenient reasons divided the whole body of the fleet into four squadrons, by means of which division the enemy might be greatly, and more continually troubled. The first squadron he kept for himselfe: the second he assigned unto Sir Francis Drake his viceadmirall: the third to maister John Hawkins: the fourth to maister Martin Frobisher, and after noone he gave order, that in the night five of the merchants ships in each squadron should charge the Spanish fleet, in as many parts at once & the same time, & at midnight the enemy might be kept occupied. This order taken as it was very likely might have had as good effect as it was wisely given: but by reason of a great calme which fell out, no part of this aduise ment could be accomplished, fortune interrupting good counsell.

The next day being the five and twentieth day of July or Saint James day, there was a great Spanish galcon left behind her company to the southward neare to the squadron of maister John Hawkins, so that the barkes belonging vnto the great ships, were within musket shot of her: by reason hereof three of the galliasses and another ship that was in manner of a galcon, and well appointed, came from the Spanish fleet to succour this galcon. Against whom went out the lord Admirall in the Arke, and the lord Thomas Howard in the golden Lion, and drew to neare being towed by their boates, that they did them much harme, where-by one of them requirring the helpe of the rest, being succoured by them, returned vnto the fleet. And from another, by means of a shot coming from the Arke, there was taken away her light and thronone into the sea: the third lost her becke, whereby these two ships, the Arke, and the golden Lion declared this day to each fleet, that they had most diligent and faithfull gunners, desirous as well of the common good, as of the private honour of their leaders the lord Admirall, and the lord Thomas Howard which went in them: which commendation might rightly be imparted with them concerning this happy event, because the calme was so great, that albeit the two fleets were well able to behold the fortune of each of their friends, yet notwithstanding they could not helpe them at all: at the length the wind beginning somewhat to rise, the Spaniards tooke the opportunity thereof, and put themselves forward to helpe those of their side, and succoured them honorably. After this time the galliasses, in whose puillance the greatest hope of the Spanish fleet was founded, were neuer scene to fight any more, such was their entertainment that day.

The two fleets notwithstanding approaching nigh one vnto another began a conflict, but they continued it but a while, except one ship called the Non-pariglia, and another called the Mary Rose, which hauing taken in their topkales slaid themselves there, to make as if there a certaine experience of their manhood vpon the Spanish fleet, behauing themselves honorably for a season. In which time the triumphing to the northward of the Spanish fleet, was so farre off, that doubting that certaine of the Spanish ships would assault her to the westward, they succoured her with diuers boates that got the wind easily: for the Beate and Elizabeth Jonas, euen at one instant hauing knowledge of the danger wherewith the other were, drew neare vnto them, desiring both in regard of the honor of their common wealth, and also for the preservation of their friends and countrymen, to be partakers of the like danger and difficulty.

Wherupon each ship doing her duty, they ioynely sauced the triumph from all harme, and recovered the wind. And thus this dayes worke ended: wherof I may say that the conflict was no whit shorter then the day it selfe.

At this present the Englishmen considering the great waste of powder and shot that had heretofore bene made, the lord Admirall determined not to assault the enemy any more, vntill he were come nigh vnto Douer, in which place he should find the fleet vnder the charge of the V. Scimor, & Sir William Winter, who were ready to ioine with him, that thereby he might both fortifie himselfe with a great number of ships, and in this manner provide themselves of munition from that part of the realme. Vpon Friday therefore being the 26. of the moneth of July, ceasing from fighting, the lord Admirall (as well for their good deserts and honorable seruice, as also to encourage others to like bold) was desirous to aduance certaine personages to the degree of knighthood, for that behauing themselves manfully, as well with their ships as their good aduise, they were worthy that degree of honour: and so much the more worthy, in that being farre separated from all courtly fauour, which many times imparteth the chiefest honours vnto the least deserving men, they declared their valour in the eyes of either fleet.

Therefore the two lords, viz. the lord Howard, and the lord Sheffield, Roger Townesend, John Hawkins, and Martin Frobisher, were called forth, and the order of knighthood given them by the lord Admirall, & their generall.

Knights made for seruice.

This day there came to the seruice of her maiesty in her fleet diuers gentlemen, honourable both by blood and place, but much more in respect of their courage and vertue, for that in these publike affaires, and so necessary seruice of the warres, they willingly offered their seruice in the defence of their country, and honour of her Maiesty.

This day also, and the next, being the leuen and twentieth, the Spaniards followed their course quietly before the English fleet. In which time the earle of Sussex the lord Buckhurst, Sir George Care knight, & the capitaines of the forts and castles thereabout, sent their men with powder, shot, and victuals, to the lord Admirall to assist and helpe the army. The same 27. day towards the evening, the Spaniards drew nigh to Calcis vnder the coast of Picardy, and there suddenly cast anker almost right against the left hand of the hauen to the westward, a little lesse then five miles from Calcis Clennes: the English fleet also cast anker with in a culuerin shot of the enemy to the westward.

The Spanish fleet lieth, and is chased by the English.

In the meane season the lord Scimor, and Sir William Winter ioyned with the Admirall, whereby the English fleet increased to the number of 140. ships of all sorts: but the Spaniards with all speed sent things vnto the duke of Parma of their arrivall, who at this present was at Bruges, who hauing retained with him at his sealing in many dayes before to this purpose, yet proceeded no further in the matter for that time, although for such time as the king had limited him, he for his part tooke as much care as might be looked for at his hands: for hauing already imbarcked a certaine number of souldiers, he was carefull in like manner to dispatch the rest as soone as they should be ready, that they might take opportunity to come forth, furnishing them abundantly with victuall and munition. But in the meane time such a chance fell out as made frustrate, not only his, but the conceipt also of the duke of Medina and wholly ouerthrew their enterprise, for the lord Admirall hauing by certaine notice vnderstood, that the duke of Parma had prepared a great number of tuns of water, and 10000. chosen footmen to be imbarcked for the toyning with the fleet, which could not be auoided, if the duke of Medina were not compelled to auoid that place, knowing also the euident perill that was to be feared, if the Spanish fleet should be suffered to refresh it selfe, and to be furnished with so many souldiers, he applied his wits so in the deliberation of these matters of weight and importance, hauing the consent of others more practised, that no time might be lost for the furtherance of this seruice, and so much as the forces of the enemy were not yet united and ioyned together, therefore the 28. of this moneth at midnight, he provided 8. small ships dressed with artificiall fire, to the intent to burne the saue upon the Spanish fleet. This thing was diligently & effectually brought to passe vnder the charge of capitaine Yong & capitaine Powle, two valiant and courageous men: by reason hereof the enemy was not only enforced to breake his sleepe, but the fire coming so suddenly vpon him, to cut his cables, to let slip his anchors and to heape vp sailes as the onely way to saue his fleet from so imminent and unexpected a mischance. Furthermore, by means of this tumult & confusion, the chiefe gallie fell forie with another ship, vpon the cable of whose anker her sterne was set so fast, that they could not loose her all the night long, so that the next day following she was enforced with her oares to make toward the land, & to draw nigh to the hauius mouth of Calris, to saue her selfe in that place: but not knowing that warre, and hauing no profitable and convenient counsel for the time, she fell vpon a Shelfe. This thing being in good time espied by the Lord Admirall, he sent thither his greatest boate vnder the charge of Amiens Preston his lieutenant, and together with him Thomas Gerard, sonne and heire to sir Gilbert Gerard master of the Bowles, & master Harry two of her maiesties gentlemen & seruants, and others of the court and of his owne seruants, who fought with her, but vnequally, for that the ship being grauelled could with her force preuaile but little. In this conflict it chanced by a mischance that Hugo de Moncada chiefe captaine of the gallie, a noble & valiant man, in the head of the which mischance layned with the difficulty of liuing themselves in their defence, bred such a desperate & very man, that the greater sort leapt into the water to saue themselves by swimming into the sea, although many of the perished in the water. By this disorder of the enemy, the Englishmen being more secure, tooke her, and sacked her to their great commodity, about 100. men being entred into her, and their company increasing more and more, vnder vpon monsieur Gordon gouernor of Calris, a man of good estimation in respect of his prerogative in that place, sent his nephew to give the Englishmen to vnderstand, that they should content themselves with the ordnance spoyle, & that they should leaue behind them the great ordnance, as a thing belonging vnto him by vertue of his office: the which message being sent the second time vnto men more intencue vnto their pray, then other mens reason, made the gentle-gentleman to be cully entertained by our men, in such sort, that they would haue forcibly taken from him some things about him, thinking him to be a Spaniard: whereat M<sup>r</sup>. Gordon being offended, caused certaine peeces of ordnance to be discharged from the towne, and then the Englishmen departed, leauing the gallie at his pleasure, after the losse of some souldiers, hauing notwithstanding sacked 22000. duckets of gold, appertaining vnto the king, and 14. coffers of mouables of the duke of Medina, with some other money and mouables of other particular men, and some prisoners, among whom was Don Rodrigo of Mendoza, and Don Iohn Gonzales de Soliz, also vnder-captaine of the gallie.

During the time of surprizing of which gallie, sir Francis Drake vice-admirall being in the ship called the Revenge, accompanied with Thomas Fennor captaine of the Bonpariglia, with the rest of that Squadron, set vpon the Spanish fleet, giuing them an hote charge. Within a while after, sir John Hawkins in the Victory, accompanied with Edward Fenton captaine of the Mary Rose, with George Beeton captaine of the Dread nought, and Richard Hawkins in the Swallow, with the rest of that Squadron, put themselves forward and brake through the middell of the Spanish fleet, where there began a vehement conflict continuing all the morning, wherein euery captaine did very honorable seruice: among the rest captaine Beeton deserved speciall praise. Unto this fight came the Lord Admirall, accompanied with the earle of Cumberland, the lord Thomas Howard, the lord Sheffield, and in that place where the fight was made, and the victory was gotten, they were publickly commended. Not farre from this place there was a great Spanish galeon scene, which was set vpon on the one side by the earle of Cumberland, and George Nimmo in the Bonauenture, and on the other side by sir Iohn Scimor, in the ship called the Rainbow, and sir William Winter in the Clantgard, yet she saued her selfe valiantly, gathering into the body of the fleet, although with ill successe, for she was so beaten and so terribly rent and toyne with our great ordnance, the night following, in sight of her owne fleet she sunke, her men (as it was thought) being saued. After this, captaine Fenton in the Mary Rose and a Spanish galeon met together, being east and west one of another yet no nigher then that their shot might play safely, and fir betweene them without any great hurt. Captaine Fenton notwithstanding, and those that were with him, were worthily commended for their seruice begun and accomplished with such prosperous boldnesse. The same day the deeds of sir Robert Southwell were scene and worthily commended. Also was praised Robert Crosse captaine, who in the ship called the Hope, gaue a signe of valour to be in him.

It fell out also the same day, that the Lord Henry Scimor, & sir William Winter did so thoroughly beate two Spanish galeons, although they were of the chiefeest of them, and best provided, that they were enforced to withdraw themselves to the coast of Flanders, where as much as they were in a very cull taking, as well in respect of the mar, her of their men, as the manifold leakes of their ships, they were surprised, and without fight rided by the Zealanders, and with all the men in them caried as prisoners vnto Flushing. Among these chiefeest was Don Diego Pimentelle, a man very famous among this countrey people. It seemeth hereby, that in these conflicts many of the Spanish ships perished. After this battell battell which was made the 29. of the moneth of July, the Lord Admirall the 30. day ordained, that the lord Seimor and sir William Winter should returne with their fleet vnto their appointed office in the chancell, which was to keepe the coast from the danger that the Duke of Parma seemed to threaten. The which Duke had already lost the oportunitie of being able to do any thing for the accomplishing of the common intention of the Spaniards: because the sodaine and vnlooked for departure of the Duke of Medina with the whole fleet from the coast of Wales caused the whole care of the aforesaid Duke that he tooke vpon the maine land, to become void, so that he did not imbarke the rest of his men to ioyne with the Duke of Medina.

The Lord Admirall therefore determined to followe the Spanish fleet onely, so long vntill they might be shot vp to the northward, whither the Spanish fleet directed her course, but to what end, it was not knowne. And that he with the same would might come to the Frith, which is vpon the coast of Scotland, if so be he sawe the enemy passe those parts. Vpon which he thought moreover, that it was good to stay his fleet from attempting ought vpon the Spaniards, vntill he should haue good intelligence of their purpose, thereby to worke a meane vnto the discomfit and ouerthrow of them. But the Spaniards kept their course about the Islands of Shetland, declaring thereby, that they minded to returne that way into Spaine along by the north coast of Scotland, which as skillfull men considered would be to their euident danger, as it fell out afterward: perceiving therefore the purpose of the enemy when he was shot vp 55. degrees & 13. minutes to the north ward, and 20. leagues off from Newcastle, the Lord Admirall resolved with himselfe to let the Spanish fleet keepe on her way. The Spanish fleet therefore as for her owne welfare it was requisite, hauing gone on so far before, the lord Admirall resolved to put into the Frith in Scotland, as well to refresh himselfe with new victuals, as also to dispatch certaine other matters which he thought necessary. But the wind bring much westward & against him, the day following he changed his course, and turned into England with the whole fleet the 7. of August, although by reason of a tempest part of the ships put into Douer, part to Harwich, the rest into Portsmouth. And thus much of the seruice by sea, wherein God hath giuen to the English a wonderfull victorie.

The Spanish fleet passing as aforesaid into those seas which for y<sup>e</sup> most part are quiet & calme enough, whether it were diuine or and fro in their contrarie winds, or by some other fatal accident that fell out it continued therein tossed vp and downe vntill the end of September, with fearefull successe & deadly shipwracke along the whole coast of Ireland: so that the Duke of Medina Sidonia was enforced to leaue there behind him about the number of 17. good ships, besides 15. that were thought to be lost in the moneths of July and August, & so to returne into Spaine. The persons lost in Ireland were esteemed to be about 5500. so that all being accounted together, it is certainly auaunched that all the ships that were lost amount to the number of 32. & the men accounted one with an other, arise to the number of 13500. or more. The prisoners also of all sorts in England, Ireland, and the low Countries, arise to the number of 2000. and more. As for the losse of the ordnance, & the common or private treasure, or whether the the Duke after he was preserved from the former fearefull & mostall dangers, lost any more ships, or no, or last of all, how many he brought home with him againe into Spaine, I know not, and therefore leaue any further to write of that matter.

Now as you haue heard before, the campe in the meane tyme, being kept at Tilbury in Essex, vnder the charge of the earle of Leicester &c. the 9. of August, her maiestie repaired thither where all the whole campe being set in order of battell, both horse and footmen, she passed through euery rank of them, to their great comfort and reioicing, and was lodged that night and the night next following, in the house of maister Edward Rich, a Justice of that shire in the parish of Hounston. On the next morrow being the tenth of August her maiestie returning to the campe, beheld the same, they being all trained in the best order that might be, and on the eleventh of August returned to Saint James, and shortly after the campe was dissolved.

And on the 20. of August, M. Nowell deane of Pauls at Pauls crosse, in presence of the lord Maior and Aldermen in scarlet, the companies in their best linceries preached a sermon, mouing them to giue laud & praise vnto Almighty God, for the great victorie by him giuen to our English nation, by the ouerthrow of the Spanish fleet and our enemies.

The 26. of August at the Sessions hal without Petersgate of London were condemned fire persons, for being made priests beyond the seas and remaining in this realm contrary to a statute thereof made: foure temporall men for being reconciled to the Romane church: and foure other for relecting and abetting the others. And on the 28. W. Deane and H. Webber were hanged at the Whites end, W. Gunter at the Theatre, R. Mooton and Hugh Moore at Newgate. Some soldiers, T. Adon at Clarkentwell, T. Felton and James Clarkin betweene Saint Dunstons & Hounston. And on the 30. of August, R. Flower, Ed. Shelley, R. Leigh, R. Martine, I. Roch and Margaret Ward, gentlewoman (which Margaret had conuicted a royd to a priest in Biddewell, whereby he let himselfe downe and escaped, were hanged at Tibborne.

The 4. of September, deceased Robert Dudley earle of Leicester, lord steward of her Maiesties household, lieutenant generall and marshall of all England, at Courtbury in Oxford shire, from whence he was conuicted to his castle of Kenilworth, & from thence to Warwick. where he was honorably entered. In which towne of Warwick, he had in his life tyme, of an olde guildie giuen him by the towne men for that purpose, founded an hospitall for 12. poore men, indowning the same with lands to the yearely value of 200. l. and better, and 52. loads of wood ready cut and made out of Kenilworth wood, &c.

The eight of September, the preacher at Pauls crosse moued the people to giue God thanks for the ouerthrow of our enemies the Spaniards, and there were shewed cleuent ensignes or banners taken in the Spanish ships by our men, these ensignes were set vpon the lower battlements of Pauls Church, before the preacher and the audience, (which was great) all sauing one streamer, wherein was an image of our Lady, with her sonne in her armes, &c. and this was held in a mans hand ouer the pulpit. And the same banners were on the next morrow hanged on London bridge towards Southwarke, where

The 17. of November being Sunday, D. And at the same barre the Lord Maior and his brethren the Aldermen in scarlet, receiued and welcommed her Maiesty to her cite and chamber, deliuering to her hands the scepter, which after certaine speeches had, her highnesse reduced to the Maior, and he againe taking his horse, bare the same before her. The companies of the citie in their lueries stood in their raires of timber, covered with blew cloth, all of them saluting her highnesse as she proceeded along to Pauls church, where at the great west doore, she dismounting from her chariot-throne betwixte the houses of twelue and one, was receiued by the Bishop of London, the Drane of Pauls, and other of the Cleargie, to the number of more than fiftie, all in rich coapes, where her highnesse on her knees made her hartie prayers vnto God: which prayers being finished, she was vnder a rich canapie brought through the long west Ile, to her Trauers in the quire, the cleargie singing the Letanie: which being ended, she was brought to a closet, of purpose made out of the north wall of the church, towards the pulpit Crosse, where she heard a Sermon made by doctor Pierce bishop of Salisbury, and then returned through the church to the bishops palace, where she dined, and returned in like order as afore, but with great light of torches, to Sommerlet house.

Seminarie priests, in the moneth of December, recanted at Pauls crosse, to wit, William Teder and Anthony Thiel.

The 10. of January at night, a great wind in the northeast, butled many houses, overturned trees, and other wise did great harmes both by land and seas

 The 18. of April, sir Iohn Norris and sir Francis Drake Generals, with sixe Voiage for of her Maisties ships 20. ships of war, and 140. fit for burden, having in them a Portingale. choise choise companie of knights, captains, gentlemen and soldiers, departed from Plimmouth, and on the 23. of the same moneth arrived at the Gwine. The 26. they tooke the lower towne by assault, together with great store of ordnance, victuals, cables, ropes and other furniture for shipping.

About the first of May they fought with the Spaniards at Puente de Burgos Bridge, where the enemy fled with losse of 700. men.

The seventh of May, the lower towne of Gwine was burned, and on the ninth our fleet set saile, the 12. the earle of Essex, with maister Walter Deuereux his brother, sir Philip Butler, sir Roger Williams and sir Edward Wingfield met with our fleet. The 16. the whole naue arrived at Penicha in Portugal, where in despite of the enemies, our people were set aland, and the same day wan both the towne and castell of Penicha. After this they diuided the armie, whereof part marched with sir John Norris by land to Lisbon, the rest with sir Francis Drake passed by sea to Callicales. The 24. our men entered the suburbs of Lisbon, where they obtained rich spoiles, and plenty of every good thing. The 27. the armie being victored, was found to be weak, and of small force to sustaine so great a siege as that was like to be, besides the want of powder, and some other necessities: for which causes, after counsell taken, they left Lisbon, and came to Callicales, without any great fight or skirmish, where they tooke the castell, and thence returned for England. There followed them nine gallies, who fighting with two English merchants ships, by consuming of the Queenes ships, discharging but one peece at them, they retired, so our ships came safely to Vigo, where landing our men the towne was taken, & the countrey wasted, &c. Now at large this matter is published in print both in Latine and in English.

The 21. of June, sir Francis Drake arrived at Plimmouth, and on the third of July, sir John Norris with the rest of the fleet arrived there also.

Great lightning and thunder.

The first of August at night, was the greatest lightning and thunder that had at any time bene scene and heard about London, in the memorie of any man living, and yet thanks be given to God little hurt heard of.

Sir John Norris & sir Francis Drake being returned, as ye have heard, many of their sailors and soldiers, shortly after their landing, fell sick, and died of a stanch bred amongst them on ship-boord, other some of the so rudely behaved themselves about the countrey, about the court, & elsewhere, that many men misliked of their doings, and divers of them being apprehended, on the 27. of August one was hanged on the end of a signe at an Inne doore in the towne of Kingstone upon Thames, for a terror to the rest. The 29. of August, two more were hanged in Smithfield, two at the Tower hill, two besides Westminster, 1 on at Tiborne.

About the 21. of September, the citizens of London furnished a thousand men to be sent over into France, to the aiding of Henry late king of Navar, then challenging the crowne of France, as rightfull inheritor: by lawfull succession. Also divers shires in England sent into France to the same aide, some three a thousand, as Kent and other shires, and some shires less, &c. All which companies were sent over into France, under the conductin of Peregrine Barrie lord Willoughby and Erskly.

The last of November, Ledwike Griuell of Wilcoke in the countie of Warwick

An. reg. 32. Citizens of London fired by fires.

The 5. of January, about five of the clock in the evening, before the Twelfth day, began a great and terrible tempest of wind in the south west, which continued with great vehemencie till about 11. of the clocke of the same night. This in the citie of London blew the tiles off mens houses, overthrowe many chimneies, and caused many men feare the overthrowe of their houses: one of the three west gates of Saint Pauls Church, to wit, that next to the Byshoppes palace was broken, with the bolts, bars, and lockes of the same gate, so that it was blowne over. In the countreie, houses and barns were bozne over, and some of them blowne far from the places wherein they stode, besides trees in great numbers blowne up by the rotes. On the Seas, no man can tell what hurtures were done, by ships and barkes cast away. About Southampton the ships and barkes riding at anchor, were driven a land and sunke, the like was neuer scene thereabouts.

Tempest of wind great and violent.

South west gate of Pauls blown open.

In this moneth of Januarie, Nicols one of her maiesties purveyors was hanged, for that hee converted to his owne use certaine provision taken of her subsidies for her maiesties use.

beached on a cart in Chrape*

The 16. daie of Iulie in the morning, Edmond Coppinger and Henry Arthington gentlemen, repaired to one Walkers house nere unto Broken wharf of London, where conferring with one of their friend, named William Hacket of Dunbale in the County of Northampton yoman, they offered to annoint him king, but Hacket taking Coppinger by the hand, said: You shall not neede to annoint mee, for I haue bene already annointed in Heauen by the Holie ghost himselfe. Then Coppinger asked him what his pleasure was to be done. Go your way both (said he) and tell them in the city, that Christ Iesus is come with his fan in his hand to iudge the earth. And if any man aske you where he is, tel them he lies at Walkers house by Broken wharfe; and if they will not beleue it, let them come and kill me if they can: for as truly as Christ Iesus is in heauen, so truly is hee come to iudge the worlde. When Coppinger saide it should be done forthwith: and thereupon went forward, and Arthington followed, but ere hee could get downe the staires, Coppinger had begun be low in the house, to proclaime newes from Heauen of exceeding great meracie: that Christ Iesus was come, &c. with whom Arthington also cried the same words aloud, following him along the staires from thence by whatling streete, and did change toward Chrape, they both adding beyond their commission these words: Repent England, repent. After they had both thus come (with a mightie concourse of the common multitude) with an brisome crie into Cheape nere unto the crosse, and there finding the throng and prease of people to encrease about them, in such sort as that they could not well passe further, nor be convenientlie hearde of them all as they desired: therefore they gotte them vpon into an emptie cart which stood there, where in they stood not onely vpon the wordes of their former crie, but they reading something out of a paper, went more particularlie ouer the office and calling of

Hacket,

Hacket, how he represented Christ, by partaking a part of his glorified body, by his principal spirit, and by the office of securing the god from the bad with his fan in his hand, and of establishing the Gospell in Europe, &c. telling also the people, where they saw him, where he late and remained: that they were two Prophets, the one of Mercie, the other of Judgement, sent, and extraordinary called by God to all. I him in this great worke, and were witnesses of these things, &c. And thereupon the one of them pronounced Mercie, great comfort, and unspeakable hopes to all that should repent presentlie, be obedient, and embrace this acceptable message, and oportunitie offered: And the other denounced terrible Judgement if they repented not, which should even presentlie (also) fall vpon them, and especially vpon the City of London: affirming, that all that beleued them not, were condemned bodie and soule: with other matter against her Maestie, and some of her honorable Primate Counsaile, which I ouer passe. And whereas they had purposed to haue gone with the like Crie and Proclamation, through other the chiefe partes of the Citie, the prease was so great, as that they were forced to go into a Tauerne in Chrape, at the Signe of the Spertmaybe, the rather because a Gentleman, being of his acquaintance, plucked at Coppinger, whyles hee was in the Carte, and blamed him for his deuicand; and speeches. From thence they went by back lanes, but yet crying (as afore) Repent England, repent, &c. to VValkers house at Broken wharfe. This strange accident being quickly blowne through the citie, all was in a buzze, and a kind of astonishment, what to thinke of the matter: and being speedilie brought to his maiesties eares, two of his honorable counsaile were presentlie dispatched vnto London, to take further notice of the whole matter: so that about one of the clocke in the afternoone, Coppinger was sent for, whyles Hacket and Arthington were brought before those honorable counsellors and others at the Lords Palaies to be examined; whose examinations I ouer passe: but in the ende it was thought good, that Hacket should come to trial: so that on the twentieth daye of Iulie, hee was brought from Wobdelwell to the Sessions House, nere to Fleetgate, before the Lord Palaies; and other Iustices, where being arraigned, hee was by two severall inditeiments founde guiltie; as to haue offered and spoken dyuers most false and traitorous words against her maiestie, to haue raised and defaced her Maesties Armes; as also a certaine Picture of the Queenes Maestie, and did maliciouslie, and traitorously thrust an yron Instrument into that part of the sayde picture that did represent the Brest and heart of the Queenes Maestie, &c. He had judgement, and on the 28. of Iulie, he was brought from Fleetgate towards the place of execution after ten of the clocke in the morning, albeit by reason of the incredible multitude then in the streets, but especially in Cheape. All the while that hee was dragged vpon the hurdle, hee continued his counterfeit baie; one while crying out, Iehouah, Messias; Iehouah, Messias: another while crying out thus, loke, loke, howe the heauens open wide, and the sonne of God cometh downe to deliuer me: when hee came vnder the gibbet (which reached hard by the Crosse in Cheape) hee was exhorted to alke God and the Queene forgiveness, and to fall to his prayers: but he in stead thereof, set to railing, and cursing of the M. maiesty, most villanously, and then began a most blasphemous and execrable prayer, against the diuine maiesty God. They had much adoe to get him by the ladder, where he was hanged and after bowelled and quartered.

On the next daie, being the ninth and twentieth of Iulie, Edmond Copplinger, hauing wilfully abhoynded from meate (as was sayde) dyed in Wyderwell. And Anthington longe after in the Countie in Woodstreete, was referred in hope of perfect repentance. In which expedition his Lordship was also honourably accompanied, with sundrie Gentlemen and soldiers that voluntarie followed him in this seruice. Proclamation
ties and Semi-narie.

In the moneth of October, a proclamation was published, containing a declaration of the manifest troubles pretended against the crowne and estate, by Seminaries and Jesuites, (aborned by the pope and king of Spaine, to infect her maiesties subiects with the poison of the irredition religion, and vnder color thereof, to traine them vnto their pretended treasons, so) the betraying of this estate vnto the Spanishe tyranny and inuasion. For the better preuenting of which imminent dangers, a speciall charge was thereby given vnto all her Maiesties officers and ministers, vigilantlie to looke vnto their severall charges of the forces appointed to be in the readines, for the necessary defence of the realme. And for the better repressing of the fraudulent attempts of those Jesuits, the very deuicers of all treasons and rebellions, disguising themselves in their habit and apparrell, sometimes like gentlemen, and sometimes like serving men, and so inuoluing themselves into the families and seruices of noblemen, ladies, and gentlemen, to couer themselves from suspicion and apprehension: It was by the said proclamation provided, that speciall commissioners should be appointed in all Shires, Cities, and port Townes of this Realme, to inquire out this viperous broode, and such as male bee reconciled by their enchantment, thereby farther charging all manner of persons of whatsoeuer degree or condition, to retain none into their houses, without due examination of their conditions, manner of life, & conformitie in the religion, and to keepe thereof a Register, to be shewed vnto the said Commissioners, if they shall demaunde the same, vpon suspicion of the disloyaltie of any such persons.

Not long after the publishing of this proclamation, her maiesty adioyned commissions

Bren O Roirke of Ireland arraigned.

In the moneth of October, to wit, on the 28. day, Bren O Roirke, a great man of Ireland, was arraigned at Westminster, where he was found guiltie of high treason, and after for the same executed at Tyborne on the 3. of November, as hereafter more at large insineth.

The articles contained in the indictment against Bren O Roirke, Lord of a great territory and countie in Ireland, named Breny I Roirke, who accounted himselfe to haue descended of one of the Monarches that were in Ireland heretofore: at his arraignment at Westminster on St. Simon and Iudes day, Maister Iohn Ly of Keshpide a gentleman out of Ireland, being assigned by the lordes of the counsell and commissioners to enterpret betwixt the Judges, and the said O Roirke, who did expounde and declare in Irish the Articles ensuing, and also all speeches uttered by the Judges, and the said O Roirke, to the good liking of all the said Judges and others that were present.

That the said Bren O Roirke sought the deprivation of his maiesty from her regal seat, the destruction of his person, and the overthrow of his realme of Ireland, at Downabur and other places in Ireland, the 2. of July, in the 28. yere of his maiesties raigne.

That the said O Roirke stirred up, and procured Alexander Mac Connel, and Denell, Mac Connel being enemies to her Maiesty and her said Realme of Ireland: to raise forces against her Maiesty in Ireland, and after that reliued and succoured them the second of August, the twentieth eight of her Maiesties raigne.

That the said O Roirke at Downabur aforesayde, caused the picture of a woman to bee made, setting to her Maiesties name, and caused it to be fixed to an hoyle tape, and to bee drawn through the mire in derision of his maiesty. And after caused his Galliglasses to be towne the same in peeces with their axes, uttering diuers traitterous and rebellious words against her maiesty.

That the said O Roirke, when Sixtus the fift of that name was Pope, and Philip the Spanishe King had bent their forces against Englande, and after dispersed by her Maiesties aete, till they came about Scotland, and so to Ireland, and arriving there, the sayde O Roirke did entertaine, releeue, and succour, at Downabur aforesayde, and other places, diuers of the said Spaniards, which were employed to this intended inuasion. And after proclamation being given by the Lord Deputy vpon paine of death, that no man should haue any of the said Spaniards, but they to bee sent to his Lordshippe, by a daie limited: yet the sayde O Roirke kept the sayde Spaniards till the sayde Lord Deputy went with her Maiesties forces to the South, at which time, the saide O Royke conveyed them through the March with a Spanisht frer, and an Irish frer in their companie, and so to Spaine, without making the saide Loide Deputie of Ireland acquainted therewith: and after received letters by the frer from the saide King of Spaine, gratulatory for the entertainment he gave to the saide Spaniards anno 30. of her maiesties raigne.

That the saide O Royke procured and caused one Thady O Harte and his frer, with diuers others to enter into aduall rebellion against his maiestie, so that the said Thady and others did burne Ballymote and other places, and after that done, the saide O Royke did relieue and succor the saide traitors, that were entered into the said rebellion.

That the saide O Royke did enter and burne Ballingasse with diuers other villages in the county of Wolscoman, and murdered O Kena at Collier, Christopher Caddell, and others others of his highnes loiall subiectes, and spoiled and carried away the prizes of the said towne.

That the saide O Royke did violently enter into the Towne of Kynocke, Mullin, and diuers other villages in her maiesties realme of Irelande, in the barony of Epyrell in the county of Sligo, and burned the saide Towne, and murdered one Chencin Wood a gentleman, with diuers others of her maiesties loiall subiectes within the said Barony of Epyrell, and so continued his outrages, untill he was constrained by her maiesties forces to fly into Scotland.

That the saide O Royke being fled into Scotland, did stir by certaine Scots there to insurrection, and to ioyne with himselfe their forces against his maiestie in the Realme of Irelande. And also offered at Glasco vnto the King of Scots, if he would maintaine him and suffer his subiects to go and ioyne with him, that he would bying the realme of Ireland to his subiection: contrarie to his duty, and in contempt of his maiesties lawes, the 9. of Aprill, anno 33. of his maiesties raigne.

Also it did appere by the saide Bren O Royke his speeches made in the towne, where he said, that if the Spaniards had first come into Irelande, as they did into Englande, that Ireland had better their owne, and that he would do them a peece of seruice: which speeches were sufficient proue of his traitorous mind towards his graces maiestie.

To conclude, the saide O Royke, after manie speeches by the Judge and him bitter, being at the barre, saide, that hee would not consent that any inquest or Iurie shoulde passe vpon him, vnlesse hee might haue a weekes respite to be giuen him, and all those writings sent by William Fitz Williams, Rylen, Bingham, and others in Ireland to be deliuered him, and a good man of lawe to be assigned vnto him, and the same man of lawe to be sworne to deale as truelie for him, as hee would do for the Maiesties hitte apparant, if hee were in his place. And besides this, that hee would haue the Maiesties maiestie to be one of the Iurie to passe on him. This his refusal to be tryed was entered, at the request of her maiesties learned Councell. And after entrie so made: the saide John Ly, being interpreter, was willed by the lord

chefe Justice to tell him that the lawe was, if hee would refuse to be tryed by twelue men, then iudgement must be giuen according to the quality of those Articles of treason wherewith hee was charged, and being obstinate therein, was guiltie of his owne death, yet that notwithstanding, hee refused to yrayll. When the saide John Ly expounded vnto him his iudgement, which was as ensueth.

That the saide Bren O Royke shoulde be taken from thence to the place from whence hee came, there to be laide vpon an hurdle, so to be drawne to the place of execution, there to be hanged untill hee were halfe dead, then to be let downe, and his members and bowels to be taken out and byent in the fire, his heade to be stricken off, his bodie to be quartered, and his head and bodie to be disposed at her maiesties direction. This being expounded to him by the said Ly, he answered nothing, but said, if that were their will, let it be so.

Vpon Wednesdaye the 3. of November, Bren O Royke was drawne to Tyborne, and there hanged, his members and bowels burned in the fire, his heart taken out, and holden by by the hangman, naming it to be the archtraytors heart, and then did he cast the same into the fire, then was his heade stricken off, and his bodie quartered. But before this was done: the saide O Royke yet standing vpon the cart, spake John Ly aforesaid, willed him in Gods behalfe to remember the filthy and odious treasons that hee committed against her maiestie, with many other good exhortations, to draw him to repentance, and to aske her maiestie and all the world forgiveness; and he to forgiue all the world: yet he obstinately answered that he would not, but said, that if the M. would haue granted him space, and all such writings, as the officers in Irelande, viz. William Fitz Williams, and Dicke Bingham sent against him, to be giuen him to make answer to them, and also to giue him his life, that then he would aske her forgiveness, and from henceforth serue her truelie. And further saide, that hee did thinke little that the King of Scottes would haue sent him to the quene without safety and good assurance of his life, and remittall of his offences.

The saide John Ly did further hyge and entreat the saide O Royke to repent, and to aske forgiveness (as aforesaid) and likewise to forgiue, and that, that was the onely way for him to come to the heavenly kingdome: and also told him that all the standers by, requested and prayed him so to do: he answered and willed them to make meanes for themselves to come to God, and that hee would make meanes for himselfe, but no more could hee haue of him, but fell to his prayers. The saide Ly told him againe, if he could not lawfully pray being so obstinate, hard hearted, and to die without repentance, but it would not be, and so the cart went from him. Also Meylens the Lord archbishop of Cashell in Irelande being present, was willed by the standers by, to counsaile the saide O Royke, and the saide Archbyschoppe requested him to call to God, with other good exhortations: The saide O Royke turned vpon him and sayde, hee had more neede to looke to himselfe, and that hee was neither heere nor there.

Bren O Royke executed at Tyborne.

This yere Michaelmas terme was kept at Hertford in Hertfordshire 20. miles from London, and began on Crastina animarum.

The thirde of November at night, deceased Sir John Parrat prisoner in the Tower of London.

The 12. of December, a certaine gentlewoman by the Countells commandement was whipped through the city of London, for affirming her selfe to be the daughter of Philip King of Spaine, as she had bene perswaded by some accounted sophisters, after proued liars, for she was knowne to be a butchers daughter in Cud cheape.

The 17. of February, a boy was hanged in Sten-church strete, for murdering of his master.

The 19. of February, the Parliament began at Westminster.

On the last of March Henry Barrow and John Greenwood were brought to Tyborne in a carry, and there fastened to the gallows, but being dead and returned for the time, they were there hanged on the 6. of Aprill.

The 10. of Aprill the Parliament brake up at Westminster, for the time, wherein was granted thre subsidies of 2.s. 8.d. the pound goods, and foure s. lands, and 6. shillings.

My Lordes, and you my commons of the lower house, were it not that I know no speeches presented by any other, nor wordes deliuered by any substitute, can be so deeply imprinted into your mindes, as spoken by her selfe, whose order and direction was but followed and deliuered by the lord Keeper, I could be content to spare speech, whom silence better pleased then to speake. And because much hath bene spoken, much lesse shall I now neede to speake of mine owne disposition of nature, and small desire in priuate respect to be enriched by you present, which wordes shall not witnesse, but dedes by your former experience, hauing expended what I haue receiued, to the preferment on and defence of your selues. And thus much I dare assure you, that the care which you haue taken for my selfe, your selues, and the common weale, that you do it for a Prince, that neither careth for any particular, no, nor for life, but so to liue, that you may flourish. For before God and in my conscience, I protest, wherunto many that know me can witnesse, that the great experience of my time, the labour of my studies, and the trauell of my thoughts, chiefly tendeth to Gods seruice, and the gouernment of you to liue in a flourishing and happy state, God forbid you should knowe any change the contrary better princes than my selfe you haue had, but one only excepted whom

In the duty of a child I must regard, and to whom I must acknowledge my selfe farre (shallow) I may truly say, none whose loue and care can be greater, or whose desire can be more to fashome dayer for prevention of danger to come, or resisting of dangers, if attempted towarde you, shall euer be found to erre de my selfe: In loue I say towarde you, and care ouer you, you haue heard in the beginning of this parliament, some doubt of danger, more then I would haue you to feare: Doubt only should be, if not prevented, and feare, if not prouided for, For mine owne part, I protest I neuer feared, and what feare was, my heart neuer knew. For I knew that my cause was ever iust, and if it standeth vpon a sure foundation, that I should not faile God assisting the quarrell of the right wise, and such as are but to defende. Glad mought that king my greatest enemy be, to haue the like advantage against me, if in truth for his owne actions, he might truly so say. For in ambition of glorie I haue neuer sought to enlarge the territories of my land, nor thereby to abanance you. If I haue bled my forces to keepe the enemy farre from you, I haue thereby thought your safetie the greater, and your danger the lesse. If you suppose I haue done it in feare of the enemy, or in doubt of his reuenge, I know his power is not to pteuaile, nor his force to feare me, hauing so mighty a protector on my side. I would not haue you returning into the countrey to strike a feare into the mindes of any of my people, as some vpon the arrival of the late nauie, dwelling in a Spaniane thirde fled for feare farther into the middle of the land, but if I had bene by him, surely I would haue taught him to haue shewed so base and cowardly a courage, for euen our enemies holde out nature resolute and ballant, which though they will not outwardly shew, they inwardly knowe. And whensoever the malice of our enemies shall cause them to make any attempt against vs, I doubt not but we shall haue the greater glorie, God fighting for those which truly serue him, with the iustnesse of their quarrell. Only let me in know to be wary, and not to be found sleeping, so shall they shew their owne valour, and frustrate the hopes of the enemies. And thus farre let me charge you that be lieutenants, and you that in thires haue the leading of the most choise and seruicable men vnder your hands that you see them sufficiently exercised and trayned, so oft as neede shall require, that the wantes of any of them be supplied by others to be placed in their rowmes, and that all decates of armour bee presently repaired and made sufficient. The enemy finding your care such, and so great to provide for him, will with the lesse courage thinke of your disambance. To conclude, that I may shewe my thankfull minde, in my conscience neuer hauing been willing to draw from you, but what you should contentedly giue, and that for your selues, and hauing my head by vares, and experience better stated, what soeuer any shall suppose to the contrarie, then that you make easily beleue that I will enter into any idle expences. Now must I giue you all as great thanks, as euer pietye gaue to louing subjects, assuring you that my care for you, hath, and shall erre de all my other cares of worldly causes, what soeuer.

The 19. of July, the court of assise for Surrey was holden and kept in S. Georges field, a tent being set up for that purpose, many prisoners were there arraigned, condemned and had indgement, nineteen were bent in the hand, but none executed. This assise was ended the same day, which was thought would haue bene three daies worke, for the Justices (all duties being paid) made haste alwaies for feare of being infected with the pestilence by repaire of people thither.

The 11. of Aprill, a raine continued very sore more then 24. houres long and withall, such a winde from the north, as pearced the wals of houses, were they neuer so strong.

The 14. of Aprill, a woman was bent in Smithfield for murdering of her husband.

A woman bent in Smithfield.

The 16. of Aprill, Ferdinando Earle of Darby deceased at Latham, whose strange sickness and death, gathered by those who were present with him at the time thereof, was such as followeth: his diseases apparant, were vomiting of sober or rustie matter with blood, the yealow jaundies: melting of his fat, swelling and hardnesse of his spleene, a beement hiccokche, and foure daies before he died, stopping of his water.

Ferdinando earle of Darby deceased.

The causes of all his diseases were thought by the physittians, to be partly a surfeit, and partly a most violent discompering himselfe with beement exercise, taken foure daies together in the Easter weeke.

The 5. of Aprill about sixe of the clocke at night he fell sicke at Lutholby, where he vomited thyece.

The 6. he returned to Latham, and feeling his health to sinke more & more, sent to Chester for a doctor of physicke.

The 7. before the coming of the doctor, he had cast 7. times, the colour of his vomits was like to southe or rustie pyon: the substance verie grosse and fattie: the quantitie above seven pintes, the smell not without offence, his waters were in colour, smell, and substance not unlike his vomits. The same night he toke a glister to drawe the course of the humours downeward, which wrought five times and gave some ease.

The 8. he toke a gentle infusion of Rhabarb and Spanna in a draught of chicken broth, which wrought very well nine times.

The 9. because of his continuall bleeding by mouth with his vomits, he was instantly intreated to be let blood, to direct and stay the course thereof, but by no meanes he could be perswaded thereunto, wherefore that daie only for mentations, oyles and plaisters were outwardly applyed, to stay and comfort his stomache.

The 10. he toke one other glister, which wrought well five times.

The 11. he toke one other purge which wrought with great ease 9. times vpon the humours. The same night he toke a little diacordium with the syope of limons and scabions water, which somewhat staid his stomache and gave him some rest.

The 12. because his vomiting continued still, hee was moued to take a vomit, that thereby the bottome of his stomache might be scoured and cleaved from so vile and lothsome matter wherewith he was troubled: but by no perswasion he would yeelde thereunto, notwithstanding the same daie he toke a medicine to procure sweate, but perceiuing not, the very saunc night his water staid vpon a sodaine, to the astonishment of all.

The thirtieth, all meanes were offered to pouchoke water as glister drinks, fomentations, oyles, pulvises, plaisters and stirrings, but nothing happelie succeded.

The 14. and 15. was vied an instrument called a Catheter, which being conueied into his bladder, was strongly sucked by the Chirurgion but no water followed.

The 16. day about five of the clocke at night, he most deuoutly yielded his soule to God.

In all the time of his sickness, he often took Bezars Stone, and Unicoines boyne, his pulse was ener good, his strength indifferent, the number of his vomites were 52. and of his stoles 29. his physicians were doctor; Canon, doctor; Ioyner, doctor; Barre, doctor; Caie.

A true report of such reasons and coniectures, as caused many learned men to suppose him to be bewitched.

The first of Aprill being the mondaie before his hono<sup>r</sup> fell sicke, a woman offered vnto him a supplication, or petition, wherein her request was, that it would please him to giue, or assigne her a dwelling place nere vnto himselfe, that she might from time to time reueale vnto him such thinges with speeche, which God reuealed vnto her for his good. This petition was thought vaine and therefore refused.

On the fourth of Aprill, he dreamed that his ladie was most dangerously sicke to death, and in his sleepe being sore troubled the reuith, he wept, sobainly cried out, started from his bedde, called for helpe, sought about the chamber, betwixt sleeping and waking, but being fully awaked was comforted, because he found her well: here we omit strange dreames, or diuinations of diuers graue men, which happened before or about the time of his sickness.

On the fifth of Aprill, in his chamber at Ironsley about five of the clocke at night, there appeared sodainly a tall man, with a gasly and threating countenance, who twise or thise seemed to crosse him, as he was passing through the chamber, and when he came vnto the same part of the chamber where this shadow appeared, he presently fell sicke, and there vomited thise. After Gorbome one of his secretaries attending then vpon him sawe nothing, which more amazed him. The same night he dreamed that he was in fighting, and twise or thise stabbed to the heart, and also wounded in manie other places of his bodie.

The 10. of Aprill about midnight, was founde in his bed chamber by one master Hallfall, an Image of ware with haire, like vnto the haire of his hono<sup>r</sup>s head, twisted through the belly thereof, from the navel to the secrets: This Image was spotted, as the same master Hallfall reported vnto master Smith, one of his secretaries, a daie before anie paine grew, and spots appeared vpon his shes and bellie. This Image was hastily cast into the fire by master Hallfall, before it was viewed, because he thought by burning thereof, as he said, he should relieue his lord from witchcraft, and burne the witch who so much tormenteth his lord, but it fell out contrary to his loue and affection, for after the melting thereof, he more and more declined.

The 12. of Aprill, one Iane a witch demanded of master Gorbome, whether his hono<sup>r</sup> felt no paine in the lower parts, and whether he made water as yet

or no: and at that verie time notwithstanding all helpes, his water bitterlie stopped, and so remained till he died.

Sir Edward Filton, who with other Iustices examined certaine witches, reporteth, that one of them being bidden to saie the lords prayer, said it well, but being confured, in the name of Iesus, that if she had bewitched his hono<sup>r</sup>, she should not be able to saie the same, she could neuer repeate that petition. For-giue vs our trespases, no not although it was repeated vnto her.

A homely woman, about the age of fiftie yeres, was found mumbling in a corner of his hono<sup>r</sup>s chamber, but what God knoweth. This wise woman (as they termed her) seemed often to ease his hono<sup>r</sup> both of his vomiting and hickocke, but so it fell out, which was strange, that when so long as hee was eased, the woman her selfe was troubled most vehemently in the same manner, the matter which she vomited, being like also vnto that which passed from him. But at the last, when this woman was espyed by one of the doctors tempering and blessing (after her manner) the iuice of certaine herbes, her pot where into she streined the iuice, was tumbled downe by the said doctor, and she rated out of the chamber, notwithstanding she did still saie that she would not cease to ease him, although she could not perfectly helpe him, because hee was so strongly bewitched. All physike wrought verie well, yet had he none or little ease thereby, his diseases were many and his vomits, with stopping his water grieuous, yet ever his pulse remained as good and perfect as euer it did in time of his best health, till one quarter of an houre before he died. He himselfe in all the time of his sickness cried out that the doctors laboured in vaine, because he was certainly bewitched. He fell twise into a trauince, not able to moue, hand, head, or foote, when he would haue taken physike to doe him good. In the ende, he cried out often against all witches and witchcraft, reposing his onely hope of saluation vpon the merites of Christ Iesus his Saviour.

One excellent speech, can not be omitted amongst many in the time of his sickness, especially the day before he departed, at which time he desired one of his doctors, whom he especially loued, to perswade him no longer to liue, because (saith he) although out of thy loue, thou wouldst stirre by hope of life, and doest imploie all thy wit, arte, and traualle to that ende, yet knowing for a certaintie that I must now die, I pray thee cease, for I am resolu'd presently to die, and to take awaie with me onely one part of my armes, I meane the Eagles winges, so will I flie swiftly into the bosome of Christ my onely saviour. And with that he lent for his Ladie, and gaue her his last Vale or farewell, desiring her to take away and lone his doctor, and also to giue him some iewel, with his armes and name, that hee might be remembered: the which thing, immediately after his death was most honorably performed. His spirituall physicians, were the bishop of Chester, and master Ecc his chaplaine.

In the moneth of May, namely on the second day, came downe great water floods, by reason of sodaine thowzes of haile and raine that had fallen, which bare downe houses, pyon milles, the prouision of coales prepared for

The second of May the new sergeants at law in number tenne, held their dinner of feast (as it hath bene tearmed) at the newe Temple in Fleet-strate.

B. of London deceased.
The third of June, deceased John Elmer bishop of London at Fulham, and on the 26. of June, was solemnly entered in his cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, before S. Thomas chappell.

Doctor Lopez and other Portugales executed.
The 7. of June, Rodericke Lopez, with two other Portugales, were conveyed from the Tower of London by the lieutenant, unto the olde swan, and from thence by water to Westminster, where being brought before the kings bench barre, the lieutenant was called to bring in his prisoners, which were there deliuered, and was discharged of them. Then was it by the court declared unto them, how they had bene charged with high treason against her maiestie, had bene tried, found guilty and had receiued iudgement; wherefore it was demanded of them, what they could say for themselves, and should not suffer death accordingly: whereunto one of the Portugales began in his language to tell a long tale, but was willed to be short, which he answered could not be done without circumstance, &c. whereupon he was willed to holde his peace. The second answered by writing in his language, which being read by an interpreter, the Duennas at tournehabd saie, for it was not true. Rodericke Lopez in English made his submission, and affirmed bee neuer thought harme to her maiestie, &c. Then was called the marshall of the kings bench, and appearing, hee was charged with the prisoners, to conuaine them to the prison of the kings bench, and there to deliuer them to the Sheriffes of London, with a writte to see them executed: so were they conuained by water from Westminster to the bishoppe of Winchester staires in Southwarke, from thence to the kings bench, there laide on hurdles, and conuained by the Sheriffes of London ouer the bridge, vnto Leaden hall, and so to Tyborne, and there hanged, cutte downe alive, holden downe by strength of men, dismembred, bowelled, headed and quartered, their quarters set on the gates of the citie.

Ships sent to the seas by the citizens of London.
The 15. of July, by a common counsell in the Guild hall was granted (according to precept from her maiestie) that five shypes, and two pinnaces should be set forth to the seas at the charges of the citizens, the same to be ready with men, munition, and victuals for three monthes, by the last of July. More, on the 17. of July the same common counsell according to another precept, granted 450. men on foot to be likewise set out by the citizens, towarde the charges whereof, a suttaine was raised, and collected.

This yere in the month of May, fell many great shewres of raine, but in the monthes of June and July, much more: so it commonly raised euery day, or night, till S. James day, and two daies after together most extreemly, all which, notwithstanding in the month of August there followed a faire weather, but in the month of September fell great raines, which raised high waters, such as staled the carriages, and bare downe bridges, at Cambridge, Ware,

Ware, and elsewhere, in many places. Also the price of graine grewe to be such, as a strike of bushell of Rye was sold for five shillings, a bushell of wheat for five, seven, or eight shillings, &c. for still it rose in price, which dearth happened (after the common opinion) more by meanes of ouermuch transporting, by our owne merchants for their private gaine, than through the vnseasonable lenesse of the weather passed.

This yere Beuis Bulmar Gentleman, set vpp an Engine at Broken-wharfe, thereby, from thence to conuaine Spaine water vp into the Citie, sufficient to serue the whole west part thereof, being conuained into mens houses by pipes of lead.

The same gentleman on the 18. of October came vnto sir Richard Martine then lord Mayor of the city of London, and to the citie for ever, one cup of silver with a silver waighing 137. ounces of fine, better then the sterling, the silver of which cup, with other, was by his meanes digged out of the Spine in England, in the month of August last before passed.

The 30. of December a woman was hient in Smithfield, for coyning of money.

The same 30. day Doctor Fletcher Bishop of Worcester, in Paules church was cleard bishop of London.

The 26. of Januarie, the Earle of Darby married the Earle of Orfords daughter at the court then at Greenwich, which marriage feast was there most royally kept.

The tenth of February two Souldiers or Captaines named Yorke and Williams, were executed at Tyborne.

The 20. of February, Southwell a Jesuit, that long time had laine prisoner in the Tower of London, was arraigned at the kings bench barre: he was condemned, and on the next morrow dyane from Fleetgate to Tyborne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered.

The 20. of Aprill being Easter day in the afternone about five of the clock, it thundered and lightened sore, with some raine, notwithstanding the weather very colde, and so continued the rest of that month, and also the month of May.

This yere by meanes of the late transporting of graine into foraine countries, the same was here growen to an excessive price, as in some places from foureteene shillings to foure markes the quarter, and more, as the pore did feele, for all thinges els, that fouer was sustenance for man, was likewise raised without all conscience and reason. For remedie whereof, our merchants brought backe from Danke much Rye, and some wheate (not of the best) but passing deare, yet serued the turne in such extremitie, some prentises and other young people about the citie of London, being punished of their victuals, more then they had bene accustomed, tooke from the market people in Southwarke, butter for their money, paying for the same but 3. d. the pound, whereas the owners would haue had 5. d. for the which disorder, the said young men, on the 27. of June were punished by whipping, setting on the pillorie and long imprisonment.

After the same time certaine men for coining were hanged: Also a scruener in Holborne was hanged, bowelled and quartered, for counterfeiting of a new patent, and setting to the seale of an olde.

The 29. of June, being Sunday in the afternoon, a number of barbly youths on the tower hill, being blamed by the wardens of Tower street ward, they w at them stones, and drawe them backe into Tower street, being bartened thereunto by sounding of a trumpet, but the trumpeter hauing been a soldier, and many other of that companie were taken by the Sheriffs of London and sent to prison. About 7. of the clocke the same night, Sir John Spencer lord maior rode to the tower hill, attended by his officers and others, to see the hill cleared of all tumultuous persons, where, about the middle of the hill, some wardens of the tower, and lieutenants men being there, tolde the maior, that the sword ought not in that place to be borne vp, and therefore two or three of them catching hold of the sword, some bickering there was, and the sword bearer with other hurt and wounded: but the lord maior, by his wise and difcrete pacification, as also by proclamation in her maiesties name, in short time, cleared the hill of all trouble, and rode backe, the sword bearer bearing up the sword before him.

The Quenes maiestie being informed of these, and sundry other disorders committed in & about her city of London, by unlawful assemblies: And some at tempting to rescue but of the hands of public officers such as had bin lawfully arrested, where by the peace had bin violated and broken: Her maiestie, for reformation thereof, by proclamation dated the 4. of July, straightly charged all her officers, both in the city, and places nere adjoining in the counties of Middlesex, Kent, Surrey and Essex, that had authority to preserve the peace, and to punish offenders, more diligently, to the best of their powers, see to the suppression of all offenders against the peace, upon paine to be not only remoued from their offices, but to be also punished as persons maintaining or comforting such offenders. And because the late unlawful assemblies & routs were compounded of sundry sorts of base people, some prentices, and some others wandring, idle persons of condition Rogues & vagabonds, and some colouring their wandring by the name of soldiers, her maiesty, for better execution to her officers of Justice, and inquisition to be made, notified her pleasure to her counsell, to prescribe orders to be published, and straightly obserued, and for that purpose a Honorable marshall with sufficient authority to apprehend all such as should not be readily reformed and corrected by the ordinarie officers of Justice, and that without delay to execute upon the gallows by order of marshall law. The orders prescribed, were the same day also by proclamation published. Sir Th. Willford knight, was appointed honorable marshall for the time, he rode about, and through the City of London daily, with a number of men on horsebacke, armed, with their scales of pistols. &c. His marshall apprehended many bagrant and idle people, brought them before the iustices, who committed them to diuers prisons. On the 22. of July were arraigned in the White hall of London 5. of those barbly youths that were apprehended on the Tower hill, they were condemned of high treason, had iudgement to be for 7. d. and so the like of fish or flesh, exceeding measure in price, such was our sins deserving it.

The 17. of November, a day of great triumph, for the long and prosperous reigne of her maiestie, at London, the palpet Crosse in Bowles church parke newe repaired, painted, and partie inclosed with a wall of hickie: Doctor Fletcher bishop of London preached there in praise of the queene, and praye for her maiestie, before the lord maior, Aldermen, and citizens in their best liueries. Which sermon being ended, upon the church leades the trumpets sounded, the cornets wound, and the quiriters sung an anthem. On the steeple many lightes were burned: The tower shot off her ordinance, the belles were ringing, bonfires made, &c.

The 5. of February, two marshals were chosen and appointed in the citie of London, for the apprehending of bagrant and other disordered persons.

The 20. of February five men for colosing and counterfeiting of comman-ons, were set on the pillory in west Cheape, some of them had their eares naked and cut off, other that had before lost their eares, were nowe burnt in their shakes and foreheads.

This yere a certaine Winace was made by an house Carpenter, in the great green parke of the Leaden hal in London, it was of burthen about some
5. tun: this was made to be taken a sundre, & set together with vices: the same was finished, and launched out of the Leaden hall on the 12. of March in the night, being drawne by strength of men, and of horses on a sled, with wheles made for that purpose, towards Algate, where against the parish church of St.
Katherine Christs church, the wheles taking fier on the areliries, were broken about one of the clocke in the morning, where it staid till the next night, and then was drawne to the Tower hill, where the same was calked and pitched.
And on the 20. of March drawne and launched into the river of Thames at the water gate by the tower, and from thence by water drawne to Radecliffe, and there tackled.

The 9. of April being good friday, in the afternoon, the lord maior and aldermen of London being in Bowles church parke, bearing the sermon at Bowles crosse, were suddenly called from thence, and forthwith by a precept from her maiestie and counsell, pressed 1000. men, which was done by 8. of the clocke the same night, and before the next morning they were purvided of all maner of furniture for the wars, ready to haue gone towardees Downe, and so to the aide of the French in Calais against the Spaniards, but in the afternoon of the same Saturday they were all discharged: not without mourning on the 11. of April being Easter day, about terme of the clocke before none, came a newe charge, so that all men being in their parish Churches ready to haue receiued

Lord keeper deceased.

A Declaration of causes why the Queene sent her navy to the seas.

The last of Aprill at night, deceased Sir Iohn Puckering Lord Keeper of the great Seale, he died of a dead palsey, wherewith hee had bene taken on the fire and twentieth of Aprill at night, and was buried at Westminster.

About this time was published a booke intituled, A declaration of the causes mouing the Quenes maiestie of England, to prepare and sende a Flotte to the seas, for the defence of her Realmes against the King of Spaines forces, to be published by the Generalls of the saide Flotte, to the intent that it shall appeare to the world, that her maiestie armeth her Flotte onely to defende her selfe, and to offend her enemies, and not to offend any other, that shall so beate to strengthen her enemy, but to blesse them with all lawfull fauours.

To all Christian people, to whom this declaration shall come to be read, as heard greeting. We Robert Earle of Essex, and Sir, Viscount Hereford, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Voordgeher and Louane, &c. and Charles Lord Howard, Baron of Effingham, Lord high Admirall of England, &c. hauing the charge of a Royall nanie of ships, prepared and sent to the seas, by the most excellent Princeesse, the late Elizabeth, Quene of England, France and Ireland, &c. doe giue all men knowledge that the saide nanie vnder our charge is by her maiestie prepared and sent to serue on the seas, for defence of her maiesties realmes, dominions, and subiects, against such mightie forces, as we are aduertised from all partes of Christendome, to bee already prepared by the King of Spaine, and by further provisions of men and ships daily sent for, are to be mightily increased, to invade her maiesties Realmes: as heretofore in the yeare of our Lord 1588, was attempted (even when there was a Treatie continued by both their Commissioners for a Peace) with a greater Army then euer before in his time was set to the seas: though by Gods goodness, and the valour and wisdom of her Noble and faithfull Subiects, the same was notably made frustrate. And because her Maiestie hath good intelligence of perforce amitie with all Kings and Princes of Christendome, fauoring with the King of Spaine, who hath this manye yeeres most brauidly professed openly, great enmitie by diuers actions, both against her Royall person, and her people, and Countries, without anye iust cause first giuen on her Maiesties part. Therefore the saide the Earle, and Lord Admirall, doe ascertaine all persons, that we are most straightly commanded by her excellent Maiestie to forbear from offending in this our Voyage of anye manner of persons of what Nation soeuer, except the saide Kings naturall Subiects, or such others borne Strangers, as shall giue to the saide King manifest ayde, with men, ships, Artillerie, Munition, and other warlike provisions for invasion

tion of her Maiestie. Which her Maiesties commandement we meane dutifull to obserue: and doe therefore giue straight charge to all persons that shall serue in this Flotte underneath vs, vpon paine of extreme punishment to obserue the same, &c.

On Sundae the eight of August, great triumph was made at London, for the good successe of the two Generalls, and compaigns in Spaine, the winning, sacking, and burning of the famous towne of Cadix, the overthrow and burning of the Spanish Flotte, and other accidents, as here followeth.

Anno Domini 1596. her Maiestie sent a great flote to the seas consisting of 17. or 18. of her Royall shippes, and three of the L. Admirals, and of merchants shippes and men of warre, and victualers above 100. and to these the States added foure and twenty: so that the whole flote being assembled at Plimouth, was about 150. saile.

An Abstract of the expedition to Cadix 1596. by the Duke of Devonshire. of Commentaries written at large thereof, by a Gentleman who was in the voyage.

This Royall flote was commanded by the most noble and fortunate in all his adventures, the L. C. Howard (now Earle of Nottingham) high Admirall of England in the Arke Royal, wherein by Gods fauour & her maiesties auspices he defeated the great Spanish fleet in the yeare 1588. And by the right honorable and renowned Lord, Robert D'Eureux earle of Essex and Elm, and master of her maiesties horse and ordinance: both jointly her maiesties Lieutenants generall for this expedition by sea and land; theire authoritie and power being equall, sauing that the one had the precedence at sea, the other at land: the Earle was shipped in a newe built and very warlike shippe called the Du repulse. The Vice admirall of the whole flote was the L. Thomas Howard second sonne to the duke of Norfolk in the Spirance. The Vice admirall was Sir Walter Rawleigh Captaine of her maiesties garde and lieutenant of Cornwall in the Massacre, both new ships. The Admirall of the fleet of the States was Ion van Duvenvoord Lord of Warmount, in the Septimus a ship of 400 tonnes.

This whole fleet was diuided by the L. Generalls into foure squadrons, euerie one of these Chiefs aforesaid had their particular squadron, and Vice admirall. The first squadron was lead (as it was his right) by the Lord high Admirall of England: the second by the earle of Essex: the third by the Lord Thomas Howard: the fourth by Sir W. Rawleigh: the fifth by Mounier Du vennoord: And straite commandement was giuen throughout all the fleet that euery shippe should waite vpon the Admirall of his squadron. The Vice admirals of these squadrons were, Sir Robert Southwel (son in law to the Lord admirall of England) in the Lyon, to the Lord Admirall: Sir Francis Vere Lord Marshall in the Rainbolt, to the earle of Essex: Sir Robert Dudley son to the earle of Leicester in the Bonaparte, to the L. Th. Howard: Captain Robert Crosse in the Swifshire, to Sir Walter Rawleigh: and Ion Gerbramson in the P. of Holland, vice admirall of the Hollanders.

The four squadrons with their Admirals and Vice admirals.

The lords Generals while they lay at Plimmouth (to arme or furnish the m-selves with euerie thing necessarie for so great an army) gouerned their charge with verie good iustice and marshall discipline: and for instance hereof briefly this I obserued: Two souldiers were hanged vpon the wyld with papers vpon them shewing their offences: vpon the one paper was written:
For drawing his sword, and raising mutinie against his Commander. Vpon the other, For running away from his Colours.

His name was HARRISON.

There was also a lieutenant that had taken fiftie pounds to discharge men that were pressed in Wales, he was disarmed by proclamation, and adjudged to repay the money and banished the army.

A souldier also in a dutch regiment that had killed one of his companions, was by order of marshall law tied to the partie murdered, and so throwen both into the sea: And in ffaroe afterward an English souldier was shotte to death by other souldiers, for killing a dutch sea Captaine. The lords Generals at Plimmouth also published a declaration of fust causes which moued her maiestie to set forth this flæte against the king of Spaine: admonishing also the subjects of all other princes and states, of their danger if they ayded the said king with shippes, victuals or munition, which was translated into Italian, French, Dutch and Spanish, and dispersed.

The souldiers were mustred at Plimmouth and trained euery day by their Captaines, Colonels and Commanders. The chiefe Commanders and officers of the army by land (besides the earle of Essex, and the lord admirall ioint Generals as aforesaid) were, sir Francis Vere lord marshall, sir John Winkfield Campmaster general, sir Coniers Clifford sergent maior, sir George Carew master of the ordnance, master Ashley secretarie, captaine John Buck princeps marshall, captaine Oliuer Lambert quarter master. The Colonels of the regiments of the army were, the earle of Sussex, sir Christopher Blunt, sir Thomas Gerrat, sir Richard Winkfield, and sir Edward Winkfield of the voluntaries: besides the regiments of both the generals, whose lieutenants colonsels were, sir Mathew Morgan, and sir VVill. Woodhouse, of equal rankes with colonsels: and besides the regiments of the lord Marshall, of the Camp-master, of the Sergeant maior, and of the Dutch, commanded or to haue bene commanded by the Count Lodowicke, and all these regiments contained not aboue 10000. men.

The Queenes
Prayer.

And in this meane time of all these businesse at Plimmouth, the Queenes gratefull (well considering that the lord of hostes blesteth the hostes and forces of godly princes, and giueth victorie to the faithfull armies) made a ve-rie deuout prayer to Almighty God for the good successe of the flæte, and sent it by Captaine Ed. Conway to the Generals, commanding that it should be daily saide throughout all the flæte. And here also they receiued instructions for appointing their priuate counsell for this expedition, viz. the lord Thomas Howard, sir W. Rawleigh, sir Francis Vere, sir George Carew, and sir Coniers Clifford: and here they ordered that there should be two flags tied to be hanged in the steeles of the lord Admiralls shippe about counsell causes, the one a flagge of the armes of England with a warning piece to call the select counsell, sell, and the other the flagge of S. George hanged in the same place to call the common counsell of all sea captaines and masters of shippes, and besides that euerie shippe in the flæte should hang vpon their misen yarde a white pen-dant foure elles long.

And they sent to euerie shippe certaine instructions sealed vp, with strait commandement to the Captaine the reed not to open them untill such time as they were come to the South cape, whilste they layed in the meane time to bee secured from the flæte by storme, or other misfortune: and if they hapned to be taken by the enemy, then to burne them so sealed ouer board. But for breuitie sake I passe ouer thus these and other like preparatiues to this iour-ney: and come to the matter.

By these instructions the day of Cadiz was appointed the Reiducus.

The first date of June all the souldiers and mariners being embarked, and the winde comming to the South-west and by north, the lord Admirall of England being aboard the Arke, commanded his master gunner to shote off a piece to giue warning to all the flæte to weigh anchor, and set sailes: which they did incontinent, and thus being vnder saile (the lord Admirall leading) they sayled the same date and night as farre as a promontorie in Cornewall called Wodmans point: but the winde scanting they were faine to returne againe, the greater shippes into the sound of Plimmouth, and the lesser shippes into Canslon bay by speciall caution of the lords Generals, least anye mariners should returne againe to Plimmouth: which they also prevented by sending commandement to the maior of Plimmouth that they should suffer no boates from the flæte to come ashore.

The next date following being the 3. of June we set saile againe, and in a good houre, for from that time till wee came to Cadiz, we had faire weather and the winde prosperous: but we neuer came within sight of Spaine till we came to the cape of S. Vincent, and thereabout vpon the 18. date of the same moneth the L. Admirall take an Irish Barke that came but a date or two before from Cadiz, of this Irish man the lord admirall enquired what forces were in Cadiz, what shipping in the Bay, what netues of the English flæte: to whom the Irish man answered, that in the towne were no forces more then ordinarie, but in the Bay there were 20. gallies and about 50. saile of shippes, whereof foure or fife were of those Gallions of the kings which are called the twelue Apostles, & two great Gallies, thre fregates, thre Le-uanticas or Argosies, two great Whiskines, the rest were merchants shippes rich, and most of great burden, and the lading of these shippes was munition, coine, wine, oyle, silkes, cloth of gold, gold lace, chicke silver and aboue 1500.
quintals of ware, and diuers other rich merchandise: and some were bounde for the Indies, some for Britaine, some for Lisbon, and some for other places: and that there was no speech (that he heard) of the coming of any English flæte thither. By this time the Earle of Essex was come aboard the Arke, and there was a flagge of the armes of England hanged in the steeles, and after consultation, and euery man returned to his owne shippe, the lords Generals battered their course to Cadiz, and vpon the 20. day of this mo-neth being sundae early in the morning we came all to anchor within halfe a league of S. Sebastian a frierie at the west end of Cadiz.

The Generalls attempted presently to land nere to this Frierie at a descent called the Calietta, they filled many boates and barges with souldiers, and leaders, but the weather was verie fowle, and the water went so high that two boates with some 80. souldiers armed sank, whereof some were drowned, the others by helpe of other boates were saued, and set aboord their owne ships againe. This mischance did not happen as anie token that God was displeased with our enterpryse (as the sequell shewed) but that we mischose the daie attempting so great a worke upon his daie of rest. And it was also a mercie of Almighty God: for we could not haue landed there without great difficulty and much losse, for besides that the place was strong of it selfe, the Spaniards had brought all the strength that they could to it.

The next daie being monday early in the morning, the Spanishe fleet which rode at our coming before the towne vnder the fortres and bulwarks thereof (by the aduise of Diego Soto master of the S. Phillip the Admirall ship) shot with the tide within the point of the maine land, and Castle of Puntall in the straites of the Bay: immediately after the English fleet weighed, and came to anchor nere the same place where the Spanishe fleet rode before, and there the fast S. Phillip and the rest plaide vpon our ships with their great ordnance, and the Gallies were very busie: but by the Generalls commandement sir John Winkfield in the Vanguard hauing some other lesser shippes joined to him, took them to task, and so lanced them that they were glad to seeke to saue themselves: they crept by the shore, first to the Puntall, and from thence into the Bay, and so to the Bridge called Puente de Suaco, where striking their masses and by helpe of certaine engines vpon the Bridge (contrarie to the expectation of the Generalls) they went rounde about the Ile of Leon, and came to Rota. But the eye and care of the lords generalls was chiefly fired vpon the Gallions and other great ships before mentioned: whereupon they resolved to send that most noble Gentleman and great sea Captaine the lord Thomas Howard to encounter with them in the Ponparcille, adioyning to him some fewe ships of the Quenes (for the place was so narrow that hardly ten ships could come to fight.) The other that were employed in this enterpryse with the lord Thomas, were sir Walter Rawleigh, sir Robert Southwell, sir Francis Vere, captaine Robert Crosse (aboord whom the Earle of Sussex was), sir George Carew in the Mary rose, and Captaine Alexander Clifford in the Dreadnought and the Alcedo of London. And although it were agreed in counsell that the lords Generalls should not hazard their shippes of greatest burthen and of most charge in those straites and thees; yet the earle of Essex could not endure to be onely a looker on in so honorable an action, but he put in amongst the thickest of them, and fought very gallantly: which the lord Admirall seeing (and being not able to bring in his owne shippe) took his long boat and went presently aboord the Espiranoze, & went into the fight also, taking with him his noble young sonne now the lord William Howard of Effingham: being at those young perces very desirous to seeke and share honoꝝ with the choicest captaiues at all hazards.

This fight lasted till past none, and then the Gallions being cruelly rent and torne, and so much slaughter in them, that the blood gushed out at the scuppit holes, some resolved to die to Porto Real, some to burne their ships, some ran their ships aground: diuers Spaniards lepte into the water, whereof some swamme althoꝝ, some were drowned, some taken, some slaine. The L. Admirall beholding this miserable spectacle of a conquered fortie in these distressed Spaniards swimming about their ships and craving mercie, had compassion of them, and took his boate and reue by and downe amongst them forbidding these cruelties, & preventing the firing of the Spanishe ships so much as was possible, which the Spaniards remaining aboord in this desperate beaten estate chiefly intended, and first they fired the S. Phillip a ship of 1500. tunnes, by whose side a pinnace of sir Robert Southwells was burned, but the men were saued. They fired also the S. Thomas, and the S. Juan (as Signior Fantonio affirmed to me in his house in Cadiz) but the other two Apostles S. Mathew, and S. Andrew ships of 1200. tunnes apiece were preserved from fire, and flats, and brought safe into England.

The battail by sea being thus happily fought and victorie obtained, the lords Generalls (not willing to lose any opportunity) presently set in hand the landing of the souldiers, and in a verie little space there was such diligence used, that the earle of Essex was aland nere the Puntall about a league from Cadiz, with 3000. shot and pikes: he was accompanied with the earle of Sussex, the earle Lodowike of Pallat, the lord Herbert sonne and heire to the earle of Worcester, the lord Bourke of Ireland, sir Edw. Winkfield, sir Robert Drury, sir Thomas German, sir Anthony Standen, master S. Laurence, master Alexander and master Will. Ratcliffes brothers, and diuers other gallant gentlemen aduenturers.

As soon as this lord Generall was landed he dispatched presently three colonels with their regiments to the Puente de Suazo, the Sergeant maior, and sir Christopher Blunt, and sir Thomas Gerard, with charge so to empelch the passage of that bridge that there might be no meanes left for any succours to come into the Ile of Leon to helpe the Spaniards, and to breake betwene that engine, by helpe whereof the Gallies might passe, and also to surprisise or force the Castle at the bridge foote called by the dutch Herods house: they did somewhat ruinate the bridge, and returned to Cadiz that same night. But the dutch (which presently after the Earles landing took the fort at Puntall) took also after ward that Castle of Leon at the bridge foote (as E. Metcranus writeth) but I neuer heard so much before. The Earle of Essex hauing for his guide Captaine W. Morgan, marched apace with his army toward the towne, although in no hope to lodge within it that night: vpon the way he was encountered with 400. or 500. canalleroes or haltsmen of Arres, and 600. or 700. footmen, but they were without any great difficulty beaten backe, and ran into the towne, offering to shut the gates: but the Earle made such haste as he entered with his troopes pell mell with them: and some made such shift to get into the towne that they climbed over the wals, helping our men by that meane another way to enter the towne if they could not haue got in at the gates, which they some learned and put in practise: and by this the L. Admirall was landed with his battaile of some 12025 hundred, and followed the earle with a berry round march: hee was accompanied with all the chiefe commanders by sea, and captaines of ships and their retinue, as the lord Thomas Howard, and sir Walter Rawleigh, who was not able to march so fast as the rest, by reason that he was hurt in one of his legs with a splinter in the fight with the Gallioons. There were also in this march the young lord William Howard, sir Robert Southwell, sir Edward Hoby who bare the lord Admirals ensigne, master W.

Paget, sir R. Leuison, master Philip Woodous, master John Townesend, mast.
Ri. Weston, master Mathew Browne, captaine Robert Mansell, master Miles Corbet, master George Bucke, master John Morgan, master Th. Woodous, and diuers other gentlemen aduenturers, and men of qualitic, whose names
I doe not now remember.

When the lord Admirall came into the towne, he found the Earle of Essex skirmishing and fighting with the Spaniards, who fought and fled till before him, others threw downe stones from the battlements of their houses, which annoyed much our soldiers, and some were hurt thereby. But after that the forces of both the Generals were ioyned together, the fight and resistance of the Spaniards continued not long, but they fled into the Castle and into the Cinabda or towne house in the market place adioyning to the Castle, and into other their strong places. And here sir John Winkfield riding vpon a nagge unarmed, hauing bene hurt before in the fight was shot in the head from a lopp in the Castle, whereof hee instantly died: yet before night the Cinabda was taken, and therein the Generals lodged that night, and they were mas-siera of the whole towne (the castle and the fort S. Philips excepted) both which also in the morning were rendred the one to the earle of Essex, and the other to the lord Admirall, and their red ensignes displayed vpon the tops and walls of them. And the next night the earle lodged in the frierie of S. Francis: and the lord admirall in the house of Don N. Ruygoes whose sonne was captaine of S. Philips fort, where he had thre or four hundred pikes and shot, and eight saire haile pieces of Ordnance, & wine and bread good plenty, as I my selfe saue being at the taking in of this fort by the commandement of the Lozde Admirall.

The conditions whereupon the Corrigidor and the rest of the chiefe of the towne yielded were these: they should haue their liues saued, and onely their wearing clothes permitted them: all the rest of their goods and wealth should be spoyle and pillage to the soldiers, and should pay besides to the Generals for their rancome five score thousand ducates: and for the payment hereof, the Generals took fouly of the chiefe Regidores, Cavalloeros, Clergie men and merchants for Rehenes or hostages, and brought them into England, and here kept them till the money was payde. And now proclamation was made that no Englishman should offer violence to any religious person, to any woman, or child, or any other of the Spanishe nation in Cadiz: and the Generals sent away boates, barges, and pinnaces, first with the Ladies and the religious, and then the men & all other of the inhabitants of Cadiz to Porto Santa Maria, excepting the Rehenes, and the prisoners of some English Captaines. The women were sould by the Generals to weare so much apparel as they were able to beare vpon them, and all their fewels: and because none of them should be spoiled by our ruder soldiers and mariners, the lozde Generals themselves stood at the water gates and saw their safe imbarking.

The lord Admirall also let go the rich Bishop of Cusco, who was his prisoner without any rancome, onely he promised to send him a horse which he had not yet perforce. In this interim also the L. admirall appointed the terce admiral to take some of the lesser of the Queenes ships and merchants ships (that died but little water for their more safetie) to go after the Spanishe shippes which were fled to Porto Reall, and there either to take them, or to sink or to fire them, if they would not yield. But while this was determined, offer was made of two millions to the earle of Essex for the sauing & ransoming of those ships and their lading: The L. admirall would by no means agree that the ships should bee left to the Spaniards, nor ransomed: but onely the merchandice. But the Duke of Medina Sidonia Admirall of Spainne decided this controuersie: for he being then at Porto Santa Maria, and alwaies ill affected to them of Cadiz, gaue order that the next morning before daie the whole flete at Porto Reall should be fired, which was put in execution: yet nevertheless our men made such haste thither that they recovered much merchandise and diuers pieces of ordnance & other things, but none of the ships could be saued.

Thus this whole flete which was valued by some of the best of the Spaniards at tenne or twelue millions of ducates, was all either taken, sunke, or burned in a short space. In the towne of Cadiz were 1500. pipes of wine, 2000. chests of sugar, great store of rice, much coine and plate and rich furniture in their houses: The S. had also much rich merchandice in his Wharfas or Warehouses, and a great deale of treasure in the castle, all which should haue bene preserved (and all that sooner else was the kings peculiar goods) for her maiesty by her right, if some had, or could haue performed the trust committed to them. But the losses which pinched the king most (his ships excepted) were the 1200. pieces of ordnance which were taken or sunke in his ships and his forces, and armor in his armorie to arme five or sixe thousand men. All which riches, treasure, munition, merchandice, victuall, &c. of the kings and of his subjects there aboard the ships and in the towne, I heard valued by Pedro de Castilla the kings Iudge of the contratation, and Don Juan de Soto a principall sea man, and Signior Fantonio the rich florentine, three graue and well experienced men) to bee worth twenty millions of ducates at the least.

These things being thus happily atchieued, and sir John Winkfield verte honorably buried in Santa Cruz the chiefe church of Cadiz, with all the fane-rall solemnities of warre, the drums and trumpets sounding dolefully, the shot bearing the noses of their pieces downward, the pikes trampled, his body was borne by six knights, the Generals threw their handkerchiefs wet from their eyes into the graue, and at the instant the most part of all the shot great and small aboard and ashore were discharged.
and

The 27. day of June being Sunday, the L. Generals with all the Chiefs and gentlemen of the army heard a sermon at S. Francisco. Where after dinner they made a great many knights, even all almost that did deserve it, or affect it, or not neglect and refuse it (as some did:) this great Indulgence of fortune, and exceeding access of honor to them in this achievement, made them not onely bountifull, but prodigall of honor. But two verie woorthie Captaines (which were hurt in the fights at the entring into the towne) were knighted before the towne was all won: sr Samuel Bagnol, and sr Arthur Savage. There was great dispute about the keeping of Cadiz, and the opinions of all the olde souldiers and seamen asked: but because it appeared not howe it might certainly at all needes be relieved with men, munition, and victuals, and for other causes best knowne to the Generals, it took no effect.

The next day being munday, the L. Admirall went aboard, to set things in order in the state, and to make ready for a new enterprise: and by his example also to drawe the sea men and mariners to their shippes that were loth to come out of the towne.

About this time the L. Admirall receiued (from his olde acquaintance, since 1588.) the Duke of Medina Sidonia Admirall of Spaine, two very honorable answeres to two letters which hee had before written to him about the exchange of prisoners, Spanish for English in the Gallies: the Dukes answer was that he liked well of the motion, and would do in it so much as lay in him. But (he saide) that that charge was more particularly in the Adelantado of the Gallies, to whom he would write, which he performed so effectually, that within a day or two the Adelantado sent a principall Captaine to the L. Admirall, and he made a full agreement for the exchange of English prisoners in the Gallies for Spanish prisoners in our shippes: and upon the sixt of July following, about 40. of our English prisoners were deliuered aboard the Arke by the Gally called La fama, and promise for the rest which was afterward duly accomplished. This gally La fama wherof Don Julian Hurtado was Captaine, came from Acota to the English state with a white flagge of safe conduct, according to the order of warre, but an ignorant sea Captaine made a shot at her as she passed by him, and hurt and killed three men in her, whereat the lord admirall was much grieved, and greatly offended with the Captaine, and threatened to haue hanged him: but the Captaine of the Gally and Don Payo Patin one of the Rebenes, made earnest suite to the L. Admirall for his pardon, which they obtained.

The Earle of Essex staid all this while in the towne with the rest of the commanders & captaines and companies of the army by land, which he suffered not to be idle. Upon the 28. day the ordinance was taken from the walls, Castles and fortres. Upon the 30. day of June in the night hee made a rode into the Tyle, and burned and rased and spoiled, all that mough: serue the enemy to any strength or reliefe. The next day he set ploners a worke to rase and besace the forts and castle in the towne. The first of July, the Tower of the Gualoa was battered downe. And lastly, upon the fourth of July set the whole towne on fire (the Churches excepted) and saw all his men embarked, & came aboard last. And the next day the whole state set sail, & sterd their course to the westward: and in the mean time besides the negotiation (which I spake of before with the gallies) the 6. of July the Generals sent a Pinnace into Barbary with 40. slauces which had escaped out of the gallies & came to them for succour. And about this time sr Anthony Atley was sent into Englande to make report to her maiestie what had passed hitherto, and for other secret affaires of the lords Generals.

From this time till we came to Frato, there was nothing done, but often meetings for consultation about their next enterprise, & how to get victuals & fresh water: seeing that the Gallies in a calm caught by a flieboat of ours bound for Engl. In this course we passed first by Acota, and by the point of Cypiona

The D. of Medina Sidonia's letters to the L. Admirall.

Chylona nere unto which lie the Rocks called the Salmedinas, and by the Duke of Medina Tower, or Almagana for Tunny fishing: and by Arenas Gordas in the mouth of the Bay of S. Lucar, and by Symont in Portugal, and then we doubled the cape S. Mary, and so came before Faro a principall towne of Algarua, where they resolved to land.

But first the Generals sent both their Lieutenants of their ships, Sir Amias Preston, and Sir Will. Mounson, and Captaine William Morgan, to discover the passage to the towne by the channel in their Pinnaces in the evening, and to view the place, to espie the forces, and to learne what flagge that was, which they saw at their coming before the towne, and to seeke for fresh water and victuals, and such like instructions. They brought answer the next morning, that the people were fled and had carried away their goods, and that they could not as yet finde any fresh water nor victuals: but yet for all this in the afternoon the lords Generals landed with all their forces: but the L. Admirall being not well, and having little hope of any reliefe there for their wants, returned aboard his shippe taking Sir Edward Winkfield with him, who was lame of a hurt which he had received at Cadiz in one of his legges, and indeed it was the earle of Essex his earnest desire that the L. Admirall (seeing him so ill) should returne to his ship and take that valiant knight with him. Whilst the lord Admirall lay here at anchor, the flate of the Gallies came, and anchored close by the English flate: but the L. Admirall sent a ship presently to them to command the in in his name to depart from thence and goe further off: which commandement they obeyed as readily, as if the Admirall of Spaine had sent it, and I rather note this because I thinke it was the first commandement that they ever obeyed, being giuen them by an enemy upon their owne coasts.

The earle of Essex being landed (as I said before) and being desirous to doe some exploit upon the Terra Firma of Spaine, being also provoked hereunto the rather by the enemy (who made byane shelves of horse and foote upon the coast all along) as we sayed by) he marched with his army that night to Faro (being about some two leagues from the place where we landed) he took the towne with ease, for the inhabitants had abandoned it and carried away most of their goods (as he was enformed before) there was in the Sumnerie some stiffe left, and in the Bishops palace, and a Library of booke valued at 1000. markes: there was also in the towne some fruites, and wines, and a few hennes: and in the fort there was some pieces of great Ordnance, whereof one was the fairest and longest Culuerin which the King of Spaine had, as it was esteemed. And here the earle appointed Captaine Brea a valiant gentleman, and of very able body, to march into the Countrey with 800. souldiers of the strongest, chosen out of bluer bands: he marched some two or thre leagues and found a towne called Locha which he took and burnt, without any resistance, but he saw a farre off troupes of horse and foote, (but none) approached him: but if any of his souldiers stragled, or were left sick by the way (as many were) hee found them at his returne pitifully mangled, some with their hands chopt off, some had their nostrils slit, and others killed.

In this journey he got aboute a hundred Cowes and Oxen, and some Swine, for victuall, and was brought by an old Portugall to a well of good fresh water, but small store: and so returned to Faro to the lord General, who after he had sacked and stered the towne, the third day returned to the flate.

And now being all aboard againe, the Generals with their counsell helde a new consultation that was else to be done, and how victuals and fresh water might be supplied: some had great desire to go for Lagos: but ere any thing was resolved, the flate was past the cape S. Vincent where a strong northerly winde took us and forced us to hale off into the sea some 80. leagues from the Cape, and towards the Isles of Azores: and here they called a counsell againe, and resolved to go for those Islands, there assuring themselves to have plenty of fresh water and victuals, and there to lie for the Caraks and West Indian flate, and to encounter with the 25. Spaniards men of warre, which lay at the Isles (as the Generals were advertised.) But neither did this purpose hold, for the windes coming contrarie, they held a new consultation, and that was to beare in with the coast of Spaine and Portugal, and to search what shipping was in the harbours thereof as they passed. And this course was thought the best, and kept for the most part untill we came before the Groyne & Ferola. From thence master George Buck was dispatched by the lords Generals to her maiesty, to make relation of that which had passed in the army since the flates departure from the Bay of Cadiz: and other particular busines of their Lordships for her maiesties service.

The L. Generals thus being come before the Groyne the first of August, and finding no shipping there nor in Ferola, now lastly resolved to come for England, and the rather by reason of the generall wants of victuals and fresh water, and for that there were many sick men in the Masspite and in bluer other ships of the fleet, and for a great leak that was sprung in the Mount-guard, and for that (which moved their Lordships most of all) her maiesties commandment that they should stay for but five months in this voyage. All which reasons duly considered, the lords generals now shaped their course directly for Engl., and upon the 7. and 8. daies of August they arrived with their whole fleet in Plymouth safely thanks be giuen to Almighty God, who hath so blessed her maiesty and her ministers in all her doings and enterprises, with so much honor and good successe, as he hath made her the mirror of all princely felicitie in this world. Thus far of the expedition to Cadiz.

The twentie nine of August, the Duke of Boloine being arrived in England, came to the Court then at Greenwich, and there by her Maiesties othe confirmed the league of amity and peace betwixt the two Realmes of England and France: and shortly after soldiers were sent ouer to aide the French, in their wars against the Spaniards.

Presently vpon the departure of the Duke of Bullion, the right honorable Gilbert Earle of Shrewsbury was sent into France to take the oth of Henry the fourth French king, for the confirmation of the saide League, as also to trust the said king with the order of the Cartar: the manner where of being carefullie obserued by M. William Segar then Somerset Herault, I haue set downe according vnto his owne description as followeth.

We departed from Dover on Thursday the 16. day of September 1596. and arrived at Depe in France the Thursday seauen night following, where both the Ambassadors, the right Honorable the Earle of Shrewsbury, and Sir Anthony Myldmay Knight, were very nobly entertained, and seated, the first night by the Commander of Depe, Mounseur de Chasse, who was invited the next day to dinner and requited by the Earle, and so during the unshipping of their horse, and other their provisions, their Lordships passed the time in hunting for two or thre daies.

Monday the 27. following, the Earle set forthwarde to Roane, the capitall Towne of Normandie, and was mette on the way by Mounseur Feruagues, and his traine, who conducted his L. that night to the Castle of Cleve, where he lodged.

Wednesday his L. proceeding on was encountered within two miles of the Citie of Roane, by the Duke Mountpenser, the kings Lieutenant the reof, and about 200. horse, of nobles and gentlemen his attendants, who bringing his Lordshippe to his lodging, after some ceremonies of honorable entertainment toke his leave: his Lordships lodging was in the market place, called Le March Veux, in a very faire house, furnished with rich hangings and tapits, thre clothes of estate, and two standing beds.

The Wednesday seuenight following, being the first of October, the king made his rofall entrie into Roane, in which entring sundrie messages passed betwene the king and the Ambassadors, praying them not to thinke the time long of his coming, for that he was to attende a preparation which the townes men had purposed for his welcome, having neuer bin in the citie before: the manner whereof, for it was verie princelie, and full of rare deuices, I haue thought good to insert.

In the suburbs of the towne on the farther side of the river, was newlie erected for the king a most statelie roome, made of plaister of Paris, where his highnes stode with his possibilitie to beholde the companies, and severall Classes both of horse and foote, and to receive the townes mens submissions as they passed, which was most humbly performed by fire of enerie company, and of his Maestie most grationlie accepted.

First the Order of the Friars Capuchins followed their Crosse, being of wood, vpon which a Crowne of thornes and thre great nayles were fast, their habit was Russet, all bepatched, girt with hempen cordes, shirtd with haire-cloth, and bare footed, wearing sandals onely. This order may haue but one habit for a man during his life, the same standing, and kleepe sitting, the pluse by almes, and are much esteemed of the people.

Secondly, the Gray Friars being Cordeliers followed their Crosse of silver. This order haue a Librarie in their house, containing fire and fiftie paces in length, with thre rowes of bookes all along, replenished with many excellent bookes both of Philosophie, and the fathers, the most parte Manuscript.

Thirdly followed the Carmelites, and Celestins. Fourthly, the Jacobins. Fifthly, the Augustins. Then proceeded the Priestes, and Chantres of the towne in their Surplices, singing, bearing 42. Crosse of silver, which was the full number of the parishes, and chappels in the towne, and every crosse had a great banner of a Saint, richly painted thereon, besides two tapers of white waxe in aulter candlesticks, borne by youths, and every taper armed with an Escutcheon of the kings armes.

Then followed the Spint-masters of Normandy, the merchants of the County of the River, Receivers, Customs, Treasurers, Advocates, Procurators, and other officers of the palace.

Then came Bachelers, and Masters of Arte, Doctors of Physicke, Civil lawe, and Diuinitie. All these degrees were clothed in very faire and reuerent garments, of damaske, satten, and blacke velvet, long and large, and for the most part riding vpon mules, distinguished by bidders that made way before them.

Then followed in Gownes of purple cloth, and hoods of the same, with square cappes on their heads, the Officers and Councillers of the Chamber of Normandie, in which is kept their high court of Chancerie, and Parliament.

Then came riding on mules to the number of foure in scarlet, called De la robe rouge, being Judges, and Officers of estate, belonging to the saide Chamber.

After them toke place, the foure Presidents of Normandie in Robes of scarlet, furred with Calaber, wearing on their heads great caps of maintenance of blache velvet.

Then proceeded the seuerall bandes of the Towne, containing foure regiments of foote, and thre coronets of horse, sited in greene, russet, and carthasian satten, and velvet, garnished with silver lace, their hats, plumes, scarfes, and shoes white: the furniture of their muskets, fether staves, and partisans, suitable to their colours, their ensignes, coronets, and standards all white, emblazoned with the kings armes, and enriched with his device, which was a Roseman H. Crowned, betwene two branches (as I take it) the one an Olive, the other a Laurel, his motto, or word, Has dedie, His dabit vrbis.

After

After vpon great Conlers rode for tie enfant d' Honeur o; Henchmen, the properest and thickest young men of the towne, laced in greene Weluet hoysmens coates, richlie laced with Siluer, their Caparisons and trappings admirable, their plumes, scarfs, and boates white.

Then came all the Galliauntes and young Gentlemen of the French court (cojacketing and fetching by their great horse) accompanied with blazers of the Nobilitie, as Barons, Vicountes, and Carles, the Kinghtes of the Saint Esprite were knowne by their blew Ribandes, and white Crosses hanging thereat.

The Chauncello; Monsieur Cheuemy rode alone after his mace.

The Archbishop of Rheims, did ride betwene the Bishops of Amolo and Carcuz.

Then marched the Kinges thre guardes after their Drummes and fifes. The Swilders with holte and pikes, the Scots and French with Halberds, the Kings Trumpets in hoysmens coates of greene Weluet, and vertie well mounted, then tooke they place, and sounded oftentimes, as they passed. Monsieur Suraine B. of the ceremonies, and one of the Captaines of the garde rode together, after whome followed thre Heraultes, Amolo, Picardie, and Byptaine, inuelled in rich coates of Purple Weluet, embroidered with the Armes of France, each bearing his name in capitall letters of gold vpon the left manch.

Then followed two Sergeants of Armes, carrying maces before the person of the King, who that daie was mounted on a white Courser, his olone apparell plumes, and hoyses furniture white, wearing the order of the Saint Esprite at a broad blew Ribande about his necke. About his person were his Guardes of Scottes, and certaine footemen in white. And after him followed the Duke de Neuers, Duke de Namours, Duke Joyeuse, and others.

It came thus the King going to the Citie, and let vs by the waie of preparation know how the same was ordered for his entertainment.

Some five or six daies before the King made his entrie, the Bailiffs of Roane commanded by sounde of Trumpet that all the strates through which his maiestie should passe, should be clenfed, sanded, and their signes taken downe, hanging forth their fairest coveringes, and Tapits at their Windows, and to erie Vive le Roy as hee passed. All which beeing in a readines, the Windows full of people of all degrees, the strates garded with certaine ensignes of muskets, and infinite numbers of common people in euery quarter.

His Maiestie by this time was come to an vtter gate betwene the bidge and the Suburbs, which in the late warre had bene more than halfe ruined. This gate in two or thre daies with plaster of Paris they had halfe repaired, and the other halfe remained in ruin for explication of a deuise, which was this. On the toppes of the Gate were certaine personages made of plaster, some carrying of stones, some mortar, some heaving, some leveling, and al to witte, that they seemed to want nothing, but vertie motion. Vpon the arches of the part repaired save Apollo, with his lyze, vnder whome in golden letters, was written this prophesie.

And ouer the Postall,

The King being past this gate, hee came to the first Gate of the Bidge, which was made of twelue columns about foureteene foote of height, the base bodie, Capitall, frize, and Cornish, after the order Ionica. Ouer the Arch the whereof in a table of embossed work save a personage representing Solomon, resting her backe against two Leoparbes (the Armes of the Dutchie) in her left hande, she helde a Hart, her right hande shee put forth to a figure, resembling the King, who seemed to raise her bp, vnder her was written, Damiferæ dextram, and ouer her certaine droppes distilling from the Heauens. Then in golden letters vnder the Kings armes (which was embased with lotus palmes) were these verses in French thus englished.

O doubled branches, for Conquerors ordaind,
If Henries name, for Crownes hath you not gaind,
Bowing downe your toppes, for to be wretched
You cannot giue him your honors triumphant,
No more then this streame, can yeeld water currant,
Valeffe from higher spring it be receiued.

The King hauing viewed the deuise, and read the verses, passing further vnder the rose o; bank of the gate, ouer his head certaine cloudes opened, and there descended vpon him the similitude of the holte ghost, and an angel presented vnto him a sword, called the sword of peace, before the opening of which cloud, a voice was heard, as from God saying:

Heavenly moouing spirits, stable intelligences,
Cleue through, make way for this sprites descent;
Presenting from one heauen, of thousand influences
To one speciall monarke, one speciall present.

Henries mine annointed, he feares me, I him loue,
Yeeld him due honor, the honor shall be mine:
All kings are Gods, and as my selfe above,
Dispose both good and bad, on earthly line.

The Angel descending saith:

Stay mighty monarke stay, the heavenly monarke sends
To thee this sword of peace, with good and happy day:
Take it, but in thy blisse, a modest heart intends,
Himselfe who raisech, fals; and Gods loue loofethraye.

He hath giuen thee the sword in fields victorious,
And that which to no other could be giuen so:
One more of peace did rest for thy hand glorious,
Receiue it from above, for to command below.

Threefold great by these, thou maist thrice happy make,
France vnder thee to yeeld, thy scepter greames bring;
Pursue this good (therefore) the price for gracious take,
The which about thy browes, makes thouland laurels spring.

The Angell ascending saith:

Reioice yet heaueus, since peace which yor hath lesse
Returned is on earth, to dwell with Henry,
Who for his neighbours good, of ioy berefte
Meris for his, that men one day be forye.

Earth do as much, tapet thy selfe with flowres
And sundry fruites, that henceforth may encrease,
All things without mans Art, or handy labours:
For golden age is where there reigneth peace.

Then liue thrice happy, and content this prince,
Who chiefe of world, and peace, is made this day,
Of all the world heele make but one province,
If there be kings, these kings shall him obay.

After these wordes delivered by the angell, the king proceeded out the hugge of Roane, which was garbed by five or six hundred swissers, al in bright armour, and Spanish pikes, untill hee came to the other gate of the hildge, which entered into the towne, the building of which gate was after the order rustique, rising thre degrees, baying upon the one corner of the first degree, a boynd with a Cupid riding on his backe, vnder which was written, Dux A- mor est fidei. And on the other corner, an Ore, with another Cupid, subscrbed, Vires fruantur Amore. Upon the corners of the second degree, stood foure Eritons, or mare men with trepents in their hands, and aboue them vpon the third degree, was created a personage representing Roane, with a lambe standing, and laying one foote vpon the knee of the figure, ouer which was written, Nowe, it is to be understood, the lambe is the armes of the Citie, which in an Epigram made vnto the king was thus described.

O King your lambe before our wretched boile,
Was wont to beare vpon her humble backe
The golden fleece, like that of Colchos Ile,
But certaine newcome Argonauts (alacke).
Haue her oft times so barely cut and thorne,
That on her body poore, and all forlorne,
You scarce with paine, can find at all to pull
One simple fleece, or litle locke of wooll.

The king passing through this gate, the towne had prepared for him a Ca-napie of purple velvet, richly embrodered with his armes, and device, and flower deluces streined all over, which canapie was carried ouer him by six henchmen

henchmen apparelled in the sute, from thence he went by the streets called La Rue du Pont. where was set up a very stately Pyramide, about 100. fute of height, on which was set forth in painting of Copper colours the labours of Hercules. vnder the topp whereof was a great Sunnie of golde, bearing the king crowned H vpon the points of his beames: the figure of this Pyramid was caried from the Bate, by a pedestall by foure Sophistes guild, and on the one side of the saide Bate, was written Hercules Gallicus, and on the other side in letters of golde vpon table, French verses thus Englished.

Hercules, and Henry, are semblable

In vertues, wordes, and Actes,

But that Hercules is in the fable,

And Henry in the Fades.

Here the king turned downe the streete called Ozou, where were set up two figures of plaister, vpon Antique Bases, both vndernamed in Greke characters. The first called Noble historie, held in her one hand a shalme, and in the other an Imperiaill Crowne, and scepter, treading vpon armour, and other martiall engines. The other figure was quite fighted Justice, holding a sword and ballance, and treading vnder her feete a number of blase, or maskes, signifying falsehoods, betwene them both was written in golden letters vpon a tur, certaine French verses to this effect.

Kings which for honour bore name of August

(Or happy Cæsars) preferred by History,

Acknowledge Henry more valiant and iust,

Would beare no other but the name of Henry.

So the kings passing through the streete named Le Rue de la Viscount, at the streets end opposite his coming forth into the high street, there was raised a docthe pillar about 20. fute of height, on the top whereof stood Fame, treading downe death, holding a crowned H on one hand, and a trumpet with a bannerroll of France in the other, which when the kings trumpets in passing by sounded, Fame raised her trumpet to her mouth, and seemed to sound also, turning her selfe round about, which motion was most cunning-lie wrought by an engine belowe within the Bate. And vpon the out-side of the Bate, leaning against the pedestall, sat Pallace, and Peace; treading vpon Enue, who was set forth like a scie, with haies of snakes, and a murdering knife in her hand. Over these figures sat Historie sitting, and looking vp to Fame, vnder whom were written these Latin verses.

Delicium historia, & fama sed vera canenti;

Henricum reges exemplar habet futuris;

Ut fuisse populos, & bello, & pace regat.

That:

That you may rule, and gouerne prosperously,
Your people both in warre and peacefull sort.

Under these verses was painted a Lion breathing forth Bees, but without either whistle, or allosion.

As being passing on through the Diall gate, there was an Arch, resembling Apollos temple, richly wrought of herbage, & fashioned like wreathed pillars; adorning to which was a little towre, wheron a wall was painted in prospect diuers Metamorphoses, as Daphne pursued by Apollo, & turned to a Laurel: Pan embracing Siringa, as she became a Reede; Europa & Iupiter, & such like. In which Arch was excellent musique heard, both for voice and instruments. All which being a while staid vnto by his maiesty, he proceeded to the Streetes end, turning to our Lady church (called Postcardame) where was erected a most magnificent Arch triumphall of plaitter, after the order Corinthique, on the toppe whereof upon a great Globe of the worlde, stood the Figure of the king in his Roman Robes, supported by two personages; the one Prudentia who crowned him with a crowne of Starres, the other Fortitude, who offered him a Scepter wreathed about with Laurell-bayes. In this Occasion, beheld him Clemencie; and round about him like aethers, ensignes, drummes, trumpets, and other martiall instruments: at either corner sate a huge Lyon of golde supporting the armes of France and Spawarte, and on the one side of the gate stood Enuie, bound in chaines feeding of her own hart, and on the other side a man of armes sitting a sleape on a drummes head, by whose side was written Securitie. Over the Diall-gate, vnder the Globe were written Latin verses thus translated.

To some for feare, to some for Clemencie,
Are prizes giuen; but fourth king Henrie
Excelling other kings in both, and both conioynde
In him by wisdom, hath also adioynde,
Vnto these three, a fourth (occasion)
Which if it stand, with lawes probation,
Hath sworne her selfe to be companion,
Yoking worlds to France by king Bourbonion.

Opposite to this Arch-triumphall, upon two Rustique pillars (distinguished above 20. fote asunder) stood two Figures of plaitter, the one of Saint Leuin in his Angly Robes, holding a Scepter in one hand, and a berge in another; on the top whereof was a hand pointing to the king which stood on the Globe, with this verse vnderwritten. Mille tua virtute mea maxima suis. The personage on the other pillar, was Sambetha, one of the Sibils, who likewise pointed to the kings proportion, and presented to the beholders a table with this prophete in Latin, Enligthes thus.

Sambetha I of Sibils chiefe, an Hebrew by offspring, Glad Oracles bring to the French, and vnto thee O king.

The

The earth did neuer boast her selfe of any child so much,

As France (O Henry) shall reioyce that thou their king art such,
Peace being to the people brought, a thousand armies strong,
Dreadlesse shall march and follow farre thy battailes all along,
Where Tagus, and Durias sweet, with goodly golden land,
And where Idume for thy selfe holdes wpoorthy palmes in hand,
Thou being Captaine, souldiers shall retorne with laden spoiles
Of Easterne and the Westerne wealths, and shall bring to their soiles, Triumphant signes, and trophies backe; O king their countrey wone, Fame shall etemall crownes thee giue, for that which thou hast done.
Lue thou therefore now all our yeeres, and Nestors longest date,
Worlds loue, to people giuing lawes, made quiet by thy state.

The king going through this Arch Triumphall, he presently entred the Cathedral church of Postcardame, with all the ecclesiastical pompe that might be, from whence, after certaine ceremonies which entertained him for a time, he returned more ppiately in his coach to his Court, being followed by a Cardinals house, adioyning to Saint Owens Church, and thus the kings entrie ended with the day, being performed with great honoz, charge, and appoyntments of all sorts of people.

The 7. of October, the right honorable A. L. Embassadors had audience of the king, who most princely received, embraced, and welcommed them both, as also all other the Lordes, Knights, and Gentlemen their attendants.

The 9. of October the fidelitie of the of confederation betwene the king and the Quene's maiestie of England, was very solemnly taken in the Church of S. Owen, in the presence of the French nobility. Lords spirituall, and tempozall, who that day tooke the right hand of the quire.

Sunday being the morrow after, the order of the Carter was most roally performed in the said Church, where both the Princes had their estates, and armes erected. The Quenes fidelitie being Sovereigne of this order had that day the right hand of the quire: & so had the right honorable Carle, her maiesties Embassador his armes, title, and stall accordingly. Before her maiesties estate sate Maister William Dechicke, Carter principall king of armes in his Robe of the Order. Before the Carle stood William Segar So-merlet Herault: Next vnto the Carle sate the Lord Embassador Liege. Then the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Rich. and all other knights and gentlemen according to their qualitie. On the left hand sate the king, betwene the two Bishops of Anioin, and Curent. Before the kings estate sate his Chancelor Monsieur Cheuery alone. And before him stood Anioin, Picardy, & Britaine, heraulds of armes. In the hals sate the knights of the Saint Eprit, who as farre as I doe remember were these, Duke Montpensire, Duke de Neuers, Duke de Namours, the Prince de Vaudemont, Duke Montmerancé Con-table, and his brother the Abbot, Duke Joyeuse, Duke de Bullion, the Marshall de Roz, and the Marshall Marignoni.

Of the fa-delitie taken by the French
king.

The French
king imposed with the order of the Carter.

All thing being accomplished with much honor, the kings maiestie innered and forth, the helpers ended, and the benediction given by a bishop in his Pontificalibus, the king taking the Carle by the hand, returned as they came, attended upon by the nobility, who two, & two proceeded before them. That night the king and the Carle supped together under one estate in the house of Duke Monpenser; where also was a generall feast for all the English.

The 14. of October the king took the Carle into his coach, and went to the bridge of Roan, to see a sea fight upon the River, which was performed by two French Shippes, against two supposed Spaniards, and one Brazilian (large boates armed and prepared for that purpose, with muskets, pikes and Hargubuze a Crooke) where after one houres fight, the Brazilian was sank, and the Spaniards forced to flee, by the French. This pastime was done by the townesmen, for the kings most delight.

The 15. the right honorable Carle with his attendants took leave of the Kings maiestie, and kissing his hand departed with great loue, honor, and reputation.

The sixteenth of October, his Lordship set forth of Roan, and came that night to Dape, being accompanied with the commander thereof, Monsieur de Chaste, where he remained for convenient passage, ten dayes after.

The 26. of October, the Quenes maiesties Shippes being come, his Lordship embarked himselfe in the Admirall, and arrived at the Portones nere Dover the day next following.

This yere, like as in the month of August, so in September, October, and November, fell great rains, whereupon high waters overflowing the low low grounds. Wheate and other graine grew to great price, so that wheate meale was solde at London for ten shillings the bushell, Rye at six shillings, Tyme at eight shillings the bushell, &c.

The 17. of November, a day of great triumph for the long, prosperous, and triumphant raigne of her Maiestie at the Court, the Carle of Cumberland Champion for the Quene, the Carles of Essex, Bedford, Southampton, and Suffex, with other, ran at the Race most bravely.

Sunday the first of December, great numbers of people being assembled in the Cathedrall church of Wells, in Somerseth shire, in the sermon time before noon, a sodaine darknes fell among them, a storme and tempest followed, with lightning and thunder, such as overthrew to the ground them that were in the body of the church, all which church seemed to be on a light fire, a tofome French fellowing some stones were thrown out of the bell tower, the wyers and pions of the hodge were molten, and no timber beams which tempest being ceased, and the people come to themselves, some of them were found to be marked with sundry figures in their bodies, and their garments not perished.

In the Countie of Kent, in the parish of Wickham, a mile and a halfe from the towne Southward, not farre from the East side of a common high way, called Wickham hill, leading from London towards Buckhurst in Sussex, two closes of ground lying together, separated with a hedge of Hollow albes, &c. On the 18. of December was found a part thereof for xii. perches long to be sunke vi. fote and a halfe deepe, the next morning xvi. fote moze, the third morning 80. fote moze at the least, and so from day to day, that great trench of ground containing in length about 80. perches, and in breadth 28. began with the hedges and trees thereon to loose it selfe from the rest of the ground lying round about it, & withall to move, slide, and shote Southward day and night for the space of xi. dayes. The ground of two water-pittes, the one vi. fote deepe of water, the other xii. at the least, and about xlii. perches over in breadth, having sundry tuftes of Alders and Aspes growing in the bottoms, with a great rocke of stone under them, were not onely removed out of their places, and caried towards the South, at the least foure perches a peece; but withall mounted aloft, and become hills; with their sedge, flagges, and blacke mudde upon the toppes of them, higher then the face of the water (which they had broken) by 5. fote, and in place from which they are removed, other ground (which lay higher) is risen, receiving the water lying now upon it. Somewhat in one place of the plaine selfe there is a great hole made by sinking of the earth, to the depth of thirtie fote at least, being in breadth in some place two perches over, and in length five or six perches. Elsewhere there is a hedge of thirtie perches long caried Southward with his trees, leaven perches at the least; sundry other sinkings there be in others places, one of fiftie and five fote, an other of thirtie and seaven, and an other of thirtie and foure fote, by meanes of all which confusion, it is come to passe, that where the highest hills were, there be the deepest dales, and the lowest dales are become the highest grounds. The whole measure of the breaking ground was at the last 9 acres, 7 day workes and foure perches, &c. The witnesses for testimony of truth hereof, were Robert Boocke Chiefe Justice of peace, James Aulkin, Sir Iohn Studley Vicar of Westham, Iohn Dawling Gentleman, and many other.

The moneths of December, January and February, continued cold and moyste, also March colde but by with extreme frosts, Aprill cold showers, May colde and drye, &c. by means of which weathering, and pouison for at sea, all kinde of victuals kept at an high price, as well fish as fowle, whilst meate and whatsoeuer, Butter was still sold for vii. d. or viii. d. the pound.

This yeare in the moneth of May, great preparation being made to the Seas, soldiers were pressed in the Citie of London, to the number of 550. and all their furniture was prepared at charges of the Citizens: these were daily for a long time trained in the fields also at the charges of the Citizens, out of which number was picked 400. the residue, were dismissed: these and other like picked men out of diuers Cities (besides soldiers) consisted of 6000. able men for land service, amongst the which were of Knights & gentlemen voluntaries, to the number of 500. or better, very gallant persons, and as handsomely furnished of all things necessary (besides superfluous in golde lace, plumes of feathers, and such like). These commanders were as followeth, Robert Deuereaux Earle of Essex, atwell Admirall by the sea, as Generall of the army by land, his vice-admirall L. Thomas Howard knight of the order, his vice Admirall Sir Walter Raleigh knight, captain of the guard, and L. of the Staranaries. For the land service, his lieutenant generall, was Charles L. Mountjoy knight of the order, his marshal of the field, Sir Frances Vere knight, colonell generall of the English forces in the Low-countries: master of the ordinance, Sir George Carew knight, L. president of the council: his seriant major, Sir Ferdinand Gorge knight, gouernor of 5 forts at Plymouth: the treasurer of the army, Sir Hugh Belsion knight, &c. The whole nauie deuided into three squadrons, consisted of 6. score saile, whereof 3. score were good men of war, the rest victualers, & ships of transportation of her maiesties ships, the number was 17. or 18. there were of this nauie 5. saile of good men of war, sent from the States of the Low-countries, to attend her maiesties fleet in this service, well manned & furnished. The residue of the fleet, consisted of the best shipping of London & other the most townes, together with sundry vessels belonging to the Lords & gentlemen adventurers in this voyage. The purpose of this preparation was for the taking of 3 Islands of Alores, which was resolved to haue bin taken & possessed by our Englishmen, there to haue placed strong garisons. This army & nauie meeting at Plymouth, embarked, & set saile about the ix. of July, but bring some 60. leagues on wards their iorney, there suddenly arose a fierce & tempestuous storme that against them, & so continued for 4. dayes, in so great violence that they were at forced back againe into Plymouth bayne, where they remained six weekes, ere all things could be ordered & repaired. On the 17. of August they againe weighed anchors, & set saile, making with many stormes & soile weathers, whereby they were dispersed, but on the 15. of Sept. they met at the Islands, where the gouernors of Flores and Euernes came to the Generall and himselfe themselves to him, bringing with them fruites and other fresh victuals, craving at his hands safeguard from the spoile of his men, which was granted vnder his seale.

At the Island of Fayall, the vice Admirall took a strong towne & forts thereof, boasting the country about, before the coming of the Generall thither, who refreshing himselfe & his followers there for some 4. dayes or better, he burnt the towne and brought away the ordinance both of the towne and forts.

In the meane time the Squadron of Flemings were playing their part in 5 parts of Pike, cancking the wines, & burning all 5 was within their power. The 26. of September, from Fayall the fleet made toward the Ile of Gratiola where they cast anchor, & presently came aboard our generall, 5 chiefe men of that Island submitting themselves & craving mercy, which they obtained by condition to send refreshing to the fleet, which they willingly performed.

From thence our fleet made for S. Michaels Island, & as they came very nere vnto it, two of the foremost ships of that fleet that of twisse or thysse, & bare by towards the Admirals ship, these brought newes of the Indian fleet, by them discovered, coming for the road of Gratiola, which the Generall had so lately left: vpon this intelligence our Admirall shot off a peece, & cast about, 5 like was done by the vice-admirall, & so through the fleet. Within few houres after, our fleet encountered & took the Spanish ships, coming from the Hauana. These ships made relation of 40. sailes of Indian men (whereof some 8. were freighted with the kings treasure) vpon this intelligence of the passing by of those Indian ships, our fleet followed after them to the Terres, where they were some 6. houres entered before, & had moored their ships so fast vnder the towne & fort (being one of the best portes of all Europe) that after a long dispute, our generall, and L. Mountjoy in the Desiance, & other tall ships bare in as close alongst the shore as they could, exchanging some 15. or 20. great shot with them, & so left the Ile of Tassora, & returned againe to S. Michaels Island, let fall their anchors before the towne, where, after diuers viols taken for a convenient landing place, it was at length agreed that Sir Walter Raleigh, should with all the strength of the fleet lie before the towne, whilst the generall, with all the land commanders and some 2000. men embarked into small barks & pinnaces, secretly in the night did conuey themselves about 5 point, to land at a towne called Villa Franca, some five miles off, where they arrived safe, & were laided by 5 next morning without any resistance. Those left in the best ships before the towne of S. Michael, did all that night vse their alarmes, to giue the land army the better means to go in secret, & to come vnbloked for on the land side of the towne of S. Michael, as was promised. They in 5 ships looked out all the next day, hoping to see their troopes marching over the hills & plaines, but the towne of Villa Franca, being seated in a pleasant soile, full of fruites, vines, and fresh victuals, the sellers stuffed full of Wade and wheate, the army was content there to ingarison six dayes together, feasting themselves and carping aboard of wheate, Wade, and other marchandise, into private mens ships, that followed for that purpose, whilst the fleet before Saint Michaels, gaped for the coming of their land army. A Bayell-man laden with sugar and Bayzell-wood, let fall his Anchor in the middle of them, & there whom they take as prize, and a little after him a mighty Carack followed, thinking (as the Brazil man did) our fléete to haue bene the Spanish Armado, whereupon the reuerend Admirall Sir Walter Rawleigh, commanded all the flags to be taken downe off our ships, that no man should know an Anchor, shot off a peece, or put off boate, but by direction: all which time the Carack bare in with full saile: but suddenly one of the Flemish Squadoon, contrary to all direction given before, hooped Anchors, hoysed saile, and made towards the Carack (now ready to double the point that entered the Roade) and made a shotte at her, whereupon the discovering our fléete to be enemies, changed her course, and ranne her selfe a ground hard under the Solons and Foyle, and there set her selfe on fier in many places at once. She was a ship of 1300. or 1400. tunnes laden with Sugar, and other rich commodities. This tragedie thus ouer past, our fléete againe looked out for comming of our land-armie, but all in vaine, for they neither came, nor sent, and thus was a great peece of seruice, very vnfortunatly neglected and lost. The same night the Generall sent to command all the fléete to wepe, and come for Villa Franco, so left they Saint Michaels god towne: and then approached the time of yere, that brought with it violent stormes, & foule weather to those Islands, whereof, upon the meeting of the whole fléete before Villa Franco, a generall commaundement was given, that all sorts should with speede repaire aboaze their ships, for the winde and seas began to rise. Thus on the 9. of October they set saile for England, and landed on the west coasts thereof, about the end of October. There were in this voyage taken, besides Spaniards, three god prizes that came from the Hauana, laden with Cocbinella, and other rich marchandise, besides the silver, golde, pearles, Cit, Muske, and Ambergrée. And these three prizes (whereof one was about 400. tun) by report of those marchants that came in them, were valued to be worth about 400000. ducats, and thus much for this voyage to the Isles of Afores, whereof Sir Arthur Georges knight, then Captaine of her Maiesties ship called the Walspight, hath largely written, and learnedly discoursed, in his Booke, intituled; A plaine and true relation of the voyage made vnto the Isles of the Afores, &c.

This summer arrived at London an Orator from the king of Polonia; Sigismund the third, sonne to Duke Iohn of Finland, that after was king of Sweden, and was a long while here in England. This Embassado; was named Paulus de Saline, a Gentleman of that Countrey, he brought letters of credence from the king dated the 19. of May last past, and had audience the 25. of July, at the Court then at Greenwich: whose oration in Latin beginning, Serenissima princeps, domina Clementissima, sacra Regia maiestas. Polonia dominus meus clementissimus, &c. The effect of his speech after princely congratulations, what god entertainment her Maiesties subjects had in his dominions, as his owne subjects, and contrary to which, his subjects were in England deprived of all their former olde priuiledges, and liberties of trade, graunted them by her Maiesties predecessors, and consequently were deprived of all trade and traffique on her kingdome. And notwithstanding his

subiects hath made severall complaints, of the which he must haue a care, he could not be moued to diminish any part of his god will toward her Maiestie, and her subiects, but there was of late set forth certaine Poets and exclamations, by the which contrary to the law of nature, his subiects were forbidden the nauigation and trade into Spaine, and under colour thereof, diuers ships of his subiects had bene taken at sea, and their goods made prize, and confiscated, with moze the like iniuries, all the which were such, that it touched not only his marchants, of whom he must haue a care, but likewise all the vniuersall nobilitie of his kingdomes and dominions, for that by the trade, both consist all their linings and reuenues, so that no greater iniury can be done to the king his maister, and the states of his kingdomes: yet for his brotherly loue to her Maiestie, he hath suspended those means of doing the like to her Maiesties subiects, which meanes her Maiestie doth know, he doth not want: he thought good to procede with patience, and so to aduertise her Maiestie thereof, as a good neighbour, and Princes duty doth require. And so: that letters hitherto haue not bene regarded, he had now sent him to require her Maiestie, according to equitie, to make reparation and restitution, and that the trade Westward to Spaine might be free, as it ought to be to all men; by the law of nations, otherwise the king his maister would no longer neglect his subiects losses, but to take in hand such necessary means as might be required. As for the Quenes warres with Spaine, that ought not to hinder his subiects nauigation, by the common law of nature, and there was very olde and good friendship betwixt the king his maister, and the king of Spaine, and betwixt the house of Austria: the King his maister, hauing now renued the olde amitie, by marriage with a daughter of Austria, so that he is bound to maintain the friendship with the king of Spaine, as well as with her Maiestie, euer his request bearing such equitie, he doth trust that her maiestie will take regarde of his protestations, and commaund satisfaction, &c. commending withall some particular sorts and causes. This Oration was presently, learnedly, and eloquently answered by her Maiestie, also in Latin: the effect whereof in English followeth.

Wh, how is I deceiued? I looked for an Embassage, but thou hast brought a complaint vnto mee. I vnderstand by thy Letters, that thou wert a Legate, but I finde thee a Herault, neuer in my life heard I such an Orator of Polonia. I maruell truly, I maruell at so great and such vnaccustomed boldnes in a publick assembly. Neither doe I thinke, if the King were present, that he would say so much, but if peradventure he hath committed any such thing to thy charge (which surely I much doubt) this is the cause: That where the King is young, and not by blood, but by election, and newly elected, doth not so perfectly vnderstand the cause of handling these busineses with other Princes, which eyther his auncestors haue obserued with vs, or perhaps others will obserue, that afterward shall succede in his place. For thy part: Thou seemest to mee, to haue read many bookes, but not to haue come vnto the bookes of Princes, but altogether to be ignorant what is convenient amongst Kings: For thou that makest often mention of the lawe of nature, and nations, knowest that this is the lawe of nature and nations, that when warre doth happen amongst Princes, it is lawfull for the one of them to intercept the warlike helpees of the others, brought from any place, and to beware least they fall to the losse. This I say is the lawe of nature and nations. Whereas thou dost rehearse a new assistance with the house of Austria, which now thou makest so famous, forget not that there have bene of the same house, that would have bereft the kingdome of Polonia from thy king. But for the rest, which be not to be spoken of, at this place, and time, because they are many, and to be considered of, one after another: Thou shalt expect that, which thou shalt understand of some of my Counsell, to whom I will assigne this matter. In the meane time farewell and be quiet.

Shortly after, the sayd Orator, or Poland Embassadour, was called before certaine of her highnesse honorable private counsell, to wit, the Lord Burghley then high Treasurer, the Lord high Admirall, Sir John Forrester, and Sir Robert Cicell Secretary: to whom, after the sayd Poland Embassadour had delivered his speech, which he made before the Queene in writing, and excused his rough kinde of speaking, shewing that by his Commission signed, and sealed by the King in the assembly of the States of Polonia, he was therunto empowered: he received a large answer in the name of her Maiestie, which properly pertaining to the matter of the Spanes, and answering fully and very pertinently the question made by them about their olde privileges, and is set downe to the full, in a Booke intituled, A Treatise of Commerce.

Great price of bread in Copie. In this month of August, the price of Wheate at London fell from xiii. shillings the bushell, to ten shillings: Ale from nine shillings, to five shillings, and so to three shillings two pence, but then arose againe to the late greatest price.

Embassa. do. from Denmark. This yeere also, Arnald Whitfield Chancelloz of the realme in Denmarke Embassadour, and Christian Barnikan his assistant, from the king of Denmarke arrived here, and were lodged in Fenchurch Street: these had audience at the court then at Ribals in Essex, on the seventh of September, they made certaine requests, which her Maiestie presently answered without pause, to every point of their Embassage.

Embassa. do. The first, he required that where as there had remained a long league of amitie betwene the two Crownes of England and Denmarke, both in the life of the late deceased king and his predecessors, that it might please her maiestie to continue, and continue the same to the king his maiester, now newly adopted and crowned.

Her Maiestie. Her Maiestie granted thereunto, on condition the king his maiester would promise no worse then his progenitors had done, and in all Christian love accepted thereof.

Embassa. do. His request was, that whereas there was great and continuall warres betwene betwene her Maiestie and the King of Spaine, whereby much Christian blood was shed; to the king his maiester, and all other Christian Kings great griefs, and to the great damage, and danger of Christendome, that it would please her maiestie, if in her wisdom she did see it convenient, to give her consent, that the king his maiester might make a motion of peace, and if he found both parties thereto addicted, to procure further for the effecting thereof.

Her Maiestie replying, sayde, she thought the king his maiester was too busy going to knowe the cause of the breach of the league betwene her Maiestie and Spaine, and as it was not broken by her Maiesties consent, nor by any of hers, so it should not be sued nor sought for by her maiestie, nor any in her behalfe, for sayde she: Knowe now, and be it knowne to the king your maiester, and all princes Christian, or Heathen, that the Queene of England hath no neede to craue peace, for I assure you (sayde she) that I neuer endured one houre of feare, since my first coming to my kingdome and subiects.

Embassa. do. He was to desire, if it might stand to her maiesties good liking, open trade like with Spaine, and that the goods might not be staide on the narrow seas, as it hath heretofore bene.

Her Maiestie. Here Maiestie said, if any his maiesters or subiects goods were so stayed, it was to her unknowne, but if he had any such iust complaint, he should (the matter being made to her counsell knowne) have such redresse, as should well content his maiester, and subiects.

Embassa. do. He was to returne the Charter that her Maiestie had bestowed upon the king lately deceased, as the manner of all foraine Princes is to do.

Her Maiestie. Her Maiestie accepted thereof, but told him she was lothe to receive it of him, for thereby she was put in minde of the losse of a most honorable brother and loving friend, and so that she were assured of his kings love & felicity in the like sort, she would hereafter to his king his maiester do the like favour.

Embassa. do. The Embassadour having his Audience the day that her Maiestie was borne took thereby occasion to say, that when it had pleased God, on that day (which hee was informed was her Maiesties birth day) to glorifie the world with so gracious a creature, who had brought so great happinesse to the Realme, and the neighbour kingdomes, hee doubted not but that the king his maiester should in that happy day, have an happy answer of his request, &c.

Her Maiestie. I blame you not to expect a reasonable answer, and a sufficient, but you may thinke it a great miracle, that a child borne at foure of the clocke this morning, should be able to answer so learned and wise a man as you are, sent from so great a Prince as you be, about so great & mighty affaires you speake of, and in an unknowne tongue, by three of the clock in the afternone. And with him more prudent and gracious words she ended, and gave him leave to depart.

The 24. of October began the Parliament at Westminster: on the which day diuers people were smothered, and crushed to death, pressing betwixt Whitehall, and the Colledge church, to haue seene her maiestie and nobilitie riding to the said parliament, Sir Thomas Gerrard knight-marshal, and his men making way before them.

The 27. of October, her maiestie went by water to the parliament house and prorogued the said parliament, till Saturday the first of November.

This yere against Christmas Pepper was solde at London for eight shillings the pound, a matter then much noted, considering that not many yeares since, a great Carreck richly laden with diuers marchandise, was taken at Sea, brought to our coasts, the goods thereof in smaller vessels connased to London, and layde vp in the Leaden hall, where the Pepper by Marchants of the Citie, was valued to be worth one hundred thousand pounds, appointed there to be solde, which was done, with restraint that no Pepper (by way of Marchandise) should be brought into this Realme, before sale of the former. About the latter end of May, or beginning of June, Calais and other townes in France, lately holden by the Spanish nation, were upon compositions of peace rendred to the French king.

The Queens of England, for the congratulations of the late marriage solemnized at Copinague the capital Citie in the Realme of Denmark, between Christian the 4. King of Denmark, and the daughter of the Marquis of Brandeburge one of the Princeps Electors of the Empire: abiding, the Lord Zouch theither in Embassage, being assisted by Christopher Perkins Doctor of Lawe, who departed from her in Easter the 1. day of June. The second point of this legation, contained the recommendation of certaine complaints exhibited vnto her Maiestie by her Marchants trading into the East parts, touching a late arrest and detention of their goods in the same, amounting vnto the value of one hundred thousand Talers, vpon a pretect of false and untrue entries of their marchandise, to the detranding of the Kings customs. At which concealements and imputations of fraude, the Marchants themselves pertained in themselves a cleare will, supplying the making of their entries agreeable vnto the custome and usage in all other places, for marchandise of the like natures. Wherunto it was on her Maiesties behalfs desired, that it would please the King to enter into some indifferent and honorable consideration thereof, according to equitie, and to extend his clemencie vnto the Marchants in the release and restitution of their goods, if there should not appeare any fraude in form. Vpon some debating of the cause betwixt her Maiesties Embassador, and his assistant, and some other of the Kings counsell appointed to conferre with them therabouts, and these Danish Commissioners, still insisting vpon the iustitie of the considerations, the King in conclusion condiscended in regarde of her maiestie, to yelde vnto a restitution of thirty thousand Talers. At which offer, if it should please her Maiestie to accept, he would expect her resolution, vntill the feast of Saint Michael the Archangell next. The Lord Zouch and Doctor Perkins hauing receiued their small auctoritie from the King, departed from Copinague the 13. of Iune to Holofner, where the next morning they set saile for England, and returned to her Maiesties presence the first of August following.

In the month of September following, Doctor Parkins was againe disported in a shippage unto the King of Denmarke, to demand a generall restitution of all such goods of her Merchants as had bene arrested and confiscated: for considering that they still complained of the rigor of his commission, and adduced the matter of their entries according to the usage accustomed both here in her Majesties Custom house in England, and in all other countries, whether they resorted for traffike. The Queene reliev'd nothing satisfied with the late offer of the thirty thousand Tallers made unto her by the King. Wherefore in regard of this her Majesties second legation, the King added unto the said graunt of 30000. The month of March, April, & May, cold & dry, but on Wednesday great rains, and high waters, the like of long time had not bene seen: the month of June, and July, hot and drie for the most part, thus much for weathering.

This yeare in the month of August, the beginning thereof, pollicie preventing danger feared to happen, by occasion of some preparation of shipping to have been made in Spaine (as was presumed) to the accompanie of this our estate. And so it followed that on the five & twentieth of August, being Saturday night, postes were sent after them, to recall the horsemen, presently to returne to London, with all speed possible, in which charge they prepared to performe. But on Monday following the said postes, were likewise sent to staye them at home, or to returne them backe, whose forwardnesse in service of her majesty was lacke, as the like hath not bene seen, or heard of, towards any place of this realme, or other, to the great honour, and comfort of her Majesty, whom God had blessed with so dutifull, loving, and obedient subjects.

The 26. of August being Sunday, before five of the clocke in the morning, by commandement from her Majesty, the 3000. soldiers, trained up by the citizens, were all in armour in the streets, attending on their Captaines till past 7. of the clock, at which time, being thronged by wet by a great storme of raine, they were sent home againe for that day.

It snowed on the 4. of April, which whole month following, with also the month of May was colde and drye, frosts every morning (except some three daies little raine) which coldnesse of the spring, & drynesse of the ground, made men doubtfull of any good harvest to succede, whereupon, and by meanes of some late transpozting over the seas, procured by the Justices of the shires, but more by unconscionable farmers hoarding by their cozne, badgers, and other cozne-mongers, keeping the same from the markets, as extorting what price they liked, even upon a fodaine, namely, Wheate was raised from three shillings to five, seaven and eight shillings the bushell, still increasing their price. Untill the Queene published by proclamation that her Majesty had, not onely recommended precisely to her counsell and other principall ministers, that all manner of graine might be kept within the Realme, but likewise directed them to punish such ingrocers, and sellers of cozne

In the moneth of July, the Citizens of London set out 500. souldiers in to Ireland, with their furniture, also out of diuers shires were like wise furnished and set out for the warres.

This yere in the moneth of Aprill, Richard Bishop of London, with two other Commissioners, to wit, Christopher Parkins Doctor of Law, and Doctor Swale, was sent in Embassage to Copen, there to treat with Commissioners from the King of Denmarke, according to appointment, but the Danish Embassadors, having bene there, and their commission expired, were returned, whereupon our Embassadors also returned into England the eight of July next following. In which service the said reverend father, so wisely, humbly and honourably behaved himselfe, that her Maieslie very graciously accepted of his proceedings.

The fifth of June the Carle of Essex was called before the councill, at the Lords keepers, where for matters laide to his charge, he was suspended from his of diuers offices, and till her Maiesties pleasure to the contrary, to keepe his house as above, &c.

Upon Wednesday the 16. of June, in the countie of Suffolke, at a towne called Kyles, and other townes adjoining, a great tempest of haile, most of the stones as great as Walnuts, to be taken by the Friday following by handfull, waisted to the bignesse of hassell nuts, many of the stones the length of a mans finger, bent and rugged, the force of the fall of them was so great that they brake the glasse windowes of houses, beate downe the leaues of trees, hore downe the wheat and hempe to a very great quantitie &c.

On the first of August, Charles James king of Scots in Scotland escaped a strange and strong conspiracie, practised by the Carle Gowrie and his brother, as at large appeareth in a booke thereof extant, first published and printed in Scotland, and since in England.

A Peace being concluded at Gerain in France, in the yere 1598. betweene Henrie the fourth king of France and Aquaine and Philip the second king of Spaine: the Queenes Maieslie of England was likewise invited by the French king, her Confederat and Allie, to dispose her selfe into a like treaty of Amitie with Spaine. To the effecting whereof, he had procured the consent of the king of Spaine then living. After whose decease, Philip the 2. succeeding his father in the Crowne, the same was againe retrained and solicited by Andreas of Austria the Gouernour of the low Countries, and the Bishop of Constance, both for the house of Burgundy & kingdom of Spaine, afterwards ratified by the Archduke Albert returned out of Spaine with the Infanta his wife. Upon which former promise made by the Maieslie, she was at the length induced, to condescend unto a treatie of peace at Volougue in France, a place chosen by mutuall agreement on either side, with the assent and good liking of the French king: whether both Princes sent their Embassadors, furnished with ample power and authority in that behalfe, where the English Embassadors arrived the twentieth day of May in this present yere of our Lord God 1600. being the day prefixed for this assembly, and the Spanish the fourteenth of the same moneth. The Commissioners on the English side were these: Sir Henry Neuill knight, her Maieslies ordinary Embassador resident with the French king, Iohn Harbottle Esquire, her Maieslies second Secretarie of State, Robert Beale Esquire, her Maieslies Secretarie in the Spanish parts, and Thomas Edmonds Esquire, her Maieslies Secretarie for the French tongue. The Commissioners for Spaine were Balcaza de Caniga & Fonseca, Embassador resident for the king of Spaine, with the Archduke of Austria in the lowe Countries, and Ferdinando Carrillo Doctor of the Civil lawe: unto whom were adjoined on the Archdukes part Iohn Richardot president of the Councell of the sayde Archduke, and Lewis Verreyken the sayde Archdukes Audienter. The Commissioners on both sides being viewed and considered of, some question for the precedence and superiortie of place fell into disputation and debate, her Maieslie challenging the same as due unto her before the time of the Emperour Charles (as appeareth by Volaterran) in the time of king Henrie the seventh her highnesse grandfather, when this selfsame difference betweene both these crownes coming into question, the Pope preferred England, and adiudged unto this crowne the most honorable place. But for as much as the same was contradicted by the Spanish Commissioners, who not onely refused to yield preecarance unto her Maieslie, but also to admit of an equalitye, or of any other indifferent and middle course, whereby the honor of her Maieslie might be preferred: the present treatie (which hitherto was performed only by some private negotiations and conferences of some one or two of the Commissioners on either side, without coming to any generall meeting or colloquie) was on the second day of August in the yere aforesaid for this time belaid, and by mutuall assent of the Commissioners on both sides, according to their severall authoritties respectively granted unto them in this behalfe, suspended, untill the end of thrie dayes following, in which meane while it might be understood what should be the determination of both Princes for a further proceeding in the said Colloquie of peace, at some other time, and place, wherein as yet no certaine resolution hath bene hitherto taken.

About the 8. of August, arrived at Dover, certaine Embassadors and assistants, firste in number, sent from the King of Marocco, in Barbaria; these were by certaine English Gentlemen conducted to Grauesend, and from thence, by Sir Thomas Gerrard knight marshall, & other gentlemen, with the Barbarie merchants, towards London, where they were landed at the Tower, upon the 15. of August, from whence they were conveyed in foure Coaches to the Royall Exchange, and there lodged in the house of Anthonie Radcliffe Esquire, of London merchant taylor.

The 20. of August they rode in Coaches through Cheape, to Westminster, from thence by water ouer to Lambeth, and thence againe in Coaches to the Court at Ramesbury, where they were honourably entertained, and and returned the same night to their lodging at London.

About the last of August the Earle of Essex was set at libertie.

The 10. of September, the sayd Embassadors of Barbarie were againe conueyed to the Court then at Watlands, there to take their leaue of her maiestie, but were required to stay to see the Jousting and other triumphes at Westminster on the seventeenth of September.

In the month of September soldiers prest, in, and about the Citie of London, to the number of three hundred and fiftie masterlesse men, vagrant persons: and such like out of other parts of this Realme to be sent into Ireland: Divers of them running from their Captaines and Colours, being afterwards taken, were hanged for example to other.

The 18. of September, certaine Embassadors from Muscouie, or Russia, landing at the Tower wharfe, were there received by the Aldermen of London in scarlet, the Muscouie merchants, and a number (about two hundred) of the principall companies, in velvet coats, and chaines of golde, all well mounted on horsebacke, conveyed them riding in eight Coaches, from the Tower up to Abgate, from thence to the Leaden hall, downe Grace Stréete, by Fenchurch Stréete, and then downe Rode lane towards Bellingsgate. and there lodged in the house sometime pertaining to Sir Cuthbert Buckle Maior.

The 14. of October the said Embassadors from Russia & Muscouia, rode to the Court and had audience before her maiestie.

This yeare the most reuerend father Iohn Whigif, Archbishop of Canterbury, did finish that notable & memorabile monument of our time, to wit, his hospitall of the holy Trinitie in Croydon, in the County of Surrey, by him there founded and builded of stone and brick, for reliefe and sustentation of certaine poore people. As also a faire schoule-house for the increase of literature, together with a large dwelling house for the schoule master his use, and these premises by thorough Gods favorable assistance in his owne life time performed, and perfected, for that (as my selfe haue heard him say) he would not be to his executors, a cause of their damnation, remembering the good advice that an ancient father hath left written to all posteritie: Tutor vult esse, ut bonum quod quisque mortem sperat agi per alios, agat dum vivit ipse. per se: It is a way farre more safe for a man to doe good and charitable deedes by himselfe whilest he liueth: then to hope that others will doe the same for him after his death.

On Thursday the thirtieth of November, her Maiestie being most honourable attended on, by the Prelates, Nobles, and Judges of the Realme, was receiued neere unto Chelsep, by the Lord Maior of London, with his brethren brethren the Aldermen all in Scarlet, besides to the number of five hundred Citizens, in coats of Velvet, and chaines of golde, on horsebacke, euery of them having two staffe torches to attend on them; And they all waited on her, to her royall Pallace at Westminster.

The 17. of November, & the 43. yeere of her maiesties raigne, there were most princely Jousts performed at White-hall in honor of the queens holday, by three earles, foure lordes, tenen knights, and nine gentlemen, her maiesties pensioners. At these iousts was so great an assembly of people, as the like hath not bin seen in that place before: There were also present sundry embassadors, as namely from the French king, the king of Barbary & c, & the emperor of Russia. There was no great harme that hapned (thankes be God) considering the multitude; but that one arme or branch of a great elm broke, which stood in the Parke, by being overladen with people, and from whence there fell three men, that were sore brused, and dangerously hurt.

The first of February in the morning, being Sunday, a great tempest of wind beyond Saint Giles field without London, towards Tisburyne, brake the Wind-mill there, the Miller was throwne one way, an other man an other way, one towards the North, the other South, a part of the Mill rose, and halfe the Millstone, on the like manner, throwne one way, the other halfe an other way.

The Citizens of London, were by the Quene commaunded, to cause certain Gallies to be made and furnished to Sea, towards charges where, of three fiftie, were at that time collected of the Citizens.

The third of February, the Embassadors from the Emperour of Russia, and other the Muscouites, rode through the Citie of London to Marybone Parke, and there hunted at their pleasure, and shortly after returned home, ward.

The Crosse in West Cheape of London, was by commaundement of the Quene, and letters from her Maiesties honorable counsell, to Sir William Rider, then Lord Maior, partly repaired, the old Crosse on the top being rotted, was taken downe, a new Crosse of timber was framed and set up, covered with Lead, and gilded, the body of the Crosse downeward, was cleaned of dust, &c.

Sunday the eight of February, about ten of the clock before none, Robert Deucieux Earle of Essex, assisted by sundry noble men and gentlemen, in warlike manner, departed from his house by the Strand, and entered the Citie of London, at the Temple-Barre; crying for the Quene, for the Quene, till they came into Fenchurch Stréete, and there entered the house of William Thomas Smith, one of the Shyrcers of London, who knowing himselfe not master of his owne house, by means of the strength the Earle brought with him, and being ignorant of his intent and purposes, conveyed himselfe out at a backe-gate to the Maior; whereupon the Earle with his troupe returned into Fenchurch Stréete to an Armourers house, where they required Armour, which was demped there; then went into Graue Stréete, where perceiving himselfe with his adherers to be proclaimed traitors, as also the Citizens to be raised in armes against him, he with his followers hurrying by and done the Citty, towards evening, would haue passed at Ludgate, which was closed and defended against them, so was he forced to returne to Queene-hith, and from thence by water, to his house by the Strand, which house he fortified, but understanding that great Ordinance was brought to haue beat it downe, he yielded, and was conveyed to the Tower about midnight.

Captaine Thomas Lee was dyatone to Libbyne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered, being before condemned, for conspiracie against the Queene, about deliuerance of the Earle of Essex out of the Tower, he took his death constantly, confessing he had diuers wayes deserued it, but to be innocent of that he was condemned for, &c.

John Pybushe, a Seminary priest, after seauen yeares imprisonment in the Kings bench, was hanged, boweled, and quartered at Saint Thomas Waterings, for coming into England, contrary to the Statute of Anno. 27. of the Queene.

Robert Deuerieux Earle of Essex, was arraigned at Westminster, and found guilty of high treason, as more at large appeareth in Bookes thereof extant, published by authority, wherefore I will forbear to set downe in this place any further of that matter of his arraignment.

Robert Deuerieux Earle of Essex, then being Athwodesday, about eyght of the clocke in the morning, was the sentence of death executed upon Robert Deuerieux earle of Essex, within the Tower of London, where a Scaffold being set up in the Court, and a forme nere unto the place, whereon sat the Carles of Cumberland, and Hartford, the Lord Vice-count Bindon, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Darcy, and the Lord Compton. The Lieutenant, with some sixtene Partizans of the Guard was sent for the Prisoner, who came in a Colone of wrought Metal, a blacke Sattin sute, a felt-hatte blacke, a little Ruffe about his neck, accompanied from his Chamber with three Minions, Doctor Montford, Doctor Barlow, and Maister Ashton his Chaplaine: then he had requested not to part from him, but observe him, and recall him if epher his eye, countenance, or speche, should betray any thing which might not become him for that time: All the way he desired the spectators to pray for him, and so arriving on the Scaffold, he bailed his hat, and with obey, came unto the Lords, to this effect he spake, viz.

My Lords, and you my Christian brethren, who are to be witnesses of this my last punishment, I confesse to the glorie of G D D, that I am a most wretched sinner, and that my finnes are more in number then the hayres of my head, I confesse that I haue bestowed my youth in wantonnesse, lust, and uncleannesse, that I haue bene passed by with pride, vanitie, and loue of this worldes pleasures, And that notwithstanding diuerse good motions inspired into me from the spiritte of God; The good which I would, I haue not done, and the euill which I would not, that haue I done. For all which I humbly beseech my Saviour Christ to be a mediator to the eternall spaciouse for my pardon especially for this my last sinne, this great, this bloudie, this crying, this infectious sinne, whereby so many haue for lone to me bene dyatone to offend God, to offend their Soueraigne, to offend the world: I beseech God to forgive it vs, and to forgive it me most wretched of all: I beseech her spaciouse, and the state, and spiniffers thereof, to forgive it vs, and I beseech God to send her spaciouse a prosperous raigne and a long, if it be his will: O Lorde graunt her a wise and understanding heart: O Lorde blasse her and the Nobles, and the spiniffers of the Church and State, And I beseech you and the world to holde a charitable opinion of me, for my intention toward her spaciouse, whose death I protest I neuer meant, nor violence towards her person: I neuer was, I thanke God Althit, not beleuing the worde and Scriptures: neyther Papist trusting in mine owne merites, but hope for saluation from God onely, by the mercy and merites of my Saviour Christ Iesus. This faith was I brought up in, and herein I am now ready to dye: beseeching you all, to loyne your soules with me in prayer, that my soule may be lifted up by faith above all earthly things in my prayer, for now I will giue up selfe to my priuate prayer: yet for that I beseeche you to loyne with me, I will speake that you may heare me. And here as he turned himselfe a-doe to put off his Colone, Doctor Montford requested him to remember to pray to God to forgive all his enemies, if he had any. To whom he answered, I thanke you for it: and so turning himselfe againe to the Lordes and therest, he sayde: I desire all the world to forgive me, even as I do freely and from my heart forgive all the world. Then putting off his Colone and Ruffe, and presenting himselfe before the blocke, kneeling downe, he was by Doctor Barlow encouraged against the feare of death. To whom he answered: That haniug bene diuerse times in places of danger, where death was neyther so present, nor yet so certaine, he had felt the weakenesse of the flesh, and therefore now in this great conflict desired God to assist and strengthen him: and so with eyes fixed on heauen, after some passionate pawles, and breathings, he began his prayer in effect following.

O God, Creator of all things, and iudge of all men; thou hast let me know by warrant out of thy word, that Satan is then most busie when our end is nere, and that Satan being resisted will sicke. I humbly beseech thee to assist me in this my last combat: and seeing thou acceptest even of our desires as of our actes: accept I beseech thee, of my desires to resist him, as of true resistance, and perseu, by thy grace, what thou seest in my flesh to be feayle and weake, giue me patience to beare as becommeth mee, this last punishment inflicted vpon mee by so honorable a tryall: Graunt mee the inward comfote of thy spiritte: let thy spiritte seale vnto my soule an assurance of thy manifold mercies: let

When I awake, all earthly cogitations: and when I sleep, my body shall part, and my blessed Angels which may receive my soule, and convey it to thy place in heaven.

Then concluding his prayer for all Estates of the Realme, he shut up all with the Lords prayer, reiterating this petition: Lord Iesus forgive vs our trespasses, and deliver us from all our sinnes. Then desiring to be informed what would be his end, for disposing himselfe to the blocke, the Executioner on his knees presented himselfe, asking him forgiveness: to whom the Earle sayd, I forgive thee, thou art welcome unto me, thou art the minister of Justice. At which time Doctor Montford requested him to receive the Creed, which he did, repeating every article after the Diuines. So opening and putting off his doublet, he was in a Scarlet Wastecote, and then ready to lye downe, he said he would onely stretch forth his armes, and spread them abroad, for then he was ready: so bowing towards the blocke, the Doctors requested him to saye the two first verses of the 51. Psalm, which he did: and then inclining his body, he sayd; In humilitie and obedience to thy commandment in obedience to thy ordinance, to thy good pleasure, O God, I prostrate my selfe to my deserved punishment, Lord be mercifull to thy prostrate servant: so lying flatte along on the boardes, and laying downe his head, and sitting it upon the blocke, stretched out his armes with these wordes, which he was requested to say. Lord into thy hands I commend my spirit. His head was severed from his body by the Axe at three strokes, but the first bravely and absolutely despising all fence, and motion: The hangman was beaten, as he returned thence, so that the Sherriffes of London were called to assist and rescue him from such as would have murdered him.

The Queene
 Progreſſe into Hampſſire.

The ſayd 5. of September, the Queene in her Progreſſe entered into Hampſhire, and upon Eſchelſter heaſthe was received by the ſhiriffe of that ſhire Francis Palmes, accompanied by many Gentlemen of accompt in the ſame ſhire, ſo that her Maieſtie ſayde ſhe was neuer ſo honourably received into any ſhire, for as Hampſhire is a countrie pleaſant of ſoile, and full of delights for Princes of this land, who often make their prograces thether, ſo is it well inhabited by ancient Gentlemen, ciuilly educated, and who liue in great amitie together. Her maieſtie was that night attended on to Baſſing, a houſe of the Loyde Marqueſſe, where ſhe toke ſuch great content, as well with the ſeate of the houſe, as honorable cariage of the worthy Lady Lucie Marqueſſe of Wincheſter, that ſhe ſtayd there thirteene dayes, to the great charge of the ſaid Loyd Marqueſſe. The 4. day after the Queene coming to Baſſing, the ſaid ſhiriffe was commanded to attend the duke of Biron at his coming into that countrey: whereupon the next day being the 11. of September, he went towards Black-water, being the bittermoſt confines of that ſhire, towards London, and there met the ſaid Duke, accompanied with aboue 11. of the nobilitie of France, and attended on with about 400. Frenchmen, who were met by George earle of Cumberland, & by him conducted fro London into Hampſhire. The ſaid duke was that night brought to the Vine, a faire & large houſe of the L. Sands, which houſe was furniſhed with hangings & plate from the Tower, & Hampton-court, and with 7. ſcore beds, and furniture thereto belonging, which the willing & obedient people of the countrey of South-hampton upon ſix dayes warning had brought in thether to ſend the Queene. The duke aboode there 4. or 5. dayes, all at the Queens charges, & ſpent her moze at the Vine, then her owne court for that time ſpent at Baſen. During her aboode there, her maieſtie went to him to the Vine, and he to her to Baſen, & one day he attended her at Baſen-partie on hunting, where the duke ſtaied her coming, and did there ſee her in ſuch royaltie and ſo attended on by the nobilitie, ſo coſtly furniſhed, and mounted, as the like had ſeldome bin ſene: but when ſhe came to the place where the duke ſtaied, the ſaid ſhiriffe (as the manner is, being bare-headed, & riding next to her, ſtaied his horſe, thinking the Queene would then haue ſaluted the duke, whereat the Queene being much offended, commanded the ſhiriffe to go on: the duke following her very humbly bowing low towards his horſe maine, with his cap off, about 11. paces. her maieſtie on the ſudden toke off her maſke, looked back upon him, & moſt gratioſly and courteouſly ſaluted him, as holding it not beſeeming ſo mighty a Prince as ſhe was, & who ſo wel knew all kingly maieſtie, to make her ſay directly againſt a ſubiect, beſore he had ſhewed his obedience in following after her. She tarried at Baſen viii.

 dayes as is aforeſaid, being very well contented with all things there done:

affirming he had done that in Hampſhire that none of her auncelſes ever did, neither that any Prince of Chriſtendom could doe: that was, he had in the queene her prograce, in her ſubjects houſes, entertained a royal Embaſſador & had at Baſen. royally entertained him. At her departure from Baſen, being the xviii. of September, ſhe made 1. knights (having neuer in all her raigne made at one time ſo many beſore) whole names were, Sir Edward Citiell ſecond ſonne to the Lord Burley: Sir Edward Hungerford, next heire to the L. Hungerford: Sir Edward Bainton of Wilthire. Sir William Kingmill: Sir Francis Palmes then ſhiriffe of the ſhire: Sir Benjamin Tichbourne: Sir Hamden Paulet: Sir Richard Norton of Hampſhire: Sir Francis Stoner of Dorſetſhire: and Sir Edmond Lutlew of Wilthire. That day ſhe went fro Baſen toward ſarnham, a Caſtle belonging to the ſea of Wincheſter, nere unto which towne the ſhiriffe of Hampſhire toke his leave, and the ſhiriffe of Surrey met her:
 but the ſhiriffe of Hampſhire, & the gentlemen of that countrey went to ſarnham by command, and there attended the next day, where they were feaſted and kindly entertained by the learned Doctore Biſhop of Wincheſter, upon whoſe onely commendation, two ancient & worthy gentlemen of Hampſhire, Sir Richard Moll, and Sir William Vdall, received there the dignity of Knighthood. And thus much for that prograce to be noted.

About the xiii. of October, 400. ſouldiers were ſent out of the Title of ſouldiers London towards Ireland.

The xiii. of November, the Lady Mary Ramſey, wiſdow to ſir Thomas Ramſey, ſometime ſp. 102. of London, was buried in the pariſh Church of Hoſpitall of Chriſts Church by Beſogate market. A charitable dole of almes, was giuen for her on the ſame day in the afternoon at the Leadenhall, where xviij. poore and weakes people were amongſt the ſaid beggars, cruſhed and troden to death.

The nineteenth of December after the granting of foure great subsidies, and 8. sittings, the Parliament was dissolved.

Lightning and thunder oftentimes before Christmas, and in Christmas holidays, and an earthquake at London on Christmas eve at none.

Of the late long warres in Ireland under the earle of Essex, and then the Lord Mountjoy, generals, have I hitherto received small intelligence, twozth the nothing, and therefore in this place I thinke good to set downe the copie of a letter, from a souldier of good place in Ireland, to his friend in London, touching the notable victory of her Spaishe forces there, against the Spaniards, and Irish rebels, and of the pœiding bp of Kynsale, and other places there held by the Spaniards, dedicated to sir W. D. Knight.

Sir in my last of the 19. of December, I wrote to you at large of the arrival of the new supply of Spaniards at Castell-hauen, Baltemore, & Warba- uen, and of their intents and beginnings to fortifie, in all those three impor- tant places. Likewise that sir Richard Lewison towing out of Kinsale-hauen against winde & weather, fought with them within Castle-hauen most val- lantly, and of their ships being fire, sanke and made unserviceable five: the men being most landed before he could come to them, by reason of the wea- ther, and beating upon him very dangerously from the land with their ordi- nance. That they were said to be 2000. in number, with great store of ordi- nance and munition, & that as they reported, some thousands more were com- ming after. That a great part of the Irish of Munster becommen rebels of new, were resolved to them and received into the King of Spaines pay. That Odonell with good forces of horse and fote out of the North, by the benefit of the then extreame and sudden frost, gat passage almost unlooked for by him- selfe, and slipping by the Lord President of Munster (who was sent to im- peach him) with such forces as could be spared from the Army) was ioyned with them. That Tyrone, with Orouck, Redman Bourck, Mac Guyre, Mac Mahone, Randal Mac Surley, Oconor, Slygoes brother, Fyrral, the Ma- son of Lixenbo, and the rest of the olde fugitive Rebels of Munster, with the greatest and choicest force that was ever amassed in Ireland, were gathered nere our Campe. And that these all, together with fire engines of those newly arrived Spaniards, in all to the number of 6500. fote, and 500. horse, by Powles, were on fote ready to march towards Kynsale and our Campe, with intent and most assured confident hope with helpe of them in the Towne which should have salged out on the campe, upon the at- tempt of Tyrone and Odonell, and were about 2000. Spaniards, almost all old souldiers, as well to releue and rescue the Towne, as to remove our siege, and utterly to brake, dishonour, and defeat us. And truly Sir when I did then consider, on the one side this great strength, the newly ioyned men and horses to be all fresh, vigorous, and strong having all the countrey open to them, abounding with victuals, forrages, armies, munition, and all furnitures: those in the Towne, the most of them experienced souldiers, well armed, and in no such want as was supposed: On the other side, our men in numbers scant equall to them, all almost tyed and wearied out with the miserie of a long Winters siege, our horses decayed, leane and very weak, our best meanes of victuals and forrage likely to be cut from us, with many other impediments whereof I speake not: When I say, I well weighed and pondered with my selfe these points, and laide together withall, this one of great importance, that when we should be forced (as it was like- ly) to answer two forces at once, one from the Towne, another without, a great part of our men were like enough to shrink, or at least not to sticke firmly to us, (which by good coniectures I could make probable to you). Blame me not, if by: n these considerations I wrote to you then somewhat distrustfully of our estate, as taking indeed our liues and honors, this ser- vice, and by consequence this whole Countrey likely to be put to an unequall issue. And so may I well say they were, although by the goodness of God especially, & by the most vigilant circumspection and valiant prowes of our worthy Generall, things out of these difficulties have now lysed to so happy successe, as by that which followeth you shall sufficiently perceiue. To con- tinue therefore my accustomed Relation to you, and to begin from that laide day of the 19. of December, I may please you to knowe, that on Sunday the 20. we still plying our attempts to the Towne, with face and heels as though we nothing cared for Tyrone and his company, at night certaine in- telligence was brought us, that he would be the next night within a mile and a halfe of us, withall the above recited forces. And accordingly upon Sunday the 21. towards night, he shewed himselfe with most part of his horse and fote, on a hill betwene our Campe and Corke, a mile off us. At which time seeing two Regiments of our fote, and some horse drawn out of our Campe, and making a resolute march towards him, he fell backe to the other side of the hill, where he encamped that night strengthened with a fastness of wood and water. Whereby though his retire might be imputed to some touch of credite, yet had he this advantage, that he might kepe from our Arme all passages and meanes for forrage: The other side over the River of Ownebuoye being wholly at his disposition, by reason of the generall rout of those parts.

On Tuesday the 22. some of Tyrones horse and fote made shewe againe in the place where they had done the day before, and that night were some of their horse, and 500. fote discovered, searching if they might finde fit way to the towne.

On Wednesday the 23. as well by intelligence otherwise as by letters of Don John d' Aquila, Generall of the Spaniards, and Captaine of the Towne newly intercepted, we found that he had imported Tyrone and his company very much to give an attempt upon our Campe; intimating unto them his owne necessitie, and likelihood to be shortly forced within the Towne, their faithfull promises to succour him, the facilitie and undoubted successe of the enterprise, he assuring them, that our numbers could not be but much lessened, and those that were remaining, greatly decayed and weakened with the long winter siege, so that it was not possible we should be

be able to maintaine so much ground as we had taken when our strength was full, if they on the one side, and he on the other put vs well to it: which he for his part promised them assuredly to do very soundly from the Towne, whensoever they should thinke fit to do the like from their Campe. And it seemeth that upon this aduise they took their determinate resolution for this course, and to put it in execution with all speed, either that night or the next at the furthest. Those of the towne in the meane time gaue vs alarms, made Sallics, and did by all means what they could to keepe our men in continuall trauell, that they might be the lesse able for resistance when this attempt should come to be performed. The Lord Deputie till now applied himselfe in shew wholly towards the Towne, but indeed not meaning any forceable effectuall attempt upon it, til he saw what would become of Tyrone and his forces: And therefore had an especiall eye, by continuall espiall, upon his movements, and lest for daime hurt should be taken from him, or the towne, if both he without, and they within should inuade at once, he made Fortes and Barracadoes, heightened the ditches, deepened the Trenches, stopped & strengthened all the Avenues to the Towne, had the whole Armie in a readinesse upon every suddaine warning, and kept strong and watchfull guards alwayes in all places. And now late in the night of this Wednesday, the thre and twentieth day, being assuredly enformed of their intent of attempt upon his Campe that night, or the morrow after, his Lordship gaue order to strengthen the ordinary guardes, and to put the rest of his Armie in readinesse, but not as yet into Armes: commanding that the Regiment bolant, which was a Squadron of six Companies of foote, selected out of all the olde Bands, conducted by Sir Hen. Poore, and appointed to be alwayes in a readinesse to answer all Alarumes, and therefore exempted from all other duties, should draw out beyond the west part of the Campe, and there stand in Armes, not farre from the maine guard of horse.

A little before the breake of day, Sir Ric. Greame, who had the guard of horse that night, sent the Lord Deputie word, that the scouts had discovered the rebels matches in great numbers, whereupon his Lord. caused the armie presently to arme, and 300. choise men to be drawne out of the quarter, where the Earle of Thomond and thre other Regiments lay, to make stand betwene that quarter and the fort upon the west hill, himselfe with Sir George Carew, Lord President of Munster, Sir Richard Wingfield, Marshall of Ireland, advanced forward towards the scout, and hauing giuen order to Sir Hen. Dauers Lieutenant generall of the horse, for the ordering of those troopes, sent the Marshall, to take view of the Enemy, who sent word: he was advanced horse and foote nere the top of the hill. where the Earle of Thomond first quartered, within lesse then two hundred yottes of the towne. Whereupon the Lord Deputie calling to him Sir Oliuer Lambert, Gouernor of Connaught, who being there without Charge, was commanded to attend his Lord. that day, made choise of a peece of ground betwene that and the towne, of good advantage, both to embattel, and fight, as hauing on the back a Trench drawne from the Earle of Thomond quarter, and so secured from the the Towne: And on the front, a boggyish glyne passable with horse onely at one end: The ground whereon the enemy must haue drawne in grosse to force the passage sanctified from the earles quarter by the Canon, and situate in the midst of all our forces, and returned word to the Marshall, that in that place he was resolved to giue the enemy battell, if he came forward: commanding further, the Regiment of Sir H. Folyat and thre old Companies of the Regiment of Sir Oliuer Saint-Iohn to be brought thither, the rest of the Army being already in Armes, together with five hundred Sea-men, brought by Sir Richard Leuejon to attend, when, and what, he should commaund.

But Tyrone, whose meaning ouer night, was, to haue bene with vs, by day, and as we since learned, to haue put all the Spaniards into the Towne, with eight hundred of the best Irish under Tigell, seeing it now faire day light, and discovering the Marshall and Sir Hen. Dauers to be advanced with all the horse and Sir Hen. Poore with his Regiment, stopt at the foot of the hill, and anon, thinking it to be no day for him, retired the troopes he had advanced againe, to the body of his Armie beyond the fford. Presently the Marshall sent the Lord Deputie word, that the enemy retired in some disorder, whereupon his Lord commanding the forenamed troopes to follow him with all speed, advanced himselfe into the head of all, to see with his owne eye, the manner of the enemy, and in what sort there upon he might determine to proceede. But before he could, either well bieto, or direct, a violent storme, during some quarter of an hower, gaue the enemy opportunity, not yet perfectly discovered, to draw off ouer a plaine in thre great bodies of foote, all their horse in the Rere, and the wings with all their other loose men fallen vp into the head. Which the Lord Deputie, the day now clearing, perceiving and discovering, by this their disorderly March, that they were in feare, being certified also, that there was not before them any place of so good advantage to make head on, as those they had passed and quited, resolved to follow, and to see what profit might be made of an enemy thus troublesly retiring. Whereupon dispatching presently Sir Geo. Carew, Lord President of Munster with thre cornets of horse, backe to the Campe, to attend there against the Towne, and whatsoeuer other attempt, because he was to be the fittest Commander in his Lord. absence, and because there had otherwise no horse bene left in the Campe, himselfe hauing with him in al, betwene thre and foure hundred horse, and vnder 1200. foot, made after the Enemy. And advancing some mile further on, pressed him so hard, that he was forced to stand firme in thre bodies upon a foote of a bogge (which bogge to assaile them, was must of necessity passe) and in all apparence, with a Resolution there to abide vs and fight. They maintained a good skirmish on our side the Bogge, with their loose wings, newly drawne out of their bodies, and hurt some of our men and horses, till with our wings they were at length beaten backe.

The Marshall being somewhat advanced, espied a fford, a musket shot off on the left hand, neglected by their foote, and onely guarded by their horse:

hoyle: whereof aduertising the Lord Deputy, with desire of leaue to foize them that way: the Lord Deputy appoyning it, and commaunding to be done by the sate with all expedition, the first twings of sate once arriued, seconded with sir Henry Poers regiment, the sparthall, with the Earle of Clanrickard, who neuer ceased vying to fight, taking with them sir Richard Greame, and other companies of hoyle: with them, and those sate, forcing the enemies hoyle that kept the passage, passed ouer, and with that advantage, finding themselves side by side with the enemies battell. and further on then their reer, charged their battell in flankes, but finding them to stand firme, wheeled about. At which the enemies taking courage, dyed on their hoyle, with a cry to a charge, who came on brauely within fiftie or sixtie paces of our hoyle, and there after their country fashion stopped, shaking their stances, and railingy vaunting, but darst charge no further. Which the Lord Deputy seeing, sent presently ouer the sward to them his owne cornet of hoyle, under sir William Godolphin, and the Lord Presidents cornet under Captaine Minshaw, (which two cornets he had appointed before, to keepe still a gresse in the here, to answer all accidents, together with two of our three bodies of sate under sir Iohn Berkeley Seriant maior of the Campe. Whereupon the sparthall and Earle of Clanrickard seeing a second at hand, uniting themselves with sir Henrie Dauers. hauing with him Capaine Fasse. Capaine Flemming, and other companies of hoyle, charged againe the Enemies hoyle, who not abiding the shocke, fled. At the sight whereof, the battell dismayng, our men thought it better to charge againe vpon them, then to follow the hoyle, and so courageously doing bitterly brake them. The reereward of the enemy in which was Tyrell, and all the Spaniards, stood firme vpon the bogge on the right hand, vnto whom, within callier shot, the Lord Deputy had ordeined vpon our here, which was Sir Oliuer Saint Iohns 3. companies, commaunded by Capaine Roe, in absence of sir Oliuer. (dispatched fety dayes before by the Lord Deputy, and Counsaile, for speciall affaires to her Maiesty, charging him first, not to stir, till he received direction from him. But seeing Tyrell, and the Spaniards drawing betwene our hoyle, being on the execution, and the bodies of our sate, his Lordship hauing hitherto, by direction set all other mens swords on worke, himselfe now in the head of our said here, where he had before resolved to fight, charged the Enemy in flankes, and put them to a disorderly retreat after their fellowes to the top of the next hill, where they made stand a little while. But the Irish quitting the Spaniards, the Spaniards in short time were broken by the Lord Deputyes hoyle, commaunded by sir William Godolphin, and most of them slaine. The vangarde of the Enemy, with all the losse twings, which were many, seeing what happened, threw away their armes (and all our men being otherwise busie) escaped. The chiefe Commaunder of the Spaniards, Don Alonso d'Ocampo was taken prisoner, with three Captaines, five Aliers, and fortye souldiers. Tiron, and Odonell, with the rest of the Irish Lords, ran apace, and saued themselves. Those of the battell were almost all slaine, and there were (of the Irish Rebelles onely, found dead in the place, about twelue hundred bodies, and about eight hundred were hurt, whereof 1200. Irish name. many dyed that night: and the chase continuing almost two miles, was left off, our men being tyred with killing. The Enemy lost two thousand Armes brought to reckning, besides great numbers imbezeld, all their powder and dymmes, and ir. ensignes, whereof 6. Spanish. Those of the Irish that were taken prisoners, being brought to the Campe, though they offered ranstone, were all hanged. On our side, onely one man was slaine, the Cornet of the sir Richard Greame, sir Henry Dauers was hurt with a sword slightly: sir William Godolphin a little rased on the thigh with a pike butt, Capaine Crofts the skotw-maister with a shot in the back, and not a bone ere more common souldiers hurt. Many of our hoyles were killed, and more hurt. And thus were they utterly ouerthrowne, who but the very night before, were so haue and confident of their owne good successe, as that they reckoned vs already theirs, and as we since haue vnderstande, were in contention whose prisoner the Lord Deputy should be, whose the Lord President, and so of the rest. The Earle of Clanrickard caried himselfe this day very valiantly, and after the retraite founded, was knighted by the Lord Deputy, in the field amongst the dead bodies. So did all the rest of the Captaines, Officers, and souldiers, named and vnnamed, and especially the Lord Deputy himselfe, who brake, in person, vpon the srouce of the army the Spaniards, and omitted no duety of a wise diligent Conduator, and valiant souldier. Upon the fight ended, hee presently called together the Army and with prayers, gaue God thanks for the victorie, A victorie indede giuen by the God of hostes, and marvellous in our eyes, if all circumstances be duly considered, and of such consequence for the preservation and assurance to her Maiesty, of this deeply endangered kingdome, as I leaue to wisser consideration, contenting my selfe with this, that I see the God of power and might, disposed to protect the iust cause of his seruant, our gracions Quene Elizabeth, against the pride, malice, and powerfull disaune of the greatest potentates, his enemies. To him be the glorie.

After this glorious victorie thus valiantly atchieued, the Lord Deputy the same day passed to his campe, left any thing (in his absence) might happily haue bene attempted there. But, not finding the Enemy to haue made any fall, which indede had bene but haine for him, considering the small fruit hee reaped by them heretofore, euery one that he made hitherto rebounding still to his owne detriment and losse, and euery place of our Camp, at this time, being so well and sufficiently strengthened and prouided for against him as is sayd before.

The next day his Lordship commaunded Captaine Bodlegh Crench-maister generall of the Campe, who as well in the fight, as in the workes, had deserued speciall commendation, to see the formerly begunne sforte and platfaymes, to be undertaken againe, and neuer approaches to be cast out towards the towne. But after due or fety dayes labour Don Iohn d'Aquila, captaine of the Towne and Forces within, offered a parole, sending the Drumme maior of the Towne with a sealed letter to the Lord Deputy, by which he required, that some gentleman of speciall trust and sufficiencie might be sent into the towne from his Lordship, to conferre with him, whom he would acquaint with such conditions, as he then stood upon. His request being assented unto by his Lordship, Mr William Godolphin was imployed in the negotiation, which was carried in this sorte, word for word, as it is taken out of the originalls here, viz.

Don Iohn tolde Mr William, that hauing found the Lord Deputy (whom he termed the Viceroy) although a sharpe and powerfull, yet an honorable enemy, & the Irish not onely treake and barbarous, but (as he feared) perfidious friends, he was so farre in his affections reconciled to the one, and distasteth with the other, as did inuite him to make an ouerture of such a composition as might be safe and profitable for the state of England with least prejudice to the crowne of Spaine, by deliuering into the Viceroy his power, the Towne of Kinsale, with all other places in Ireland, held by the Spaniards, so as they might depart on honorable termes, sitting such men of warre, as are not by necessity enforced to receiue conditions, but willingly induced, for inst respects to disingage themselves, and to relinquish a people, by whom their King and Master had bene so notoriously abused, (if not betrayed.) That if the Viceroy liked to entertaine further parley touching this point, he would first be pleased to vnderstand them rightly, and to make his propositions such as might be suitable to men thoughtfully resolute. rather to bury themselves alive, and to endure a thousand deaths, then to giue way to one Article of accord, that should taste of basenes or dishonour, being so confident of their present strength, and the royall Second of Spaine, that they should make no doubt of yeelding good account of themselves and their Interest in this kingdom, but that a iust disdain, and spleene conceived against the nation, dissuaded them from being further engaged for it, then of force they must, Mr William Godolphin being commaunded by the Lord Deputy onely, to receiue Don Iohns propositions and demaunds. Having made his Lords and Counsell this Relation, was by them returned with the answer following. That howbeit the Lord Deputy hauing lately defeated their succours, did so well vnderstand his owne strength and their weakenesse as made him nothing doubt of forcing them within a short time, whom he did know to be pressed with vnresistible difficulties, how much sooner they laboured to couer and conceale the same, yet knowing that her sacred Maestie out of her gracious and mercifull disposition would esteeme the glory of her victorie to be blemished by a voluntary effusion, and an obstinate expence of Christian blood, was content to entertaine this offer of agreement, so as it might be concluded, vnder such honorable articles for her highnesse as the advantage the had against them gaue reason to demaund: being the same which are set downe in the Articles of agreement following, signed by the Lord Deputy, and Don Iohn and others: sauing that there was in them besides the leauing of his treasure, munition, artillery, and the Quenes naturall Subiects to her disposition, all which points he did peremptorily refuse, with constant asseueration that both he and all his would rather rather endure the last of misery, then be found guilty of so foule a Treason against the honour of his Prince, and the reputation of his profession, though he should finde himselfe vnable to resist, which more now, when he might not onely hope to sustaine the burthen of the warre for a time, but with patience and constancie in the end to overcome it. That he took it so ill, to be misundersood in hauing Articles of that nature propounded unto him, as were they but once againe remembered in the Capitulation, the Viceroy should from thenceforth vse the advantage of his sword, and not the benefite of his former offers: adding, that the Viceroy might rather thinke to haue made a good and profitable purchase for the Crowne of England, if with the expence of 100000. Macks he had procured Don Iohn to quitte his interest and footing but in Walsbymore alone, to say nothing of Kinsale, Castell-banen, and Borehaven: for (said he) suppose that all the with the rest of our places here had perished, yet would that Pen Insula (being strong in it owne nature, betwixt by our art & industry, provided as it is of bidualls, munition, and good store of Artillerie) preferre unto the King of Spaine a safe and commodious port for the arrival of his Fleet, and be able to maintaine it selfe against a land Armie of ten thousand, untill Spaine (being so deeply engaged) did in honour releue them: which would operate on a more powerful inuasion then the first, being vndertaken vpon false grounds, at the instance of a base and barbarous people, who in discourting their weakenesse and want of power, haue armed the King my master to relye vpon his owne strength, being tyed in honour to releue his people that are engaged, and to cancell the memory of our former disaster.

But this was spoken (sayd he) in case the Viceroy were able to force this towne, as I assure my selfe he cannot, hauing vpon mine Honour within these walles at this instant, aboue two thousand fighting men, that are strong and able, besides those, which hauing bene sick and hurt, recover dayly: the greatest part of these, composed of olde Shouldiers, which fall not but by the sword, and those that were new, being now both traped to their Armes, and growne acquainted with the Climate, are more able to endure then at the first: our means as good as they haue bene any times these two moneths, such as the Spanyardes can well abate with all, and thereof to suffice vs for these moneths more. While lodge in good warme houses, haue store of munition, and (which is best of all) stande well assured that our succours will be shortly here. To be playne, we preferre our men, and reserve our strength the best wee may, hoping to front you in a breach, which if our hearts faile vs not, we haue handes and breasts enough to stoppe against treble your forces: though I will giue the Viceroy this right, That his men are passing good, but spent and tyed out with the misery of a Winter-siege, which he hath obstinately maintained beyond my expectation, but with such caution, and vpon so good guard, as hauing nicely watched all advantages, I could neuer fasten a Shalle yet vpon him, but with losse to my selfe: wherein I must acknowledge my hopes decayed, that grounding on some error in his approches, promised my selfe the benefit of at least a thousand men at one blowe. But when we met on the beach, I am confident on good reason, to lay five hundred of your best men on the earth, and rest hopeful that the loss of those will make a great hole in an armie that hath already suffered so much extremitee.

But to conclude our business, the king my Master sent me to assist the Condes, Oncale & Odonnell, performing on their promise, that I should have ioynd with them within few daies of the arrivall of his forces. I expected long in vaine, sustained the Miceropes Armie, saw them drawne to the greatest head they could possibly make, lodged within two myles of Kynsale, reinforced with certaine companies of Spaniards, every houre promising to release us, and being ioynd together to force your campes, sawe them at last broken with a handfull of men, blowane a sunder into blaised parts of the world, Odonnell into Spaine, Oncale to the farthest of the North, so as now I finde no such Condes in rerum natura (for those were the very words he used) as I came to ioyne withall, and therefore have moved this accord, the rather to disingage the king my Master from assisting a people so unable in themselves, that the whole burden of the warre must lye upon him, and so periculosus as perhaps might be induced in acquittall of his favour, at last to betray him. Upon relation made by Sir William Godolphin to the Lord Deputie and Councell, of these offers of Don Iohn, which at severall conferences had bene brought to such heads, as are spoken of before; as it was thought good, for divers important reasons, to proceede roundly to the agreement. For whereas in the propositions by him made, there was not any thing that admitted exceptions on our part, but onely, that he required to carry with him his ordinance, munition, and treasure, that being no way prejudiciall to the maine scope or drift of our Treatie, which chesely respected the common good and safetie of the kingdome, deserved not almost to be thought upon. Besides that, the Treasure being at the first but a hundred thousand Duckats, with foure moneths payment of so many men, and other necessary deductions, could not but be very nere wasted; and that little remainder, more fit for a prey to the poore souldiour, after his tedious travell, than for a clause in the composition. Furthermore, how needfull it was to embrace this accord, may clearly be seen by whosoever considereth the state of our Armie, almost bitterly tryed: how full of danger and difficultie it was to attempt a breach defended by so many hands; how long time it might have cost us, if we had lodged in the Breach, before we could have carried the Towne, it being full of strong castles: how her Spaiesties ships and others lying in the harbour, should have bene forced speedily to forsake us for want of victuals: how by a long contrarietie of winds, our selves were not provided for above five daies, at the time of this parley, though within few daies after god soe arrived: it being indeed worthy of observation, that by her Spaiesties great care, and the diligence of her ministers, so good providence was used, as though this descent of Spaniards drew into that quarter all the forces of the kingdome which could be spared, all which were onely to line by provision out of England; notwithstanding all the difficulties of transportation, in so unreasonable a time, no notorious wants were found in the Armie, but that which is insuperable from a winter siege, in that Climate: that we had neither munition nor Artillerie left but for one batterie in one place at once, five of our peeces being before crazed: and finally, that if we had missed of our purpose, the whole countrey had bene hazarded. Furthermore, that which seemeth of greatest consequence to induce his Lordship to this agreement, was: That the Spaniards in Ballymore, Castlehaven and Bécce haven, by vertue of this contract, were likewise to surrender those places, and depart the countrey, which would have proved a matter of more difficultie, and have drawne on a long warre in a corrupted kingdome, to rote them out, being strongly fortified and well stored with victuals, munition, and artillerie, for that of necessitie the Armie for some space, must have rested, and in the end have bene constrained after a new supply of all necessities, to her Spaiesties intollerable charge, to transport themselves thither by sea, the way by land being altogether unpassable. In which time, their succours out of Spaine in all likelihood, would have bene come too late to them, the king being so farre engaged in his honour to second his enterprise, and we barred of that prosecution of the Rebels, which now by this agreement we may wholly intend.

The Treatie therefore was thus concluded, as by the Articles ensuing, Agreed on both parts, appeareth.

And so is this troubled cloud, of most likely perillous danger for this time dissolved, to her Maiesties most singular renowne: Not so much for the glory of the event, as for her owne Magnanimity and Princely resolution, to leaue nothing undone which might preserve that Crowne, how deare soeuer it cost her: to the great honour of our generall, Leaders, and Souldiers by land and Sea actors therein, who, if it be well considered, that after the Enemies arrivall xxviii. September, it was xxvi. October before they could get all things ready to sit downe nere the Towne: xxix. October before their Ordinance could play, And that by i. Nouember, they had gotten Ricconen castle, And then vij. Nouember were taken strethely to diminish their strength by sending the L. was the 24. of March, and the first newes to the king of his sisters death. This change was very plausible or well pleasing to the Nobility and Gentry, and generally to all the commons of this realme among whom the name of king was then so strange, as but few could remember, or had seene a king before, except they were aged persons, considering that the gouernment of the Realme had continued nere the space of fiftie yeares, vnder the raigne of two Quenees which is the farre greater part of a mans age, but tydings here of being brought to the king in Scotland, he called a counsell to him, and taking order for setting all things in his Realme of Scotland. began his voyage age towards England, and did so much that after many dayes journey, and lodging in the howles of sondry Noble men, Gentlemen, and Townes, he arriued at London the seuenth of May, and was lodged at the Charterhouse making manie knights by the way as he came.

wick, hauing then attending on him many more noble-men, knights, and gentlemen, besides the Lords wardens of the Marches, and borders of England and Scotland, with seuerall companies to receiue him. The Lord Gouernor of Warwicke also accompanied with the counsell of warre, the Constables with their Cornets of horse, and diuers of the Captaines, the band of Gentlemen, Pensioners, and others, aduanced forward to meete entertaine and conduct his Maiestie into the towne of Warwicke. This night seeme a strange, and happy day, whom peaceably so many warlike English Gentlemen went out to bring an English and Scottish king both included in one person into that towne, which for many hundred yeares had bene an enemy, or held, for the one nation, or the other, but the king of peace, hath so ordained it to be. These companies met him and were graciously respected of his Highnesse, so falling in among the other troopes, they set forward, and when his Highnesse came within halfe a mile of the towne, and began to take view thereof, from the Castle came such a tempest as it were thunder, it was credibly reported that a better peace of Ordinance was neuer in any Souldiers memory discharged in that place. The king being come nere to the gates, and the smoke of Gun-powder banished, issued out of the towne William Selbie, Gentleman Porter of Warwicke, with diuers other Gentlemen of accompt, and humbling himselfe before the king, presented vnto him the keyes of the Portes, who receiued them graciously, and being entered betwixt the gates, he restored to the sayde William Selbye the keyes againe, and graced him with the honour of knight-hood for his seruice. This done his Highnesse entered the second gate, and being within both the walles, he was receiued by the Captaine of the warde, and so passed through a double garde of Souldiers, well armed in all points: betwene this garde his Maiestie passed on to the Market crosse, where the Mayor and his brethren receiued him with no small signes of ioy, but the common people omitted nothing they power could attaine vnto, to expresse loyal dutie and hartie affection: kneeling, shouting, crying God saue king James, till they were (in a manner) intreated to be silent. Then maister Christopher Parkenson the Recorder of Warwicke, a man graue and reuerend, made a braue speech to his Maiestie, acknowledging him their sole and Soueraigne Lord. To whom in the Townes name, he surrendered their Charter, presenting his Highnesse also from them with a purse of golde, which as an offering of their loue he graciously receiued. And for their Charter, he answered them, that it should be continued, and that he would maintaine their priuiledges, & uphold them and their towne in all quiettie, by reason it was the principall & first place, honored with his most gracious person. Whence his maiestie passed to the church, there to humble himselfe before the altar of the humble, & thank him for the benefitts bestowed vpon him & his people, at which time preached before him the reuerend father in God doctor Tobie Mathew bishop of Durham, who made a most learned sermon, which finished, the King departed to his palace, & then they gaue him a praise of great ordinance, more then before. Warwicke neuer hauing king to rest within their walles, for many yeares.

The

The next day, being the seventh of Aprill, his Maiestie ascended the walles, whereupon all the Canoniers, and other officers belonging to the great ordinance stood every one in his place: the Captaines with their bands of souldiers likewise vnder their coulores. Amongst which warlike traine, his Maiestie, to shew an instance how beloued and respected the arte Militarie, he made a shot himselfe out of a Canon, so faire, and with such signe of experience, that the most expert Gunners there gaue it iust commendations. After this he left that part of the wall, and being attended on by his nobilitie, both of Scotland and England, the Lord Henry Howard, brother to the late Duke of Norfolk, and the Lord Cobham, being then newly come to the towne, and guarded by the Gentlemen pensioners of Warwicke, he bestowed this day in surveying of the fortifications, commending the Military order of the towne, and so returned to his palace.

The 8. of Aprill the Trumpets warned for the remoue, and all that morning, his maiestie with royall liberality bestowed amongst the garrison souldiers, and every officer for warre according to his place, rich and bountifull rewards. After dinner, his Highnesse mounted on horse-back, and took leave of Warwicke, and proceeded into England, where he was receiued by Nicholas Forester, high Shyrliffe of Northumberland, accompanied with a number of Gentlemen of the shire: who riding before his maiestie, led the way to Withington, where by the maister of the place sir Robert Curie, and his Lady, he was receiued with all dutie and affection, the house being plentifully furnished for his entertainment.

The 9. of Aprill, he set forward towards New-castle (being 16. miles from Withington) where his Highnesse was met by the Mayor, Aldermen, counsell, and best commoners of the same, in toposill manner: the Mayor presenting him with the Sword and Keyes with humble submission: giuing to his Maiestie also in token of loue and loyalty, a purse full of golde. His Highnesse returned to the Mayor the Sword and Keyes, ratifying all their customs and priuiledges that they were possessor of; and so was conducted to the Mayor's house, where he was richly entertained, and remained there three dayes.

Sunday the 10. of Aprill his maiestie went to the Church, before whom preached the Bishop of Durham: Monday he bestowed in viewing the towne, the manner and beauty, the bridge and Key, being one of the sayrest in all the North parts. Besides he released all prisoners, except for treason, murder, and papistrie, giuing summes of money for the releafe of many that lay for debt. So topfull were the townsmen of New-castle of his maiestie being there, that they thankfully bare all charge of his household, during the time of his abode with them.

The 13. of Aprill his maiestie set forward toward Durham, and when he came nere, the maiestrates of the Citty met him, and behauing themselves as others before them, it was by his Highnesse as thankfully accepted. And passing through the gates, whence he entered the market place, there was an oration made vnto him, which being ended, he passed towards the the bishops house, where he was royally receiued, the bishop attending him with a hundred gentlemen in Tawne liuey coats.

The 14. of Aprill his maiestie toke leaue of the bishop of Durham, whom he greatly graced, and commended for his learning, humanitie and grauity, promising to restore diuers things taken from the bishoprick: his Maiestie remoued towards Malworth 16. miles from Durham, where by the Gentlewoman of the house named millicke Genton, he was bountifullly entertained.

The 15. of Aprill his Maiestie set forward toward Pojke, his traine still increasing by the numbers of Gentlemen from the South-parts, that came to offer him feaultie: whose lone although he greatly censured, yet did their multitudes so oppress the country, and make prouision so deare, that he was faine to publish an inhibition against the inordinate and dayly access of peoples coming, that many were stopped of their way: The high shiriffe of Pojkeshire very well accompanied, attended his Maiestie to malster Inglebyes besides Topcliffe, being about 16. miles from Malworth, who with great humilitie receiued his Maiestie, where he rested that night.

The 16. of Aprill, his Maiestie remoued towards Pojke, being 16. miles from Topcliffe, and when he came about some thre miles from Pojke, (the liberties of the Citie extending so farre) Maister Bucke and Maister Robinson, shiriffes of the Citie met him, & with humble dutie presented him with their white staves: which his Maiestie receiuing, he deliuered them againe, so they attended him towards the Citie, within a mile of which, when his Highnesse approached, there met him the Lord Burghley, Lord President of the North, with many worthy Knights and Gentlemen of the shire. These also attended on his person to Pojke, where when he came nere into the Citie, met him thre of the seruants at Armes, M<sup>r</sup>. Wood, M<sup>r</sup>. Damsfort, and M<sup>r</sup>. Westrepe, who deliuered their spases, which his Maiestie deliuered to them againe, commanding them to waite on him: and the same time the Sergeant Trumpeter and some other did in like manner submit themselves, whom in like manner he commanded to waite on him. Then he rode till he came to one of the gates of Pojke, where the Lord Maior of the Citie, the Aldermen, and weltheift commoners, with abundance of other people met him: there a long Oration being made, the Lord Maior deliuered the sword and keyes to his Maiestie, together with a Cup of gold, filled full of golde, which present he gratefully accepted: deliuering the keyes againe to the Lord Maior, but about bearing of the sword, there was some argument, the Lord President taking it for his place, the Lord Maior esteeming it to be his, but the King demanded, if the sword being his, they would not be pleased, that he should haue the disposing thereof; whereunto they humbly answered it was all in his pleasure. His Highnesse deliuered the sword to the Earle of Cumberland, who bare it before him, riding from the gate to the Spinnier, in which way there was a Conduit that all the day ranne white wine, and Claret, cusey man to drinke as much as he liked. After which short repast he ridde forthwardes to Worsope, but in the Parke he was somewhat stayed: for there appeared a number of Huntsmen all in Greene: the cheefe of which in a Woodmans speech did welcome him, offering to shew some game, which he gladly condiscended to see, and with a traine set, he hunted a good space, and went into the house, where he was so nobly and royally receiued, with abundance of all things, that still, enery entertainment seemed to exceede other.

The 21. of Aprill his Highnesse toke his waye towards Aeto-worke vpon Trent, where that night he lodged in the Castle: the Aldermen presented him with a faire gilt Cuppe, which was kindly accepted. In this Colone, and in the Courte, was taken a Cut-purse doing the deede, and being a base pilking Thiefe, (yet was all Gentleman-like in the out-side): this fellow had good stoepe of coyne found about him, and vpon examination confessed, that he had from Barwicke to that place, played the Cut-purse in the Courte. The King hearing of this gallant, directed a warrant to the Recorder of Aeto-worke, to haue him hanged, which was accordingly executed, and all the rest of the prisoners in the Castell were pardoned.

tion.

The 24. of October proclamation was made for quietnesse to be observed in matters of Religion.

warden of the cinque portes, and Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, were in find Coaches comitted from the Tower of London towards Winchester in the County of Southampton, also on Fryday the 1. of November, Sir Walter Rawley, Sir Griffin Markham Knights, George Brooke Esquire, brother to the Lord Cobham: Anthony Copley Gentleman, William Warlon and William Clarke piers, were comitted from the Tower of London towards Winchester, the same day, out of the Gate-house at Westminster Sir Edward Parham knight, and Bartlemew Brookesby Esquire of Leicester shire, all these stayed at Bagghat in Surrey 24. miles from London.

On Wednesday the 9. of November, Henric Lord Cobham under the custody of Sir Thomas Vauisor Knight aparchall, and Thomas Lord Gray, under the custody of Sir Richard Leucion knight, were conducted by Sir Henry Wallop, and Sir Hamden Pawlet Knights of the County of South-hampton, well & strongly guarded with 50. light horsemen of the same countie, from Bagghat to the Castle of Winchester, 30. miles from Bagghat.

And on Saturday the 12. of November, George Brooke Esquire, brother to the Lord Cobham, under the custody of Sir William Wade knight, Sir Walter Rawley knight under the custody of Sir Robert Mansell knight, Sir Griffin Markham knight under the custody of Sir Robert Wroth, Sir Edward Parham knight, Bartlemew Brookesby of Leicester shire Esquire, Anthony Copley Gentleman: Watton and Cleke piers every one of these last stay, attended on by the wardens of the Tower, & Sir Edward Parham, & Bartlemew Brookesby by the keepers of the Gatehouse besides: for they thence went out of that prison, were by the said Sir Henry Wallop knight, Sir Frances Palmes knight, Sir Richard Touchbourne knight, Some and Heire to Sir Benjamin Touchbourne then high sherriffe of the said countie of Southampton, together with 50. light horsemen of that countie conducted from Bagghat aforesaid to the said Castle of Winchester, and there delivered into the custody of the said high sherriffe, where they together with the said keepers (all save the said wardens of the Tower and the keeper of the Gatehouse) remained, till they were brought out to their severall arraignments into the great common hall of the Castle of Winchester.

Arraigned at Winchester the 15. of November, George Brooke brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffin Markham, Sir Edward Pawlet knights, Watton & Clarke, piers, Bartlemew Brookesby Esquire, Copley gentleman indicted. Arr.

1. To conspire to kill the King.
2. To raise rebellion.
3. To alter Religion.
4. To subvert the estate.
5. To procure invasion by strangers.

To effect these treasons, on the 14. of June 1602 the said Lord James the first, they intended their act against the King & his home, & to carry them to the Tower, and there to enter, and with the Kings treasure in the tower to maintaine their intent. but if the Tower should not be taken, then to take the Castle of Dover, & to carry the King thither, & then there to obtaine of the King three things, viz. 1. Pardon for their owne presumptions. 2. Toleration of religion, 3. to remove some from the council.

Watson the pylest dealed othes in writing by which the parties were bound to conceale their treasons. Clarke and Watson pylest, did say the xiiii. of June, the king was no king untill after his coronation.

Spallier George Brooke, and Sir Griffin Markham opened their entents to the lord Gray, to which the lord Gray did consent. That the xv. of June they did consent to take Grenewich, and to take the lords in their Chambers there, and then to carry the king and his counsell to Dover; to the Tower, and there would holde the king halfe a yeare. And they would deuide places of authoritie amongst themselves, viz. Watson lord Chancelor, George Brooke lord Treasurer, Sir Griffin Markham Secretary, lord Gray master of the horse, and Carle Sparrhall of England: and they would send for the Spaloz and Aldermen of London, and keepe them in the Tower.

The xviii. of June they opened to the lord Gray the treasons, whereto the lord Gray gaue consent, and then the lord Gray himselfe desired to be Carle Sparrhall. They did also make the said xviii. day, and there did moue othes to loyue in their treasons. And also the xx. of June, the lord Gray, George Brooke, and Sir Griffin Markham, agreed that the lord Gray should attaine the leading of 1000. men for defence of the Low-countries, and that with those men he should effect this enterprise: most of them confessing the Inditement in part, not in the whole, & pleaded not guiltie: but master Brooke before he did make this argument: That which is not the rule of my action, can not be iudge of my action, but the comon lawe cannot be iudge of my action. He affirmed he had commission from the king, which he intended aboue the comon lawe, to do that he did, viz. to trie faithfull subjects: but being willed to shew that letter of Commission, he answered he had such a one, which he did not shew, wherefore his argument was of no force.

Watson the pylest affirmed he was the man that dyed in all these Gentlemen to their treasons as now they are held to be, as he said, but he held them not so, the king being not crowned: allegoing Saul was annointed in Ramath, and after ward Saſus Rex in Mipsa: & Clarke the pylest alleged Rehoboam, but it was answered, our king was king presently after the Quenes death, as any other is heire to his father before liuery liued, and that the kings coronation was but a ceremonie to declare him to the people to be king, for our king neuer dyed, and in England is no Interregnum.

Sir Griffin Marham confessed his discontentment, his liuing being taken from him, but desired to cleare himselfe of all intention of blood, & desired the lords to moue the king for mercy, confessing his fault very penitently.

The xxi. of November was Sir Walter Rawleigh arraigned, being indicted the xxi. of September at Satines, for combining with Henry L. Cobham the ir. of June at S. Martins in the felas to compass to destroy the king, raise sedition, commit slaughter, moue rebellion, alter religion, subuert the estate, to procure inuasion, leuie war, & to set by lady Arbella Steward, &c. as in the indictment with other arguments, which continued from morning till about six of the clock at night, that Sir Jarry in halfe an houre found him guilty of high treason.

of estate, & none in the upper end of the hall but himselfe, the lordes sitting on benches along the sides of the hall, halfe on the one side, & halfe on the other, and at their feete, on either side sat 4 Judges, and the kings eldest gentleman usher, sitting at the feete of the lord Steward. The Clarke of the Crowne with a very low curtseie, deliuered to the lord high Steward the kings spaiellies commission, which he with great reuerence receiued and so redeliuered the same backe againe to the Clarke of the Crowne. Then a Sergeant at armes made proclamation for silence, and the Clarke read the Commission, then the Sheriffe was called to returne his writ, & to bring in the body of the lord Cobham, then master Hamden Sericant at armes returned the sommoms of the lords & piers, who were called every one of them by name.

Then the lord Cobham was arraigned upon an Inditement taken the 24. of September last, for that he together with Sir Walter Rawley, & George Brooke, the 9. of June last at saint Partins in the felas did compass to depriue the King, and him and his to bringe to death, to cause slaughter, and stir rebellion, and the government, and Religion now established to change, and to subuert the estate, & to perswade strangers enemies of this land to inuade the same: to effect these treasons, the said 9. of June did meet with Sir Walter Rawley and did consult about inuasion, and rebellion, and to stirre up and depriue the King, and him & his to bringe to destruction, and to aduance Arbella Steward, and that he should intreat with Countie Arenberge for 6. hundred thousand Crownes, & there it was agreed that he the lord Cobham should go to the Arch-bispe to perswade him to assist Arbella, and Sir Walter Rawley agreed the lord Cobham should go to Spaine to perswade the king to assist Arbella, &c. As in the indictment to which he pleaded not guilty, and put himselfe to be tried by God and his piers, who found him guilty, & he had iudgment.

The 26. of November, Thomas lord Gray, was arraigned at Winchester upon an indictment taken the 24. of September at Satines, for ioyning with George Brooke, Sir Griffin Markham & Sir Edw. Parham knight, Watson and Clarke pylest, Barlemeu Brookesby squire, & Copley gentleman, the 14. of June last to compass the king to kill & depriue, the government & religion to change, & to perswade strangers to inuade, & to effect the said practices, the said 14. of June did meete at Westminster, & there did treat to bringe into their power the king & his son, & them to carry to the towre, & there to find money to maintain their action, & there would obtaine 3. things viz part of their prescription, toleration of religion, & to remoue some from the cosell, & if the towre would not be taken, then to carry them to Dover castle, & Watson the said 14. of June did deuide othes in writing to conceale their intent, & they did affirme the king was no king, till after his coronation, & did declare that to the Lord Gray & he assented, & conferred to effect these treasons, & how to take Grenewich, and to take the lords there & detain them, and then would carry them & the king to the towre; to Dover castle, and there imprison them halfe a yeare.

And the said day it was agreed at Westminster, that Watson should be Lord Chancelor: Brooke Lord Treasurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary, and that they would send for the Spaloz and Aldermen of London, and keepe them in the Tower, till they had giuen hostages not to hinder their en-surprised, & to effect more, the 18. of June they declared all this to the L. Gray whereto he consented, & there did toyne with them & there desired to be Earle of Marhall, & did conclude to effect the premises on S. Iohn Baptist day & that they would move others to toyne with them. And the Lord Gray, Brooke & Markham did consult that the L. Gray should obtaine the leading & conducting of 2000. soldiers for defence of the Iowle countries & should turne them to effect this intent, and the Lord Gray promised to procure 100. Gentlemen to ioyne with them and so farre of the Inditement.

The L. Gray made a long speech full of fine words but not to the matter. Then the Lord Steward spake to the Lord Gray, and willed him to answer boldly and without feare. Then to the piers, advising them though they stood on swyne yet to try indifferently betweene the king & the prisoner then to the kings counsell at law, willing them, not to confound the prisoner with vane coullarie matter. Serient Heale opened the Inditement, and maister at toyne answered the Lord Grayes speeches, and advised him not to vlie shifts, for they had not serued the other day the matter of shifts.

In the course of proceeding against the Lord Gray, it appeared by the examination of George Brooke, Mr. Griffin Markham & other, that he was acquainted with the kings surprise to haue bene at Hainworth or at Greenwiche, but the L. Gray stood upon it, that the conspiracy was not opened to him till after it was dead, & went no further to be proceeded withal, which was pious contrary, for the L. Gray afterward consented to bring an hundred gentlemen for that purpose, which he said was but to deliuer a petition to the King for reformation of some abuses in the common-wealth, neuertheless he lingered to attempt, for feare the Catholike faction should out goe his, & he saide he would haue his religion the superior: which seemed to be the reason why they did not attempt their wicked purpose: then the Lord Gray would haue extimated the fact, saying it was but a verbal matter and neuer to be effect & therefore could not be treason, but when the Iudges told him his fact was treason, he began to make an inuective speech against the law, which would not serue his turne, then the Lords went together and returning founde him guilty.

The 29. of November, Watson, & Clarke, Bishops were executed at Winchester, Watson first acknowledged his offence, secondly asked mercy of the king and state, desiring God to prosper both in peace and amity. Thirdly he was sorry, he had done so many into that act, wishing he had so many bodies as might satisfie his kings maiesty for all that had conspired & were in danger, & like to suffer so: that action, fourthly he forgave and desired to be forgiven of all, namely that the Jesuits would forgive him if he had written ouer eagerly against them, saying also it was decessioned by them whom he forgave if they had conspired & conspired had done him into that action for which he suffered, he desired also to witness that he died a true catholike, and all true Romanish catholikes to pray for him. Clarke in little differed from Watson, only he seemed not engaged in the action so much, he was done in by Watson, he said he had written a dialogue betweene a gentleman and a scholler concerning the obedience and loyalty of subjects towards their King.

and did therefore mention the booke, least happily if it were after printed it might not be thought to haue bene written by him, his death was with more penitency and constancy then Watsons was: he confessed he relied onely on the mercies of God, not his owne merits, desiring all christian Catholikes, & all which were in the unity of the church to pray for him.

Then both acknowledged that they suffered the iudgment of death, not for their religion, or their function of priest-hood, but for that they treasonable act, which the iudges by the lawes whose wisdomes they rather commended then would blame, had censured for treason, though their intents & hearts to God were cleare in that point, only Clarke said he knew not the certainty, yet he thought his priesthood at least by accident had hastened his execution.

George Brooke beheaded at Winchester the 5. of December, being brought forth vnto the scaffold, by the shrieve, and the bishop of Winchester to persuade him to dye well, after many good exortations and prayers by them vnto him, he uttered these few speeches, after a still kind of passion, with a very low voice, & cherefull countenance being by very few heard: That he would neither excuse, nor accuse any more for any matter of treason or practices against his king or state, but that he did assuredly hope that in time it would be knowne vnto the world manifestly discovered that he died free and innocent from any action worthy of death, and would not by any means seeme to acknowledge himselfe guilty, he desired the gentlemen, and those by him, to be witness to his last will and testament, wherein since his last act, had bereft him of all goods and landes, where withall he might benefite his beloued and deare wife, and children: he had nothing left to bequeath them, but only his earnest prayers to thalmyghty to bleesse and prosper them, which he did there earnestly offer vp vnto him, in the sight and hearing of them all.

He said to die it did not grieve him, neither was it in any sorte fearefull vnto him only his greatest care was that he should leaue his wife, and children, by his act wholly destitute and unprotected.

He was in the whole time of his being on the scaffold neuer sene to alter his countenance, or to make any shew of griefe, untill he came to talk of his wife & children, at which time the water stood in his eyes, and his countenance somewhat changed, for matters of religion he shewed himselfe a well deuoted christian, and in each respect obedient, and cherefull in his prayers, humbly desiring mercy and forgiveness of his sinnes, when he came to prepare himselfe to lay his head on the block, he told them, they must giue him instructions what to do, for he was neuer beheaded before.

Having laid downe his head, his hande being not sate, he rose againe, the headsmen pressing to helpe him, he put him from him, & called his owne man to do the last seruice for him he laid downe his head and had it taken off at a blowe, he was apparelled in a black damaske gowne, a suit of black latten with a wrought night-cap, his gowne being taken off it was deliuered to the shrieve's man, which the headsmen demanded, and being denied it, he made answer that but he had it, the shrieve should execute the office himselfe.

Here you must understand, that as soon as the arraignments were past, sed at Winchester, the privy council (to the number of fourtene or fiftene, of which company all of them had either bene triers of the noble men as their piets, or sitten as high commissioners upon the Gentlemen) were called before his Maiesty in his privy chamber at Wilton, where he commanded them to deliver (without respect to any person) the true narration only of the order in the trial of these persons, that had bene condemned by the Law, and of the nature and degree of their offences, as had appeared in every one of them by their severall answers. All which being clerely and iudly reported by them (each speaking in hearing of the rest) his maiesty, having concluded in his owne hart, in what manner to procede: and that without asking of any earthly person) it pleased him to resolve (betwene God and himselfe) that their execution should be stayed, even at the instant. And therefore, after the two priests were executed on Tuesday the 29. of November, and George Brooke on Sunday following his Maiesty on the same day, being the 5. of December, signed 3. warrants for the execution of the late Lord Cobham, Lord Gray, & Sir Griffyn Markham knight, with particuler direction to the Shrieve, to performe it on Friday after before ten a clocke in the morning, all these directions being now become notorious, both by the copies of Execution (which passed under the great Seale) and by the making ready the scaffold at Winchester, his Maiesty very secretly drew himselfe into his Cabinet, on Wednesday before the day of execution, and there privately framed a warrant, written with his owne hand to the Shrieve, by vertue whereof, he countermanded all the former directions, alleging the reasons therein mentioned. First his maiesty resolved it should be a Scottishman that should carry the warrant, being thereby like to be freed from particular dependency upon any nobleman, Councillor, or other their friends or allies. Next he resolved, to send a man of no extraordinary rank, because the standers by should not observe any alteration, nor the delinquents themselves should take any apprehension of such a mans being there at that time.

His being his Maiesties special desire that every one of them being severally brought upon the scaffold might quietly breath forth their last words, & true confession of his secret confidence. And so his maiesty made choice of Paister John Gibb, a Scottishman, a man that had never delt with any counsellour, or other, for suite or business, but one that had bene sent backe into Scotland, from whence he was but now freshly arrived at Wilton some few dayes before.

This party being by the King approved for an ancient trusty and secret servant, and a man little known, receiving the warrant secretly on Thursday, from the Kings owne hand, and telling his fellows that he must lye that night at Salisbury upon some private business of his owne, he rode directly to Winchester, and there keeping himselfe private all night, rose early in the morning, on Friday, and went obscurely to the Castle Greene, where the people flocking in all the morning, as the time drew neere, he put himselfe with the throng close by the Scaffold, and there leaned till the Shrieve brought brought by Sir Griffyn Markham to the place, who was the man appointed first to die.

Where Sir Griffyn Markham, having ended his prayers and made himselfe ready to kneele downe. M. John Gibb (while the Shrieve was preparing) to give secret notice of his charge called Sir Benjamin Tichborne, the Shrieve, and then delivered him privately his Maiesties warrant, with further directions, who he should see it.

Here upon, the Shrieve perceiving his Maiesties intention, so discreetly ordered the matter, as he only called Sir Griffyn Markham unto him on the Scaffold, and told him that he must withdraw him selfe into the hall, to be confronted with before those two Lords that were to follow him, about some points that did concerne the Kings service: and so carrying Markham into the Hall he left him there and went up to the Castle for the Lord Gray, who being likewise brought up to the Scaffold, and suffered to powze out his prayers unto God at great length, and to make his confession, as he would answer upon his soule, when he was ready to kneele downe to receive the stroke of death, Paister Theris came to him to stay, and told him that he must goe downe into the Hall for a while, and trilled him there to tary till he returned.

Last of all, he went for the Lord Cobham, who having also ended his devotion to God, and making himselfe ready to receive the deadly blow, the Shrieve caused both the Lord Gray, & Sir Griffyn Markham, to be brought back to the Scaffold, and there before them all thre that were condemned, and in the hearing of all the company, notified his Maiesties warrant, by which he was authorized to stay the execution.

The Lord Cobham (holding his hands to heaven) applauded this incomparable mercy of so gracious a soveraigne, aggravating his owne fault, by comparing it with the princes clemencie, wishing confusion to all men alike that should ever thinke a thought against such a prince, as neither gave cause of offence, nor tooke revenge of ingratitude.

The Lord Gray finding in what measure this rare King had recompensed good for evil, and forborne to make him an example of discouragement, and terror to all men that breather might attempt to breake the bonds of loyalty, upon the passions of any ambition, begone to sob and wepe for a long while with most deepe contrition, protesting now that such was his zeale and desire to redeme his fault by any meanes of satisfaction as he could easily sacrifice his life, to prevent the losse of one finger of that royall hand, that had dealt so mercifully with him, when he least looked for it.

Sir Griffyn Markham (standing like a man astonished) did nothing but admire and pray. The people that were present, witnessed by infinite applause and shouting the joy and comfort, which they tooke, in these wonderfull effects of grace, and mercy in a prince, whom God had inspired with so many royall gifts, for their conservation. Thus far out of a letter written by T.M.

A true copy of his Maiesties warrant, written with his owne hand, and directed to Sir Benjamin Touchborne, high sheriffe of Hampshire, for stay of the execution of the late Lord Cobham, Lord Gray, and Sir Griffin Markham at Winchester. 1603.

Althoug it be true, that all well gouernid and flourishing Kingdomes and common wealthis, are established by Iustice, and that these two Noblemen by birth, that are now upon the point of Execution, are for their treasonable practises condemned by the Lawe, and aduagist woorthy of the Execution thaireof, to the example and terror of otheris: The one of thaim hauing filthily practised the ouerthrow of the whole kingdom, and the other for the surprize of our owne Personne: Yet in regard that this is the first yeere of our Raigne in this Kingdom, and that neuer King was so farre oblest to his people, as we haue bene to this, by our entry here with so hairet and generall an applause of all sorts; Among whom all the kinne, friendis, and allies of the saidis condemned personis, vaire as for duart, and duetiful as any other our good Subiectis, as also that at the very time of their Arraignment none did more freely and readily giue their assent to their commition, and to deliuer thaim into the handis of Iustice, then so many of their neereft kinsmen and allies (as being Peers iuniere upon their Iurie, as likewise in regard that Iustice hath in some sort gotten course already, by the execution of the two Preists, and George Brooke, that vaire the principall ploteris and intisairs of all the rest, to the embracing of the saidis treasonabill Machinations, Vce thairefore (being resolu'd to mixe Clemency with Iustice) are contented, and by these Presentis commandyon, our present Sheriffe of Hampshire, to superseide the Execution of the saidis two Noblemen, and to take thaim backe to their prison againe, quibill our further pleasure be knowin. And since we will not haue our Lawis to haue respect to personis, in sparing the great, & stricking the meaner sort, It is our pleasure, that the like course be also taken with Markham, being sorry from our hairet, that such is, not only the heynous nature of the saidis condemned personis crime, but euen the corruption is so great of thair naturall disposition, as the care wee haue for the safety and quiet of our State, and good Subiectis, will not permit us to use that clemency towards thaim, quibill in our owne naturall inclination, wee much very easily be perswaded vnto.

On the 15. of December, Sir Griffin Markham, Bartemew Brooksby, and Antony Copely, with the Loydes Cobham and Gray, and Sir Water Rawley were all returned to the Towne of London.

In the former yeare, to wit 1602. the plague of pest. being great in Holland, Zealand, and other the low countries, and many souldiers returning thence into England, the infection was also spred in diuers parts of this realme, namely in the Citie of London and liberties thereof it so increased, that in the space of one whole yeare, to wit, from the 23. of December 1602. vnto the 22. of December, 1603. there died of all diseases (as was weekly accompanied by the parish clerkes, and so certified to the King.) 38244. whereof of the Plague. 30578. The xi of Ianuarie was Proclamation made for commons of a Parliament

ment to be holden at Westminster.

A conference graunted by the King, and Proclaimed to be holden the 12. of January, before his Maiestie, in his private Chamber at Hampton Court, betwene the Bishops and other of his Cleargie, was upon occasion deferred till Saturday the 14. of January, on which day was holden the first conference: Monday the 16. was the second, and Wednesday the 18. the third. Agents for the plinary plaitiffes, were Doctor Reynolds, Doctor Sparkes, Gaillier Knechtubs, and maister Chatterton, commandement was given by his Maiestie, that none should be present but onely the Lozds of his private Counsaile, and the Bishops, to wit, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Worcester, Saint Dauids, Elichester, Carlisle, and Peterborough; five Deanes, videlicet, of the Chapple, Westminster, Poules, Winchester, and Salisbury; who being called in, the doore was close shut by my Lord Chamberlaine.

The first day his Maiestie consulted with the Bishops about some speciall points, wherein himselfe desired to be satisfied, first concerning the Booke of Common-prayer, and diuine service used in the Church, second, excommunication in the Ecclesiasticall Courts: Third, the p'ouiding of sit and able Ministers for Ireland, &c.

The second day, the foure opponents brought in their complaints, who kneeling before Doctor Reinold, reduced all matters disliked to foure heads, and so into branches, all which was heard and answered by his Maiestie and the Bishops, to their contentments, as it seemed.

The third day, the Kings Maiestie shut up all with a pittie exhortation to both sides, for bntie, perswading diligence in each mans place without violence in the one party, or disobedience in the other: to which they all gave their binanimous assent, taking exceptions against nothing that was said or done, but promised to performe all duty to the Bishops as their reuerend fathers, and to toyne with them against the common aduerbsaries, &c.

The 29. of February at his house at Lambith, deceased the most reuerend Father in God (and my very good Lord) John Whitegift Archbishop of Canterbury, a man bozne for the benefit of his Countrie, and the good of the Church, wherein he ruled with such moderation, as he continued in his Princies fauour all his life, by surpassing such new sects as in his time began to rise, as his learned booke of purpose written by him against such Sectaries doth well appeare, whose aduancements for his good life, and sincers manners in the Vniuersitie of Cambridge, and in the common wealthe grew to these degrees. That he was (after some preferments taken in the Scholes, as Gaillier of Artes, Batcheler of Vniuitie, Gaillier of Peterborough house, Gaillier of Penbroke hall, Gaillier of Trinitie Colledge, and Doctor of Vniuitie, and twice Vice-chancellor, made Chaplaine to Quene Elizabeth, after Deane of Lincoln in the yeare 1572. next in the yeare 1577. he was endawed Bishop of Worcester, and shortly following, Vice president of Wales, upon the death of Grindall 1583. he was made Archbishop of Canterbury: in the yeare 1585. sworne one of her Maiesties private Councell, wherein he continued during his life. At whose funerall at Cropdon (where he had founded a famous hospitall) were mourners of the Nobilitie (besides the Bishops) the Earle of Worcester, and the Lord Zouche, which among other noble men had bene his pupils, when they were brought up in Cambridge, of whom I will say no more in this place, because I have before in the yeare 1600. said some what, and my good friend maister Francis Thinne, Lancaster Herald, hath also liberally treated of him in his booke of the lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury: and one of his Chaplaines hath for an Epitaph delivered the whole course of his advancements, with the place of his birth, in these verses following.

The fifth of March, was proclamation made for the authorizing & transcribing of the Booke of Common prayer, to be read throughout the Realme.

The Kings Majesty lodging in the Towre of London, on the 13. of March, after he had surveyed all the officers, fire-keepers, and the point, where both the King and Quene copied money, & gave to divers persons there present. Being told of the Lions, he asked of their being, and how they came thither, for that in England there were bred no such fierce beasts, whereunto was answered, that no mention is made in any record of Lions breeding here, notwithstanding Abraham Ortelius, and other foreigne writers do affirme that there are in England beasts of as great courage, as the Lion, namely the Spanish Dog. Whereupon the King caused Edward Allen, late servant to the Lord Admirall, now become the Spaniards man, and waiter of the Beare Garden, to fetch secretly three of the feeblest dogs in the Garden, which being done, the King, Quene, and Prince, with 4. or 5. Lords, went to the Lions Towre, & caused the lustiest Lion to be separated from his mate, and put into the Lions den one Dog alone, who presently flew to the face of the Lion, but the

the Lion suddenly threw him off, & grasped him fast by the necke, drawing the Dog by his eares & downe his eares. The king now perceiving the Lion greatly to exceede the Dog in strength, but nothing in noble heart and courage, caused another Dog to be put into the den, who proved as bolle & lusty as his fellow, and took the Lion by the face, but the Lion began to booke with him as with the former, whereupon the king commanded the third Dog to be put in before the second dog was spoiled, which third Dog more fierce and fell then either of the former, & in despite either of claws or strength took the Lion by the lip, but the Lion to loose the Dog by the eyes, head, and face, that he lost his hold, and then the Lion took the dogs neck in his mouth, drawing him by & downe as he did the former, but being wearied, could not bite so deadly as at the first, now whilst the last dog was thus hand to hand with the Lion in the upper rowne, the other two dogs were fighting together in the lower rowne, whereupon the king caused the Lion to be taken downe, thinking the Lion would have parted them, but when he saw he must needs come by them, he leapt claine over them both, and contrary to the kings expectation, the Lion fled into an inward den, and would not by any means endure the presence of the dogs, albeit the last dogge pursued eagerly, but could not finde the way to the Lion. You shall understand the two last dogs whilst the lion held them both under his pawes, did bite the lion by the belly, whereat the lion roared so extremely, that the earth shook to the hall: and the next lion ramped and roared as if he would have made rescue. The Lion hath not any peculiar or proper kind of sight, as hath the Dog, Beare, or Bull, but onely a ravenous kinde of surpising for prey. The 2. first dogs dyed within few dayes, but the last dog was well recovered of all his hurts: & the young Prince commanded his servant E. Allen to bring the dog to him to S. James, where the Prince charged the said Allen to keepe him, and make much of him, saying, he that had fought with the king of beasts, should never after fight with any inferior creature.

The 15. of March, King James, Quene Anne his wife, and Henry Frederick the Prince, passed triumphantly from the Towre of London, through his royall Cittie and Chamber of London, towards Westminster. The companies of the Cittie marshalled according to their degrees, were placed, the first, beginning at the upper end of Marke-lane, and the last reaching to the Conduit in Fleet-street, or there about: their seates being double raised, upon the upper part whereof they leaned: the streamers, ensignes, & banners of each particular company, decently fired. And directly against them, quite through the body of the cittie, so high as Temple-barre, a single raile, in such distance from the other, was likewise erected to put off the multitude: the king richly mounted on a white Gennet, under a rich Canopy, sustained by eight gentlemen of the Privie-chamber, for the barons of the Cinque ports, entered his royall Cittie of London, and passed the same towards Westminster, through 7 gates, of the which the first was erected at the East end of Fenchurch, over the which gate, was represented the true likeness of the notable houses Towres and Steeple within the cittie of London.

The second gate, a most sumptuous piece of workmanship, was loftily raised in Graffe-street by the Italians.

Canterbu-

On the 24 of December, as on Christmas day in the afternoon, the Reverend Father Richard Vaughan, Doctor of Divinity, Bishop of Chester, being translated, was installed by his deputy D. D. in Pauls Church, Bishop of London.

The 27. of December, 1901, a proclamation was made to prepare the Berlin Ports and ment till the month of October next following.

The 4. of January, John Philip-Harborn, brother to the Duke of Devonshire, was married at the court then at Whitehall, to the Duke of Argyll's daughter, whose father was lately executed: the king gave the lady in marriage.

Friday the 4. of January at afternoon, Charles Duke of Albemarle (a child of some 4. years old) second sonne to King James, Robert lord Willoughby, the lord Chandoy, the lord Compton, the lord Norris, William Cicell, beinge and heire to the Honourable Cranborne, Allaine Pierce brother to the Earle of Northumberland: Thomas Somerfield second sonne to the Earle of Worcester: Francis Manners brother to the Earle of Rutland: Francis Clifford, brother to the Earle of Cumberland: Thomas Howard, second sonne to the Earle of Northfolke: and John Harrington sonne and heire to the lord Harrington, were appointed to be made knights of the Bath, the earles of Oxford and Essex beinge esquires to the Duke, took their lodgings at Whitehall in the first gate-house going to Kings-street, where they were all after supper, at which they sat by degrees acroo on the one side, with the armes of many of them, over the lease where he was placed, and layed upon funeral pallies in one chamber, with their armes likewise over them, havinge their hattons provided for them in the chamber underneath. The next morning beinge Saturday, they went about through the gallery betwixt into the Parks in their German robes, the squillions playing, & the Spanish going before them, into the Court, and so into the chapel, and thers after solemn marchelles, like to the knights of the Garter, first to the Altar, and then to the chace of office.

every one took his place in the Gallies of the River, and heard solemn service, which done, every one with his Equires, went and offered: the Mayne of the Chaple in a rich Coat before the Balcon. After they went by unto their lodgings, as they came, and there were attired themselves in Robes of Crimson Tassels, with Hatts and white feathers, then they went backe to the great chamber, where the king sat under the cloath of Estate, and by him were there giued with the sword, & had the gault spurrer put upon them. This done, they were solemnly served at dinner, & after dinner went againe to the chapple, and there offered their thanks.

The next day being Monday, in Twelfth day, in robes of Purple Satin, with Whorls on their Shoulders, and Hatts with white feathers, they proceeded out of the chappell with the Duke of Albany (being then to be made Duke of Yorke) into the Hall where the king sat under the cloath of Estate, at what time the Harleins going before, the knights of the Bath followed after them, the Lord Chamberlaine Earle of Suffolk, in his robes of Estate going alone, then Henry Howard earle of Northampton, and Charles Blunt earle of Devonshire, carrying the robes of estate for the Duke of Yorke after Henry Wiltshir earle of Southampton carried the Coronall, George Clifford earle of Cumberland carrying the golden Rod: the earle of Worcester the Cap of estate, and the earle of Nottingham bare the Duke of Albany in his armes, supported by the earle of Dorset Lord Treasurer, and the earle of Northumberland, who all coming in this order before the king, the Duke of Albany, soon after the Harleins read, created Duke of Yorke, with the robes and Coronall put on him, and the golden Rodde delivered to his hand: all which performed they went to dinner: the Duke of Yorke and the earles sitting at one table in the upper end of the great chamber in their robes of estate, and the knights of the Bath by themselves at another table in the end of that chamber.

The 26. of February was an other Lion whelped in the Tower in London by the Spanish Ambassie, which was taken from the Dam as soon as the same was whelped, and brought by by hand according as the king commanded: but this Lions whelp also dyed about some 20. dayes after. In the month of March. Thus much of these whelpes have I observed, and put in memory, so that I have not read of any the like in this land before this present yeare, to wit, one, on the 5. of August, and the other, on the 26. of February next following.

One note more (not the merest) though out of place, and cometh late, in here to be set, as I received it at the hands of my very good friend Master William Seger, Garter, king at Armes, when all the former was passed the Harleins: and thus it followeth.

The right Honourable Roger Earle of Rutland, appointed by the Kings Ambassie to be Ambassador to his brother Christian 4. king of Denmark, returned to his country (in his behalf) the Christianizing of the said kings Sonnes, as also to present his Highness with the most noble order of the Garter: which he leav at the court at Greenwich on Sunday the 26. of June

June 1603. And on Monday embarked himself at Gravesend, in his Ships, 26. of June his ship called the Gouden Lion, being towship accompanied with nine knights, twenty Equires his friends and allies, besides, about one hundred Gentlemen and Women his servants and followers. 1603.

On Tuesday the 28. day, his Lordship set saile at Gravesend: on Wednesday at night we lost sight of land, and the weather being favourable, on Tuesday seaven night following we arrived and safely anchored within the Sound of Denmarke. On Thursday the 7. of July his Lordship landed at Elsenor, was visited and saluted from the king. On Friday he rested himself: and on Saturday took his journey to Copenhagen, where the king then was with seaven score wagons prepared for his transportation. His majestie having also sent two very faire Coaches, and some Gentlemen his servants to attend him.

By the way his lordship was met by Ramellius, & some other of the kings Councill, who by an oration made in Latin, saluted his Lordship with most kinde welcome, signifying that it was the kings pleasure, that himselfe and all his traine should be free of all charge during their abode in his country, and to that end had so ordeined, that in all the towne and villages where he passed, Wine and Beere, with other vittall, were plentifully and freely offered unto all men. This Oration was answered by Master Nanton, a learned Gentleman that attended my lord for that purpose.

That evening we came to Copenhagen, the Ambassadors & his brothers were lodged in the Court, and the knights & Gentlemen in the towne: that night the Earle was visited in his lodging by some of the kings Councill, and some complements passed betwene the king and the Ambassadors by messages onely.

Sunday in the morning being the 10. of July, my Lord was appointed to have audience of the king, and thereupon about the houre of nine, his Lordship set forth of his lodging, with all his attendants in very good order and richly beset, his Gentlemen of the better sort had a livery of Scarlet laine with fine or fine Silver laces about, & the meaner sort with as many guards of white Satin.

The kings Majestie stood on a halfe pace in a great chamber at the side of a square table placed under a cloath of estate of Crimson Velvet, he was apparelled in black, for he then mourned for his brother which dyed in Russia. At my Lords approach he uncovered his head, and descending the halfe pace, embraced my lord with much kindnesse, then began Master Nanton my lords Orator, his Oration in Latin, which he performed with great eloquence. And in handling the parts of his Oration, he first presented the king of Englands letters of credence, and deputation for the Baptizing of the Child, and then the Commission for the order of the Garter. All which the king received and read, and after a few instructions given by his majestie to Ramellius his counsellor, Ramellius answered the Oration pointly, with great learning and readinesse. After which the king discoursed a while in the Italian tongue with the Ambassadors, taking knowledge of the knights & gentlemen, who kissed his his Highness hands: and so proceeded to church, to the Chipping of the young Prince, in manner following.

The Streets of Copenhagen through which this royall proceeding should passe, were set with certaine Ensignes of Burgers, both of Shot and Pike: the kings Trumpets rid foremost sounding; then followed the kettle drums, then the kings household servants on foot, after whom followed 50. Gentlemen mounted on great horse, apparelled in black, who mourned as the king did, then came the Lord embassadoz attendants, followers and servants, accompanied with divers Dances on foot. The Bishop of Breame, with the deputies of Saxon, Brunswick, & Brandeburg, accompanied each other. The king, the lord embassadoz, and duke Vriek (the kings brother) rid all thre together. The Quene mother followed dressed in white, sitting alone in a chariot of Crimson Velvet embroidered & richly gaud, bearing the young Prince in her armes, the chariot was drawn with six white horse, sumptuously harnessed & plumed, and a guard of Suisses listed in red & yellow like, bore light torches therabout. After followed a spare chariot of purple velvet richly embroidered, & after it divers coaches of the Quenes women, apparelled in white like unto Prins. Thus with great triumph & rejoycing of the people (which were there in great numbers) they entered our Lady Church of that towne, where the baptizing was to be performed. The chancel was hung with crimson velvet and satin figured, & round about beautified with the fairest Ladies in great abundance, all riche in Jewels, and head attyres of Pearle, close dressed, but their garments were black and plaine. And truly in my judgment, both for habit & behaviour they seeme to be the most modest women of the world.

In the Chancell were erected two transees, th one for the Quene mother and the Prince, the other for the King and the Embassadors. After divers Anthems & Hymnes long, and continued with excellent Musick in great variety: a Bishop assisted with one Deacon in rich vestments standing before the Altar, began to read certaine prayers both in Latin & Danish tongues, which performed, the Bishop came to the Font, and the Quene mother being led by the Lord Embassadoz, and duke Vriek, brought the child in her armes to the same, and there she delivered the child to be held by the Lord Embassadoz, whilst she her self slipped back the head attire for the Baptisme, which the Bishop after certaine prayers performed, by putting water on the Infants head with the signe of the Crosse, saying, Name de Barne, which was Christian, done by the Embassadoz and the other Deputies, at the request of the King his father. All which accomplished, and the Quene mother with the Prince retired into her transe, the Bishop began a Sermon in Latin upon the Gospel for that day, which ended, the Trumpets sounded, and they royally returned as they came.

That day the king made a solenne feast to the embassadoz, and the other deputies, placing the Embassadoz of the king of England at the table end on the right hand of the Quene mother, himselfe sat on the right side of the table end, his Quene on the left: the duke his brother the bishop of Breame and the other estates were placed according to their degrees, and so were the

English

English knights & Gentlemen, as many as the house might containe. To be briefe, it were superfluous to tell you of all superfluities that were used, and it would make a man sick to heare of their drunken healths: he hath brought it into a fashion, a fashion made it a habit, which ill becomes our nation to imitate.

Monday the 11. of July the Lord embassadoz was entertained with the sight of the Kings Stable of horse, and with the Arsenall of storehouse of the kings munitions, which truly when it shall be performed, will be one of the most excellent provisions in Christendom. There was but one floor of it built, the other lay in their foundations, the habitation is of three levels, in the neermost is Artillery upon carriages, to neate and cleane kept, that the brasse is as bright as gould, and the Iron as black as Jet, the Bullets are built in piles according to their size, & all provisions so ready & necessary, as it is not to expect with words, what it is in forme, so is the middle storehouse of Ammours, Pike, & shot, Ensignes, Drums, & all martiall instruments els the top: 1. ft with Powder, Carbage, and other necessities is plentifully stored.

Tuesday the 12. day, was spent in seeing the king of Denmarks ships, and other compliments.

Wednesday the 13. day, my Lord embassadoz and his attendants having kissed the Quenes hand, & the young Prince, took their leave & returned frö Copenhagen to E. senor, by the way the king had the embassadoz hunted.

Thursday the 14. day, the king recreated the order of the Garter within the castell of Ellenor, which service was performed by William Segar Norroy King of Armes, unto whom the king gave a rich suite of apparell, & a chain of golde with his spedaigle hanging thereat: At the evening of the King, the Castell discharged fiftie canon, and the king of Englands ship lying beside the Castell, reported as many. That afternoon the king went aboard the English ship, and had a banquet prepared for him upon the upper decks, which were hung with an Awning of cloath of Laine, every health reported five, eight, or ten shot of great Ordnance, so that during the kings abode, the ship discharged 160. shot.

This Castell of Ellenor is a quadrant, and one off the goodliest fortifications in that part of the world, both for strength and most curious Architecture, and was built by Frederick this Kings father, there is in the same many Princely lodgings, and especially one great Chamber: it is hangd with Carpets off: & coloured like without gold, wherein all the Danish Kings are buried in antique habits, according to their severall times, with their armes and inscriptions, containing all their conquests & victories: the roofe is of inlaid woods, and hung full of great branches of brasse for lights.

Friday the 15. day, the king hunted, and by the way shewed my Lord certaine Water-mills (of his stone device) for the forging, hammering, and boaring of his Ordnance, both great and small: in which workes a dozen men did (with much ease) the offices of three or foure scope. The chase continued about two houres, the Deere being brought within foyles, were killed with speker-shot, to the number of eight or nine scope, the most part Stags. After which the king feasted my Lord in a lodge very royally.

Saturday

Saterday the 16. day in the morning, sixe or eight of the kings countell repaired unto my lord Embassadors lodging in the castell, and there in the presence of his lordship and his attendants, made a solemne protestation of the kings high acceptation of those labours & honours which his loving brother the king of England had done unto him, promising all princely requital, if it lay in his power, yielding likewise great thanks unto the Embassadors for his long and painfull journey to do him honour, and therewith presented his lordship with a faire Chaine and rich Jewell set with Diamonds & his picture also hanging thereat. Sixteen other chaines were given to the knights, and some of the gentlemen my lord's followers, and about ten of his specialles in gowls unto others.

The presents which the king of England sent unto the king of Denmarke were, A Collar of the Order, two very rich Georges set with Diamonds, & two Garters; & to the Quene, & Quene mother riche Carcanets and other Jewels, esteemed worth three or foure thousand pound Sterling.

That day Ramellius invited both the king and the embassadors to dine with him at his owne house nere the castell: & in his dining chamber had erected a cloath of estate of Crimson Sattin figured, with two chaires & cushions of the same, and upon the estate were set the Armes & Shies of both the kings, which before were not used, because the king received the order in his chamber, and not in his chappell. The cheare was great, and my lord being weary of those Bachinnall entertainments, took there his leave of the kings maiesly, intending that night to lye aboard, for his more speedy dispatch homewards: the king by no perswasion could alter his determination, and therefore after many embracements on either part, with kissing the kings hands, his lordship departed, and was accompanied unto the shore by his Maieslie, where the Winnetle and long Boate lay ready to convey him aboard.

Sunday and Monday we were becalmed in the Sound: and on Tensday the 19. of July we set saile for England, our ship saluting the castell, was saluted by the same: and the king standing upon a counter-lesse that lay into the sea, gave fire to a Canon with his owne hand for our last farewell. And truly I must say thus much of him, that for his royal person, & princely carriage, I hold him to be the goodliest King of Christendome.

Saterday the 30. of July, after we had bene fourtente dayes at Sea, carried by contrary winde, we landed at Scarborough in Yorkshire, and the 8. of August following, the Lord embassador came with his attendants, followers and servants to Hampton Court, where his Lordship and the rest, kissed the kings maieslies hand.

An. reg. 3. The 24. of March, D. Overall Deane of Paules, preached at Paules Crosse, being there present the Companies of the Citie in their liveryes, all praising God, & praying for the prosperous raigne of our soveraigne lord King James, and a Hymne was sung, & instruments sounded on the battlements of the church before the Sermon, the Guns were shot off at the Towre a great peale in the morning, & the like at none, the Bells in the Citie were rung, &c. The Court then at Greenwich, there was great triumph, running at the tilt, jousting, &c.

The

The right honourable Charles earle of Nottingham, Lord high Admiral, being chosen by his maieslie to goe ambassador unto the king of Spaine, to shewre the King into the League concluded, took his leave at the Court on the 27. of March, and on the 26. of March he set forward on his journey.

Thus good reader, have I brought this my Annales of England, (now lately enlarged) from the first coming of Brute into this Island (of whom it is said, it took the name of Britaine) untill this present yere of Christ our Saviour 1605. and the 3. of our soveraigne Lord James the first, unto whose maieslie I pray God to send a long and prosperous reigne over us, to Gods glory, and our comfort. And desire thus to take these and other my labours past in good part, like as I have painfully (to my great cost & charge) put of this book, & written of Charles the first, brought the same to light, and for thy great commoditie, bestowed them upon thee: in that thou shalt receive long lines by my labours, at the request and commendation of the reverend Father Mathew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, but he then deceasing, my toke was presented, by printing & reprinting (without increase, as well liking) of Raigne Wolke collection, and other late comers, by the name of Raphael Hollingshead his Chemician.

Of the Vniuersities in England, and Colledges in the same, with the founders, and principall benefactors.

I have before time reposed (saith Erasmus Roderdam) that England was so well furnished with so many men of excellent learning, but now I begin to enuie her felicitie, for that she is furnished with all kinde of literature, that by taking the commendation thereof from other Regions, shee may as it were marvellouslie obscure them. And yet this commendation is not as now first seen in England, in the which (it is well knowne) have bene of long time, men of great learning. The Vniuersities provide this to be true, which have for their antiquities length, are contented with the most ancient & best Vniuersities in the world.

Colledges

Colleges and Halls in the University of Cambridge, to the number of 21, endowed with lands and possessions for maintenance of Students in all manner of Sciences, firstly accounted according to the time of their beginnings, although at this day by the altering of foundations they are but 18. left.

First, the Philosophic Schoole above and beneath, sometime called the Schoole of Emulation (that is to say, the West-end of the same church) was builden at the charges of the Universitie, and other good benefactors, since the place of our Lord God 1136. The Schoole of Physicke, and againe that beneath Chappell, (that is to say, the North-end) was begun by the Universitie upon contributions and collections of sundry persons. And the same was finished in the yere of Christ 1400. by the recitours of Sir William Thorpe Knight, sometime chiefe Justice of England. The Schoole of Art, and once that the old Library (that is to say, the South-end) was made by the Universitie of the ruines of the old Scholes. The gate of the same Scholes, with the walkes on each side thereof, and the new Library (that is to say, all the East-end) was builden at the costs of Thomas Rochester Archbishop of Yorke, with some contribution of the Universitie in the yere of Christ 1470. And in the yere 1476. was purchased, as now it standeth.

Saint Peters Colledge, commonly called Peter House, was founded in the time of king Henry the third, by Hugh Balham prior of Ely, in the year of Christ 1256. This was after enlarged in the time of king Edward the second, by master Robert Lyring, who gave a house with the appurtenances wherein sometime dwelled the religious men called Freres de sacco or of ponencia lase (Arish); likewise another house was given by Robert de Ayle-sham master of Framlingham. But the indowment was given by the sayd Hugh Balham who was after the 15. Bishop of Ely, and died in the Colledge in Anno 1284.

rights, as well by him as by divers other good benefactors of latter time. At this day it is taken into Trinity Hall.

The Universite Hall or Colledge founded by King H. the eight. of the Universite of Cambridge, in the yere 1226. And the 19. yere of king Edward the second (maister Richard Badew being then Chancelor) upon a ground, thereupon bode two houses belonging of old time to the said Chancelor and Universite in Spinelstrate. King Edward the thirde in the 20. yere of his raigne, gave licence of Mortmaine to the maister and schollers of the said new created Colledge, to take lands and tenements to the yerele value of forty pounds for ever, for their maintenance in study, at the request of the Chancelor and masters of the said Universite. Since that it was much increased by maister Walker Thackelme maister of the same Colledge. But now it is united into the foundation of the lady Elizabeth de Burgo countesse of Clare.

The Kings Hall in Colledge had his first original of king Edward the first, who of his owne devotion maintained there for a time 32. scholars, in a table of learning and knowledge, who for certaine yeres after were payde their salaries or stipends, sometime by the sheriffe of Cambridge, sometime by the prior and convent of Saint Neotes or Needes, and sometime out of the Exchequer. But king Edward the third by his charter dated the seventh daie of October, in the 11. yere of his raigne, erected there a Colledge in the honour of God and his blessed mother s. Mary the virgin, and all holy Saints, to a master and 32. scholars, calling it by the name of the Kings Hall. The ground whereof he purchased of master Robert Croiland, and after inbowed it with lands and possessions, which he continued a Colledge till the time of king Edward the 3. who united the same to his new foundation of Trinitie colledge. Clare Hall was founded by the wife of John de Burgo Earle of Ulster in Ireland, daughter of sir Gilbert of Clare Earle of Glocestre, and one of the heires of sir Gilbert of Clare her brother the last Earle of Glocestre, she was first married to John de Burgh earle of Ulster in Ireland, after to Theobald of Berdon, and thirde to sir Roger Damary, and had issue by them all, the taking into her foundation the forenamed Winterstie Hall by the resignation of master Walter Thackelred master of the faide house, and the consent of master Richard Badew the first founder, called it all under the name of Clare Hall : and became the only founder thereof in the time of king Edward the thirde, about the yere of our lord 1347.

Pembroke Hall was founded by the ladye Mary of Valentia Countesse Pembroke, wife of Audomare de Valentia earle of Pembroke, and daughter of Guido Earle of Saint Paule in France, who obtained licence of King Edward the third (whose colen she was) to founde this Colledge of a scholar and thirtie scholars or more, at her pleasure: And to assigne them their habitation a place in Cambridge of her owne inheritance, with thre other messuages which she purchased, and 100. l. of yeerlie rent in advow-sons of churches for ever, and called it Aula de Valentia Marja. Anno 1347.

Arre The

The Colledge of Corpus Christi & our blessed lady, commonly called Bennet Colledge, was founded by the alderman and brethren of Corpus Christi guild, and the brethren of our Lady guild in Cambridge, at the instance of the first Henry Duke of Lancaster, who in the 26. yere of king Edward the third, obtained a licence of Papstmaln for the said alderman and brethren, that upon a messuage to them belonging in Cambridge, they might erect this colledge for scholars, chaplaines, and others, to be gouerned by a master, according to their rules and ordinances. By the same licence was also appropriated unto the colledge for ever the aduowson of St. Bennets church standing before their gate. This duke of Lancaster in the 28. yere of the said king Edward the third, was elected alderman of the said guildes, who recognised the statutes of the colledge not by the dukes seale, but by the seale of the alderman of those guildes.

Trinity Hall was of olde time an hostell or house of studie. And in the time of king Edward the third, John Cranden prior of Ely and his count procured the same hostell for their monks to studie in. To this house were adde three other dwelling houses by master Richard Ling Chancelor of the Vniuersitie, and Archibald of Norwich, master Walter Elueden, and master Simon Rekinghale parson of Kolesby, either of them one house. And in the 28. yere of the raigne of king Edward the third, master Robert Stratton, John Trunch, Walter Bakton, Walter de Aldeby, and Peter de Biterings, gaue toward the enlargement therof one messuage and seven pieces of bold ground. And likewise the said Walter Bakton, and Peter Biterings, and Thomas Walsingham, gaue one other messuage called Draxes entrie. All which being thus laid together, were after purchased by master William Bateman bishop of Norwich, who by the kings licence builded thereon the Colledge, as now for the most part it standeth, in the worship of the holy Trinity, and indow'd it with lands and possessions, and became founder thereof, though since it hath bene increased by diuers good benefadors: hee deceased at Autun in France (where he was sent on the kings message) the first day of Januarie, in the 11. yere of his consecration, and of our Lord God 1354.

Gonville Hall was founded by Edmond Gonville parson of Terington in Norfolk, in the two and twentieth yere of king Edward the third, who for that purpose obtained a licence at the suite of Sir Gualter de Manney, to erect a colledge for a master and twentie scholars, to be students in the art of Logike and other sciences, upon a ground where sometimes stood three houses and a garden in Lurthowplane, which he purchased for his money. And in the 26. yere of the same king, the house of that colledge was enlarged by the gift of two other houses, the one by the Chancelor and masters of the Vniuersitie, and the other by the master and brethren of Saint Johns hospitall in Cambridge. This Edmond Gonville at his decease hauing a good summe of money, commended the further finishing of the same colledge to master William Bateman bishop of Norwich, which he performed both in the buildings and indowment with lands, and caused it to be named Gonville Hall. At this day it is vniited into the colledge of doctors Caius, and called by the name of Gonville and Caius colledge.

The Colledge of Gos-house was first founded by master William Bingham parson of Saint John Zacharie in London, upon a tenement and three garden plats in Spinestrate, which he bought for his money, and procured licence of king Henry the first, in the twentieth yere of his raigne, to erect thereon his said colledge for 25. persons and a prouost, to be gouerned by such rules and statutes, as should be assigned unto them by the said William Bingham, and by William Wimbell, William Millington, and William Gull doctors of divinitie, and John Tilney doctor of Law, and the longest liuer of them. This colledge was chiefly erected for such as should profess the study of Grammar, whereof (as it seemeth) there was great want in those daies, not only in both the vniuersities, but also throughout the realme. In few yeres after St. Henry being determined to found his great Colledge of our Lady and St. Nicholas, obtained of the said William Bingham a resignation of that house and ground for his said new colledge, and in stede thereof gaue unto him two other places in the Preachers strate, belonging sometime the one of them to the abbot of Ely, and the other to the prior of Wey, wherewith he also granted a licence of Papstmaln for one hundred pound by yere towards their maintenance for ever. But shortly after the said William Bingham in the yere 1447. resigned unto the said king Henry the foresaid colledge, to the intent that hee should be accounted the onely founder thereof as he was indeed. But now it is annexed to Christs colledge founded by the lady Margaret comtesse of Richmond and Darby.

The Kings Colledge of our blessed lady and Saint Nicholas was first founded by king Henry the first, under the name of a Rectory and scholars, in the nineteenth yere of his raigne. And after in the one and twentieth yere of his raigne, he translated the forme of that foundation into the name of prouost and scholars. Edward the fourth in displeasure with the Colledge so much land as the founder had given them, and after restored them to the poorely valew of five hundred markes. After that king Henry the seventh finished the same worke of that notable chappell begun by king Henry the first, and king Henry the eighth finished the glazing, stalles, and pavement of the same. This colledge was begun by king Henry the first, to haue bene one of the beautifull houses in this city, the plat whereof is more particularly set out in this my Annales.

The Colledge of Saint Margaret and Saint Bernard, commonlie called Queens Colledge, was first begun by Duene Margaret wife to king Henry the first, and daughter of Reyner king of Sicilie and Ierusalem, who procured Papstmaln for the same of 100. pound by yere, in anno 1441. at the intercession of master Andrew Ducker, parson of Saint Botolphes in Cambridge, sometime principall of Bernard Hostell, which Hostell he purchased and gaue to the said colledge. And by his owne money and helpe of others, purchased certaine other tenements and builded the colledge, being the first president of the same: and gaue as well in his life time, as by his testament, diuers summes of money and parcels of land: procuring likewise certaine giftes of George Duke of Clarence, of Cicely Duchesse of Yorke, of Richard duke of Gloucester, and Anne duchesse of the same, of Edward earle of Salisburie, of Maule countesse of Arford, and Marmaduke Lomelle bishop of Litchborne, sometime Chancelor of the Vniuersitie. But the creation of this foundation goeth now in the name of king Henry the first, as appeareth by his charter dated the third day of December in the 25. yere of his raigne, who made the same vpon his owne ground, where now it standeth in Spilnesstrate, for one president and foure fellowes or mo, as the ir liuelode shoulde extend according to such rules and statutes as shoulde be deuised by Ma<sup>r</sup>. John Somersct, chancelor of the Exchequer, John Langton chancelor of the Vniuersitie, Richard Cawdreie, Peter Huford, Gilbert Northington, and Thomas Bolyn, and by the longest liuers of them. After all which, quene Elizabeth the wife of king E. the 4. made perfect the statutes of that Colledge, in the yere 1465. king Richard the 3. endowd this colledge, with 500. markes the yere laide.

Katherine Col.

Katherine Hall was founded by M<sup>r</sup>. Robert Woodlarke doctor of Diuinity, chancelor of the Vniuersitie, and p<sup>r</sup>osess of the kings Colledge, to the honor of our blessed Ladie and S. Katherine, the virgin and marty<sup>r</sup>, in the time of E. the 4. about the yere of Christ, 1475. for the number of one Master and three fellowes or mo, vpon a certaine messuage in Spilnesstrate, by him purchased, wherewith he also obtained of the said king a licence of mo<sup>r</sup>tymaine for 40. markes of p<sup>r</sup>ecely rent towards the ir maintenance for euer. Since it is enlarged by other good benefactors.

Jesus college.

Jesus Colledge was of old time a Monasterie of religious women of S. Kadegund, which monasterie being desitute of government, the offices fallen in decaye, the gods and ornaments of the church wasted, the lands diminished, and in conclusion a small number of nunnkes left, being but two, where of the one ready to depart, and the other an infant, were brought into such p<sup>r</sup>ouertie, that they were not able to relieue thei<sup>r</sup> selues, and therefore forced to depart and leaue the house desolate: whereupon John Alcocke bishop of Elye, obtained licence of king Henry the 7. in the yere 1497. to found in place thereof a Colledge to the honor of the holy Trinitie, and our blessed Ladie, and S. John the Euangelist, and S. Kadegund the virgin, for the number of one master, six fellowes, and a certaine number of schollers, to be gouerned by such rules and statutes as he shoulde appoint vnto them.

This John Alcocke was borne at Beuerley in Yorkshire, and builded a free schole at Eithkstone vpon Hull, and a chappell on the southside of the parish church wherein his parents were buried: he builded likewise a most beautifull monument in the great church of Elye, where himselfe lieth buried, and did in his time so many and so good actes, as would require a long treatise to set them forth. The rents of this Colledge, and the number of fellowes and schollers haue been more amplified at seuerall times by Sir Robert Resade knight, chiefe Justice of the common Pleas, doctor Elefon, doctor Roye Hon, and doctor Fuller.

Christ's College.

Christ's Colledge was first begun by king Henry the first, and after his decease by the lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond and Derby, daughter and heire of John Duke of Somerset, and mother of king Henry the seventh, in

In the place where sometime the Colledge of Gods-house stode in the Wyndesore strate, which colledge was first founded by William Bingham parson of Saint John Sabary in London and other, but because it came neerer to persection, he obtained of the said king her sonne his charter dated the first day of Aprile in the 20. yere of his raigne, and the yere of our Lord God 1505, to increase the number of students there, translating it according to her disposition, so that from thenceforth it shoulde be called Christ's Colledge, where in the allowed by her Will to the number of 60. persons, with seruants to them conuenient and necessary. Saint Johns Colledge.

The noble lady Margaret countesse of Richmond and Derby, being informed, that the number of religious brethren was greatly diminished, and now brought but to two, the house decayed, and the landes and goods wasted, procured licence of her nephew king Henry the 8. to erect in the same place a Colledge in the worship of S. John the Euangelist, but she being prevented by death, left the execution thereof to her executors Richard Foxe Bishop of Winchester, John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, Charles Somersct lord Herbert, afterward created Earle of Worcester, Sir Thomas Louell, Sir Henry Marney, and Sir John S. John knights, Henry Homeby, and Hugh Ashton clerkes, who with her goods finished the building, and with the remaine of the landes that was in the house before, amplified with her owne landes, founded the said Colledge for a master and fifty schollers, in the yere 1509.

But these buildings being left by the duke imperfect, were after brought to some better passe by the p<sup>r</sup>os of Elye, and the abbots of Ramsey, and Walden, and so continued a place of study for the moniks till the generall suppression of monasteries made by king Henry the 8.

At length the Lord Thomas Audley Baron of Walden, and Chancelor of England, founded there a colledge under the name of S. Mary Magdalen, and indowd it with possessions, in the yere of our Lord 1542. But being prevented by death, so that that he had begun, he left unfinished, Sir Christopher

In the Vniuersities of England (saith Erasmus Roterdame) there be cert. taine colledges, in the which there is so much Religion, so streight discipline, in such integritie of life, that if you did see it, you would neglect in comparison of them, all monkish rules and orders.

All the cities in England, manie Market Townes, and villages, haue free Grammar Schooles erected in them for the further increase of learning and vertue. Vertuous men haue to the perpetuall registering of their god names done these god deedes, learned men haue not barne all the doers. Some therefore for the supplie in other, of that which wanted in themselves, haue done likewise, all to this purpose: that vertue and learning vntied and knitt together, might in this our age make a learned vertuous worlde, haue done goodlie. It were much (they are so manie) in a small rounne to comprehend them, but the chiefe and woorthie patrones of the rest are.
